In our researches into the origin and early history of the Romans, we find that their early writers drew as largely upon their imaginations as did the writers of all the olden nations of antiquity, the story of Romulus and Remus is but a burlesque on common sense, and never could have been received but by an ignorant and barbarous people. It is now a matter of great doubt, among historians, whether such persons as Romulus and Remus ever existed. Some ancient historians, especially those of Greek origin, contend that a party of Trojans escaping from their beleaguered city, took shipping and started out on the hunt for a land far removed from their mighty and warlike neighbors, the Greeks, where they could hope to live in peace. They finally sailed up the Tiber and went ashore to hunt for food and to have a good time generally. A bold and daring woman named "Roma," wife of one of the Trojan Refugees, tired of being cooped up on shipboard, influenced the female members of the expedition to set the ships on fire in the absence of their male friends, who had by this time got tired of inactivity, and were about reëmbarking to continue their search for a better land. In those rude times the women performed almost all of the manual labor, and they found that a migratory life was, of all others, the worst for them. The men upon discovering what had been done, and finding also that all their "woman-kind" were alike guilty, although very wroth at the trick played upon them, concluded to accept of the olive branch held out to them by their wives and sisters, who, to appease them, made free use of tears, and all those blandishments that have rendered the sex invincible in all ages. The necessity of their circumstances obliged them to have recourse to the cultivation of the soil for their support. The land being fruitful, and the climate not to be complained of, they not only became reconciled to their lot, but were hugely pleased, and upon laying out a city called it "Roma," in honor of the cunning lady who had so effectually spoiled their chance of maratime explorations.

Notwithstanding that the Greek historians, in their endeavors to render the Greek name immortal by claiming to be the originators and first founders of the mighty Roman States, fixed up the most reasonable story to that end. Troubadores and minstrels—the first compilers of tradition—rejected any such easily accounted for origin as that of actual men and actual women having been driven by distress to the banks of the Tiber, and thus becoming the founders of so great a power, and chose rather, that origin that was based upon the ideal and marvelous. The most moderate among them claiming that the god Mars begat Romulus by Ilia, daughter of Æneas and Lavinia, two celebrated characters. But all ardent lovers of the marvelous swallowed without grimace the fable that "Tarchetius," king of the Albans, once discovered a huge Phantom rising up out of his hearth. This unwelcome presence showing no disposition to leave, the oracles of the goddess Tethys was consulted, who answered that some virgin must accept the embraces of the Phantom, the fruit whereof should be a son, eminent for good fortune and great strength of body. Tarchetius ordered his daughter to entertain the apparition. She, declining, sent her maid, who, proving more fruitful than the goddess expected, bore two sons instead of one. After many ups and downs, those two miraculously begotten children were finally set afloat upon the waters of the Tiber. The trough in which they were placed ran ashore where Rome now stands. A she wolf took upon herself the duties of wet-nurse, while the duty of general provider was performed by a woodpecker—a sacred bird of the gods.

It is humiliating to the intelligence of the age in which we live, that historians of our own times will not endeavor to burst asunder this veil of tradition, and procure for us some facts, instead of leaving the subject involved in such a mass of nonsense, folly and trash. Imagine for a moment what would be the answers of a class of juvenile students of history of our day, if catechised upon the origin of Rome:

Pedagogue.—Who founded Rome?
Juvenile.—Romulus and Remus.
Ped.—Who begot Romulus and Remus?
Juv.—A Ghost.
Ped.—Who performed the part of a mother to Romulus and Remus?
Juv.—A She-wolf.
Ped.—Who provided food for them in their infancy?
Juv.—A Woodpecker.

Great honor is due to that daring writer, Clodius, who, in his "Amendations of Chronology," affirms that all of the ancient records of Rome were destroyed when the Gauls, under Bremus, sacked and burnt the city, three hundred and sixty years after its foundation; and that those which are now shown as such were forged in favor of some ambitious Romans, who wanted to stretch their lineage as far back as possible, and thus be able to deduce it from names covered with (fabulous) glory.

The probability is that some daring freebooter of those rude and warlike days, gathered around him a strong force of "free-companions," and made war upon various petty nationalities in his vicinity, taking captives, and making the maids, wives or concubines, and reducing the males to slavery; this laying in the foundation of Rome a strong stratagetic point to occupy and fortify as a place of safe deposit for the spoils taken in their forays, to which they could return and rest in safety, when wearied with their hunts for prey, would be one of the first measures of an intelligent military leader.

Europe, at that time, was in possession of innumerable petty nationalities. The Greeks, Phœnecians and Carthagenians were all great colonizers, and innumerable colonies of those hardy maratime explorers dotted the Adriatic, the Mediterranean and Atlantic coasts of Europe, while the vast interior was in the precarious possession of numerous offshoots of most of the nomadic tribes of Asiatic and European Tartary. The disintegrated state of society was exceedingly favorable to rapine and plunder, by a bold and able leader of "Free-Companions." How much more reasonable to suppose that the foundation of Rome, the then-to-be future mistress of the world, was laid in this manner, than that two (human) cubs of a she-wolf should have that honor—if honor it be?

Of course, in the foregoing, it is not for one moment assumed that any modern historians preserve the she-wolf story but to illustrate the profound darkness in which the origin of Rome is enwrapped. That is well enough understood; the point in the mind of the writer is to show that there is no necessity to present the early history of Rome as hopelessly involved in fable, when a natural and reasonable origin growing out of the well understood condition of those times lies close at hand.

CONSUMPTION.

BY JINGO, C. B. & R. S.

This is a subject that comes home to every man's bosom. It is evident to the most casual observer, that most people consume more or less. We have traveled a great deal by land and by sea. We have journeyed over the great plains repeatedly, have seen the representatives of almost every clime beneath the sun.

I've traveled East, I've traveled West,
And I've been o'er the main;
Have borne the stranger's frown, and worse,
Have traveled home again.

and our conclusion has been, after mature deliberation, that all people eat more or less, either singly, in couples, or en masse. The intelligent reader naturally inquires why do people eat? The philosopher informs you with a grand flourish that it is because "it is necessary to supply the depletion of the system." This is a direct evasion—a cruel subterfuge. When we come to consider that at a very moderate computation one eight part of a man's whole life is expended in eating. The philosophical mind of the intelligent reader naturally demands a more comprehensive answer. There must be more than one reason for such a universal disposition throughout the world to almost incessantly gorge themselves, and there is. Some eat from compulsion, but the vast majority because they can't help it. We put this in plain terms in order that even the editor may understand it.

Dear reader, have the patience to follow us through a few figures. We observed, on a former occasion, that "figures can't lie;" as there may be individuals who failed to see this statement we reiterate it, figures don't lie. The reader may place the utmost confidence in the ensuing calculations, which are based upon actual ocular observations; and have been made with great care,—no pains nor expense having been spared to insure their accuracy. We will take for instance a man of ordinary consumptive capacity consumes say 7½ lbs. of food at each meal, however as we do nothing by halves, we will call it 8lbs. or to facilitate calculations we will call it, in round numbers, 10 lbs. Say, for instance, he devours 1 lb. of Sirloin, (we have known an individual to eat 5 lbs., but do not wish to base our calculations on extremes), also 4 medium sized potatoes, averaging say ½lb. each, making in all, 2lbs. of potatoes; of other vegetables such as cabbage, carrots, onions, peas, beans, etc. at a moderate computation, say 2lbs.; of bread, cake, pie, etc., 1lb.; of fluids, taking the year through, say 2½lbs., (in summer, much more), the ½lb. of which we will throw off, as we wish to avoid the use of vulgar fractions. Total, 8lbs., or in round numbers (we always prefer round numbers even in g–astronomy), say 10lbs. (Our own appetite being somewhat delicate, we have taken it as a standard. It is true we don't eat much at once, but like to have our meals regularly.) These 10lbs. are consumed, say, three times per diem., (in England, it is customary to eat much oftener.) This would make 30 lbs. per day, or in 365 days, 10950lbs., or, in round numbers, say 11000lbs., which make 5½ tons, or, in round numbers, 6 tons per annum. A temperate man who merely consumes this amount of food at regular intervals, would probably live to the age of 75 years; and, during that time, would manage to place himself outside of 450 tons, or say, in round numbers, 500 tons of food. This food, at 10 cts. per pound, the average price of beef and flour, would amount precisely to the snug little sum of $100,000. Ergo, when a man pays a dollar a meal and a dollar a bed for seventy-five years, he is regularly and systematically swindled out of exactly $9,600 by proprietors of boarding houses and hotels. We make it a rule never to visit such places as long as we have a friend in comfortable circumstances.

When we contemplate the fact that a medium sized individual, of average mental calibre, consumes in the course of an ordinary lifetime, say 166⅔ tons of solid food, and twice that amount of liquid food, making jointly 500 tons—to which must be added about four tons, for the extra amount usually eaten on fast days. We reiterate, gentle reader! when we behold such a man, and consider what he has passed though—and what has passed through him—and observe his rotundity and healthy aspect, and when we reflect that he is a self-made man, we are constrained to exclaim with the poet, "Man is fearfully and wonderfully made."

TERESE, THE HEBREW MAIDEN;

OR,

NOT ALL DROSS

BY EDWARD W. TULLIDGE.

CHAPTER XLIII.

MINE! IN LIFE OR IN DEATH.

No sooner had Donna Clara Garcia ordered from her house, in her wrath, the man for whom she would have given her life, than she would have given almost that life to unsay her words.

"No, no, Farinelli, I did not mean it; your cruel charges wrung my words from me."

"Donna Clara, I leave your house. You shall see me no more."

But the Spanish lady threw herself between him she loved and the door to interrupt his exit. He attempted to pass her, but she threw herself imploringly upon her knees. He attempted to raise her to remove her from his path, but she clung to him as she would have clung to life.

"No, no, Farinelli, you shall not; you shall not leave me thus. You shall not leave me to return no more."

"Donna Clara, you have ordered me from your house. I but wait to obey you."

"Forgive me! Forgive me! Oh, forgive me, Farinelli!" and still she clung to him in her distraction, for she feared, did he leave her now, it would be forever.

As a ship tossed at the mercy of the storm, is woman when the whole yearning of her life is crowded into the span of a moment's distraction. Her love is to her everything—not a fragment of her world. No wonder, then, that she clings to its object with a tenacity that knows not the logic of reason when the logic of her feelings overwhelms all. No wonder that even the good woman clings to a bad man—her husband—to the last breath; and no wonder that Donna Clara, a Spanish woman whose very essence was passion, should cling to Farinelli to prevent him from leaving her forever. We have nought to urge for the proprieties, but simply tell the story of Donna Clara Garcia, whose life has its tragedy as terrible as any which she had represented upon the stage.

But Farinelli had been somewhat playing a part, for he had determined to wring from the prima donna her knowledge of the retreat of Terese, and her ordering him from the house had given him the opportunity to be cruel.

"Rise, Donna Clara. I will not leave you thus, if you will tell me where my foster-sister is."

"I will; I will on one condition," she answered, rising.

"Name it, lady."

"Promise me that she shall never be your wife." The lady, it will be remembered, had exacted a similar promise from Terese.

"I promise you, Donna Clara; and I do it sincerely."

"But swear by all your hopes of salvation."

"I swear by all my hopes of salvation, that I will never seek to make my foster-sister my wife. I had already resolved it."

"Then I will tell you: she is in Paris with Spontini."

"Thank God. Then my foster-sister is safe."

"And now, Farinelli, you will return again. You will return again; will you not?"

"I must first seek my foster-sister, Donna Clara."

"No, no; go not to her. Oh, go not to her!"

"I must; but believe me, I shall not forget this night's scene. Lady, you have touched my heart. I dare say no more. Let us end this interview; and may heaven bless you."

"And you, Farinelli; may heaven bless you! We shall meet again in Paris."

They parted. The Spanish lady had more than half won the object of her life, and she returned to her gay party with a hopeful heart.

"Gentlemen, I am engaged for Paris."

"For Paris!"

"Leave Rome!"

"And upon such a triumph?"

Such were the acclamations which met this sudden announcement.

"May I hope for the pleasure of your company, Donna Clara? for I, too, go to Paris," observed the Marquis Baglioni.

"Delightful, Marquis. I accept the offer. And now, gentlemen, let us renew the festivities of the night. And then for Paris."

The party broke up at three in the morning. Their gifted hostess did all she could to keep up the spirits of her guests; but the gentlemen were evidently not pleased with the prima donna's announcement of an engagement for Paris.

Donna Clara felt much relieved when her guests had departed; for she was sick at heart with the brilliant nothings of the evening which her admirers had poured into her ears. One moment of passionate affection from Farinelli would have been to her worth a lifetime of admiration from noble gallants, whose favors she looked upon merely as a woman of the world. But to Farinelli, she was a woman of heart; and, after his call and the passionate scene that night with him, she ached to be alone with her thoughts.

When she had retired to her chamber, she approached a crucifix which stood upon the table near her bedside. She gazed upon it wistfully and seemed as though she felt a great impulse to fall on her knees before it and vent her heart in supplication, for love at that moment made her more religious; it purified her of some of the dross of her nature. But the spirit of an earthly passion triumphed over the gentler feeling, and the angel of evil drove from her presence the angel of good. She fell not before the crucifix. She took it in her hand not for a prayer, but for a great oath to which her whole being gave fearful response.

"Farinelli," she said, apostrophising the absent one, "You have sworn to me, to-night, by your hopes of salvation that she shall never be your wife. My oath shall now be added to yours. By this awful symbol of our church, I swear that you shall be mine! In life or in death, you shall be mine! At the altar or in the grave, my hand shall be your link."

And the Spanish woman kissed the crucifix. That solemn oath the angel of fate recorded.

CHAPTER XLIV.

A NEW MATING IN SIR RICHARD'S FAMILY.

We must return now to the Courtneys, whom we left in great trouble by the stern decision of the conscience of the two families that the Jewess and the Christian must not mate.

But not alone had come this decision. There was, as we have noted, by the united canceling of the betrothal between Walter Templar and Eleanor Courtney, a thorough disarrangement of the entire family intentions. Nor did the towering barrier of religions and races, which had, by the appearing of Isaac Ben Ammon into the action, so suddenly come between our hero and heroine bring about a return to the old engagements of the Courtney family. The betrothal once canceled with such conscientious solemnity in the minds of the cousins, it could never be reconfirmed, Walter Templar was the last man whom Eleanor Courtney would now have chosen to wed. She would as soon have thought of marrying her own brother as Walter. Indeed in renouncing the marriage engagement, he became to her precisely as an only brother. The very sanctity of the past relations made him more than a cousin, and their early associations and attachments confirmed the brother-and-sisterhood of their nature and family which existed between them.

There were also other phases of the case, as it now stood between Walter and Eleanor. A sense of pride and love had entered into the maiden's mind. To have married her to Walter would have humbled, not exalted, her. As we have said, Eleanor possessed the same lofty conscientious character as Walter, and it must be confessed the same touch therein of imperiousness. She was not haughty in a petty sense, but she had all that pride and dignity of sense which is so strongly marked in the old English aristocracy, who would torture their own hearts or go to the block, as became the peerage of a lofty nation, but not relax to save their heart from the torture or their necks from the headsman's stroke. This was remarkably illustrated by Elizabeth of England, when she signed the death-warrant of her petted Essex, which called forth from Henry the Great of France, the eulogy that Elizabeth alone could perfectly play the sovereign and it was also illustrated by Charles I, who would not, to Cromwell and the High Commission court, bend his dignity to save his head. Now, Eleanor Courtney possessed this same sense of lofty propriety and she would not have consented to the renewal of the betrothal with her cousin Walter, even had she loved him with the love that woman is capable of feeling for the one whom she is destined to find either in this or another life as her mate everlastingly. Had she deemed Walter that one, she would now have refused him until he had come round to feel that she was his other half—his necessary link for self-completement. Had she felt him hers in this sense, still she would have given him to Terese, under the circumstances, leaving it to the hereafter to bring about the eternal union of spiritual fitness, when the crossed circumstances of this life are swept away and the self-parts come together as though all things had a pre-ordination. It is thus somehow or other that women of fine sentiments everywhere philosophise touching their yearnings for their own mates, when they find crosses in their love or unfitness in their marriages. And in this matter, though they may not be so practically sound as men, they are more sentimentally wise.

But the revocation of the betrothal had brought Eleanor Courtney to the subject of love in its positive phases. In questioning her own heart closely, she found that she loved Walter as an only brother; and that she did not feel that yearning towards him as for the one destined to be her eternal mate. She realized now the investigation of the matter was so peculiarly pressed home that Walter was too much like her own self. They were the two positive natures, and not capable of that beautiful blending of kindred natures in opposites. That law of kindred is not only physiological, but also psycological. We find it everywhere in nature illustrated; and the fitness of the sex for a union is one of its examples; and that example has its finer details. This law was forced upon Eleanor Courtney's perceptions by her own circumstances, and she felt before her reason sensed it, or her delicacy worded it to herself that Frederick De Lacy, not Walter Templar, was her fitting mate. Every peculiarity of character which had so harmonized Walter and Frederick in their life and friendship, fitted Eleanor Courtney and young De Lacy for a corresponding union. Eleanor and Frederick, excepting in the sex, were almost identically Walter and the De Lacy over again, or Sir Richard and his dead friend repeated now exactly in their children just as they had first intended. Their mating was simply in their case a transposition from Frederick and Alice to Frederick and Eleanor.

Moreover, as already hinted, the disarrangement of the union in one case in the family of Sir Richard Courtney had disarranged the union in both cases between the young folks. Sir Richard and his sister, Lady Templar, in resigning the one case to the choice of the heart, had resigned it in both cases and given up their entire scheme of mating their children. Philosophically, they now realized that these family matings by arbitrary rule were wrong and productive of disappointment, and they conscientiously abandoned their purposes. All this, the young people felt: indeed, Sir Richard gave them to understand as much and that they were all left free to follow the bent of their own choice. They now, therefore, felt themselves unembarrassed and relieved from the ties of all former engagements.

This new state of affairs in Sir Richard Courtney's family brought Frederick De Lacy and Eleanor into another circle of relations. They gravitated towards each other by mutual impulse rather than design, and soon realized their remarkable fitness for a union of souls. At first Frederick De Lacy was startled —aye somewhat shocked by the discovery, for in the buddings of really the first passion of his life, it seemed like treason to the former matings. He schooled his heart severely upon the matter and repeatedly resolved to keep aloft from Eleanor, but in a few hours he found himself unwittingly by her side again. At length he became reconciled in his conscience to these new circumstances, for it is easy to become reconciled to that which our hearts desire. This in the case in question was also the more readily brought about by the fact that Sir Richard Courtney evidently did not disapprove, but looked on with a favorable eye. Walter Templar was also evidently gratified as far as Eleanor and Frederick was concerned, with this providential turn of affairs. As the case now stood the young De Lacy was fairly in love with Eleanor Courtney.

Six months had elapsed since the announcement that the Jewess and the Christian must not mate, Walter had fallen into his misantrophic mood. He shunned all company and all association even to that of his uncle Courtney. It was the first time in his life that there had not been unreserved communion between Walter and Sir Richard. The noble uncle regretted this much, but he could not intrude upon the deep afflictions of his nephew, but he trusted that time would soften the stroke. Fred's alone was the only presence, excepting that of one which did not disturb rather than sooth Walter, but even with him he exchanged only a few words, from month to month, of that summer and autumn after his return from Italy. To Fred he would sometimes give, with a fervent grasp of the hand, a prayer that no cloud might darken the future of his friend and Eleanor, so that the lovers knew that Walter in his gloom was not unmindful of their happiness. This fact gave Eleanor much satisfaction, but she mourned over her cousin, though she approached him not, while Fred would often sadly remark to her:

"Walter is indeed now as Night shorn of all her splendor—no moon, no star in his sky."

For hours each day, Walter Templar would roam alone in the noble park of the Courtney estate in Somersetshire. Amid the solitary oaks that towered to the sky, he found Nature in harmony with his own mind; and when Autumn came along, and the leaves fell, he experienced in the grand solitude of the park a fitness with his own state. But there was the one other presence that often hovered around him: it was that of his cousin Alice Courtney.

Oftentimes, in the park, Walter and Alice would meet. He would speak to her gently, for he seemed to realize that she was not long for this world. Sometimes he would gaze upon her mournfully, with this impression upon his mind, and then, taking her by the hand, he would walk with her among the fallen leaves of the trees, like two doomed ones who had seen their last Summer of life. They in these walks exchanged but few words, though Alice felt supremely happy; but her presence never made any claim upon her cousin, and as he never dreamt of any new love, and looking upon Alice almost as a spiritual creature from another sphere, this tender association startled him not. Sir Richard Courtney and Lady Templar, however, anxiously marked this association, and already had began to hope for a union between Walter and Alice.

In the meantime, Terese Ben Ammon was in Paris with her master, Spontini, following her profession, and dreaming, in her pious reflections, of a union with Walter Templar in the better life to come. Farinelli was also there, and so was Donna Clara Garcia. There we shall meet them by-and by; and there we shall meet the Angel of Death, hovering over one of the characters of our story.

CHAPTER XLV.

SAVED FROM DEATH.

We now come to an incident between Walter Templar and Alice Courtney.

It was Autumn; Alice Courtney and Walter were taking a ride in the park. The horse which Alice rode was usually gentle, though high-spirited; but it was the maiden's favorite, and the noble creature knew the hand of his gentle mistress. The maiden had pursuaded her cousin to a ride, but they trotted along side-by-side, each wrapped in self-communion. There was, however, a yearning in Alice's heart towards her somber cousin, painful from its very speechlessness. She was beginning to understand its secret voices. This occupied her thoughts to-day.

The gentle Alice would never have allowed her mind to so run upon her cousin Walter had not the interruption of the union between him and Terese occurred, coupled with the changed circumstances in her own family touching the old betrothals. But the sorrows of her cousin Walter had drawn her towards him, and that etherial state of nature into which she was fast hastening, made her peculiarly susceptible to his griefs. She felt herself less of this world than of the world to come, and the office of a ministering angel seemed the one more fitted for her than that of a bride of earth. Already a deep conviction had taken possession of Alice that she would die young, though she sought to hide this fact from her father and sister Eleanor. Hence she was not drawn towards the gallant young Lord Frederick De Lacy, for he was in manhood's rich bloom, and was palpably a being of earth, notwithstanding the purity of his native character. He was in the Spring of life, while she, though young, was in life's Autumn. But the grand somber state of her cousin Walter possessed a charm for the spiritual Alice, for he was like the night into which she was fast hastening. There was the morning after the night, but the night came first; and when that morning broke, she saw herself, in fancy, hovering over her cousin Walter a guardian spirit to him.

Such fancies as these filled Alice Courtney's mind as her horse trotted along by the side of Walter Templar. Suddenly, from the underwood, as they rode through the park, a fierce hound rushed upon the noble steed which Alice rode, and his deep-mouthed bayings frightened the spirited creature into an ecstasy of madness. Before the rider had fairly awoke from her dreams, the horse, feeling no resolute hand to check him, had bounded away like a sudden whirlwind, and as he flew along his hoofs seemed to shake the very ground beneath, while the fierce hound pursued like a demon just set loose upon its prey. Before Walter Templar could take in the situation, his cousin Alice was several hundred paces from him. He put spurs deep into the sides of the mare which he rode, and she started with all her speed to the rescue, but Alice's horse gained ground every moment. More than a mile had been made in the mad flight, but the maiden's horse showed no signs of stopping, for the voice of cheer which Walter sent after his cousin increased the animal's fright, which the young man perceiving, produced a silence broken only by the feet of the flying steeds. At length Walter became alarmed, for he thought he saw Alice reel several times in her saddle, but she recovered herself again, for she perceived a danger before her which now struck dismay to the heart of her cousin. The horse in his mad flight was approaching a deep ravine which nature had formed near the boundaries of the park, and certain destruction seemed before the maiden. Walter, no longer able to contain his speech in the excitement of the fearful crisis, almost shrieked, in the full compass of his trumpet voice:

"Alice, from the saddle—from the saddle! Throw yourself from the saddle!"

It seemed the maiden's only chance from death, and though a confused leap from the saddle of a flying steed might have injured her, it was preferable to being dashed to pieces in the deep ravine. But no; Alice threw herself not from the saddle, perhaps because she took not in the import of her cousin's wild words. It was too late, the horse was within a few bounds from the edge of the chasm—another moment and surely all will be over.

Just then came another wild cry, with such a might of declamatory power that his voice rang like that of an archangel's voice from the skies:

"Alice, firm to your seat! Firm to your seat! 'Tis I, Walter!"

Alice gathered strength at her cousin's cry, while the steed, electrified by it into a demoniac fury, took the fearful leap, threw the maiden over his head on to a thick bed of fallen leaves on the other side, and then brought suddenly up by a giant oak, reared upon his haunches and fell back to be dashed in pieces down the deep ravine.

"My God—my God!" burst from Walter, who for an instant thought that Alice had been carried to the dreadful death with the horse, but the joyful shout of a woodman on the other side: "All right, Sir Walter!" brought him to the truth, and saved him from the leap which most likely would have been his destruction. Then, turning the head of the noble mare which bore him down towards a narrower passage of the ravine, which he knew was near, he barely cleared the chasm and reached in safety the other side. In a moment more he was dismounted by the side of his gentle cousin, and her head was pillowed tenderly upon his bosom.

His trumpet voice had saved her, for it reassured her, and frightened her horse seemingly beyond a mortal creature's leap. For an instant the steed was as a winged thing; the next, a bloody mangled corse at the bottom of the ravine. We have spoken often of Walter's extraordinary voice, and his operatic practice in declamation had now almost wrought a miracle.

The woodman hastened to a bubbling stream close at hand, and filling his hat with cooling water brought it to our hero, who sprinkled it copiously upon his cousin's burning brow, while the peasant, with delicate tact, retired at a distance among the trees.

Alice Courtney revived from her swoon for a moment to find herself on the bosom of her cousin Walter. She looked up into his face with an angel's smile, and then resigning herself to the blissful ecstasy of the situation, her spirit returned again almost within the gates of the other world, where her soul was hastening. Her cousin, finding that she had relapsed into a death-like state, called the woodman to him. With assistance of the peasant, Walter placed Alice in the saddle of the brave mare which had borne him to the rescue, and the noble creature, by her gentleness, seemed to realize all which had happened. Walter then mounted the steed and took his cousin like a child in his strong arms and bore her to Courtney House, avoiding the ravine in their homeward course. The family of Sir Richard was shocked by the accident—there was a new trouble in store for their generous hearts.

CHAPTER XLVI.

THE LAST HOPE.

It was a week after the date of the incident related in the last chapter. Alice Courtney had passed through a critical state, and now her life still hung as upon a thread. The family physician had just left her chamber. Sir Richard led him into a private room; Lady Templar followed the two gentlemen, for she was as anxious to hear the candid opinion of the man of science.

"Dr. Cooper, you understand a father's anxious heart for his darling."

"I do, Sir Richard."

"You will answer me without reservation?"

"I hope for the best, Sir Richard."

"Nay, Doctor, but speak as you think," urged the afflicted parent. "Tell me, will my child live?"

"My brother would know the worst, Dr. Cooper," added Lady Templar. "Tell us truly, will the child live?"

"Her life is in the hands of Heaven, Lady Templar."

"Then I am to understand there is no hope for my darling?" observed the baronet.

"Not so, Sir Richard. There is a hope—only one hope. But it is not in my power to bid you hope. Sir Walter Templar can alone give you that."

"Your thought runs with my own, Dr. Cooper," remarked Alice's father; "and it was to find out your view of this delicate case that we now consult you. My sister and myself have talked over the matter many an hour during the past week, and we resolved to-day to speak to you."

"I am glad of this, Sir Richard. I have marked the words of your daughter in her moments of delirium, and the object of all her fancies. Sir Walter Templar is that object."

"My sister and myself have noted the fact, and it has been the subject of our deep consideration. She fancies herself the spirit bride of her cousin."

"Let Sir Walter Templar make her his bride of earth and she may be saved," said the physician. "Yet I will not conceal from you the fact, Sir Richard, that your daughter inherits the seeds of consumption from her mother, but offspring might prolong her life for many a year. It is the only hope, and I have said it rests with your nephew to confirm it."

"Brother Richard, we must now speak to my son," here observed Lady Templar.

"Knows Sir Walter aught of his cousin's fancies," asked the physician of the mother.

"Once my son heard the words of Alice in speaking of herself as his spirit bride, but he has made no comment upon it, nor has he since entered his cousin's chamber, though he almost hourly makes inquiries concerning her."

"Sir Richard, you must speak to your nephew. If all be well, a short interview between him and your daughter may be granted. Upon it her life depends. But tax not the strength of my patient much, barely enough to give her hope. In the morning I will call again. Adieu, Sir Richard. Adieu my lady; and may all be well."

"Heaven grant it, Doctor!" responded the afflicted father.

Sir Richard Courtney next sought his nephew. The noble baronet was troubled in his sense of propriety; but it was for his darling's life he was about to plead. He would perhaps have hesitated long, had it been to any other man than Sir Walter Templar. He did not doubt for a moment that his nephew would give to him back his daughter's life; but, knowing our hero's love for Terese Ben Ammon, he felt it almost sacrilege to attempt to root it from his heart, but his child's life was at stake, and Walter's mother urged him to make the appeal.

MAN'S REQUIREMENTS,

Wilt thou be mine, sweet maiden?
O, wilt thou be my bride?
My spirit, sorely laden,
For such a love has sighed!

Yet much as I admire thee,
I first would rather see
If all that I require thee
Thou likely are to be!

Thou'lt share my joy and sorrow,
Thou'lt love me well and long?
Thou'lt teach my soul to borrow
Fresh comfort from thy song?

Ah yes! but there is more love,
That I of thee desire—
Which (as I said before love)
I should of thee require.

Wilt never have cold mutton
My appetite to hurt?
Wilt never let a button
Be missing from my shirt?

Wilt never let a hole be
Undarned in sock of mine?
Then mistress of my soul be;
Sweet maid, I'm ever thine!

Gertrude Mazurka.

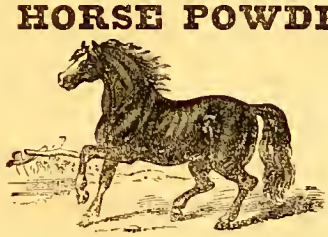
HARVELL'S
HORSE POWDERS.



These celebrated and renowned powders for horses and cattle have been tested by an intelligent public for sixteen years. Hundreds of the principal horsemen of the Union have pronounced them the only Condition Powders safe to use and work the horse. There is nothing in them to expose the animal, but, on the contrary, everything to improve them. The proprietors of horse railroads, omnibusses, and stage owners in all the principal cities use them; and their combined testimony stamps them one of the wonders of medical science. Letters sufficient to fill a small book are in our possession, testifying to their goodness. Merchants are requested to warrant them, and refund the purchase money should they fail to give satisfaction.

ALLCOCK'S POROUS
STRENGTHENING
PLASTERS.

ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS are the results of studies and experiments of Dr. Schecut, of South Carolina; of Dr. Wm. Wagstaff, now Baron Wagstaff, of Horace H. Day, the distinguished manufacturer of rubber goods; and of Thomas Allcock, Chemist and member of the College of Pharmacy of New York, now General Allcock, etc., etc.

Step by step this commodity has attained its unprecedented fame. They are universally approved. They support, strengthen, and aid the growth of muscles. They appear to have a peculiar effect upon the nerves, allaying irritability, while supplying warmth. They seem to accumulate electricity, and aid the circulation of the blood through the part where applied, by which healthy actions are induced.

Even in paralysis, where articulation was suspended, the use of the Porous Plasters to the spine restored the articulation, and materially reduced the paralysis. In fact, the patient could help herself, while before the Porous plaster was applied she was as helpless as a baby. We refer to Mrs. Sally Elliot, Springfield, Mass.

Dr. Myer, of Savannah, Ga., says they are the best mechanical supporters for weak muscles ever discovered; that by their warming properties they bring power and health, until the strength of the muscles are entirely restored. That he knows a case where Allcock's Plasters cured a gentleman of a weak spine. That he daily prescribes them in his practice with the happiest results, and desires us to refer to him.

Dr. Henderson, of Farnsville, Louisiana, says:
"The counter-irritant effect of Allcock's Porous Plasters is produced in such a mild and gradual way, they so invigorate the circulation around the parts to which they are applied, and exert upon all nervous diseases such a great sedative influence, that I place them confidently at the head of every plaster now in use."

Dr. Johnson, of Hartford, says.
"My daily experience confirms the very superior excellence of your Porous Plasters. At this moment of writing, a man applies for one, who, by entanglement in a shaft of machinery, had both his legs broken, spine severely injured, and was for nearly a year entirely helpless. This man found relief very soon by the application of a plaster to his spine. He was soon enabled to work, and now he labors as well as ever. He would cheerfully pay five dollars for a single plaster, if they could not be had at a lower rate. Surgeons should make use of these perforated plasters, to the exclusion of all others, as their flexibility and adhesiveness are greatly in advance of all other plasters with which I am acquainted, while the perforations peculiar to them render them greatly superior to all others for ordinary surgical uses. Knowing the plasters to be so useful, I have no scruples that my sentiments should be known.
J. W. JOHNSON, M. D."

Dr. Sterling's testimony:
"For two years, I have been a great sufferer from neuralgia in the head, and found only temporary relief from all the various remedies that I have tried, until I applied one of Allcock's Porous Plasters. I cut it into three strips, placing one under each shoulder blade, and the other over the small of the back; and for the past three months, I have had scarcely a twinge of the old pain.

I advise all who suffer from nervous diseases to lose no time in making a trial of the wonderful Porous Plaster.
A. F. STERLING, Sec. Singer Mfg. Co.
New York, June 8, 1868.

MEDICINAL QUALITIES
—OF THE—
POROUS PLASTERS.

The Porous Plasters possess the soothing, warming and sustaining qualities of the combined plasters of the dispensatories. An Electrician, who has great experience of their effects in Local Rheumatism, in Tic Doloreux, and deep-seated nervous and other pains, and in affections of the kidneys, etc , etc., attributes all their sedative, stimulative and pain-relieving effects to their ELECTRIC qualities. He asserts that they restore the healthy electric condition (equilibrium) of the part, and that being restored pain and morbid action cease. He was amazed at the great number of beneficial indications produced by one of these plasters. He affirms that Head-ache is cured by one worn just below the breast-bone; that one placed over the navel will cure hysterics, as well as dysentery, and affections of the bowels.

PATENT

ARION PIANOFORTE

GRANDS AND GRAND SQUARES,

7⅓ OCTAVES.

The "ARION" is the very best Piano for the Great West, because it stands in tune longer than any other Piano. t requires no repairing or regulating; shipping any distance, or dampness does not affect them.

WHY?

It commences where the "First Premium" Makers stop, and upon the most improved Modern scale makes four patented improvements; which make the Arion more simple, yet stronger; increasing its volume and beauty of tone, while rendering the instrument more enduring.

WHAT THEY ARE.

First. The patent Arion Reversed Wooden Agraffe Bridge, which retains all the purity of tone only found in a wooden bridge (the rest whereon the strings lay), and obtains all the solid prolonged strength of tone of the metal Agraffe, without that acute metalic noise which the metal Agraffe develops by use.

Secondly. The Fatent Arion Compound Wrest-Plank, which holds the tuning pins, is six thicknesses of hard maple, the grain of each layer runs in a different direction. The advantages are, the 20 tons strain of the strings cannot split our Arion wrest-plank, as frequently happens in other Pianos, and when people say "My Piano won't stand in tune," all other makers must use the single wrest plank with the grain running only one way.

The Arion Tuning-Pins have end wood to hold them on every side, while all other makers can have it only upon two sides of their pins.

Thirdly, The Patent Arion Diagonal Sustaining Bar, extending parellel with the steel strings under the over strung Bass strings. The Arion is the only Piano wherein the enormous strain of the large steel strings is resisted in the natural place and direction. Using this bar renders the weakest part in all other over strung Pianos the

STRONGEST IN THE ARION.

THE ARION STANDS UPON ITS OWN MERITS.

unsupported by either buncome, weak facts, or useless or complicated Patents. We append a few unbought opinions of those who

KNOW THE ARION.

The Musical Director of the New York Conservatory of Music, Edward Mollenhauer, says: "The Arion I bought of you is the best Piano I ever played on: that rolling bass and silvery treble, etc."

John H. Woods, Piano Dealer, Oswego, N. Y., says: "The tone is truly immense, and surpasses anything in the shape of a Piano we ever saw or heard of, etc."

Horace Greely said: "The Arion is the best Square Piano, superior for its clearness and brilliancy of tone," &c.

Louis Wagner, Fort Leaverworth, says: "My Piano arrived here in splendid order. Its tone fills my parlor with melody—it is the wonder and admiration of all who hear it. Miss ——, who is teaching the Piano desires me to order one for her," &c.

Our friends will find at Mr. Waters' store the very best assortment of Pianos, Melodeons and Organs to be found in the United States.—Graham's Magazine.

MUSICAL DOINGS.—Since Mr. Waters gave up publishing sheet music, he has devoted his whole capital and attention to the manufacture and sale of Pianos and Melodeons. He has just issued a catalogue of his new instruments, giving a new scale of prices, which shows a marked reduction from former rates, and his Pianos have recently been awarded the First Premium at several Fairs. Many people of the present day, who are attracted, if not confused, with the flaming advertisements of rival piano houses, probably overlook the modest manufacturer like Mr. Waters; but we happen to know that his instruments earned him a good reputation long before Expositions and "honors" connected therewith were ever thought of; indeed, we have one of Mr. Waters' Piano-fortes now in our residence, (where it has stood for years,) of which any manufacturer in the world might be proud. We have always been delighted with it as a sweet-toned and powerful instrument, and there is no doubt of its durability; more than this, some of the best amateur players in the city, and several celebrated pianists, have performed on the said piano, and all pronounce it a superior and first-class Instrument. Stronger indorsement we could not give.—Home Journal,

Dr. CADY'S CATARRH REMEDY.

A CERTAIN CURE FOR CATARRH AND ALL Mucous Diseases of the head, nose and throat.

This is a Medicine never before used or known to the public. Dr. Cady, the discoverer, was a sufferer from this terrible disease for twenty years, and after testing all the remedies extant—without relief—in his efforts to obtain a cure he discovered this UNEQUALLED REMEDY, which cured him in the short space of eight weeks.

It has been thoroughly tested, and has not failed in a single instance. Several of the most obstinate cases have been thoroughly cured by this remedy, after every other known medicine had failed. Every one who has tried it will testify to the truth of the above statement.

Every one afflicted with Catarrh should give it a trial and find out for himself whether it is a humbug.

Price, $2 per Bottle. Sold by GODBE & Co., Salt Lake City.

BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES

"A SLIGHT COLD," COUGH, Hoarseness, or Sore Throat which might be checked with a simple remedy, if neglected often terminates seriously. Few are aware of the importance of stopping a Cough or "slight cold" in its first stage: that which in the beginning would yield to a mild remedy, if not attended to, soon attacks the lungs.

The efficacy of Brown's Bronchial Troches is demonstrated by testimonials from Physicians, Surgeons in the Army, and eminent men wherever they have been used.

They were introduced in 1850. It has been proved that they are the best article before the public for Coughs, Colds, Bronchitis, Asthma, Catarrh, the Hacking Cough in Consumption, and numerous affections of the Throat, giving immediate relief.

PUBLIC SPEAKERS & SINGERS will find them effectual for clearing and strengthening the voice.

Your Troches are too well and favorably known to need commendation.

HON. CHAS. A. PHELPS, Pres. Mass. Senate.

My communication with the world has been very much enlarged by the Lozenge which now I carry always in my pocket; that trouble in my Throat (for which Troches are a specific) having made me often a mere whisperer.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

Saratoga A WATER.

The Saratoga "A" Spring Water is probably the most effective mineral water found on either continent. It has ten per cent. greater mineral properties than the celebrated Congress Spring; four times that of Baden Baden of Austria; five times that of Aix La Chapelle in Prussia; twice that of Vichy in France; nearly three times greater than the renowned Seltzer of Germany; and equally over the Spas of Bath, England, and Kissengen in Bavaria.

The reputation of this water is based upon its effects in diseases of the stomach, liver, bowels, kidneys and spleen. It acts with wonderful benefit in cases of chronic dyspepsia, constipation, gravel, gout, Scrofula, cutaneous affections, general lethargy, soreness and prostration of the system.

AMONG THE LILIES.

BY LESLIE WALTER.

Beautiful black-fringed eyes,
How have you lost your light,
Hidden away from sight,
Veiled with a dull surprise?
Can you see farther than we:
Prophets and spirits of light
Walking in robes of white,
Out on the jasper sea?

Rosy and smiling lips,
How are ye pale and chilled,
How is your music stilled—
Your brightness in sad eclipse?
Could ye but speak and say
What is the secret of Death,
Robbing your bloom and your breath,
Stealing your sweetness away?

Fair little idle hands,
Once with so warm a clasp,
Frozen in Death's cold grasp,
Pale in your flowery bands;
Long shall ye solemnly lie,
Crossed in this callous rest,
Changelessly over her breast,
Under the changeable sky.

Gentle and loving heart,
Have ye no tenderness left?
Pity for us bereft,
Grief for our painful part?
Soothed in that stony sleep
Seas could not part us more,
Ye on the farther shore,
We to remember and weep.

Lilies above her brow,
Lilies upon her breast—
Pure as the place of their rest—
Bury her under the snow;
Bury them under the snow,
Planting with tears the sod,
There let them blossom and grow,
Fit for the garden of God.

TWICE BLIND;

OR,

THE MAID OF MALINES.

BY SIR EDWARD BULWER LYTTON.

CONCLUDED.

Flushed, elated, triumphant, Julie bent upon him her sparkling eyes; she did not undeceive him.

"You are wrong, you mistake," said Madame le Tisseur, in confusion; "that is her cousin Julie, this is your Lucille."

St. Amand rose, turned, saw Lucille, and at that moment she wished herself in her grave. Surprise, mortification, disappointment, almost dismay, were depicted in his gaze. He had been haunting his prison house with dreams, and, now set free, he felt how unlike they were to the truth. Too new to observation to read the woe, the despair, the lapse and shrinking of the whole frame, that his look occasioned Lucille, he yet felt, when the first shock of his surprise was over, that it was not thus he should thank her who had restored him to sight. He hastened to redeem his error; ah! how could it be redeemed?

From that hour all Lucille's happiness was at an end; her fairy palace was shattered in the dust; the magician's wand was broken up; the Ariel was given to the winds; and the bright enchantment no longer distinguished the land she lived in from the rest of the barren world. It was true that St. Amand's words were kind; it is true that he remembered with the deepest gratitude all she had done in his behalf; it is true that he forced himself again and again to say, "She is my betrothed—my benefactress!" and he cursed himself to think that the feelings he had entertained for her were fled. Where was the passion of his words? where the ardor of his tone? where that light and play and light of countenance which her step, her voice could formerly call forth? When they were alone he was embarassed and constrained, and almost cold, his hand no longer sought hers; his soul no longer missed her if she was absent a moment from his side. When in their household circle, he seemed visibly more at ease; but did his eyes fasten upon her who had opened them to the day? did they not wander at every interval with a too eloquent admiration to the blushing and radiant face of the exulting Julie? This was not, you will believe, suddenly perceptible in one day or one week, but every day it was perceptible more and more. Yet still—bewitched, insnared as St. Amand was—he never perhaps would have been guilty of an infidelity that he strove with the keenest remorse to wrestle against, had it not been for the fatal contrast, at the first ment of his gushing enthusiasm, which Julie had presented to Lucille; but for that he would have formed no previous idea of real and living beauty to aid the disappointment of his imaginings and dreams. He would have seen Lucille young and graceful, and with eyes beaming affection, contrasted only by the wrinkled countenance and bended frame of her parents, and she would have completed her conquest over him before he had discovered that she was less beautiful than others; nay, more—that infidelity never could have lasted above the first few days, if the vain and heartless object of it had not exerted every art, all the power and witchery of her beauty, to cement and continue it. The unfortunate Lucille—so susceptible to the slightest change in those she loved, so diffident of herself, so proud too in that diffidence—no longer necessary, no longer missed, no longer loved—could not bear to endure the galling comparison of the past and present. She fled uncomplainingly to her chamber to indulge her tears, and thus, unhappily, absent as her father generally was during the day, and busied as her mother was either at work or in household matters, she left Julie a thousand opportunities to complete the power she had begun to wield over—no, not the heart!—the senses of St. Amand! Yet, still not suspecting, in the open generosity of her mind, the whole extent of her affliction, poor Lucille buoyed herself at times with the hope that when once married, when once in that intimacy of friendship, the unspeakable love she felt for him could disclose itself with less restraint than at present,—she should perhaps regain a heart which had been so devotedly hers, that she could not think that without a fault it was irrevocably gone; on that hope she anchored all the little happiness that remained to her. And still St. Amand pressed their marriage, but in what different tones! In fact, he wished to preclude from himself the possibility of a deeper ingratitude than that which he had incurred already. He vainly thought that the broken reed of love might be bound up and strengthened by the ties of duty; and at least he was anxious that his hand, his fortune, his esteem, his gratitude, should give to Lucille the only recompense it was now in his power to bestow. Meanwhile, left alone so often with Julie, and Julie bent on achieving the last triumph over his heart, St. Amand was gradually preparing a far different reward, a far different return for her to whom he owed so incalculable a debt.

There was a garden behind the house, in which there was a small arbor, where often in the summer evenings Eugene and Lucille had sat together—hours never to return! One day she heard from her own chamber, where she sat mourning, the sound of St. Amand's flute swelling gently from that beloved and consecrated bower. She wept as she heard it, and the memories that the music bore softening and endearing his image, she began to reproach herself that she had yielded so often to the impulse of her wounded feelings; that, chilled by his coldness, she had left him so often to himself, and had not sufficiently dared to tell him of that affection which, in her modest self-depreciation, constituted her only pretention to his love. "Perhaps he is alone now," she thought; "the tune too is one which he knew that I loved:" and with her heart on her step she stole from the house and sought the arbour. She had scarce turned from her chamber when the flute ceased; as she neared the arbour she heard voices—Julie's voice in grief, St. Amand's in consolation. A dread foreboding seized her; her feet clung rooted to the earth.

"Yes, marry her—forget me," said Julie; "in a few days you will be another's, and I, I—forgive me, Eugene, forgive me that I have disturbed your happiness. I am punished sufficiently—my heart will break, but it will break loving you"—sobs choked Julie's voice.

"O, speak not thus," said St. Amand. "I—I only am to blame. I, false to both, to both ungrateful. O, from the hour that these eyes opened upon you I drank in a new life; the sun itself to me was less wonderful than your beauty. But—but—let me forget that hour. What do I not owe to Lucille? I shall be wretched—I shall deserve to be so; for shall I not think, Julie, that I have imbittered your life with our ill fated love? But all that I can give—my hand—my home—my plighted faith—must be hers. Nay, Julie, nay—why that look? could I act otherwise? can I dream otherwise? Whatever the sacrifice, must I not render it? Ah, what do I owe to Lucille, were it only for the thought that but for her I might never have seen thee."

Lucille stayed to hear no more; with the same soft step as that which had borne her within hearing of these fatal words, she turned back once more to her desolate chamber.

That evening, as St. Amand was sitting alone in his apartment, he heard a gentle knock at the door. "Come in," he said, and Lucille entered. He started in some confusion, and would have taken her hand, but she gently repulsed him. She took a seat opposite to him, and looking down, thus addressed him:

"My dear Eugene, that is, Monsieur St. Amand, I have something on my mind that I think it better to speak at once; and if I do not exactly express what I would wish to say, you must not be offended at Lucille; it is not an easy matter to put into words what one feels deeply." Coloring, and suspecting something of the truth, St. Amand would have broken in upon her here; but she with a gentle impatience, waived him to be silent, and continued:

"You know that when you once loved me, I used to tell you that you would cease to do so, could you see how undeserving I was of your attachment. I did not deceive myself, Eugene; I always felt assured that such would be the case, that your love for me necessarily rested on your affliction; but, for all that, I never at least had a dream, or a desire, but for your happiness; and God knows, that if again, by walking barefooted, not to Cologne, but to Rome—to the end of the world, I could save you from a much less misfortune than that of blindness, I would cheerfully do it; yes, even though I might foretell all the while that, on my return, you would speak to me coldly, think of me lightly, and that the penalty to me would—would be—what it has been." Here Lucille wiped a few natural tears from her eyes; St. Amand, struck to the heart, covered his face with his hands, without the courage to interrupt her. Lucille continued:

"That which I foresaw has come to pass; I am no longer to you what once I was, when you could clothe this poor form and this homely face with a beauty they did not possess; you would wed me still, it is true; but I am proud, Eugene, and cannot stoop to gratitude where I once had love. I am not so unjust as to blame you; the change was natural, was inevitable. I should have steeled myself more against it; but I am now resigned; we must part; you love Julie—that too is natural—and she loves you; ah! what also more probable in the course of events? Julie loves you not yet, perhaps, so much as I did, but then she has not known you as I have, and she, whose whole life has been triumph, cannot feel the gratitude I felt at fancying myself loved; but this will come; God grant it! Farewell, then, for ever, dear Eugene, I leave you when you no longer want me; you are now independent of Lucille; wherever you go, a thousand hereafter can supply my place;—farewell!"

She rose, as she said this, to leave the room; but St. Amand, seizing her hand, which she in vain endeavored to withdraw from his clasp, poured forth incoherently, passionately, his reproaches on himself, his eloquent persuasions against her resolution.

"I confess," said he, "that I have been allured for a moment; I confess that Julie's beauty made me less sensible to your stronger, your holier, O! far, far holier title to my love! But forgive me, dearest Lucille; already I return to you, to all I once felt for you; make me not curse the blessing of sight that I owe to you. You must not leave me; never can we two part; try me, only try me, and if ever, hereafter, my heart wander from you, then, Lucille, leave me to my remorse!"

Even at this moment, Lucille did not yield; she felt that his prayer was but the enthusiasm of the hour; she felt that there was a virtue in her pride; that to leave him was a duty to herself. In vain he pleaded; in vain were his embraces, his prayers; in vain he reminded her of her plighted troth, of her aged parents, whose happiness had become wrapped in her union with him; "How, even were it as you wrongly believe, how in honor to them can I desert you, can I wed another?"

"Trust that, trust all to me," answered Lucille; "your honor shall be my care, none shall blame you; only do not let your marriage with Julie be celebrated before their eyes; that is all I ask, all they can expect. God bless you! do not fancy I shall be unhappy, for whatever happiness the world gives you, shall I not have contributed to bestow it?—and with that thought I am above compassion."

She glided from his arms, and left him to a solitude more bitter even than that of blindness; that very night Lucille sought her mother; to her she confided all. I pass over the reasons she urged, the arguments she overcame; she conquered rather than convinced, and leaving to Madame le Tisseur the painful task of breaking to her father her unalterable resolution, she quitted Malines the next morning, and with a heart too honest to be utterly without comfort, paid that visit to her aunt which had been so long deferred.

The pride of Lucille's parents prevented them from reproaching St. Amand. He did not bear, however, their cold and altered looks; he left their house; and though for several days he would not even see Julie, yet her beauty and her art gradually resumed their empire over him. They were married at Courtroi, and, to the joy of the vain Julie, departed to the gay metropolis of France. But before their departure, before his marriage, St. Amand endeavored to appease his conscience, by purchasing for Monsieur le Tisseur, a much more lucrative and honorable office than he now held. Rightly judging that Malines could no longer be a pleasant residence for them, and much less for Lucille, the duties of the post were to be fulfilled in another town; and knowing that Monsieur le Tisseur's delicacy would revolt at receiving such a favor from his hands, he kept the nature of his negotiation a close secret, and suffered the honest citizen to believe that his own merits alone entitled him to so unexpected a promotion.

Time went on. This quiet and simple history of humble affections took its date in a stormy epoch of the world—the dawning revolution of France. The family of Lucille had been little more than a year settled in their new residence, when Dumouriez led his army into the Netherlands. But how meanwhile had that year passed for Lucille! I have said that her spirit was naturally high; that though so tender, she was not weak; her very pilgrimage to Cologne alone, and at the timid age of seventeen, proved that there was a strength in her nature no less than a devotion in her love. The sacrifice she made brought its own reward. She believed St. Amand was happy, and she would not give way to the selfishness of grief; she had still duties to perform; she could still comfort her parents, and cheer their age; she could still be all the world to them; she felt this, and was consoled. Only once during the year had she heard of Julie; she had been seen by a mutual friend at Paris, gay, brilliant, courted, and admired; of St. Amand she heard nothing.

My tale does not lead me through the harsh scenes of war. I do not tell you of the slaughter and the siege, and the blood that inundated those fair lands, the great battle field of Europe. The people of the Netherlands in general were with the cause of Dumouriez, but the town in which Le Tisseur dwelt offered some faint resistance to his arms. Le Tisseur himself, despite his age, girded on his sword; the town was carried, and the fierce and licentious troops of the conqueror poured, flushed with their easy victory, through its streets. Le Tisseur's house was filled with drunken and rude troopers; Lucille herself trembled in the fierce gripe of one of those dissolute soldiers, more bandit than soldier, whom the subtle Dumouriez had united to his army, and by whose blood he so often saved that of his nobler band; her shrieks, her cries were vain, when suddenly the reeking troopers gave way; "the captain! brave captain!" was shouted forth; the insolent soldier, felled by a powerful arm, sank senseless at the feet of Lucille; and a glorious form, towering above its fellows, even through its glittering garb, even in that dreadful hour, remembered at a glance by Lucille, stood at her side; her protector—her guardian!—thus once more she beheld St. Amand!

The house was cleared in an instant—the door barred. Shouts, groans, wild snatches of exulting song, the clang of arms, the tramp of horses, the hurrying footsteps; the deep music, sounded loud and blended terribly without; Lucille heard them not,—she was on that breast which never should have deserted her.

Effectually to protect his friends, St. Amand took up his quarters at their house; and for two days he was once more under the same roof as Lucille. He never recurred voluntarily to Julie; he answered Lucille's timid inquiry after her health briefly, and with coldness, but he spoke with all the enthusiasm of a long pent and ardent spirit, of the new profession he had embraced. Glory seemed now to be his only mistress, and the vivid delusion of the first bright dreams of the revolution filled his mind, broke from his tongue, and lighted up those dark eyes which Lucille had redeemed to day.

She saw him depart at the head of his troop; she saw his proud crest glancing in the sun; she saw his steed winding through the narrow street; she saw that his last glance reverted to her, where she stood at the door; and as he waived his adieu, she fancied that there was on his face that look of deep and grateful tenderness which reminded her of the one bright epoch of her life.

She was right; St. Amand had long since in bitterness repented of a transient infatuation, had long since discovered the true Florimel from the false, and felt that, in Julia, Lucille's wrongs were avenged. But in the hurry and heat of war, he plunged that regret—the keenest of all—which imbodies the bitter words, "TOO LATE!"

Years passed away, and in the resumed tranquility of Lucille's life the brilliant apparition of St. Amand appeared as something dreamt of, not seen. The star of Napoleon had risen above the horizon; the romance of his early career had commenced; and the campaign of Egypt had been the herald of those brilliant and meteoric successes which flashed forth from the gloom of the revolution of France.

Many French as well as the English troops returned home from Egypt, blinded with the ophthalmia of that arid soil. Some of the young men in Lucille's town, who had joined Napoleon's army, came back, darkened by that fearful affliction, and Lucille's aid, and Lucille's sweet voice were ever at hand for those poor sufferers, whose common misfortune touched so thrilling a chord of her heart.

Her father was now dead, and she had only her mother to cheer amid the ills of age. As one evening they sat at work together, Madame le Tisseur said, after a pause:

"I wish, dear Lucille, thou couldst be persuaded to marry Justin; he loves thee well, and now that thou art yet young, and hast many years before thee, thou shouldst remember that when I die thou wilt be alone."

"Ah, cease, dearest mother, I never can marry now, and as for love—once taught in the bitter school in which I have learned the knowledge of myself—I cannot be deceived again."

"My Lucille, you do not know yourself; never was woman loved, if Justin does not love you; and never did lover feel with real warmth how worthily he loved."

And this was true; and not of Justin alone, for Lucille's modest virtues, her kindly temper, and a certain undulating and feminine grace, which accompanied all her movements, had secured her as many conquests as if she had been beautiful. She had rejected all offers of marriage with a shudder; without even the throb of a flattered vanity. One memory, sadder, was also dearer to her than all things; and something sacred in its recollections made her deem it even a crime to think of effacing the past by a new affection.

"I believe," continued Madame le Tisseur, angrily, "that thou still thinkest fondly of him from whom only in the world thou couldst have experienced ingratitude."

"Nay, mother," said Lucille, with a blush and a slight sigh, "Eugene is married to another."

While thus conversing, they heard a gentle and timid knock at the door—the latch was lifted. "This," said the rough voice of a commissaire of the town—"this, monsieur, is the house of Madame le Tisseur, and voila mademoiselle!" A tall figure, with a shade over his eyes, and wrapped in a long military cloak, stood in the room. A thrill shot across Lucille's heart. He stretched out his arms; "Lucille," said that melancholy voice, which had made the music of her first youth—"where art thou, Lucille; alas! she does not recognise St. Amand."

Thus was it, indeed. By a singular fatality, the burning sun and the sharp dust of the plains of Egypt had smitten the young soldier, in the flush of his career, with a second—and this time with an irremediable—blindness! He had returned to France to find his hearth lonely: Julie was no more—sudden fever had cut her off in the midst of youth; and he had sought his way to Lucille's house, to see if one hope yet remained to him in the world!

And when, days afterward, humbly and sadly he re-urged a former suit, did Lucille shut her heart to its prayer? Did her pride remember its wound—did she revert to his desertion—did she say to the whisper of her yearning love—"Thou hast been before forsaken?" That voice and those darkened eyes pleaded to her with a pathos not to be resisted; "I am once more necessary to him," was all her thought; "if I reject him, who will tend him?" In that thought was the motive of her conduct; in that thought gushed back upon her soul all the springs of checked, but unconquered, unconquerable love! In that thought she stood beside him at the altar, and pledged, with a yet holier devotion than she might have felt of yore, the vow of her imperishable truth.

And Lucille found, in the future, a reward which the common world could never comprehend. With his blindness returned all the feelings she had first awakened in St. Amand's solitary heart; again he yearned for her step—again he missed even a moment's absence from his side—again her voice chased the shadow from his brow—and in her presence was a sense of shelter and of sunshine. He no longer sighed for the blessing he had lost; he reconciled himself to fate, and entered into that serenity of mood which mostly characterizes the blind. Perhaps, after we have seen the actual world, and experienced its hollow pleasures, we can resign ourselves the better to its exclusion; and as the cloister which repels the ardor of our hope is sweet to our remembrance, so the darkness looses its terror when experience has wearied us with the glare and travail of the day. It was something, too, as they advanced in life, to feel the chains that bound him to Lucille strengthening daily, and to cherish in his overflowing heart the sweetness of increasing gratitude; it was something that he could not see years wrinkle that open brow, or dim the tenderness of that touching smile; it was something that to him she was beyond the reach of time, and preserved to the verge of the grave, (which received them both within a few days of each other,) in all the bloom of her unwithering affection—in all the freshness of a heart that never could grow old!

A BUNCH OF DAISIES.

[CONCLUDED.]

It was a happy moment in the life of Madame de Breuil, that in which she received the congratulations of her friends and neighbors on the approaching marriage of her nephew, Ernest de Merieux, with Madame d' Aubrielle.

The good lady did the honors of her salon with a triumphant and joyous air, and appeared at least ten years younger than usual; for the wedding was to take place next day, and they were about to sign the contract; the notary was present, and the relations were fast arriving.

Ernest and Louise, occupied with each other, almost shrank from the compliments showered upon them by the guests.

Ernest felt in his secret soul that he had arrived at that plentitude of happiness so often imagined in his day-dreams, but which he had despaired of ever attaining.

In the midst of the rich presents given by the bridegroom to the bride, one gift formed a strong contrast to the rest by its simplicity; this was a bouquet of daisies, freshly gathered. Every one was surprised to see it there, and many remarks were made on the subject. The wits of the party supposed that the young couple meant to interrogate these flowers, for the pleasure of having repeated what they had already heard so often.

All at once the notary, Monsieur Celestin Gobillot, who was still a young man, with an honest face, said, on approaching the table where the presents were displayed, and looking at the daisies through his spectacles, "This bouquet puts me in mind of the only romantic adventure of my life. Whilst I was at Gisors, head clerk in the office of M. Prichard, I went one evening to a village fete which was held in repute in the neighborhood. I had donned my best clothes, and I went merrily to the forest of Franville, where there was to be a ball on the village green. It was quite dark by the time I reached it; the weather, which had been fine until then, changed suddenly; a terrible gust of wind, accompanied by large drops of rain and some claps of thunder, carried away the tent which had sheltered the dancers, and extinguished most of the lights. There was a tumult, screams, and indescribable confusion. Every one fled right and left; but what made it worse was that some young men, elegantly dressed, but half-drunk and ill-conducted, wished to take advantage of this mishap. Two of them were pursuing a young lady who was flying from them, shrieking wildly, whilst a third was having an altercation with her father, or husband. I have never been able to discover which relation he held to the lady, but he was an old man, of most respectable appearance, who had no chance against these young scamps. I had a supple hand and foot, and a good walking-stick, so I gave chase to the ruffians, who had almost gained upon the distressed beauty. I rained blows upon the cowards indiscriminately, and obliged them to fly. Then I left the young lady to assist the old gentleman, and his assailant fled likewise. I was master of the field of battle.

"The storm increased. The poor lady had fainted—or nearly so. I took her in my arms, desired the old gentleman to follow me, and carried her to the forrester's house, about a hundred yards from the scene of action. When we arrived there, no light was to be had; the gentleman seemed almost frantic; and the lady could scarcely open her eyes. I offered to go out and try to procure a conveyance for them. The gentleman thanked me, saying he had expected his carriage, but it had not made its appearance; and he begged me to find some vehicle for them.

"I rushed off immediately, but my search was unsuccessful—not a carriage could be found. At the end of an hour, streaming with rain, and out of breath, I returned to the cottage, but found nobody there except the forester, who told me that after my departure several friends had arrived in great agitation; that they gathered about the young lady, who continued ill; then a fine carriage drove up, into which they all entered without delay, and off they went. The old gentleman desired the forester to tell me how very thankful he was for my trouble, and to apologise for leaving before I came back, also to tell me his name; but the idiot had forgotten it, and distorted it in such a manner that I could not make it out. The lady had left a bouquet of daisies for me—I had remarked it in her girdle. I kept those flowers carefully until my wedding day, when I sacrificed them on the shrine of Hymen, and presented them to Madame Godillot."

During this recital Ernest kept his eyes fixed on his betrothed, who blushed, grew pale, and glanced earnestly at the notary, with a certain degree of emotion, then turned towards her lover with an air in which was mingled a little confusion, somewhat of reproach, and a good deal of affection.

Ernest understood it all, and was going to murmur in her ear how they had fallen into this double mistake, when Madame de Breuil, who perhaps knew more of this affair than she allowed to appear, signed to the notary, exclaiming, "Come, sir, the contract—the contract, sir! that will be the best story."

It was then suddenly discovered that one of the cousins, whose presence was necessary, had not arrived.

"'Tis no matter; let us sign, at all events," said Madame de Breuil, adding, "The old miser! he will be coming by the diligence, and who can tell at what hour these provoking machines may pass this road?"

"Don't abuse the diligence too much," said Madame de Sauvray, the poor canoness, who made but a sorry figure in the midst of these joyful wedding preparations. "Chance," she continued, "obliged me, three years ago, to travel in one of them with my uncle De Lancy. I remember that night well, for we had a fellow traveler one of the most delightful of young men I ever met with. There was at once established between us a sort of sympathy, an intimacy, and on his side most marked attentions, which I had the good sense to attribute in a great degree to the darkness of the night; but I confess I did not like him the less on that account; for, thanks to him, those hours, the fatigue and ennui of which I had dreaded, were amongst the most agreeable I have ever spent. I have often, too often perhaps, pondered upon them, and I should have ended in giving too large a place in my heart to the amiable unknown, if I had not remembered that Louise de Sauvray is fated to grow old without entering into those ties that sometimes make life almost Paradise."

This time it was Ernest who started, and Madame d' Aubrielle who made a discovery. In an instant she was beside her betrothed, to whom she whispered, "It appears there are two bouquets and two Louises. Ernest, do you love me now?"

"Dearest, a great deal more, and better," he replied; "but tell me——"

"I will—to-morrow," she said; but her blushes and smile had told already.

At this moment Madame de Breuil, who had signed the contract, handed the pen to her nephew, saying, in a low tone, "Well, my poor Ernest, what have you done with your ideal?"

"I have exchanged her for happiness," he replied, looking towards his Louise, "and I do not complain of my bargain."

Music.

HOW TO MAKE POPULAR HITS.

When composing Trios or Duettos which we wish to render available in a short time to the unlearned in music, we cannot select better melodies than those that will progress harmoniously in two parts, with thirds and sixes, and so arranged that the bass notes will be moving only to the tonic, and dominant, with an occasional change to the subdominant. Composers will find, by attending to this rule, that their compositions will be easily caught up by ear-singers, and will be appreciated by them. In fact, singers with little experience in the progressive laws of varied harmonies will read music of this character much better than they will classical compositions; classical pieces they cannot read. Moreover, good ear-singers will be enabled to add parts themselves without the aid of music, on the first hearing of the melody, almost as correctly as an author can arrange them. Some musicians call such exploits vamping by ear, and this style of vamping is frequently used in simple dance music by lazy instrumentalists who will not trouble to write parts for themselves. Such compositions, as I have before said, will soon obtain much popularity with the mass, and are as soon thrown aside by them when often repeated.

I will now, by way of instruction to young composers, speak of a few rules for the systematic use of thirds, sixes, doubled unisons and subtonics, or major sevenths.

A sequence of major thirds in parallel motion are bad, and not more than two should be employed consecutively. Any number of minor thirds are good in a sequence, but minor sixes are not pleasing, because they are the inversion of major thirds, and for this reason, not more than two should be employed following each other. Major sixes are good and can be used in a sequence, as they are the inversion of minor thirds. But thirds and sixes are most pleasing when short sequences of each alternate with each other.

The reason why unisons should not be doubled in two parts, with the exception of the beginning or ending the strain, is, because we omit one part by the progression. When it is possible we should avoid doubling the major third, as major thirds overpower the other notes. However, sometimes it cannot be avoided, more especially when we use the sixth and third taken from the seventh form of the ancients. Should we employ this harmony in four parts, one third should descend a semitone, and the other should ascend a whole tone.

We should always avoid doubling the subtonic or major seventh, because it leads one semitone in ascending to the tonic or key note, which should be taken by one part only. This great fault, I again repeat, must be avoided.

THE HAND OF GOD IN ALL RELIGIONS.

CONCLUDED.

Before we can properly see the hand of God in the raising up of the great religions of past ages, there is one fact that must be clearly understood, and that is that unless the Pagan and Mohammedan sections of the world had had their peculiar religions, they would have had none at all. There is a sort of an undefined notion in many persons' minds, that all nations could have obtained Jesus's Gospel had they wanted it. This is untrue. That Gospel, numerically speaking, has not been offered to the one-thousandth portion of the human family. The solitary believers in Jesus, who have penetrated a few points in the vast regions controlled by other faiths, have been buried up and lost among the swarming myriads who have lived and died utterly unconscious of their presence. To this very day, the little portion of the earth where it is even known that Jesus lived, can be covered on the map, by the point of your finger; while the wide domains of Mohammedanism, Paganism, etc., are comparatively larger than the palm of your hand. To this great world of humanity, practically, no gospel but their own has ever been offered; and, therefore, unless God has raised up the faiths they have He has done nothing for them at all.

As the latter conclusion is too repulsive to think of, and all our intuitions of the order, beauty and completeness of the universe are opposed to it, we look for the Divine Hand in such religions as do exist; and we find abundant evidence confirming what our souls tell us must be true. Evidences of the movements of this Hand we have already traced, in the lives of the great founders of Hindooism and Mohammedanism, but its operations are confined to no section of the globe. Passing to the vast empire of China, we behold it no less in the raising up and in the inspiration of the great teacher, Confucius. Here we have a man who, living over two thousands of years ago, has made his name immortal among his own people; and so impressed upon them his convictions of truth, that to this hour, they are the guiding star of every Chinese household. He is to them, in a large degree, what Jesus is to the European world. They quote his sentiments as the height of philosophy, and the divinest of wisdom; and many of them, truly, are so akin to those of Jesus of Nazareth, that it is evident that, if he received not of his fullness, he, at least, drank at the same fountain. His doctrines have influenced millions of human beings to modesty, contentment, justice, and a score of other virtues. They have fed the Chinese mind with the highest conceptions of God, and of civil and religious duty, that they could entertain; but more than all, they have assisted to lay the foundation for the peaceful control of millions of Chinese, for ages, who, without it, would have helplessly drifted into every form of anarchy and confusion.

In viewing the necessities of this shrewd but childish race, and what these principles have done for them—the harmony, civilization and refinement they have brought to their undeveloped natures, we are compelled to the conclusion that we can no more deny God to the mission of Confucius, than we can to the rain or the sunshine thad has blest his land. It has done them good, anyway, and that is the signet wherewith God enstamps and marks his presence in human affairs.

But there is another great religious power to be examined in our review, one that has shaped the destinies of more civilized nations, to which the minds of our readers will now refer with the inquiry, whether the Hand of God can be traced in that also—we refer to the great Roman Catholic Church.

Let us bring Roman Catholicism on trial before our bar, and ask what has it done for humanity. Let us look squarely at the character of the times when it arose, and during which it was operating the most effectively.

When Roman Catholicism arose, the whole world, excepting in little Judah and its borders, was in a state of Paganism. Rome, its very seat, was also heathen. It had a world of heathenism to handle and revolutionize. How easy that would have been, may be sensed by our Elders who have visited Africa and Asia without converting a single pagan in those continents. But here was a period when it was all paganism, and no half-bred Christian nations to fall back upon. Jesus, it is true, had lived and taught his pure principles, but their light had died away in the distance; and even had there been individuals alive to their highest spirit, the great world of barbarian Europe was in no condition to receive such truths in an unadulterated form. On the other hand, to have waited till these uncivilized nations could have stepped from the depths of their barbarism to that height of spiritual culture necessary to appreciate in an unalloyed form the Godlike sentiments of Jesus, would have been to have waited for ever, for they never could have taken that step, had they not first taken a lower one. A system was needed that would take the barbarous and heathen nations of France, Germany, Britain and other large countries, and lead them a step towards civilization; and this, Providence wisely effected by the raising up of an intermediate system, or half-way house from one extreme to the other, blending the new light of Christ with such of the old forms of heathenism as clung closest to the uncivilized mind.

This, we maintain, was the wisest plan that could have been carried out by Deity. There was God and salvation in it for humanity; because it furnished stepping stones upon which the ignorant uncivilized races of Europe could rise to a comprehension of such principles of gospel truth as were within their reach. It was true that Jesus and his disciples had taught higher and purer truths than this Church presented to mankind; and also true that a few solitary minds on a level with Jesus' plane of thought had caught the flame and become one in Christ Jesus; but what was all this to the hordes of barbarian Europe, for whom Roman Catholicism arose? They could not grasp such truths. They could not as Jesus required, worship a truth because it was truth, to love the right simply for the glory and excellence of righteousness itself. Their outer senses had to be appealed to in order that the little inner light that glimmered in their soul, might be reached.

The Roman Catholic church had to deal with men in ages of bloodshed and conquest, when pomp and parade was everything to the multitude; and men were coarse and sensuous, and could only be reached through outward show, or understand the superiority of anything but physical strength. Hence assumptions of priestly sovereignty were absolutely necessary to influence and control them; and gorgeous rites, solemn processions, and swelling music were also essential to impress them with the sacredness and divinity of their religion. To them, the crucifix, with its bleeding Jesus, was necessary, because it made Christ tangible to their gross senses. Such of his principles as they could be taught, had far more influence over their darkened minds, when backed up by pictures of what so divine a teacher suffered. Their sympathies were then appealed to as well as their sense of right.

Herein do we discover the hand of God in Roman Catholicism. Its high sounding pretensions, its superstitions, its very mummeries and gilded trappings, were God's loving, merciful adaptations, to the weaknesses and imperfect spiritual powers of the masses of Europe. While withal its earthliness, some portion of divine truth was being interblended, and the nations were led unconsciously—through their very traditions—through that which their barbarous natures most loved—up to God.

We repeat, the Roman Catholic religion did good. It was the true and proper religion for such times. It held kings and nobles in check from gross outrage, and suppressed the coarser passions of the multitude. The high-handed rulers of those days needed a semi-human semi-divine system to grapple with them. Had it had more of God in it, it would have been above their heads. As it was, it met and appealed to them on their own level. It held back a world of licentiousness, enforced order, spread abroad the Christian virtues, patronized music, poetry, sculpture and painting, led the European world up from the fables and bloody rites of heathenism to civilization; and when it had taught the world all it was adapted to proclaim; when its mission was ended and society travailed for a higher creed, because it could not comprehend the new light dawning on men's souls, it rushed forth with the rack, the torture, and the deadly flame, to deter, as it thought, men from periling their salvation. But there was a God even in this ignorant zeal, for it opened the gates of liberty to mankind and forced a greater era to the birth.

There is a God in all such movements. God inspires a creed, gives it His providence and blessing, and when it has served its purpose, "He breaks it in pieces like a potter's vessel," and remolds another capable of better holding the wine of a new dispensation.

To those who, notwithstanding a perception of the barbarism and sensuous state of the world, amid which this religion rose to life, still imagine that Jesus and his unadulterated gospel could have been as successfully established, we have one beautiful truth to tell. It is this: the principles of Jesus are powerless except to prepared and cultivated souls—to such as have grown as it were, to his level of principle. To them, it is all radiance and beauty. They need no compulsive influence beyond the bare attraction that there is in truth itself; but to the ignorant and undeveloped, the diviner the creed, the weaker its influence. To barbaric races, as nations, there is no gospel so powerless as that which depends for its attraction and influence upon principle alone. Nations must grow to it; and, in their growth, they must be provided with intermediate faiths, nearer a sensual state. This great truth has yet to be sensed by mankind, that the gospel of Jesus is a gospel specially intended to suit the highest condition of our race. True, it is offered to all the world, as art and science are offered to all; and all will reach it sooner or later; therefore was it made for all. But in the mind of a providing God, planning for the civilization and progress of earth's races, it is, of necessity, the crowning school of divine art, when all the inferior classes are passed.

Another grand truth that has yet to prevail, and which will bind the Devil of hatred and uncharitableness between races and religions, is that which will destroy for ever the hateful Israelitish idea that God has a favorite people. God has no favorite people, nor never has had. A certain nation, because of its forwardness in the race for truth, may reach principles nearer the fountain, but those truths shine for all. We have also yet to learn that nations are not wicked and rebellious because they do not accept Jesus when taught by ancient or modern apostles. Their wickedness is the wickedness of infants who refuse meat because God and nature has given them a love for something better adapted to their constitution. When nations grow to the truth, they will accept it; and when God wants their conversion, he will take steps proportionate to the greatness of such a work. Up to the present time, nothing in God's providences have looked like a Deity, moving for so grand an object, while all the efforts that have yet been made by individuals for that purpose put together, have been as manifestly futile as sending a fly to carry off an elephant.

From the narrow platform where we suppose ourselves the almost only objects of Jehovah's care, so far as religion is concerned, we have to step out and see God providing for His world as a whole. We shall see Him like a Great Teacher dividing his school into classes, according to the grade and capacity of His scholars, and sending to each, teachers adapted to their condition. But combined with this idea, we must also grasp the sublimer one, that the educational period of humanity is not confined to this life, but is coëqual with the immortality of our race; and that nations and peoples move from off this temporary sphere to probate in higher classes as ages roll along. The childish race, therefore, to whom an inferior gospel is given to-day, will, in future periods, be led by the Almighty Hand up the ladder of life until it reaches the topmost round. Herein is the equality of God's providences; herein the breadth and grandeur of divine administration; and herein the cause of love and thankfulness to Him "who doeth all things well."

SWEET HOME.

BY A. DALRYMPLE.

The place of my birth it is dear to me yet,
The scenes of my youth I can never forget,
From that long-cherished spot I have no wish to roam,
The place of my birth and my boyhood's loved home.
Home; home, sweet, sweet home.
My heart fondly lingers around thee, my home.

'Twas there my young footsteps in infancy roved,
In youth's sunny morning with those whom I loved,
Of pleasures sweet cup we then quaffed the bright foam,
The remembrance is sweet, while I sigh for my home.
Home, home, sweet, sweet home,
My heart fondly lingers around thee, my home.

The friends of my youth, could I meet them once more,
And mingle our songs as in bright days of yore,
'Twould a solace impart, a rich feast to my soul,
To greet them at home—home, my life's destined goal,
Home, home, sweet, sweet home,
My heart fondly lingers around thee, my home.

When life's closing scene or adversity's blast
Pale sorrow and anguish around us shall cast,
Let union and home be our watch-word and song,
And that strain ever sweet, let us strive to prolong,
Home, home, sweet, sweet home,
My heart fondly lingers around thee, my home.

CHARLEMAGNE AS THE DAVID OF FRANCE.

THE WORLD'S HISTORY ILLUSTRATED IN ITS GREAT CHARACTERS.

Charlemagne is more interesting as the David of France than as the Cæsar. As we have seen, he was a priestly king and, though a mighty conqueror and empire-founder, he was rather like the son of Jesse raised up to establish a theocratic kingdom in the name of the Lord, than of Cæsar to subdue the world in the might of man. Indeed Charlemagne not only imitated David and Solomon, but he had the singular fancy of taking upon himself the name of the psalmist king. He and his principal counsellors formed themselves into an academy, in which he took his place as King David, while his counsellors adopted other names such as Homer, Horace, etc. Most fitting, therefore, was Charlemagne to be the prophet of a new civilization, for he blended the character, of the priest with the fanciful nature of the poet, and the might of his sword and the strength of his host made him the great champion of Jehovah, as king David had been before him. There was a beautiful poetic fanaticism in this conception of Charlemagne, in relation to the part which Providence had ordained him to play in the world. To find "Saul among the Prophets" was an anomoly but David and Charlemagne with them were in their proper sphere. In a synod with his bishops or surrounded by the intellectual light of his age, he was as much in his own place as in the camp among his soldiers, carrying out the purposes of the Lord in converting the world to Christianity and carving out a new civilization. True, we in modern times can have but little sympathy with his missionary mode of forcing the Saxons into the waters of baptism by the terror of his sword; and we are somewhat horrified by the fact of his having caused four thousand Saxon prisoners to be beheaded in one day, for refusing to be baptized. But yet that mode of missioning the world was the only one which his age could understand; and while in the abstract, we should not sanction evil means for the accomplishing of good ends, we can readily understand the potency of a young civilization through the potency of a Charlemagne. It is absolute folly for peace men, in our humanitarian times, when nations are converted to the wiser policies of Christianity, to attempt to bring Charlemagne and the necessities of his age, to our standards. It would have been as impossible for the David of France to have missioned the world in the cause of Christ, through our modes as it would be for us to reveal Christianity through his modes. He advanced his age by his sword, not kept it back, and the might of his arm wrought out the world's good. It would have been as impossible to have converted warlike pagan nations by the Gospel of peace in that age, as for Mohammed to have indoctrinated Arabia with the grand conception of the uniting of God, had he been in his mission purely a Jesus. To a very large degree, Christ has always been before his times, and he still is to this day. Charlemagne, therefore, was fitted for his work of Christianizing and civilizing the world in the eighth century as he would have been unfitted for his work, had he been more like his uncle Charloman, who shut himself up in a monastery in a forest, to better illustrate the character of a Saint. Indeed the logic of all is that this David of France manifested Christianity in his age, in the only way that Christianity could be manifested then.

Charlemagne was not only up to his times, but he was before his times. He was not only the creator of bishops and popes, but he was superior to them in his conceptions and inspirations. More than any other man of his day, he was the magnificent soul. He sent forth his manifesto for the worship of Jesus without the appendages of idolatry, but popes saw the necessity of image-worship, and though Adrian had to deal very cautiously with his David, he kept him from revealing too much light, and thus Christian idolatry was perpetuated in the new civilization.

Pope Adrian died and Leo the Third was elevated to the pontifical throne. On the elevation of Leo, Charlemagne sent to the pope vast riches taken from the Huns; but ever mindful of his semi-priestly mission, he gave instructions to his embassadors to urge upon the pontiff to reform the morals of the Roman clergy; put an end to the traffic in sacred offices, and not to allow the wealth which he sent to be lavished on priestly debauchees. As an example of the advanced state of Charlemagne, in his Christian growth above even the priesthood of his day, it may be instanced that, at about the period when he was aiming to bring about reform in the Church and to elevate it to the worship of Deity without the mediumship of images. Pope Adrian in calling upon the armies of France to inflict vengeance upon the Duke of Bavaria and his subjects declared, that they were absolved in advance from all crimes which they might commit in the enemies' country, and that God commanded them through his vicar, to violate girls, murder women, children and old men, to burn cities and put all the inhabitants to the sword.

Is it wonderful that in an age when popes dared in the name of God to command such atrocities, which the spirit of the monster Nero, acting as that God, might have given, Charlemagne in a grand, though cruel fanaticism, should put to death in one day four thousand Saxons who would not receive Christ as their sovereign Lord? He did this in the same magnificent spirit, that a David or a Samuel, in their Hebrew fanaticism, massacred the enemies of Israel and the heathen defiers of Jehovah. In the present age of enlightenment and Christian humanity, we have no more sympathy with Samuel, when he rejected Saul for showing mercy, and hewed Agag to pieces, than we have with Charlemagne, when he did the same with the Saxons. We can but regret that the God of the Hebrews found it necessary to give inhuman commands for massacre even as we regret that Christianity sometimes had to be preached with the sword. But we acknowledge these divine necessities without infidel cavil, though we love Deity most when represented in the spirit of Jesus himself, which is only possible in days of advanced humanitarianism like those in which our lot is cast. But priesthoods have often taken cruel advantage of these divine necessities, and imitating the Davids and Samuels have issued in the awful name of God, such commands as that of Pope Adrian to ravish girls, destroy cities and put all the inhabitants to the sword. Hence the world has passed through its days of inquisitions and seen its horrid tragidies committed in the name of religion, till that name became an abomination in the eyes of enlightened men. Dreadful indeed are those tragedies at best, but unspeakably horrible in their worst phases.

It may be said of Charlemagne however, that he did much represent a king David, in his apostolic championship for God, as he did also a Solomon in his aims to create for the world a better civilization than that which he found when he came to the throne. At length in the year 800 of our era he made his grand entry into Rome to rescue Pope Leo from conspiring priests. He convoked the clergy, the senate, and the people, and before this mighty king of France the successor of St. Peter was adjudged and acquitted.

On the day following, Charlemagne went in great pomp to the cathedral at Rome, where the Pope and his clergy awaited him, and, in the presence of the dignitaries of Church and State, Leo placed on the head of the king a crown of iron, and in a loud voice proclaimed, "To Charles Augustus, crowned by the hand of God, Emperor of the Romans, life and victory." Whereupon acclamations were sent up: "Life and victory to Charles Augustus, crowned by the hand of God, Emperor of the Romans." Leo then prostrated himself before the emperor according to the custom of the popes to the ancient Cæsars. "Thus," says the historian, "was re-established, after an interval of three hundred years, the dignity of Roman Emperor, extinct since A. D. 476."

Our readers will remember that Napoleon Bonaparte in his vast ambitions to restore the ancient grandeur to France, caused to be repeated in his own life, this great historical drama, taking from the hand of the Pope, in the cathedral of the renowned city of Milan, this iron crown of Charlemagne, the modern "Man of Destiny" encircled his imperial head, exclaiming—"God hath given it to me; let him who dare, wrest it from me!" More than any other man, Napoleon represented Charlemagne in his imperial ambitions, though not the loftiness of his priestly character.

"To know Charlemagne," says Michelet in his famous history of France, "we must see him in his palace of Aix. This restorer of the empire of the West had despoiled Ravana of her most precious marbles in order to adorn his barbarian Rome. Actively busied even when taking his leisure, he prosecuted his studies there under Peter of Pisa, and the Saxon Alcuin, applying himself to grammar, rhetoric and astronomy. He, also, acquired the art of writing, a rare accomplishment in those days. He piqued himself on his choral singing, and was unsparing in his animadvertions on those priests who were deficient in this part of the service."

Charlemagne surrounded himself with strangers of every nation who brought to him the recommendation of their own mental culture: and literary men of even mean extraction were highly honored by him. It happened that together with some Breton merchants two Irish-Scots—men of incomparable learning, skilled in literature both profane and sacred, landed on the coast of Gaul. They displayed no merchandise for sale but daily exhorted the crowd of purchasers in this wise—"Whoever desires wisdom let him come to us and receive it, we have it to sell." Charlemagne hearing of the strange men, sent for them and inquired if it was true, to which they replied; "We have it, and we give it in the name of the Lord, to those who seek it worthily." The King demanded their price, and they answered "A convenient place, rational creatures, and what cannot be done without in this earthly pilgrimage—food and raiment." Charlemagne was delighted and kept them with him; but, being called away on his military expeditions, he ordered one of them—Clement the Scot—to remain in Gaul, while he sent the other—John Melrose, a disciple of the learned Bede—into Italy, giving him St. Augustine's monastery, near Pavia, that he might open a school. On hearing this, Albinus, surnamed Alcuin, another of Bede's disciples, and a native of Saxon England, went over to Charlemagne who gave to him St. Martin's Abbey, near Tours, that he might educate the people of France, both of high and low degree "and such fruits," says the historian, "did his learned labors produce that the modern Gauls or Franks were thought to equal the ancient Romans or Athenians."

After a long absence, the victorous Charlemagne returned to Gaul, and following the bent of his genius for wisdom he examined the people of his kingdom, both small and great, to learn of their intellectual progress; but found that, while the middle classes had advanced, those of noble descent had been barren in their mental culture. "Then" says the old Chronicaler "the wise monarch, imitating the eternal judge, placed those who had done well on his right hand and addressed them as follows:

"A thousand thanks, my sons, for your diligence in laboring according to my orders, and for your own good. Proceed, endeavor to perfect yourselves, and I will reward you with magnificent bishoprics; and you shall be even honorable in my sight." Then he bent an angry countenance on those on his left hand, and troubling their conscience with a lightning look, with bitter irony, and thundering rather than speaking, he burst forth with this terrible apostrophe." But for you, nobles, you sons of the great, delicate and petty minions, as you are, proud of your birth and your riches, you have neglected my orders, and your own glory, and the study of letters; and have given yourselves up to ease, sports and idleness, or to worthless exercises."

After this preamble raising on high his august head and his invincible arm, he fulminated his usual oath—

"By the King of Heaven I care little for your nobility and beauty; however, others may admire you, and hold it for certain, that if you do not make amends for your past negligence by vigilant zeal, you will never obtain anything from Charles."

But with all his love of the companionship of literary men and preference for strangers of mental culture, his ceaseless wars rendered it necessary for him to court the Germans—his own race—and hence he both spoke their language, and always wore the German dress, for his armies were Germanic. "He was of large and stout frame, and of a just, and not disproportionate height, round-headed, with very large and quick eyes, his nose a little exceeding a moderate size, his neck thick and short, his belly rather protuberant, his voice clear but not consonant to his statue." He was married five times, and had many mistresses The day before his death he finished correcting, with the assistance of some Greeks and Syrians, the Gospels of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John; and he was buried with the Gospel written in letters of gold in his own hand. Thus lived and died the mightiest man of the middle ages.

LYCURGUS AND PERICLES COMPARED.

OR, HOW THE WORLD HAS GROWN.

BY ELI E. KELSEY.

[NOTE.—By a failure in the reception of matter, the following essay, which should have closed the articles on Greece, was omitted, and a preparatory one on Rome inserted in its stead. It is, however, now presented to close the illustration of Grecian history, before the subject of Rome is further proceeded with.—ED.]

The colonial condition of all the different branches of the Greek nationality was the Magna Charta of their liberties. All claiming to have sprung from one origin, each band of colonists that settled on Islands in the Archipelago, or formed a settlement on any of the headlands, or spurs of the terra firma, claimed all the prerogatives and privileges of the "Oldest inhabitant," and entered into just such social compacts as were best adapted to their local needs, and contributed most to their enjoyment. Being emphatically the "first settlers," and having "killed the snakes, and made the roads" them selves, they owed no allegiance to any one.

Their common origin and common need—kept alive the feeling of a common nationality. They all worshipped the same God—and notwithstanding that each tribe or city claimed to be the especial pets of some one of the gods or godesses that ruled on high, they nurtured the belief that all Grecians were the general favorites of all of the heavenly hosts. The great problem the "balance of power"—that has occupied the attention of European statesmen more or less ever since the overthrow of the Roman empire,—was equally the bone of contention in Greece, and was contended and fought for in a hundred battles. The "will of the governed" was at the basis of the whole social polity of Greece. Their liberties were subverted from time to time by some cunning and ambitious chiefs. Society soon righted itself and the upheaval of the masses, overturned the temporary despot.

isms and avenged their wrongs;—by affixing the epithet of TYRANTS to the names of their oppressors—that damned them to all posterity.

History furnishes no brighter example of the influence of mighty minds in determining and directing the future of the nationalities to which they belonged, than is afforded in the lives of Lycurgus and Pericles. By a typographical error in a former article, we were made to say that the Athenian was in no way superior to his Spartan neighbor in mental training. It should have read in moral training. The mentality of the Athenian was of a far higher order than that of the Spartan. The philosophy of the Stoics prevailed in Sparta. A stoical indifference to pain, danger or death, or to good or evil fortune, was esteemed as the highest possible intellectual development in a Spartan. Lycurgus did not originate this form of philosophy in Sparta; he merely shaped it to accord best with the rude, savage and barbarous usages of his tribe already in vogue. He applied the Stoical philosophy to the conditions of every-day life. He introduced into practical use the theories of his progenitors. Lycurgus was a profound believer of all he taught to others. He descended from a throne to the simplest and most abstemious rules of life. While endeavoring to impress upon others a contempt for wealth, he did not become rich himself. He was the first to set the example by sacrificing his great wealth on the altar of (what he claimed to be) his country's good. His bitterest enemies—and he had many.—could not charge him with harboring selfish aims. To practically illustrate what he believed to be a divine system, he threw aside all the comforts that wealth would supply. He divested himself of the exclusiveness and the prerogatives of royalty, and made himself equal (temporally) with the poorest of his people. It was impossible to turn a deaf ear to a man so devoid of all selfishness—so sublime in his faith in that which he wanted others to believe in and practice. Like Moses, he was well skilled in the knowledge of human nature—rude as it was in his day. He well understood the mutability of the human mind. He was impressed with the fact that no power would be so potent in preserving his people from apostatizing from his system, as the mystery of his own end. He induced the Spartans to subscribe to a solemn oath made in the presence of the gods, to keep to the observances of his laws until his return from a journey he contemplated making—he never returned. He voluntarily exiled himself from his family, his home, his people, for his people's benefit. His end was covered from posterity by an impenetrable veil of mystery. We are proud that history has not failed to immortalize, and for over two thousand years, trumpetted the fame of so honest a man. A man whose faith was so sublime that he lived himself what he wanted others to practice. Although his system in our view, was weak, puerile and calculated only to perpetuate a rude barbarism, yet his honesty of purpose sanctifies his life and commands our respect. In our next we shall present the strongly contrastive character of Pericles.

THE SELF-MADE CHEMIST.

A TRUE STORY, FROM THE SCRAP-BOOK OF AN OLD REPORTER.

BY JOHN LYON.

Edward Woods, the subject of the following sketch, was the son of a poor, but respectable Irishman, who immigrated to Scotland in the year 1816.

At the time I first became acquainted with him he was what is called a day-laborer; and was generally occupied serving masons, or breaking stones to macadamize the highway. In this way he found it a hard matter to earn as much as was necessary to procure a scanty living for his wife and child. Fortune, however, turned her scales in his favor, and he was engaged to assist as laborer to a color maker in a calico printing establishment, purely on account of his ignorance of letters. Color-making being at that time a secret business, and controlled as a monopoly by those who held the recipes for discharging and producing bright shades of color, in finishing worsted, and silk shawls. Poor Ned's ignorance, consequently was a good recommend, as he could neither read nor write at the time he was engaged. And as he had only to do the drudging work of cleaning tubs, skimming the liquor boilers, and stirring the liquidized chemicals, he felt comfortable in his new employment.

I was then at school, and as he lived on the same "flat" with me, I had an opportunity of reading to him portions of my primer, and recited my lessons to him of an evening, in which he took great interest. One evening after reading to him the autobiography of a poor mechanic who had learned to read, write, and who ultimately became an author and editor of a public journal; he felt at once inspired with the belief that he might also be somebody if he would apply himself as diligently as the mechanic in question.

I warmly advised him to begin immediately, and proffered him the loan of my first spelling book, and also my help as a teacher.

That evening he commenced his A B C, and every moment he had, during meal-times and evenings to the latest, were employed for several months, until he could put letters and monosyllables together. Then to the large spelling book, where he blundered away at words of two, three and four syllables unwearicdly. Then to the New Tesament, which he read to his wife, making his comments like an apostle.

Many laborious hours I spent with him before he could read, in spelling with him every word, two or three times, ere he could master the meaning of it.

I thought him an exceedingly dull scholar, and often wished in my heart that I had never incited him to take lessons. However, by the time our intimacy dropped off, he could read a newspaper. At this time I left for another part of the country, and heard no more of my pupil from 1818 to 1844, leaving a blank of twenty-two years in his history.

Many were the ups and downs of my own checkered life during this long period; and the remembrance of poor ignorant Ned Woods, the untaught laborer, had entirely left my memory, among other incidents of neglected worth.

I had just returned from Edinburgh on a special mission for the Western Watchman newspaper office, when I was abruptly stopped on the street by an elderly genteel-looking man, catching me by the arm and saying,—"Sir, pray excuse me, thus rudely introducing myself, but is your name Mr. Forrest King," to which I replied in the affirmative; rather taken by his abrupt question, and, rumaging every corner of my memory, and calling up every phiz in my recollection in the vain effort to discover in the portly figure before me the fac simile of the interrogator—but I could not. "Why, Mr. King," said he, "don't you recollect your great dunce of a pupil who learned, when a married man, his A B C by your help?" "Me, sir, you certainly are mistaken?" I replied, still working away in the cranial copy of my poor brain to find out some cue to the figure before me. Still I insisted in the negative, and he kept me in suspense, until another gentleman stopped and accosted him by the familiar congratulation, "Good evening, Mr. Woods." "Woods, Woods, Woods," I repeated mentally, when all in a moment twenty-two years dwindled into the short space of yesterday, and there stood before me the same high brow, dark grey eyes, hooked nose, high cheek bones, large mouth, and broad chin that I knew in my old pupil; but from the meagre form of poverty, changed to a clear, red, healthy-looking man just past the meridian of life—from a poor laborer, changed to a well dressed, well to do, good looking gentleman.

"Why," said I, "sir, are you Edward S. Woods, who lived at Barrowfield bar, twenty-two years ago?" "The same man," he replied laughing, "only a little altered; rather fatter, richer and more intelligent than when we first became acquainted." Here he made a pause as if seeking for words to communicate his ideas, and, raising himself up to his full stature, said—"Mr. King, I am happy to inform you that I am now an independent man, so far as money and property can make a man so. I am," he continued, "but lately come down from London, where I make my home, with my family—and where most of my business is transacted. You have often been the subject of my reflections, and several times I have tried to find out where you had gone to, but those who knew you, could give me no information. This very day I was informed that you were on business in Edinburgh. Good gracious King!" said he, catching me by the two hands, and shaking me so forcibly, that I felt my bones doubling over each other in his sinewy grasp. "How glad I am to see you so respectable looking, and so intellectually engaged in your native city! But I am losing time in common-place street conversation. Come "let us go to Strawberry Hill Cottage."

"I beg the favor of another opportunity, Mr. Woods, if you please," said I, "my business requires immediate dispatch; but two hours from the present time will leave me entirely at your service." With this request, he reluctantly let go my hand, which felt as if crushed to a jelly, "Well," said he, "we meet at two o'clock, this afternoon opposite the Tontine." I nodded assent. The other gentleman took his arm, and walked off in an opposite direction; when I posted on to the office with my scraps of travel for the following day's travel.

Having transacted my business at the office with the Editor, he informed me that a gentleman had called at his lodgings seemingly very anxious to see me, and had asked a hundred questions relative to my pecuniary circumstances, connection with the newspaper, intellectual abilities, and of my family, number of children, and I don't know what all.

Two o'clock found me according to appointment waiting beneath the commodious porch of the great hall of the ancient building referred to, where Mr. Woods soon joined me, and in a few minutes we were on our way to Strawberry Hill, inside of an omnibus crowded with passengers. Passing private dwellings terraces, ornamental walks and gentlemen's villas rapidly, it brought us in the time mentioned to Strawberry Hill Cottage.

To my surprise, we halted opposite a large gate, fenced on each side with a high brick wall, enclosing half an acre in front. Mr. Woods soon gained admission, by drawing a bell-wire at a small door, which an old man opened. But guess my surprise. Instead of a cottage, and strawberries, as I had contemplated, there was everything in juxtaposition to the scenery which we had just passed.

A two-story brick building faced the entrance, and farther up the lot, on a rising ground, peaked up to the clouds, a huge stalk, or chimney, three hundred feet high, around the base of which was a circle of sheds, as black as charcoal. All around lay large vitrol bottles, barrels, and boxes of every size and description; and an innumerable quantity of bones, bark and seaweed, the stench of which was so intolerable that I could scarcely breathe. Mr. Woods, perceiving this, took me by the hand and led me back to his office, and prepared what he called a restorative for me. "Ah! Mr. King," he said, "I perceive you are much affected with the smell of our chemicals, but this will soon dispel the effects of your sickness, and rid you of that coughing. We drug-manufacturers never feel it;—usage is everything."

Having recovered from my sickness, and being left to myself, as Mr. Woods had gone out with his foreman, I had time to look about the office. The room was furnished with a large desk, tables, chairs, and a bookcase from floor to ceiling; and around the walls hung retorts, blow-pipes, worms for distillation, and various other instruments, of which I had no conception. On the shelves were bottles filled with blue, red and yellow liquids, labelled iodine sulphuric-acid, arsenic, opium, oxalic-acid, strychnine, citric-acid, and a variety of other poisons. Observing the great quantity of these deathly ingredients, I fell into a strange reverie of thought, and was musing on the quantity of beings that were daily passing into eternity from the use of such drugs, when my reflections were put a stop to by the entrance of Mr. Woods and his foreman, who would have me go with them through the works, to which I reluctantly consentd.

My curiosity being much excited respecting the bones and kelp lying around, I asked Mr. Woods what use he made of them, "Sir" said he, "those bones are the most useful, and I may say, the best paying article in the works. We purchase all the worn-out horses in the country, the skins of which we sell to the tanners, the bones we grind for manure, and the marrow in them we preserve for making salve." "Salve?" I repeated, with a slight convulsion. "Yes, sir, this salve is famed throughout the world for its healing properties. Why, sir, this salve has done more for the ease, and comfort of rheumatic patients than any other medicine discovered since the days of Aristotle.

Pointing my finger at a large heap of something like blubber, "And what is this for?" I inquired, holding my nose firmly with my other hand. "That, sir," he responded, "is another invaluable marine substance, called kelp, which, when distilled, is one of the most inveterate poisons extracted from the vegetable creation; when calcined to ashes we sell it to glass manufacturers to purify their glass; in fact, it is used in a variety of medicines; we boil, burn, and distil it to produce salts, corrodents, sublimates, and other medicinal substances." Here he left me in quite a mist, embellishing his discriptions with a great many Latan phrases, with a pompous use of names, to illustrate their combinations with other bodies, respecting all of which I had not the smallest idea. Of this, however, I felt assured, that my pupil there was far ahead of myself scientifically, as I was of him when I taught him to conjugate the letters of his own name.

"Friend Woods," said I, "I should like to know what led you first to study chemistry." "Why I thought I had told you." "No sir," I replied. "Well then I have to add another laurel to your cap, I sir learned chemistry from my employer the color-master; who would sooner have given me the hair off his head, had he known it: relying on my entire ignorance of letters he told me how to make up the compounds, the quantity, the names of the liquors for brightening and reducing shades, in imitation of the great papilton. In fact, he was greatly indebted to my industry—often I've done his work when he was stretched beneath the table, more like a corpse than a color-maker. Dead with the effects of alcohol. In this way I have to thank John Barleycorn as well as yourself for my knowledge of chemistry."

"Chemistry, Mr. King," he continued, "is the greatest science under heaven." To this I nodded assent, as one often does when he feels himself unqualified to speak one word, lest his ignorance on the subject spoken of, might be discovered.

"You, Mr. King, follow an intellectual avocation. You doubtless know more of Science, Literature, and the fine Arts than I do, and consequently know how miserably far short we are of knowing anything of chemistry, comparatively speaking."

Another nod of my head closed up this interesting detail for which I felt thankful, lest he should discover my ignorance.

"By-the-by," said he, giving me another excruciating squeeze and knowing wink, "I am much indebted to you gentlemen of the press, for publishing advertisements, such as:—Wood's Never-failing Stomach Specific! Wood's Digestion promoting Bitters!! Wood's Blood cleansing essence!!! Wood's Spine-supporting Plaster!!!! Wood's Sure and Certain Remedial Salve for Rhumatics!!!!! But," said he, "I am cutting off time. You shall have my catalogue before you leave. What do you think, Mr. King, of paying, as I have done, three hundred pounds sterling for advertising in one year.—money well laid out for puffing, too, as you would call it. My wonderful remedies, effected by chemical processes, would be little better than a block of the raw material, without the medium of the press. As somebody says in the play, 'Educate! Educate!' so I say, 'Publish! Publish!' That is the secret next to the invention of drugs."

"But," said he suddenly, "I had quite forgotten my promise to Mr. Quicksilver, the gentleman who saluted me at the Tontine when we first met; but you shall go with me. The omnibus passes in five minutes."

So saying, he took my arm, and hastened out of his cesspool of dirt, bones, and blubber-kelp, to his office at the gate, where he regaled me with a glass of good whisky, and took one himself; commemorating me with a toast to the welfare of the man who laid the foundation of Wood's prosperity, by imparting to him the complicated knowledge of A B C.

"My ignorance of useful knowledge," said he, "has led me to see after the education of my two sons, who have received in Oxford and Cambridge a sound commercial and classical education. I am sorry to say, they have not the disposition and spirit of their father; they care no more for chemistry than I do for the mysteries of Swedenborg. They are gentlemen, to be sure, and can read Hebrew, Greek and Latin, and know more of high life than I do; but had I not studied how to turn horse-bones and marrow into manure and salve, and make bark and seaweed a needful commodity in the medicinal category of drugs, where would they have been to-day?"

Infinitely to my relief, the omnibus made a halt, when we stepped into the conveyance, and left the dreary-looking brick wall and great chimney, which soon lessened in the distance, like its withering smoke, to the inexpressible relief of myself, and the benefit of the beautiful gardens, that would have been otherwise burnt up, or suffocated by its stench.

Soliciting, and pleading the necessity of attending to my business, I left with the promise to meet him at noon, beneath the pillars of the Tontine, where we met accordingly. He conducted me through several streets, to what was called the New Town, opposite to the monument erected to the memory of Sir John Moore. "This" said he, "is Wood's Medical Dispensary and Apothecary Hall. The largest and most complete establishment in Glasgow." It was indeed a spacious building occupying, what in Scotland, are called three flats. It was devoted to every species of chemicals, drugs, paints, and dye stuffs. The barrels, boxes, and jars lying at the door for export, told that an immense wholesale business was going on under the cognomen of "Woods Wholesale and Retail Drug Warehouse," which I observed, in large gold letters, above the entry. He also kept a physician and several licensed apothecaries, who gave advice, made up recipes and orders to all parts of Great Britain, and the Continent.

In this establishment he showed me many natural curiosities, of what he called, "abortive generations," preserved in vials of liquor. Khan's Museum in London, was no comparison to it. Skeletons of murderers that had been hung in Glasgow, were there with their names, crime and character attached, specimens of dissected subjects of all ages, with their bones, sinews, muscles, and blood vessels, pitched over with some kind of black glue, they were kept for private Lectures given gratis to poor students during the winter season, through the generosity of Mr. Woods. He offered me a handsome salary, if I would go into the warehouse. In fact, he did all he could to better my condition, but the knowledge of my inability kept me from accepting such a situation.

We parted on this my first days visitation to his chemical works, and Medical Hall, with the promise that whilst he remained in Glasgow I should be no stranger at his place of residence. He called often at the Western Watchman Office, and we would stroll away to the public green, and there converse together for hours on any subject that might happen to present itself.

"I am more than surprised" I said, one day, while engaged in one of our familiar confabs, "when looking at your extensive business, and reflecting on the many hundreds of such places throughout the United Kingdom, that they can all be supported, when we know that it is among the poor where disease is most prevalent. "Ah" he rejoined "the use of medicine is like the use of alcohol, the more it is used, the more it is in demand. Stimulants of all kinds have the same effect on the human constitution. In fact, the most deadly poisons when taken as medicines, by frequent use, become as necessary as common food; and while the patient is satisfying his unnatural appetite and at the very time he is exhilarated by it, he knows that it is poison, and that to quit would be certain death—just as much as he knows that the article will give him temporary relief. The weaker the patient grows through disease, the more must the exhilarating potion be increased, to keep pace with his growing maladies. Thus you perceive, Mr. King, that though medicines of all kinds when taken into the system for a long period, must be injurious; still the growth of disease is the cause." Medicine he continued, "is like wax in a tallow candle, which makes it last longer, but must in the end burn out. From this you will perceive not only the necessity of drugs as stimulants, but that the demand is always growing with the increase of disease."

Mr. Woods left for home some three months after our first meeting. I may just mention that he very warmly invited me to call at his residence in London, if chance should ever send me in that direction; which I accordingly did some eight years after. In the year 1852, I went up to London to have my portrait taken for a frontispiece to the Harp of Zion, which was then publishing. When walking over Ludgate Hill, I remembered the place and residence of my first scholar, to which I walked with expectant heart, anticipating his warm and friendly reception. But how shall I point out in words the disappointment I met with. My old friend was dead. His son, a haughty self-willed coxcomb, invited me into his drawing-room, and there interrogated me as to where I came from; what my business was in London; how I become acquainted with his father, and what my profession or calling was. To all of which questions I answered promptly, with a tone indicative of my displeasure. I saw he was ashamed of his father's mean parentage; and of those who knew anything of his history. I left in disgust, without using the formality of good-bye, and with a vexed heart—as much so as ever I had exulted at his father's success in the world, and at his great natural attainments.

The above tale I have kept in my scrap-book for many years, with a determination to publish it some day, as an illustration of what energy and labor will accomplish for the humblest, and also as a brief memorial of the ingratitude of his despicable son.

TERESE, THE HEBREW MAIDEN;

OR,

NOT ALL DROSS

BY EDWARD W. TULLIDGE.

CHAPTER XLVII.

HIS SPIRIT-BRIDE.

In the conference which took place between Sir Richard and our hero, Sir Walter, by his consideration, spared much his noble relative's pride. He had anticipated all, and was prepared.

"My dear uncle," he observed, almost as soon as Sir Richard opened the subject, "I understand it all, even as you know of the past. The old love cannot die, but that part of my heart which is not possessed by Terese belongs to Alice. I love the one without loving the other less. There is a strange blending of both in my affections. Indeed they seem to me almost as one, and not two. Alice shall be my bride."

"But Walter—"

"Nay, my dear uncle, say no more: Alice shall be my bride. Can I see my cousin this evening?"

Sir Richard Courtney wrung his nephew's hand, but spoke not for he dared not trust himself to speech. Seeking to command his emotions, he left Sir Walter Templar and went with a full heart to the chamber of his daughter, to inform her that his nephew desired an interview with her.

"Alice, my darling child," said Sir Richard, as he stood by the bedside of his daughter, "your cousin Walter has asked permission to pay you a visit. He has something very important to say to you. Do you think we can grant his request? Now you must not agitate yourself, my darling. But perhaps we had better defer the meeting till to-morrow. Your cousin must curb his impatience."

"No, papa, I will see Walter to-night," the maiden replied.

When Sir Richard addressed his daughter concerning the request of Walter Templar for an interview, her heart bounded within her, and her alabaster countenance became beautified with a rich blush, which made her look, more than ever, spiritual. She read in her father's own face the deep meaning of his words, though he threw into his voice a pleasant tone, and smiled upon her with beaming affection. Indeed, notwithstanding the baronet's just and generous soul, and his kind remembrance of Terese the Hebrew Maiden, he was unspeakably gratified with the avowal of his nephew that Alice should be his bride. His conscience would have reproched him for a father's selfishness, had it not been for the fact that Terese was a Jewess, and that the two families had pronounced the decision that religions and races had placed God and Nature's barriers between the two. Conscience, therefore, was on the side of Walter's union with his Christian cousin, rather than with a maiden of the Jewish race, for even if she became a Christian by adoption, to her family she would be as an apostate from the faith of her ancestors. All things considered, therefore, Sir Richard deemed the resolve of Walter to make Alice his bride, much as a kind interposition of Providence for good, brought about in its mysterious but beneficent ways. Hence the beaming joy of the father when he communicated to his daughter the hint of the blessed proposal which Walter was about to make.

Lady Templar, as soon as Alice had expressed her wish to see Walter that night, left the chamber and, in a few minutes, returned with her son. The mother then going to the bedside of her niece, kissed her affectionately; and, taking her brother Richard by the hand, led him from the room, leaving the cousins alone. The mother's action was expressive: Walter and Alice understood its meaning.

As soon as his uncle and mother had left the room, Walter approached and knelt by the bedside of his cousin and took her unresisting hand.

"Dear Alice," he began, "I come to ask you to bless me with this love-link which now I hold. Walter need not multiply words to you. Will you, dear Alice, be my bride?"

The proposal was like Walter Templar, all earnestness, no artificial flourish, a soul in every word, a volume of purpose in a few sentences. There was also fine tact and exquisite delicacy in this brevity for Alice knew all the past. A long passionate speech would have shocked, not made her joyful. Indeed, this family whose absolute truthfulness and noble simplicity had made such a deep impression on Judah Nathans, could best appreciate and manifest this fervent genuineness which so characterized them all. Walter's few but earnest words therefore were better appreciated by the maiden than would have been a long passionate speech as from a distracted lover. Her artless answer to her cousin was of the same character.

"Yes, dear Walter, I will be your bride—your spirit-bride!"

"Nay, dearest Alice, live for me! I know your thought. I heard you express your fancy in your unconscious moments. But I ask you now to be my bride of earth."

"I will, Walter, but not yet. I am not near enough to the gate of heaven. I will be your bride of earth, but not until the last hour of my mortal life, when my own sphere is opening above me. Terese shall take my place, and I will be your spirit bride."

"Oh, no, my gentle one, you must not pass away from us. Live for your father, for me, for us all. Think not, dear Alice, that I do not love you, for I do truly. I love Terese, but my heart and life is not less yours. As I have told my uncle, there is a strange blending of you both in the yearnings of my nature. Heaven has willed that Terese must not be mine: be you Terese and Alice in one."

"Heaven has not so willed it, Walter—Heaven has not so willed it. Terese after me, will be your bride of earth, and I your bride of Heaven. You know that they say that the vision of those who are near eternity often take in the future, when that of those who are long for earth is dim. Well, dear Walter, I have seen the future. It is not a mere fancy. I shall be your spirit-bride, but linked for a few moments on earth by the holy sacrament of the church. Yes, I have seen it all, as in a beautiful vision. Terese has been there in the scene and given her bridegroom to me and then breathing on you both a blessing, my spirit has ascended and hovered above you, leaving her in my place—the one to you the bride of earth—the other the bride of heaven."

"Talk not so, dear Alice. These are but beautiful fancies of your own pure generous soul, wrought up by a crisis which has brought you near to death. But you will soon be strong. You will live for me—promise that, dear one!"

"I will live for you, hovering ever only just above you, sharing in all your joys, comforting you in your sorrows, keeping far from you by my spirit presence, every harm that Alice's prayers can charm away. Remember it, dear Walter, in your after-life. I will be near you. All will be fulfilled. Hush, Walter, your mother's footsteps approach. Not a word of this to your mother or my father yet."

Lady Templar entered and warned her son that his interview had been long enough; and Walter impressed on the lips of his bride elect, his first kiss as a lover, and left Alice alone with his mother.

Here was one of those interesting cases so often met in life where it would seem that both fate and the heart's purest and deepest affections had bound three souls together. Wherever we meet them in monogamic society, we mourn that one or the other of the gentler ones must be sacrificed. It is then that even the severest monogamist feels a latent conviction of the necessity of some great provision in the divine arrangements for the harmony of sexual kindred. They three are one. The most heartless and selfish dare not doubt it. Yet in the narrow views of the endless unions, society dares to say the one must be sacrificed, but the tender-hearted fondly hope that all will be righted in the world above. Why should not such cases also be righted in this sphere of earthly unions? But spiritual Alice Courtney has chosen for herself the place of a bride of Heaven.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

LOVE TRIUMPHS OVER RELIGIOUS SCRUPLES.

We left Judah Nathans pursuing his own method—twisting himself to unravel his tangled skein. He had agreed with Sir Richard Courtney that it was useless to speculate on what might have been; but that was because Courtney was not prepared to make the rapid transition with himself into the new intentions which he had formed for the future to bring about the union between Sir Walter Templar and his niece. He had, moreover, to transform his uncle Isaac's mind, which he foresaw would be done more by the conflicting affections of the old man for his grandchild than by any Universalean philosophy. Nevertheless, Judah deemed the case a very difficult one, until he learned by the arrival of his uncle in London of the flight of Terese from Rome. This much modified affairs, for he found the old man in his concern for his grandchild, some days disposed to consent to the union with our hero: but on the next day, in a state of repentance, as though in thus consenting, he betrayed his religion and race. Circumstances were therefore not ripe for Judah Nathans to communicate to Walter Templar the joyful news that the embargo against the union on their side, had been removed. Moreover, he rightly judged that the conflict of Isaac Ben Ammon's affections would conquer his religious scruples.

One day, Judah Nathans, with a letter from Terese, entered his uncle's private room in the house once occupied by Reuben Nathans, the money-lender. It was the room where the old miser used to commune with his gold; and here Isaac Ben Ammon was now in the habit of communing with his sorrows. Judah found his uncle as usual bemoaning the absence of his grandchild. The stricken old man was, in his imagination, in restless search for her. Awakened from his fitful dreams, he eagerly arose to meet his nephew with questions mingled with querulous moanings.

"Have you found her, good Judah? Oh where is my grandchild? I cannot endure this suspense. Alas! alas! I fear she is dead. Oh Benjamin my son, I have lost you again in losing her. Have you heard aught concerning her? I will myself search for my grandchild. She shall marry the Christian. Father Abraham pardon me for saying so; but I cannot live without my grandchild. Ha! what have you there? A letter? 'Tis from Rachel. Give it me, Judah. The hope of Israel then has not departed. The God of Jacob be praised!"

"Remember, Uncle, your promise that Rachel's child shall marry the Christian noble."

"Alas! alas! Judah, I am sorely tried!" answered the venerable Hebrew.

The epistle of his grandchild was very affectionate, but much in the tenor of the one she addressed to him on her flight from Rome. She told him that she was in Paris with her master, Spontini, and following her profession. She spoke of the comfort which she had experienced in her determination to devote her life to art; and how distracted she should be by any other design. Tenderly, yearningly, yet resolutely, the maiden plead with her grandfather to be reconciled to the course which she had marked out for herself in life, now Walter Templar was gone from her hope, and she said that, as soon as her grandfather was reconciled to resign his intentions of marrying her to one of the Hebrew faith, she would return to his arms and home. In such a case, she would be by his side to minister to him as life was granted him; but, if he still persisted to force the marriage upon her, she could never see him more. She had sacrificed herself to satisfy the conscience of her Hebrew race in not marrying the Christian; but she would never in the present or the great hereafter, be other than the wife of Walter Templar.

"Judah," observed the old man when he had read the letter, "we will visit Sir Richard Courtney and his family; if they consent to the marriage between my grandchild and Sir Walter, we will not withhold ours. But if they consent not, then is the will of heaven against the union."

"Your philosophy is not sound, Uncle Isaac. We create divisions and call them heaven's making. We resolve and call it heaven's will. But what has heaven to do in willing the unhappiness of my sister's child? Divines would call me infidel, and such I am undoubtedly to their conceptions of the mood of God. To me, their deity is monster. No God is he to me, who plays the devil best. Indeed, I know not why he made a devil at all to work out his own ill intentions, for his own they must be: they are not mine; for evil, though it suits my mood to deem myself, I have no intentions of harm or unhappiness to any of human kind. If the adder but gets out of my path I will not tread on even him, though he is a malicious reptile, but if he would bite my foot, then will I crush him without compunction; yet with a shudder of disgust, that necessity compels me to so foul a deed as to soil my heel by crushing any life to dung the earth with. Why, what does Heaven want to set devils at us for, and to busy itself by crossing us ever when our happiness is near?"

"Yet think you not, Judah, that God permitted the serpent to tempt our first parents, as Moses our great lawgiver, has recorded."

"Why should not the good permit the evil? It created it not, and has naught to do with it. But Moses was our Hebrew Æsop. He wrote wondrous fables. Is a devil necessary for my good?—then have I enough of him in myself without any super-addition. Wherefore should good or God be infinitely malicious; if He sets an Infinite Malice to prey on poor humanity, then is He Himself the Infinite Malice—not good—not love. He would be more evil than I, who rank myself as evil, for my own conceptions of good are above myself; yet have I ever held that malice in life is a mean vice; and when I hurt, it is not because hurting gives me pleasure, but from my own or others necessities. But what necessity is there that God should design hurt, for surely He finds not the necessity for hurting. His nature, so says the highest philosophy, is to bless; therefore, His necessities are all on the side of blessings. He wills the happiness of all, therefore He wills the happiness of my sister's child. Now, I do also, will her happiness, and therefore will her marriage with Sir Walter Templar."

"But our ancient faith, Judah. That must be maintained."

"Wherefore maintain it uncle, because it is an ancient faith? If it be the highest wisdom and the highest truth, by all means, uncle Isaac, let it be maintained, not because Moses gave it four thousand years ago, but because it reaches up to Moses as he stands to-day. Uncle, I have read a hundred sages, and have sought the truth in the heights and in the depths, the length and the breadths, in the good and in the evil, and I have always found that this thing called ancient faith is the lowest not the highest form of truth. Why, I would not be to-day so low, so cruel, nor so crude a thing as Abraham's God; nor would I have a lawgiver so barbaric as our Moses. He and his faith are too ancient. Now, I am no Christian, uncle Isaac, for, in spite of my infidelity, I am Hebrew in my instincts; yet the man Christ elevates me more than the man Moses. His divine nature, excepting as we are all divine, every atom, every attribute, good or evil—his being the son of God, as christian orthodoxy makes him, is, to me, folly; yet would I take this Jesus as the standard for mankind, rather than our Moses. Jesus is not so ancient; and his modern views suit me better; and his philosophy of love and Catholicity harmonizes with the better and the higher state of man. Moses was lawgiver but to Israel,—this Jesus to a world. He pleases my intellect because he is the Gentiles God, for the Gentiles make a world, we the Hebrews but an atom of that world. I say, let the Jew and Gentile mate, for in that mating, mankind is made more universalian in their forms, and spirit; and, therefore, more modern—not more ancient. Out upon this ancient faith! I would have the faith of the future—not the faith of the past—for the one is barbaric, the other enlightened. Why go back to our father Abraham, and Moses our great lawgiver? They were great; and, in their time, the foremost of the world; but now they represent our semi-savages. Plato and Christ, were two thousand years ahead of them, because they were two thousand years less ancient, with natures and characters equally great. Uncle Isaac, never trouble about maintaining our ancient faith, but marry your grandaughter to the Christian."

"Judah, thou art wise in thy intellectual views, but perverted In thy religious faith; yet thou wilt agree with me that Israel must not die out of the world."

"Yet, Uncle Isaac, if Terese wed not Sir Walter Templar, your Israel will die out of the world. She will marry not and be childless, and your race in her will become extinct."

"Alas! Judah, thou sayest truly. But I would he were a Hebrew."

"I love my niece, and would have her happy, and therefore am I satisfied that Walter Templar is a man; were she naught to me, I should not care if he were a Hebrew."

"My son, the Hebrews were the chosen people."

"So I suppose, Uncle Isaac, all mankind are chosen to reach the better state of the world, for I see the Gentiles fast traveling towards that better state. They are wiser, better and more tolerant than were Israel of old, so they are chosen too and for a better work. Our forefather's were but savage fanatics, intolerant and narrow minded who looked upon all the human race besides themselves as dogs. If to be all this, fitted them to be a chosen people they were fitted and were doubtless chosen."

"The Hebrews were the favored of God. Thou wilt own, Judah, at least thou wilt own that they were His favored and peculiar people."

"So I suppose all men are favored who deserve his favor. As for peculiar-flavored grace, I cannot say I like the smell of it. So, Uncle Isaac, be less peculiar, and marry my niece to the Christian noble.

"I would, Judah, that thou wert lest a skeptic."

"And I that my niece were Sir Walter Templar's wife. But let her die a maiden, since you will it so."

"Nay, nay, Judah, I will it not."

"And childless, since our religion makes her childless. 'Tis the will of heaven."

"Nay, Judah, nay."

"It is not my will, nor yours, nor heaven's; wherefore then should she not be Sir Walter Templar's wife? For, if she is not that, the other follows."

"Well, well, Nephew, I have decided. She shall be the Christian's wife; but I would to God that he were the poorest Israelite in all the world, rather than a gentile. Yet, Judah, I confess he is a nobleman more than in title."

"Your intention, then, is to visit Sir Richard Courtney's family Uncle Isaac?"

"Such is my intention."

"And then the union between Rachel's child and Walter Templar? This must be unalterable or I move not in the affair. That which I undertake shall be accomplished, if within my power, or I undertake not. Say, is it unalterable?"

"Alas, Judah, my grandchild must marry the Christian; but I would it were not so. Be satisfied, it is unalterable."

"As my will," concluded Judah, "when such a necessity encompasses me. To-morrow, Uncle Isaac, we start for Sir Richard Courtney's."

CHAPTER XLIX.

TERESE'S GRANDFATHER AND ALICE COURTNEY.

To the great joy of the Courtney family, Alice rapidly revived. She had a purpose to accomplish, and that was to bring about the union between Walter and Terese. In the beautiful fancies which had taken possession of her mind, she was playing the ministering angel even now. Her own union with Walter was to be but for the moment; that between Walter and Terese was to come after she herself had passed into her proper sphere of spirit-bride. Walter daily tried to remove this fancy from her mind, but he could not; it increased, and with it a certain impatience, as though she was restless to be in her own sphere. She seemed waiting for something which she expected would certainly come.

Walter and Alice were sitting alone on the terrace in front of Courtney House, when a carriage was heard driving up the avenue of the park. In a few moments a chariot, with four horses, and postilions, drew up near the door; Judah Nathans alighted, and then helped a venerable man, with a flowing white beard also to alight. The former was in an instant recognized by the two cousins, but when the old patriarch arose in his seat, Alice looked up into our hero's face with a heavenly smile, and said:

"Dear Walter, he is come. I have been waiting for him. It is Terese's grandfather."

Walter was too much agitated for a reply. He experienced a certain shock at the realization that Alice's fancies were beginning to come to pass.

"Is it then more than a vision of her fancy? Is Alice to be my spirit bride and Terese my bride of earth?"

The thoughts were in his brain as quick as lightning. Alice gave to him another heavenly smile, for she read these thoughts with her spiritualized instincts; and then leaving her cousin, she hastened as fast as her delicate health would allow, to welcome to Courtney House the grandfather of Terese.

There was great concern, almost consternation, in the family of Sir Richard Courtney, at the arrival of their unexpected visitors—unexpected by all excepting Alice. In the presence of his youngest daughter, Sir Richard sought to avoid all reference to the past, and hinted to his visitors that Sir Walter and himself would privately commune with them in the evening. So the afternoon passed off with some constraint on both sides, not much to the astonishment of Judah, who expected reserve in Courtney. Alice, however, was particularly attentive to the grandfather, and treated him much with the same reverence as though he had been her own. Walter alone understood this, and still he was agitated by the thought.

In the evening, the gentlemen withdrew for a private conference in Sir Richard's library, excepting young De Lacy, who was left with the ladies. But previously, Alice took our hero aside and whispered:

"Dear Walter, tell them all. The time has come. It will pain my father, but he must know it. Before the close of your interview I will come. I shall know the moment."

Walter Templar was awed. He could not remonstrate with Alice at such a time, knowing how fully possessed her mind was with her fascinating programme. Indeed, he was almost fearful to break in upon her theme with a thought disconsolate to it, lest it should agitate her. So he promised to obey, and left her with a look of tenderest concern, for he felt that her strange dreams would be realized.

As soon as the gentlemen were fairly together in the capacity of a council in Sir Richard Courtney's library, Isaac Ben Ammon requested his nephew to lay before Sir Richard and Sir Walter the subject of their visit. This Judah did, in his clear, concise style, and the baronet and his nephew listened without a word, until he came to the flight of Terese, when Walter broke in, with anxious concern:

"Terese fled? And six months ago? I pray you, Mr. Nathans, stop not for the connection of your narrative, but relieve my suspense at once: Is she found?"

"Yes, Sir Walter. Her grandfather received a letter from her the day before yesterday."

"Is she well?"

"She is well."

Courtney then explained to his visitors that his family, after the last interview with Mr. Nathans, had deemed a union between Terese and Walter impossible; he then dwelt upon the months of deep grief of Walter which succeeded, and his retirement from almost all association with his family; and then, though he confessed that it was a delicate subject, he frankly related the case of his daughter Alice; and that the father's heart had plead with Walter for his darling child's life, and hope had not been denied.

"Alas, Alas!" lamented Isaac Ben Ammon. "You have saved your daughter's life, but I have blighted the earthly happiness of my grandchild. Judah, the hope of Israel has departed for ever now. Let us go. Our business is ended. We will start to London this very night, and then to Paris."

"Not so, uncle Isaac."

"In vain you remonstrate, Judah. Let my eyes rest upon my grandchild again, my ears catch her words of forgiveness, and then I will sleep with my fathers, for the hope of Israel has indeed departed now."

Isaac Ben Ammon arose from his chair to carry into immediate execution his resolve. Walter followed, to beseech him to remain, with the intention of communicating the part which Alice had charged him with: Judah kept his seat, with a calm mind and a resolute will; while Sir Richard also kept his seat, in deep sympathy for the heart-broken old man, but felt that any attempt at consolation from him would be like mocking the patriarch's grief. Thus were suspended for a moment the personages met in the library of Sir Richard Courtney. Alice Courtney opened the door of the library and stood upon the threshold contemplating the scene. To Walter Templar she seemed a spirit indeed, for he knew the purpose of her coming, and her appearance at that moment suggested to him that she was moved by mysterious inspirations. This, in fact, was the case. She had been strangely agitated for the last ten minutes, and then, led, perhaps, by some invisible hand, she sought the gentlemen in the library to tell her strange story of coming events. For an instant she stood upon the threshold, and then, entering, she took the Hebrew patriarch by the hand, and with the single word, "Grandfather!" she led him to his seat again. The maiden next took a footstool, and placing it near Isaac Ben Ammon, seated herself at his feet. The old man was awed, for she had taken the place as though she had been Terese herself, and not Alice Courtney. Sir Richard was puzzled by his daughter's conduct; Judah wondered, but in a moment took in the fact that Alice was not long for this world, and deemed her now acting under impulses of delirium. Walter alone fully realized the situation and the painful denouement to come.

Alice then told her father all her fancies; how she had pledged herself to Walter to be his spirit-bride, designing Terese, after her death, to be his bride of earth; and she closed with a prayer to her father to grant her dying request.

Sir Richard Courtney wept: Isaac Ben Ammon wept and laid his trembling hand on the maiden's head; Walter buried his face and moaned in anguish of spirit; Judah Nathans looked on with a strange intellectual concern, for he had another problem before him. At length Sir Richard Courtney burst forth in his great and sudden grief:

"Oh child, my child: can this be so?"

Alice left the side of Isaac Ben Ammon, and approaching her father, threw her gentle arms around his neck and kissed him tenderly, wiping the tears from his eyes.

"Papa, grieve not for me. I am not going to die. I am only going to the better world. Alice will be with you and Walter always. I am not going to die, papa. Jesus Christ will give me eternal life."

"Jesus was of Abraham!" mused Isaac Ben Ammon, more, however, as a thought than an observation.

Sir Richard held his daughter to his heart for a moment, and then putting her gently a little away from him, gazed intently into her beautiful face, in which a spiritual light shined, to try to read a refutation to Alice's fancies there.

"No, no, my darling," he said; "it is not so. "You are not going to die!"

"No, papa, not die. Only sleep a moment to wake above."

"Oh, my daughter—my darling little one, is it then no painful dream?"

"No dream, dear papa."

"Mr. Nathans," said Sir Richard, suddenly, "you are a man of strange knowledge. Answer me truly. Can any human help save my child?"

"I am less a sceptic than I was, Sir Richard. I think to-night there is an immortality. Your gentle daughter has seen it looming in the distance. Yes, I am less a sceptic than I was."

Judah had made similar remarks when he discovered the picture of Terese, and at the same time his uncle Isaac. It was an indirect answer to Courtney's question; but that was characteristic of the problem-solving Judah Nathans, and too well it conveyed to the agonized father's mind the truth that Alice would soon be with the angels above.

"Papa," observed Alice, "I must see my sister Terese before I go. I could not leave my earth-home happy unless I accomplished all to make Walter's life like my own sunny land to which I am going. We must seek Terese, papa. Is she in England?"

"No; in Paris, Alice."

"We will seek her in Paris, then; for I cannot go to my spirit-land until my sister Terese is near my side."

The sorrowful father could not find the desire in his heart to interfere with his daughter's beautiful, generous designs. Moreover, she gently, yet firmly declared that she could not be the bride of Walter unless all was fulfiled; and, as to be by right of holy marriage on earth his bride of heaven, was evidently a blissful thought to the maiden, Sir Richard allowed his daughter Alice to shape the future. He felt that he should know no peace of mind after her death did he deny her now. As for Walter he spoke not. Words from him would have been out of place; but he kissed his bride elect with more than earthly affection, and smoothed tenderly her alabaster brow. The rest of the family were unspeakably pained when all was communicated to them; but within a week, Sir Richard's family, including young De Lacy, started from Courtney House, with Isaac Ben Ammon and Judah Nathans, for Paris.

CHAPTER L.

THE BRIDAL WREATH.

"Sir Walter Templar, as I live! On my honor as a soldier, Sir Walter, I am delighted to meet you in Paris."

"The Marquis Baglioni, if I mistake not," observed our hero, who had accidentally met the Italian nobleman in the streets of Paris.

"By the way, have you seen Signor Spontini since your arrival?" asked Baglioni, after a few moments conversation.

"No, Marquis, but I am anxious to meet my illustrious master."

"You have not yet then heard Rachel, the Jewess?"

"And who is this Rachel, Marquis? I have heard of a lady by that name who is captivating Paris by her singing; but that is all I know of the lady."

"Delightful, Sir Walter—I have a surprise for you then. The lady is no other than your interesting companion of Italy."

"It is Terese, then," thought Walter. "My surmise was right."

"Here is the programme for this evening, Sir Walter. She sings in Spontini's great opera, La Vestala. You will be at the Opera House, I presume, to night?"

"The two gentlemen parted, and our hero hastened to communicate the intelligence to his own family, and to the grandfather and uncle of Terese.

Isaac Ben Ammon was in raptures, though he sought to subdue his transport. Sir Richard and the elder ones of the family were very grave, for they realized that Alice's dream was near its fulfillment; but the dying maiden replied, with a sigh of relief, accompanied with her heavenly smile:

"The angels are coming; but I must hear Terese sing her divine songs first."

"Nay, my darling child," gently remonstrated Sir Richard; "you must not go to the opera to-night."

"Say not so, dear papa To-morrow night I may not be able. I must hear Terese sing once before the angels come."

Sir Richard Courtney reluctantly granted his daughter's request; for all his family by this time felt that Alice had not many weeks to live. She had visibly declined since they left England, and only the tenacity of her purpose bore her up to its accomplishment.

That night the Courtney family were all at the opera-house to hear Terese sing; or Rachel, the Jewess, as she was announced to the public. The box which they occupied was near the stage. Alice was sitting by the side of Walter, Isaac Ben Ammon by Sir Richard Courtney, Frederick De Lacy, with the imperial looking Eleanor, and Lady Templar with Judah Nathans.

The opera commenced. Terese sang divinely, as usual; but Walter Templar thought, with more tragic impressiveness than she did a year ago in Rome. When our hero saw her come upon the stage, his heart throbbed and his soul yearned towards her. He felt that Terese, by her very presence, overwhelmed his nature, and all the passion of his being was again awakened. Had it not been for the spiritual fascination of his cousin over him, and the peculiar bond that was between them, he would have fled fromthe audience in dismay, for all the voices of his heart, when he beheld her, cried clamorously for Terese. He was almost terrified to find how much she was still to him. The old embargo, "The Jewess and the Christian cannot mate," had no weight with him then; division of races and antique covenants were confounded in the tumult of his feelings. Terese and Walter were one everlasting.

Perhaps Alice Courtney divined the thoughts and feelings of her elect, for she whispered to him:

"Walter, be comforted. Alice is but your bride of heaven; there is your bride of earth. We are not two, but one."

Walter tenderly pressed the hand of his gentle cousin, and the same awe which always possessed him when Alice spoke thus, brooded over him for the remainder of the evening, and, strange as it may seem, never did he love Alice as much as in that hour when he beheld Terese for the first time after their parting in Rome.

The performance of the evening was ended, the curtain dropped, and then a great shout from the audience brought the Hebrew Maiden before the curtain. As from heaven, a boquet fell at her feet. It was the first that greeted her. The hand of Alice Courtney had thrown the flowers. They were woven in the form of a bridal wreath, by the dying maiden's own hand, and concealed by her for the occasion. Terese immediately picked up the wreath, and somewhat surprised at it, cast her eyes to the box from whence it came, her face all bathed in blushes. Had she paused, instead of obeying her impulse, she would have left the wreath at her feet, but she had picked it up almost before she was conscious of the fact, and then, realizing that she held a floral crown in her hand such as might adorn a bride on her marriage day, she, in startled surprise, cast her eyes upwards to the doner. The smile of Alice Courtney beamed upon her as from an angel in heaven, and then a long entranced gaze rested upon Walter Templar. She saw also the other personages in the box, though obscurely; took in the fact that her grandfather and uncle were present; felt that the eyes of Walter's mother and uncle were bent upon her, and then, with a great gasp for breath, she fainted upon the stage, amid the shower of flowers that fell around her from many hands.

In a few minnes afterwards, the Hebrew Maiden was in the arms of her grandfather in the green-room, while Spontini was before the curtain explaining to the excited audience, the partial cause of his pupil's emotions, which they had taken as more serious. The people were satisfied, and withdrew; but Spontini had not told them all. Farinelli, who had led Terese out, alone, besides the maestro, knew that the lover, as well as the grandfather, was in the house; but even our heroine, as yet, understood not the full meaning of that bridal wreath of flowers.

A WHEELOCIPEDE.

It has only one wheel,
Neither treadle nor saddle;
It is built in such shape
That you don't have to straddle.
The man who propels it Takes hold with his hands
Of two parallel bars,
And on the ground stands;
Puts his feet in motion,
One after the other,
While the vehicle goes,
Without any bother.
This funny machine
Has no painting or gilding;
It is useful to carry
Material for building—
Shingles and shavings,
Brick, lime, and plaster—
And the lighter the load,
It can travel the faster.
It is better than a bicycle,
For it isn't so narrow;
And our wheelocipede
We call a wheel-barrow!

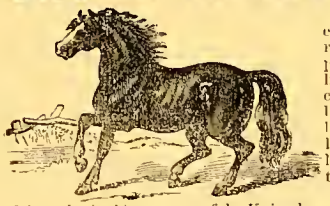
HARVELL'S
HORSE POWDERS.



These celebrated and renowned powders for horses and cattle have been tested by an intelligent public for sixteen years. Hundreds of the principal horsemen of the Union have pronounced them the only Condition Powders safe to use and work the horse. There is nothing in them to expose the animal, but, on the contrary, everything to improve them. The proprietors of horse railroads, omnibusses, and stage owners in all the principal cities use them; and their combined testimony stamps them one of the wonders of medical science. Letters sufficient to fill a small book are in our possession, testifying to their goodness. Merchants are requested to warrant them, and refund the purchase money should they fail to give satisfaction.

ALLCOCK'S POROUS
STRENGTHENING
PLASTERS.

ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS are the results of studies and experiments of Dr. Scheeut, of South Carolina; of Dr. Wm. Wagstaff, now Baron Wagstaff, of Horace H. Day, the distinguished manufacturer of rubber goods; and of Thomas Allcock, Chemist and member of the College of Pharmacy of New York, now General Allcock, etc., etc.

Step by step this commodity has attained its unprecedented fame. They are universally approved. They support, strengthen, and aid the growth of muscles. They appear to have a peculiar effect upon the nerves, allaying irritability, while supplying warmth. They seem to accumulate electricity, and aid the circulation of the blood through the part where applied, by which healthy actions are induced.

Even in paralysis, where articulation was suspended, the use of the Porous Plasters to the spine restored the articulation, and materially reduced the paralysis. In fact, the patient could help herself, while before the Porous plaster was applied she was as helpless as a baby. We refer to Mrs. Sally Elliot, Springfield, Mass.

Dr. Myer, of Savannah, Ga., says they are the best mechanical supporters for weak muscles ever discovered; that by their warming properties they bring power and health, until the strength of the muscles are entirely restored. That he knows a case where Allcock's Plasters cured a gentleman of a weak spine. That he daily prescribes them in his practice with the happiest results, and desires us to refer to him.

Dr. Henderson, of Farnsville, Louisiana, says: "The counter-irritant effect of Allcock's Porous Plasters is produced in such a mild and gradual way, they so invigorate the circulation around the parts to which they are applied, and exert upon all nervous diseases such a great sedative influence, that I place them confidently at the head of every plaster now in use."

Dr. Johnson, of Hartford, says: "My daily experience confirms the very superior excellence of your Porous Plasters. At this moment of writing, a man applies for one, who, by entanglement in a shaft of machinery, had both his legs broken, spine severely injured, and was for nearly a year entirely helpless. This man found relief very soon by the application of a plaster to his spine. He was soon enabled to work, and now he labors as well as ever. He would cheerfully pay five dollars for a single plaster, if they could not be had at a lower rate. Surgeons should make use of these perforated plasters, to the exclusion of all others, as their flexibility and adhesiveness are greatly in advance of all other plasters with which I am acquainted, while the perforations peculiar to them render them greatly superior to all others for ordinary surgical uses. Knowing the plasters to be so useful, I have no scruples that my sentiments should be known.

J. W. JOHNSON, M. D."

Dr. Sterling's testimony: "For two years, I have been a great sufferer from neuralgia in the head, and found only temporary relief from all the various remedies that I have tried, until I applied one of Allcock's Porous Plasters. I cut it into three strips, placing one under each shoulder blade, and the other over the small of the back; and for the past three months, I have had scarcely a twinge of the old pain.

I advise all who suffer from nervous diseases to lose no time in making a trial of the wonderful Porous Plaster.

A. F. STERLING, Sec. Singer Mfg. Co.
New York, June 8, 1868.

MEDICINAL QUALITIES
—OF THE—
POROUS PLASTERS.

The Porous Plasters possess the soothing, warming and sustaining qualities of the combined plasters of the dispensatories. An Electrician, who has great experience of their effects in Local Rheumatism, in Tic Doloreux, and deep-seated nervous and other pains, and in affections of the kidneys, etc., etc., attributes all their sedative, stimulative and pain-relieving effects to their ELECTRIC qualities. He asserts that they restore the healthy electric condition (equilibrium) of the part, and that being restored pain and morbid action cease. He was amazed at the great number of beneficial indications produced by one of these plasters. He affirms that Head-ache is cured by one worn just below the breast-bone; that one placed over the navel will cure hysterics, as well as dysentery, and affections of the bowels.

PATENT

ARION PIANOFORTE

GRANDS AND GRAND SQUARES,

7⅓ OCTAVES.

The "ARION" is the very best Piano for the Great West, because it stands in tune longer than any other Piano. It requires no repairing or regulating; shipping any distance, or dampness does not affect them.

WHY?

It commences where the "First Premium" Makers stop, and upon the most improved Modern scale makes four patented improvements; which make the Arion more simple, yet stronger; increasing its volume and beauty of tone, while rendering the instrument more enduring.

WHAT THEY ARE.

First. The patent Arion Reversed Wooden Agraffe Bridge, which retains all the purity of tone only found in a wooden bridge (the rest whereon the strings lay), and obtains all the solid prolonged strength of tone of the metal Agraffe, without that acute metalic noise which the metal Agraffe develops by use.

Secondly, The Patent Arion Compound Wrest-Plank, which holds the tuning pins, is six thicknesses of hard maple, the grain of each layer runs in a different direction. The advantages are, the 20 tons strain of the strings cannot split our Arion wrest-plank, as frequently happens in other Pianos, and when people say "My Piano won't stand in tune," all other makers must use the single wrest plank with the grain running only one way.

The Arion Tuning-Pins have end wood to hold them on every side, while all other makers can have it only upon two sides of their pins.

Thirdly, The Patent Arion Diagonal Sustaining Bar, extending parellel with the steel strings under the over strung Bass strings. The Arion is the only Piano wherein the enormous strain of the large steel strings is resisted in the natural place and direction. Using this bar renders the weakest part in all other over strung Pianos the

STRONGEST IN THE ARION.

THE ARION STANDS UPON ITS OWN MERITS.

unsupported by either humcome, weak facts, or useless or complicated Patents. We append a few unbought opinions of those who

KNOW THE ARION.

The Musical Director of the New York Conservatory of Music, Edward Mollenhauer, says: "The Arion I bought of you is the best Piano I ever played on; that rolling bass and silvery treble, etc."

John H. Woods, Piano Dealer, Oswego, N. Y., says: "The tone is truly immense, and surpasses anything in the shape of a Piano we ever saw or heard of, etc."

Horace Greely said: "The Arion is the best Square Piano, superior for its clearness and brilliancy of tone," &c.

Louis Wagner, Fort Leaverworth, says: "My Piano arrived here in splendid order. Its tone fills my parlor with melody—it is the wonder and admiration of all who hear it. Miss ——, who is teaching the Piano desires me to order one for her," &c.

MUSICAL DOINGS.—Since Mr. Waters gave up publishing sheet music, he has devoted his whole capital and attention to the manufacture and sale of Pianos and Melodeons. He has just issued a catalogue of his new instruments, giving a new scale of prices, which shows a marked reduction from former rates, and his Pianos have recently been awarded the First Premium at several Fairs. Many people of the present day, who are attracted, if not confused, with the flaming advertisements of rival piano houses, probably overlook the modest manufacturer like Mr. Waters; but we happen to know that his instruments earned him a good reputation long before Expositions and "honors" connected therewith were ever thought of; indeed, we have one of Mr. Waters' Piano-fortes now in our residence, (where it has stood for years,) of which any manufacturer in the world might be proud. We have always been delighted with it as a sweet-toned and powerful instrument, and there is no doubt of its durability; more than this, some of the best amateur players in the city, and several celebrated pianists, have performed on the said piano, and all pronounce it a superior and first-class Instrument. Stronger indorsement we could not give.—Home Journal.

BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES

"A SLIGHT COLD," COUGH, Hoarseness, or Sore Throat which might be checked with a simple remedy, if neglected often terminates seriously. Few are aware of the importance of stopping a Cough or "slight cold" in its first stage; that which in the beginning would yield to a mild remedy, if not attended to, soon attacks the lungs.

The efficacy of Brown's Bronchial Troches is demonstrated by testimonials from Physicians, Surgeons in the Army, and eminent men wherever they have been used.

They were introduced in 1850. It has been proved that they are the best article before the public for Coughs, Colds, Bronchitis, Asthma, Catarrh, the Hacking Cough in Consumption, and numerous affections of the Throat, giving immediate relief.

PUBLIC SPEAKERS & SINGERS will find them effectual for clearing and strengthening the voice.

Your Troches are too well and favorably known to need commendation.

HON. CHAS. A. PHELPS, Pres. Mass. Senate.

My communication with the world has been very much enlarged by the Lozenge which now I carry always in my pocket; that trouble in my Throat (for which Troches are a specific) having made me often a mere whisperer.

N. P. WILLIS.

I have never changed my mind respecting them from the first, excepting to think yet better of that which I began thinking well of,

HENRY WARD BEECHER.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

Saratoga A WATER.

The Saratoga "A" Spring Water is probably the most effective mineral water found on either continent. It has ten per cent. greater mineral properties than the celebrated Congress Spring; four times that of Baden Baden of Austria; five times that of Aix La Chapelle in Prussia; twice that of Vichy in France; nearly three times greater than the renowned Seltzer of Germany; and equally over the Spas of Bath, England, and Kissengen in Bavaria.

The reputation of this water is based upon its effects in diseases of the stomach, liver, bowels, kidneys and spleen. It acts with wonderful benefit in cases of chronic dyspepsia, constipation, gravel, gout, Scrofula, cutaneous affections, general lethargy, soreness and prostration of the system.

BETROTHAL.

O for one hour of such enchanted light
As made a fairer daytime in the sky,
When on the willow-bank we sat that night,
My old time love and I!

A while we talked so low and tenderly,
We felt the listening trees above us lean;
And louder far the silence seemed to me
That fell at last between.

Her heart lay floating on its quiet thoughts,
Like water-lilies on a tranquil lake;
And Love within, unknown, because unsought,
Lay dreaming half awake.

Ah, Love is lightest sleeper ever known!
A whisper, and he started plain to view:
Old as the heavens seemed our story grown,
While yet the moon was new.

And when she spoke, her answer seemed the while Sweeter for sweetness of the lips that told,
Setting a precious word within a smile—
A diamond ringed with gold.

Then bloomed for us the perfect century-flower:
Then filled the cup and overran the brim;
And all the stars processional, that hour,
Chanted a bridal-hymn.

Ah, Time, all after-days may fly away,
Such joy as that thou hast but once to give,
And Love is royal from his crowning-day,
Though kingdomless he live.

GLIMMERLY GAP.

I.

Henry Clay Glenning, telegraph operator at Lindenbury railway station, sat at his desk as the dusk closed in of a gloomy April evening, a dozen or more years back. A tall, light-built young man of maybe seven-and-twenty, with a full, close-cropped brown beard, and a clever, good-looking face; but, about the eyes and mouth there were troubled lines that seemed to indicate some present wearing care. The cold northeasterly rain beat drearily on the panes: the sashes rattled dismally in the eddying wind. There was nothing going through the lines this hour and more, and Glenning leaned back in his chair in thought that his attitude showed was not at all pleasant company. He got up after a while and took down his hat and coat from the wall. It was nearly seven by the office clock. The station-master relieved him three-quarters of an hour; there was no train due until the Lake Mail, nine minutes of eight. He went out, and up the bleak, wet streets. Getting home, he left his wet coat in the passage, and passed on up the stairs. He leaned back on the landing a minute, with eyes looking down, and face compressed in distasteful revery. Then he stepped forward quickly, and went in. The table was set for two. Beside it a lady sat stitching upon some needlework in her lap. Her cheek flushed as he came in; but she did not look up. He came and sat down opposite. The angry flush remained; her lips were firmly shut; she worked on, loop over loop, and did not raise her eyes or turn her head.

"Mary," he said, his tone was low and gentle, "Mary, I want to tell you a story."

She glanced up askance at his face, as though surprised. But her eyes went instantly back to her lap, and her fingers worked on, loop over loop. Glenning went on; his voice a little graver, but gentle and low as before.

"On the North Rock Road, just beyond the Southdown Mills, there is a little country store, kept by one John O'Neil and his wife, Jane. I've known the pair by sight a long time now—honest, simple, hard-working folks, and prosperous, too, as things go. They have no boys and only one girl—Jenny, after her mother. I remember her a little toddling thing, in a pink frock and gingham apron, as I used to see her playing about the place when I went out and in from the farm. She was a bright, merry child, and a great pet at home, as you may suppose. John was never tired of talking about her as a child, and praising her cleverness and winning ways. He vowed he'd make a scholar of her if he worked his nails off to do it. Well, the girl grew and grew, and last summer finished the course of the common school, and in the fall went over to Fort Hill Institute, in Tidewater. The old couple missed Jenny sadly, of course, and found the old house lonely enough when the girl was gone. Their only consolation was their weekly letter, which came in regularly every Wednesday afternoon by the Through Mail. They used to come in together in their old buggy, every week, on Wednesday, in almost any weather, and get the letter. It got to be a standing saying among the men about the station, 'There's John and Jane wants a letter from Jinny.' When I went down to the office to-day I saw them coming over from the post-office. They came in. Both looked anxious and troubled."

"'Mr. Glenning,' says John, 'we haven't no word from our girl to-day. It's the first time it's missed, and we feel a little doubtsome like. We want you to send word by the telegraph, and ask how it is.'

"I sent the message to Jenny, at Fort Hill:

"'No letter to-day. Anything wrong?'

"In half an hour the answer came back:

"'Nothing wrong. Well and happy.

JENNY O'NEIL.'

"The old pair were in great glee over their 'letter by telegraph.' They went off as happy as birds. That was about two o'clock. At three-fifteen this came." He took out some telegraph slips from his pocket, selected one and pushed it across the table. She turned her head and read:

"Jenny O'Neil died here by an accident this afternoon. Will you break the news?"

It was addressed to a clergyman of Lindenbury, and signed by the principal of the Tidewater School.

Glenning watched her as she read. He had thought the sad story would soften her. She had a woman's heart, I think; it did soften her. She too remembered the bright, fair-faced young girl, on the North Rock Road. But she seemed to strive against the feeling; summoned her pride to steel her against letting him see. Her face flushed up with a thrill of pity and sympathy; she could not see the work in her lap plainly for a dimness in her eyes. But she bit her lip, and kept back the tears that almost brimmed over, and forced her fingers to work on, loop upon loop.

"Mary," he said—his voice was sad and low, "I was wrong to say what I did. I was hot and ill-tempered then, and hardly knew what I did. I'm sorry Mary. Won't you let it go?"

He leaned his head on his hand, looked in her face, and waited for her to speak. She did not raise her eyes. He went on, with a very mournful tone. There was a wounded look in his eyes; she knew it, though she did not turn her own, or lift them from her lap. Very gravely he talked on to her, pleaded with her earnestly and sadly. There was no reproach in his words, no note of blame, though there was room.

She kept her mask on well; he thought she was unmoved. But I think the white teeth closed upon the lip inside, and the woman's heart throbbed hotly underneath. Suddenly she started visibly; he must have seen it. But it was not for anything he had said. She felt in her pocket, turned over the work-box by her side; got up and looked about the room, pulled out a drawer or two, lifted a book or paper. She did not seem to find anything; but came back and sat down as before.

"Henry," she said, "when you're ready we'll have our tea."

Her voice was low and calm—plainly forced; she did not lift her head. He started up at that as if she had struck him. A look of sharp pain leaped into his face. He got up quickly and walked about the room, his head bent and his hands behind him, in a pitiful, aimless way. After a little, he stopped suddenly, facing the window.

"Mary," he said, "come here." His voice was stern.

She got up and stood beside him. The curtains hung apart. He swept them wide with his hand and pointed through the glass.

"Look," he said.

Across the street she saw a lighted window, with the curtains drawn aside. Inside, a thick-set and common-looking man was playing about the room, with a curly-haired child; a woman by the table looking on with a happy smile. As they looked a peal of ringing, childish laughter came to their ears. He let the curtain fall, leaned back against the wall, and looked her in the face. Her eyes flashed bright, an angrier flush swept up, and dyed her cheek deep red. Her words were bitter when she spoke.

"Well," she said, "what of all that? Why didn't you marry Sue Stuart yourself? The fool would have had you for asking." She laughed a bitter mocking laugh.

"I wish to God—" he began. But he stopped. She went back and sat by the table. He came and sat down opposite. He sat silent awhile, his head sunk in his hands. The attitude was one profoundly mournful—the air of a traveler lost in some unexplored forest, who sits down disheartened at last, finding no path, seeing no way to the light. A straggling lock of hair fell down upon his face. He lifted it and drew out, one, two, three gray hairs. "Look, Mary," he said, "I'll be twenty-seven in June."

That arrow touched her visibly; his hair and face were not like that when they two married, nineteen months ago. He went on with a mournful voice: "I was alone in the world. I was lonely, and wanted help. I told you that two years ago; you must remember, Mary, I said I'd be true to you through good or evil. God helping me, I'll keep my word. I said I'd try to make you happy; I meant to be happy myself. I meant to do right by you. In the main I think I have; at least I've honestly tried. I've said hard word's at times, when I hardly knew what I said; for them I am honestly sorry, as for all my failings in love and duty. We ought to be happy; we are neither of us that; I hardly know how we came to this miserable pass. I see no way out of it now, for you or me. God help and forgive us both!"

She lifted her eyes from her lap at last, and turned upon him flashing scorn. "Henry Glenning," she said, fronting him full with a hot flushed face, "what do you want? What would you have? Am I happy? Have I no heart? no pulse? no nerves, that can be cut and stung? Because I am too proud to show my pain; because I will not mope or whine; because I laugh to hide the bitter ache and void; bite my lips till they bleed, and crush back the sob that chokes, and the tears that blind me, do you think I am ice or stone? Must you turn on me, too? Had I not enough? You know why I married you. Was it my own free choice? I was a fool; I know it, but I say it was not. You say no one forced me—how do you know? No one said, you shall or you shall not; we are past that day. I wish to God they had; I would have laughed and had my way. But is that all? Do you know how a petty household tyranny can wear and warp? A father's preference, a brother's sneers and scoffs, a sister's anger, a mother's averted face? I was a coward; I know it. If I had it to live over, I'd walk through fire, first. You were clever and handsome; they all liked you. You know what I mean. You knew it then, and should have set me right. For you I broke my faith; I was afraid of the world's silly laugh—poor, blind fool that I was! I broke my faith, I say; that was your sin and mine. Your sin, I say; for you knew, and should have died first. Do you pity me? Do you grieve for your part in making my life a shame and a lie? Pity? You blame my neglect, taunt me for my coldness of heart. Heart? I tell you I have no heart. You hear men's lies to my blame. You distrust your own wife's word. You are passionate with me; harsh, hard, cruel. You spoke to me to-day as no man has a right. I will not hear it again. I will not bear it. I warn you to beware. You may make their lies come true."

"God forgive you!" he said. That was all. He got up and went out. His head was bent, his face was haggard, but neither angry nor stern.

II.

Slowly and sadly he went down the stairs. He wondered how it would end. He could not quite understand her persistent anger, her fierce rejection of his overtures. He had been wrong; he owned it freely. His temper was hot at times; but she could not but know that she had tried him beyond patience. No, he could not understand, or see his way. Drawing on his coat, his face was turned toward the stair. The gas-light shone upon a folded paper lying on the second step, soiled and torn. He stooped and picked it up. He glanced inside; it was written in capital letters, apparently unmeaning. A horrible suspicion flashed upon him—might not what he had overheard be true? He opened the door and went out. He stopped at the corner, under the lamp, opened the paper, and held it to the light. It was a sheet of common note paper, folded in three. A wet boot-heel had apparently trodden upon one side as it lay in the fold, and ground off a part of the writing just below the first four words. A pulpy shred connected the parts, and showed what space was gone. This was what remained:

(1) O & RQQT FGCT OCT &— —DQP I
TT—HTU ATSUG. (3) FI SR BSYV
KYEVII. (4) NET YB EREH TEG.
AJDXN XARENE.

The rain dripped down upon the paper; he sheltered it with his hat, and stood, with head bare, in the beating rain. He felt in his heart that that fourth word could be but one. He found the key in a minute's time; a simple schoolboy trick. He felt that that word must be Mary. He tried it through the sentence, counting two letters back: o-m-e-a-t-r-&-y. "My poor, dear Mary."

The rain dripped from his hair; he shivered—was it with cold? He felt sick and faint; he thought he should fall. He saw the lights of the Merriman House over the way. He staggered across, through mud and water half-knee deep, heeding neither gutter nor pool; went in and up to the bar.

"Brandy," he said. He lifted the bottle; but his hand shook too much. "Pour it." His voice sounded hoarse and strange. The barman took up the bottle and half filled the glass. Glenning steadied himself by the bar. He spilled a little as he lifted the glass. He set it down empty "More," he said. He drank it off, and went out. The church clock was striking eight. He ran on down to the station; he was half an hour late. He sat down at his desk. There was nothing going through the wires from L.; only now and then some message about the trains on the railway line. The cipher changed after that first line. The burning spirit set him all ablaze; his brain was on fire, his heart a leaven weight. He studied those next legible words with a mad anxiety. They were plainly the end of a sentence, the rest of which was gone. He tried the words this way and that—counted forward, backward, one letter, two letters, three, four, five. He was sure it was some simple trick of spelling; but he could make no sense of them for a long time. Some one came stamping in now and then out of the rain; but he paid no heed, worked away at that terrible puzzle that seemed so like child's play, and was, in fact, such deadly, earnest work.

"It may well be doubted," says Poe, "whether human ingenuity can construct an enigma of this kind which human ingenuity, if properly applied, may not also resolve." In a certain sense, this is, no doubt, true. In the hiding of thought, as of treasure, it is always possible that a second mind may invent or happen upon the same method and place of concealment, and so discover the buried store. But I think I may safely engage to conceal a thought under a riddle of this sort which shall be as long in the finding as the buried gold or jewels of the pirate captain, Kidd. Here is this simple cipher, which so cruelly perplexed poor Glenning that April evening. The head that constructed it was none of the cleverest, and, by consequence, the riddle was of the rudest and simplest. In these next four words, the writer had hit, by good chance, upon an expedient so simple that you may easily get at the hidden meaning if you have quick mother-wit and good luck. Yet I challenge any reader to go to work systematically, and unravel the enigma by any more logical process than that of happy guessing. Take the words before reading further:

DQPI TT—HTU ATSUG.

Glenning wearied and fretted himself to no purpose, with trial on trial. Then he tried the system commonly used with these riddles, depending upon the known excess in the number of certain letters, e, a, o, i, d, and so on, in their order. It would not work. He was out again. The trouble with that system, and similar ones, is that they provide only for cases in which each character of the cipher refers uniformly to one certain thing in the underlying expression; and even here, the system may be easily stultified by the omission of the articles, and the use of a little care in the selection of the words employed.

In this particular instance, the writer had happened upon a pretty good plan, but showed himself plainly indebted to good luck rather than cleverness, by a blunder which a little skill would have made him easily avoid. There was a flaw in the construction which gave you a clue to the possible plan. Glenning had worked over the phrase till he was in despair of solving the terrible riddle. He leaned back in his chair and closed his tired eyes, with a baffled, beaten look. Those cabalistic words stood out before his sight, burned upon his brain in letters of fire. I do not think he would ever have construed them but for the blunder of which I speak. It struck him suddenly now; he started forward and looked. The second word of the four was "TT." By the common assumption, upon which he had worked all along, these two T's must refer to the same certain character. "TT" might, indeed, not be a word at all; it might be a number or a contraction. But the presumption was that it represented a word of two letters. Then, if the common assumption applied, this underlying word must be the double of some single letter. That was absurd on its face; no such combination, from double a to double z, forms any English word. Glenning caught at the suggestion with an eager flash; he cursed his own blindness, for not seeing it before. He saw that these two T's could not stand for the same thing—in other words, that the cipher must have been formed upon a variable plan; that a character might have different meanings, dependent upon its place in the sentence, or other pre-arranged relation. He saw how this might be easily done in a hundred ways. He tried the simplest possible—counting from the first letter one forward; from the second, two; from the third, three—and so on.

D-E, P-S, Q-S, I-M—Essm.

No; out again. d—but stop. Is that the simplest possible method? Hardly. The writer would naturally count forward; we must count back.

D-C, Q-O, P-M, I-E—Com

Ha! He counted out the letters with a fierce haste.

——Come on—all right.

It was maddening. What could it mean? It frightened him to think; some devil's work, he felt sure. He tried the next words. The cipher had changed again; he saw what those numbers meant now—saw it, and cursed them. "(1)-(3)-(4)." The (2) was doubtless gone with the part shredded off. These numbers meant four different ciphers pre-arranged.

Just then Station-master Farley came in and spoke to him something about a sick friend, and a request that Glenning would attend to any business that should come in for him, till he got back. Glenning tipped back in his chair, with his head thrown back, and his eyes staring up in the other's face. But while his eyes stared wide, his mind was all the while working away at the clumsy puzzle that yet had power to torment him intolerably. He nodded his head when Farley had done; but, when he had gone out, what semblance of an idea Glenning had of the whole was some dim notion that Farley wanted him to answer messages that might come in about the trains. Farley had told him something of a train off time; but of that he remembered nothing.

He worked on at the next four words. His whole being seemed to centre upon that one torn, crumpled, mud-stained shred with its terrible hieroglyphics. He saw, knew, thought, felt, heard no other thing. After a while the familiar sound of a message struck upon his ear, and partly roused him. He took off the message mechanically:

"Where is the Lime Lake Mail?"

He read it over and over. The words conveyed no meaning to his brain. What he did about it he knew not. The same message might have come many times, for all he knew then. What answer went back, or whether any, he knew no more.

He tried the words of the cipher back and forth, this way and that, over and over again. But he got the key at last—a stupid one enough—straight forward, counting four letters ahead.

"ALL RIGHT—COME ON. BE ON YOUR GUARD."

What could it all mean? He worked away at the rest, as one might work a problem in a nightmare dream. All else seemed dim and strange, and far away; men's voices, now and then; doors opening and closing again; once a bustle of a freight train going through. He heard these sounds in a strange jumble, without definite idea of their cause or meaning, and yet without surprise, like one in a real dream. There was little or no work for the wires. What there was he did without thought or understanding, with the machine-like acquired motions of long-acquired habit.

He missed the key of the cipher this time from its very nearness and simplicity. The thought could hardly be said to be hidden. He counted forward, two letters, three, four, five, six, one; backward the same. He twisted the words and the letters; vexed himself fiercely to no purpose; all the while devouring with eagerness to know the meaning of this terrible riddle that fate had set him to solve. He cursed himself for his stupidity, when at last he saw; the sentence was simply spelt backward, letters and words reversed.

"GET HERE BY TEN."

Just then a telegram clicked off the wires. He sat a moment like one dazed, then the instinct of long habit moved him again, and he worked the instrument with his hand—God knows, not with his heart or brain.

He looked up at the clock on the shelf; it wanted five minutes of ten. He staggered out to the door, and let the cold rain drive upon his head.

III.

My name is William Thurlow Whipple. I have been a conductor on the Tidewater and Lime Lake Railway since the summer of '51. On the 21st of April last, I ran the Lindenbury Night express out of Tidewater at seven o'clock. We had the "George Grant" engine, James Morris, driver, and nine cars in all. The distance from Tidewater to Lindenbury is sixty-three miles; we were due at L. at 10:07.

At Wendall, fifteen miles out, we passed the East Branch Accommodation, bound in, on the switch. As we ran in, I saw Henry Brown, conductor of the Branch train, cross over and stand by our track. He did not see me yet when I hailed him:—

"Helloa there, Brown! What is the word?"

"That you, Whipple?" he called. "Telegram for you from Clark's."

There was no office at Wendall; Clarksville is the next up-station. It was quite dark by this time; I read the message by the station lamps:

LINDENBURY, 7:05, P.M.

TO W. T. WHIPPLE, NIGHT EX., CLARKSVILLE.

Lake Mail off track between Fetterly and Glenbrook. Can't get on before 8. Come to Ashley—then look out.

MICHAEL FARLEY, S. M.

Farley was station-master at L. Ashley was three stations ahead. We were due there at 8:02. I looked at my watch as we ran in. I recollect we were a minute ahead of time. I jumped down as we slowed, and ran ahead into the telegraph office. A message from Linden was waiting:

"Lake Mail off yet, west of the Junction. Come on till 9."

We ran on west, making good time. Glenbrook is twenty-two miles west of Lindenbury, we should have passed the Lake Night Mail at Winterville, next west of Clark's. I felt a little anxious about it as we thundered on through the darkness; there was was no moon that night, and west of Wamona the sky was overcast, and the air full of misty rain.

It was five minutes past nine as we ran into Chairwell Station. I telegraphed to L. for orders. They came:

"All right. Come on."

The rails were slippery with the thick mist; we had lost no time on a heavy up-grade, three miles back. I waited for no explanations, ran out, and started the train. At Wrexell, the East Branch Freight was due; the branch joins the main line at Glenbrook. I went forward and watched for her lights when the whistle blew at Blackman's Crossroads. There was the bright head-light of the great "Sampson" freight engine, a mile away, waiting for us on the turn-out. I stood on the engine steps as we ran in. As we came up with the "Sampson," and ran slowly past, I hailed the engineer:

"Hallowell! Helloa! Hear any thing of the Lake Mail?"

"Passed Clannerlane at Glenbrook. Had men to work on his feed-pipes. Said he'd be right in half an hour."

Half an hour? He must be at Cunningham by this time—or Whewell's Bend at farthest.

I telegraphed to Lindenbury:

"Where is the Lime Lake Mail?"

Directly the answer came:

"Come on. All right."

The same words over again. Not a word of that train ahead. It was strange; but we were behind time yet.

"Go ahead!" I called. "Make up lost time."

It was twenty-seven minutes past nine. We had nineteen miles yet to Linden. It was five miles to Brentford, the next station west.

At Bentford I telegraphed again:

"Where is the Lime Lake Mail?"

I knew the Brentford operator, of course; his name was John Murray. He sent off the message, repeating the words aloud:

"Where is the Lime Lake Mail?"

Waiting the reply, I asked him:

"Have you had any word of the Mail this side of the Branch?"

"Not a word. No messages west of here, except to you, since half after seven."

The return message clicked off the wires. You may be sure I watched Murray's lips for the words. Again the very same:

"Come on. All right.

Not a word more.

I had no time to wait. We were still a little behind. My duty was to make that up and obey my orders.

"Give me the slip," I said.

I had the other two in my pocket. I remembered that, and was thankful for so much. They would clear me, whatever happened. But, none the less, I was fretted by the thought of that off-time train somehow ahead in the dark. I signaled Morris to increase the speed. I stood by a lamp and took out the three slips of telegraph paper. There was no mistake. I read each one over carefully. The words were plain: "All right. Come on."

You say I had no cause for such anxiety as I describe? that I was pretty close on time; the words of the telegrams simple, and such as would naturally occur in such a case; that the same words should be repeated was no more strange than happens every day. You think I exaggerate for effect? I say you know nothing about it. I say it was strange that those words were three times repeated. It was strange that they should come at all in answer to my message; they did not answer my question. Hallowell said Clanmerlane expected to be after him in half an hour. By that we should have met him at Brentford Station. I say I was horribly anxious; ten times more than I've written down. One says, I was mad to increase the speed, fearing what I did. I tell you I did my duty. I was bound to keep on time and obey my orders. They have no right to taunt me; it was bad enough without that. I say I did my duty. It was only three miles and a half to Hackerby. I was thankful to hear the whistle at the last cross-roads. I was in the office before the train had stopped.

"Marks," I cried, "do you know where's the down mail?"

"No."

"Telegraph Linden; quick! Say, 'For God's sake, where is the Lake Mail?"

I thought the answer would never come. I longed and feared to hear it. Here is the slip now, with those same terrible words:

"All right. Come on."

FIGHT BETWEEN PANTHERS AND ALLIGATORS.

A hunter in the wilds of Texas, who met many startling adventures, and saw some strange creatures, once saw a singular battle on the banks of a lonely lagoon in the forest.

He had killed a black panther at this place—more in self-defence than for game, for he was chasing wild cattle that day—and, leaving the carcass, to return, if possible, by-and-by for its skin, hurried forward on a trail which he expected would lead to the object of his hunt. He came back before night with the trophy of a wild bull hide, and passed the lagoon where he had encountered and killed his dangerous assailant in the morning. Savage cries and sounds of brutal struggle, informed him before he came to the place, that some deadly battle was going on among the beasts of the forest.

He soon came in full view of the scene; and a sanguinary one it was. Four black panthers were ferociously disputing the possession of the carcass of the dead panther, with two enormous alligators. The object of the combatants on both sides appeared to be the same—namely, to eat the carcass; and for this, both fought with bloody tenacity, tugging at the bone of contention by seeing how much had been gained.

The panthers were superior in numbers—two to one; but the alligators had much the thicker armor, and could fight with their tails as well as their heads, so that the battle was pretty nearly equal. One of the big reptiles had a panther on the top of his back, plying his flank furiously with his hind claws; and another was holding him by the fore leg with jaws like a tiger. When he succeeded in shaking off his savage assailants, his fore leg was broken, and a slit was made in his side nearly through the flesh into his stomach.

Meantime, the other alligator was making frantic efforts to get the third panther into his mouth. He had nearly succeeded, when, with a tremendous swing, the huge tail of his fellow saurian knocked out the panther, and wedged itself firmly between his jaws. The teeth snapped together like a pair of copper-mill shears, and one of the tail-thrashing combatants was minus his weapon.

The fourth panther, that had been busy with teeth and claws at the eyes of the curtailed reptile, now redoubled his attacks, and, with the aid of two others, in front and rear, soon disabled him. The third panther, owing to his entrance and exit through his enemy's jaws, had his back broken. The fight was now between a single alligator and the three remaining cat-savages. One of the three, however, was by this time badly damaged. Some terrific stroke or bite had completely scalped him, and the skin hung down the side of his neck, flapping as he fought. Another, apparently, had a rib or two broken, but did not seem to mind it. The odds in the battle were still not so very great.

Only, the advantage of celerity was vastly on the side of the panthers; and when the alligator, with much difficulty, succeeded in seizing one of them, he was so slow about crushing his prey, and made so much awkward mouthing of it, that he put himself almost at the mercy of his antagonists.

Still, his powerful tail was free; and the cat-like creatures, in springing about to find his vulnerable points, were not so active but that they took some hard cuffs from his caudal weapon. Besides, during all the combat, the amphibians had been gradually working towards the water, and now the survivor was almost at the edge.

Once in the lagoon, and his enemies would be powerless. The panthers seemed to be sensible of this; and, by an artful movement, both succeeded in getting at his throat while his mouth was full. A few seconds of tugging and tearing at the tenderer flesh completed the alligator's death wounds, and he slid hopelessly into the water.

Two panthers survived to claim the victory. But they had scarcely strength enough left to snuff about the bodies of their slain. Both were much the worse for wear; and the hunter leveled his rifle, and easily brought them down with a single shot a-piece; after which, he took off their hides and the hides of their companions, and made his way back to his ranch.

In an eventful life of more than ten years subsequently to this, in frontier countries, he never saw anything in the shape of a forest or jungle fight that could compare with this combat between panthers and alligators.

WATER TELESCOPES.

The people of Norway carry in their fishing boats a water telescope, or tube, three or four feet in length. They immerse one end in the water, and then, looking intently through the glass, they are able to perceive objects ten or fifteen fathoms deep, as distinctly as if they were only a few feet from the surface. So, when they discover plenty of fish, they surround them with their large draught nets, and often catch them in hundreds at a haul, which, were it not for these telescopes, would frequently prove a precarious and unprofitable fishing. This instrument is not only used by the fishermen, but is also found in the navy and coasting vessels.

OUR WORKMEN'S WAGES.

I.

As part of the people, among whom we class ourselves, we desire to speak a word on the subject of our workingmen's wages; and give our opinion as to whether they can be justly reduced at the present time, and how far. The arguments in favor of low wages to which we shall refer, are such as are heard discussed in every workshop and upon every street, and are, therefore, common property; and are not met as the arguments of any particular individual, but simply as abstract theories.

We will say in the start that we believe in any moderate reduction of wages necessary for competition, and proportionate to the reduced prices of such articles as the workingman uses for his support; we simply question the justice of so large a reduction as is now contemplated. Being employers ourselves, a reduction of wages would of course be greatly to our interest, for we are absolutely selling as low as Eastern publishers, while we are paying the high Utah wages to our workmen. It would therefore, be a great blessing to us to have a large reduction of wages, providing it could be done justly.

As a preliminary argument in favor of the kind of reduction now contemplated, it is commonly said, that it cannot hurt anyone, "because, if all are reduced alike, all will, necessarily, be as well off as before;" but this argument will apply equally to raising everybody's wages as to lowering them. All would in either case be equally as well off as before; for which reason it is clear we might just as well have high wages as low ones, seeing it would make no difference anyway.

But both of the above arguments are useless to us, seeing they apply only to communities that produce all they need within themselves—which we do not; for we use a large amount of imported goods, the prices of which we cannot control. Therefore, although high wages and a high price for our products make no difference so long as we trade exclusively within ourselves; they make all the difference in the world when we have to go outside to buy goods from others; as they enable us to ask a larger price for the labor or the products which we have to part with to the outsider, they bring larger amounts of money into our Territory, and thus enable us to get a larger amount of imported goods in return. The only possible argument against raising wages to effect the above object, would be in case we raised, or kept them so high that the stranger would refuse to buy and go elsewhere, or himself come in and undersell us, which of course we would not advise; our only objection being that the proposed reduction is more than is necessary for the purposes of trade and self-protection.

But a reduction of wages has also been commonly urged on the ground that the Railroad will bring in produce and manufactured articles, and, not only compete with us in what we would dispose of to each other, but also undersell us in such articles as we may desire to part with to other Territories. That a moderate reduction may be necessary to meet this is perfectly true, and should by all means be made; but the question is—how much should it be? Will the Railroad reduce the price of our products nearly two-thirds, that we should reduce the mechanic's wages to a little over one-third his present price to meet it? We think the Railroad will not reduce our products in any such proportion. Let us ask what will the Railroad bring in to compete with us. It cannot bring in carpenters, masons, plasterers or laborers' work—except in fractional items amounting to nothing. It cannot therefore undersell the largest part of our mechanical labor that that should be reduced in wages to meet it. It can only compete with us in produce, boots, shoes, hats, cabinet-work, pottery, and such of the few manufactures as exist in our midst; the prices of which kinds of labor would, of course, have to be reduced to meet that competition, while the prices of the mechanics referred to would have to come down to correspond. But what will the necessary reduction be? Take flour, the very cheapest kind of freight that can be sent here, it costs between two and three dollars per hundred to freight it from Omaha; while it is considered in the States to be very cheap indeed if it can be raised and sent to Omaha for two dollars and a half per hundred pounds. That makes it about five dollars by the time it can be deposited at Ogden. But suppose we say four and a half to be low enough. Even that is only a reduction of one-fourth below six dollars (our regular Tithing Office price) and furnishes, it will be seen, no justification for reducing wages to one half, much less to one third.

Now flour is the cheapest freight on the list, and all the the other articles named would have to pay a much heavier freight than that, and would, therefore, be less open to competition with our own. There, therefore, appears no reason for a very large reduction of wages, to enable us still to compete with the East in produce and our home-manufactures.

But it may be very truthfully urged that merchandise and produce being now considerably reduced, the working-man should reduce the price of his labor to correspond with his savings. This we consider only right. The question then is, how much is he likely to save by the cheap importations of the Railroad. Let us look at the articles he consumes. Take flour for instance: supposing flour should even be sent here and sold for one half our Tithing Office price, in which case, after paying the present freight, the eastern producer would have the pleasure of raising and giving it to us for nothing—which of course is not very likely to occur soon; even in this extreme and ridiculous case, the difference to a mechanic would be very little; for flour is not more than one-eighth of the expense of a workingman's household. So that, was he to get his flour at this unlikely price, he would simply effect a saving of about one sixteenth of his present wages. And then as to articles of merchandise which, mark it, are now about as low as they are likely to get, they are reduced, perhaps, a little over one third of their average price during the last two years; and we have not heard that our working men have been grossly overpaid during this slack period. Basing our views then on these facts, we submit, with all respect to better judgment, that a reduction of over one-third would be out of due proportion. And as such must be objectionable.

But now comes what we deem a weaker argument still. It is proposed that we should reduce wages to the low level talked of, because it would enable us to manufacture articles of the kinds now imported, and sell them so low that we could compete with States' manufacturers. Now, we wish it distinctly understood, that we deem the establishment of home-manufactures a very desirable object, as soon as they can be payingly worked. We have therefore not a word to say against that proposition. We wish solely to examine the question whether any reasonable reduction of wages would, at the present time, enable us to effect that object.

The proposition, as we understand it, is to reduce our wages so low that we can work our small factories to compete with the gigantic ones east. Now, we simply ask—Is not this equivalent to a proposition for a man who keeps a shanty in the first ward, and keeps one assistant, to reduce the wages of that assistant to enable him to compete with the "Eagle Emporium?" May we ask how much he would have to reduce that unhappy man's wages before he could sell as low and increase his establishment to the same size? The "Eagle Emporium," which we take merely by way of illustration, can flourish on a profit of a cent a yard, because it can sell yards by the thousand, while the owner of the shanty must have six times as much profit, because he sells six times less than the other. This is the relation one of our little Utah factories would stand in to those abroad.

For little establishments, before they were ready to extend their business, to reduce their prices and wages in anticipation, would, certainly, be, to say the least, one of the most novel ideas the commercial world ever heard of; and in our case, equally objectionable to our capitalists as to our workmen; because, the smaller the business done at low figures, the greater must be the reduction of the workmen's wages to make up for the fewness of the sales. Wages as low as those paid to the workmen of foreign factories would not be low enough. They would have to be reduced lower still, if we would compete with them under such unfavorable circumstances.

It may be thought, however, that by starting little factories, with low prices, we might grow in time to do as big a business as those abroad. But we put it to the good sense of our readers, would it be wise in order to create big businesses, to reduce prices or wages before we have suitable establishments or the business which alone could compensate us for such reduction?

Before we think of doing this, we need a vast market for our goods, for we must sell as much as those in the east before we can sell as low. Such a market neither this nor the adjoining Territories can furnish for years to come. Supposing we even had the factories, and they were to produce as much as those east, which they must do to compete with them in price, in a few months they would glut these Territories for years, and have the bulk of their goods on their shelves. Like a friend of ours, who started the manufacture of sulphur in this Territory, and, after laboring for years, produced an excellent article, but the misfortune of it was his establishment —which was only a little one—to pay for its working, had to produce as much sulphur in one month as would supply the Territory for years. And this would be the way with our factories. It must be clearly understood that factories that would produce only what we need ourselves could not afford to sell as low as the States manufacturer, and, therefore would not effect the object. We must manufacture as much as them or not compete at all. And as to the idea that if we did not find a sufficient market among ourselves, we could, perhaps, send our goods east and undersell the enormous and gigantic establishments that supply the whole continent and portions of Europe; in the first place it will take far more capital than we can control for years to get such magnificent establishments in full operation here; and if we did get them before we obtained the necessary market, we should be compelled, before we could enter the field and sell as low, to outrival in low, oppressive wages, those who are already grinding the blood and bone out of humanity to enable them to carry on their huge competitions with each other. This, nobody amongst us would consent to do; and, therefore, we respectfully urge that, desirable as the establishment of home-manufactures certainly is, no reduction of wages that our capitalists wou'd permit themselves to urge, or our workmen agree to accept, could, under the circumstances effect that object.

But, not only have we, as shown, not the market to keep factories of the necessary size running at present; but, with respect to that class of articles, the manufacture of which is specially contemplated, we have not the material in the Territory to keep such extensive factories going. We have, it is said, abundance of pottery clay, if it would be wise to reduce every kind of labor in the Territory just to sell one article. We have also a world of mineral wealth, but the working of that is not specially included in the proposition, and if it was, such profitable products would not require special low wages to effect their working; but as said, of the kind contemplated, we have not enough to fill the programme of competing with the East. We have not cotton enough yet; and the prices which our cotton-raisers in Dixie must pay for produce and merchandise, will not allow them to sell it as low as it can be bought by establishments that would rival us in the East.

We have not even hides enough in this Territory to produce sufficient of the varieties of sole and upper-leather—especially upper-leather—that we need ourselves, much less the amount needed to keep such giant manufacturies as we should need, going. We have not wool enough for our own consumption at present, much less, enough to supply a market of the extent required to carry out the project. Of course, we may get enough in years to come, and we should work steadily to that point; but why reduce wages TO-DAY in anticipation of such huge factories, before we have them or the material to keep them going. To reduce wages when we get suitable establishments, sufficient market and material to work them, would be right enough; but to day we have neither; and while in this condition, shall we reduce wages as the most direct road to gain them? This is a theory which the wisdom of our brethren will doubtless reject as soon as they begin to carry it out, if not before. The rule of commerce—a law which no one can violate without loss, and which all business men subscribe to,—is always to be PREPARED to do a big business before you reduce your prices! To reduce before you have your establishments sufficiently large, enough material to manufacture all you need, or your market large enough to sell all you can make, is to invite certain and irretrievable ruin, whether applied to an individual or a Territory. And if it be incorrect in principle to reduce prices till all these conditions are fulfilled, there can be no reason why wages should be reduced in anticipation.

II.

Having said so much as to the present prices proposed for labor, we now wish to present what we consider serious objections to the principle of fixing uniform prices for labor or skill of any kind.

Mankind cannot be run into grooves or ticketed off like articles in a wholesale store. There is every variety of value among men of each particular trade. This will apply equally to laboring as to mechanical work. There are scarcely any two men equally valuable to an employer. If you procure men to dig your garden, one will dig it as well again as another. One man will even saw, split and pile wood so as to be worth half as much again as his fellow-laborer. No prices can be fixed for labor of any kind except such as are fixed by an acquaintance with each man's special work. Even average prices cannot be fixed for work, except as fixed by competition, because you must leave abundant room to raise or lower wages to suit the variety of cases that will occur; and as soon as you leave latitude to suit certain cases the principle of competition immediately comes in and sweeps your average prices overboard. Suppose we resolve to declare that, as a community, we can fix prices to suit ourselves, irrespective of the laws of competition, and what is the result? We have immediately one of two difficulties to meet. either we must admit that every man's labor is as valuable as another's—no matter the difference of ability displayed, or we must admit a difference and settle it in every case by the judgment of a third party.

That we must do one of these two things is evident. Let us as a community resolve we can fix arbitrary prices, and immediately every unskilled laborer in the community has a right to say at once, "There is now no cause why I should not have as much for working a whole day as any other man. I need as much to eat. and drink, and wear, and I love to see my wife and children surrounded by luxuries as much as any other man. We are all brethren, therefore give me as much. You can do so for you have no laws of trade or competition in your way to prevent you. If the community can fix prices to suit itself, it can fix prices to suit us all. and I would like as much as any man in the Territory." This is what every man can logically say, and the demand must be complied with; and every man of skill and energy be reduced to the level of the most ignorant and unenterprising in the community.

Suppose, however, we declare a difference of value in labor, we have then the greatest difficulty of all to meet. Once we admit that a difference of value should exist, and conclude to determine that price by officers of some kind, they will not only have to examine and value the workmanship of every man in the community. but they will have to inspect and attach a separate and distinct price to every fresh piece of brainwork. artistic or mechanical skill, as fast as produced. For nothing could. in that case, have any value till they determined it. As all articles. and men's skill itself, would incessantly differ from time to time. it would take a committee as large as the community itself, to run round, watch and endlessly compare the value of every article produced—and then they could not do it. Who can satisfactorily determine the comparative value of two pieces of brainwork or artistic skill? Who can tell the value of one piece of carpentry, plastering or masonry—one piece of sculpture—one piece of carving—one picture—one invention—one architectural design—one piece of musical composition—one piece of acting, one piece of engineering, one piece of poetry. one day's management of a business, or one effort of statesmanship over another. so as to satisfy every soul? No man or men on earth could do it. No wisdom inferior to that of God. Himself, in all the plentitude of His wisdom. without one shade abated from the boundless perfection of His knowledge, could do it, so that all could feel that the true, exact point was reached. And where is there even a foretaste of such perfect wisdom now? Less than this perfection of judgment to the senses of men. and the whole plan would break itself up in endless differences of opinion and scenes of confusion; for the divine intellect of man and right of individual judgment. as to the worth of its own labor. cannot be fettered or restrained worlds without end.

On the other hand, to avoid these difficulties, should we decide to have uniform prices for all, and begin to class men at one dollar a day or at ten. that moment we shall kill all their ambition and enterprise. Unless an opening is left for men of any trade or profession. to get more than each other, if they are worth more. there is no incentive for the development of skill or intellect. The greatest booby in his calling can claim as much as the man who has toiled day and night. and bent all his energies to obtain excellence and superiority. All are swept into one dead level. Skill, talent, energy. all are covered up, and the very motive power by which the Creator has moved the world from the beginning to perfection in every art and science, is extinguished and dried up for ever.

It may be said, however, that the Gospel is destined to bring us to such a condition, that the motive power of self interest which has hitherto been the main spring of the world's progress, is to be superseded by so much of the love of God in every man's nature, that all will be willing to sink their individuality, and labor for the glory of the community as fervently as they now do for themselves. Assuming this to be true, it will have to be when the present almighty grasp of self is released from our bosoms, and the nature of angels taken in instead. Judging by all we can see of men's conduct to-day, we are a thousand years at least from that blessed period. The writer has searched deep, and searched wide, and, although he has found some who say they are willing to bring themselves to this order of things if God should require it—and commence to work every day of their lives for their neighbor's good and blessing as much as their own—he has found none who are anxious to commence, even at the rate of six hours a day for the same object, until God does command it. From which he concludes that the fear of God in most of us must be rather stronger than the love of man. At any rate, when the nature of angels does so come upon men, that the thousand passions and strivings of the human bosom for wealth and increase to one's self, are all hushed and superseded by an equal amount of joy in seeing the balance of that wealth transferred to other hands to possess and enjoy—come when this glorious day will. there is no danger in the world of its overtaking us as a thief in the night; and least of all any reason why we should revolutionize labor or put it at one uniform level expressly to meet such a contingency. That the inhabitants of Zion will, at some distant day attain to such a Godlike condition that they could do all this. if needed, we are perfectly sure; but we are equally sure that to dry up the present sources of ambition before that vast transformation of human nature shall come, would be to kill genius and enterprise. and produce a dead and stagnant community.

In conclusion we will say we wish to go with our brethren and see eye to eye with them in all things that they do for the public good; but these reasons, in a more or less connected form. are floating through the minds of hundreds, who feel them as strongly as we do; but who are too timid to give them expression however oft invited. Such objections should, we consider, be met, and if incorrect, removed for the sake of unity. We therefore collect them together, and present them, that if baseless they may be swept away, or if otherwise, remain and prevail as all true principles should and will

RETURN OF OUR MUSICAL EDITOR.

Professor Tullidge, after a lengthy visit to the southern settlements, during which he has been engaged in the cultivation of music in that part of the Territory, has returned to this city. He intends to furnish us shortly with an article on the progress of music in such settlements as he has had an opportunity to become sufficiently acquainted with.

We understand that it is the intention of the Professor to start a class for instruction in reading music at sight, commencing with the simplest elements of the science. This will furnish a splendid opportunity for such as are desirous of mastering this art, as the Professor is unsurpassed in ability for conveying clear ideas on this most interesting subject to the student. Terms can be learned on application at the office of the Utah Magazine.

We are also pleased to announce that Mr. Tullidge intends to form a select Harmonic Society for the cultivation of classical music secular and oratorial. This society will be open free to all versed in music, and aided by the best professional talent of the city.

Notice.—An article on the JOSEPHITE PLATFORM will appear next week.

THE POPESS JOAN.

THE WORLD'S HISTORY ILLUSTRATED IN ITS GREAT CHARACTERS.

Romance has its illustrations in history as well as in books of fancy. A woman is ever its center object, for she is the proper subject of romance. We see among the world's great characters, queens, and noble ladies, and their lives have given to history, not only its most gorgeously embellished pages touching the quality termed romantic, but in them have been worked out some of the most lasting benefits to the race. There is generally however, in the career of famous women, as much matter for historical scandal as of the more beautiful romance. The very naming of representative ladies among the world's great characters will at once suggest Joan of Arc, Elizabeth of England, Mary of Scots, Catherine De Medicis, Catharine of Russia, and the more gentle type of modern times, Queen Victoria. But few of our readers, however, are aware that there has figured in the world also a Popess.

There having been but one Popess in all history, and she reigning as the successor of St. Peter, in the character of a man, we will break the philosophic thread of our biographies to relate the romance of her life.

After the illustrious Charlemagne had conquered the Pagan Saxons, desiring to convert them to Christianity, he sent to England for learned priests to come over to his help. Among those who went over to Germany, to aid the great emperor in his missionary enterprise, was a young English priest, accompanied by a girl who was with child by him. The lovers well concealed their secret, but on their way they were compelled to stop at Mayence, at which place the young Englishwoman gave birth to a daughter—the subject of our romance —the Popess Joan.

It is said that Joan grew up a beautiful girl, and, under the fond care of her learned father, she manifested such extraordinary mental culture, that she astonished all the doctors of learning who came to see the beautiful prodigy. This admiration increased her love for science, and she wooed it with such an uncommon devotion that, at twelve years of age, her capacity and eloquence as a teacher of the high branches of knowledge were equal to that of the most distinguished men of the Palatinate.

But the romance of a woman's life is love. Mother Eve has in every sphere some fitting daughter to represent her. It is certain that our first parents played their part in Paradise, very much like two lovers getting themselves into a difficulty together. And so did the beautiful and accomplished Joan and a certain young student of an English family, who was a monk of the abbey of Fulda. He was seduced by her beauty, and became desperately enamored of her. "If he loved well," says the old chronicler. "Joan on her side was neither insensible nor cruel." Had there been no restriction in Paradise, there would have been no sin, and no farce to amuse theological sages. So, had there been no celebacy in the Romish Church, Joan would have been a respectable wife of an intelligent young priest, and the world would not have had the romance and scandal of a Popess.

Joan fled with her lover from her parental roof Laying aside her name and female character, she dooned the attire of a man and assumed the name of English John. She then followed the young monk into the abbey of Fulda, built by the uncle of Charlemagne. The superior of the monastery was deceived by her disguise, and he placed her under the direction of the learned Raban-Maur.

But the lovers, better to preserve their secret, deemed it wise to quit the convent and go to England, to pursue their studies. They soon became, for their erudition, the most distinguished in Great Britain. They next visited other countries to observe the manners and customs of different people, and to acquire a thorough knowledge of many languages.

France was first visited, where Joan, in her character of a monk, disputed with the French doctors, and attracted the attention of the most celebrated persons of the age. The lovers next journeyed towards Greece. Traveling through ancient Gaul, they embarked at Marseilles in a vessel which bore them to the capitol of Hellenes. The lovers were now in the very home of the classics, where philosophy and polite literature had flourished ages before France or Great Britain were redeemed from barbarism.

When Joan and her lover arrived in Greece, she was only twenty years of age, and in all the glory of her youthful beauty; but her monkish garb concealed her sex, and her countenance, pale from vigils and severe mental labor, gave her the appearance of a handsome youth, rather than that of a lovely woman.

During three years, the lovers lived together in Greece, pursuing their studies in philosophy, theology, literature, the arts and sciences, and divine and profane history. Under the most renowned masters, Joan is said to have fathomed everything, learned everything, explained all. To her universal knowledge, she joined an extraordinary genius for eloquence, so that all who were admitted to the academies to hear her, were carried away with admiration and astonishment.

But while in Greece, in the midst of this triumph, Joan received from the hand of Heaven, the heaviest stroke that can befall woman. Her lover died. But from her despair, there was born a vast ambition. It was to reach the highest pinnacle of earthly power, for already was the papal throne elevated above the empires of the world.

Joan resolved to quit Greece. In that country, she was where men wore long beards and where she could therefore no longer conceal her sex, while in Rome; men were commanded to shave. Moreover, Rome presented to her the field for her great ambition.

Arriving in the holy city, Joan obtained admittance into the academy, called the school of the Greeks. She entered for the purpose of teaching the seven liberal arts, and especially rhetoric, for which she possessed so marvelous a talent. St. Augustine had rendered this school already famous, but our learned heroine increased its reputation, thus proving that even in man's own peculiar sphere of philosophy and intellect, a woman will sometimes eclipse the most celebrated of the opposite sex. To the ordinary courses of this famous school, she introduced a course of abstract science, which lasted three years. Rome was enchanted by her. She was, though her sex was unknown, the Sirene who won the hearts of priests and sages; and, undoubtedly, her woman's tact and inspirative nature, gave her a subtle fascination over men who felt her woman's power, but understood not its secret cause. What bewitchment is there in the female nature!

Joan was quoted as the most splendid genius of the age, and the Romans in their admiration for her, gave her the name of the Prince of the Wise. Lords, priests, monks, and especially doctors of learning, deemed themselves honored in being her disciples. "Her conduct" says Marianus Scotus, "was as commendable as her abilities. The modesty of her discourse, her manners, the regularity of her morals, her piety and her good works shone forth as a light before men." But this saintly propriety of conduct was nothing more than an example of that exquisite duplicity of priests so often manifested when aspiring to power. Joan, though a woman in disguise and easy in her virtue, to reach the chair of St. Peter was compelled to be equal to the most apostolic of the opposite sex, in consummate hypocracy. She played well her part; and as the career of Leo the Fourth drew to a close, she permitted intrigues and cabals to be formed for her election. A powerful party declared for her; and it was proclaimed in the streets of Rome that she alone was worthy to occupy the throne of St. Peter.

Leo the Fourth died, and the cardinals, deacons, clergy and people unanimously chose our distinguished heroine, as the most fitting successor of the chief of the Apostles.

It is a very singular fact that these famous female sovereigns have ruled nations with greater capacity and wisdom, and much more to the best interests of humanity, than the majority of emperors and kings. On the one side, the most illustrious, and, on the other, the best of England's periods have occurred under the reign of two women—Elizabeth and Victoria. Spain was redeemed from the Moors by Isabella, and Columbus was her apostle, when he discovered America; Catherine De Medicis was equal to Richelieu; Catherine of Russia ranks with Peter the Great; and the Popess Joan was a mate for the best of the popes of Rome, in the wisdom of her administration and the benevolence of her policies, as the supreme head of the Church.

But again, Joan proved herself the woman; and again the woman proved that love was the romance of her sex. As a popess, love must be sin, for her office unsexed her.

Since the death of her first lover, Joan had preserved her secret as much by her exceeding chastity of conduct as by her prudence; but after she was elevated to the sovereign power of the Church, she chose a second lover from among her cardinals, though his identity was not fairly discovered. Their amour would most likely have forever remained a secret, and the world never known that a popess had reigned, had not Joan became pregnant.

The story runs that, one day, a man possessed with a devil was brought to her; and, after performing the usual ceremonies to cast the devil out of the man, she asked at what time it wished to leave the body of the possessed. The spirit answered—"I will tell you: when you, who are the pontiff and the father of fathers, shall cause the clergy and people of Rome to see a child born of a popess."

Joan frightened by the revelation of the evil spirit, broke up her council and hastened to her palace; but scarcely had she entered the inner apartment, when the demon presented himself to her again and said—"Most holy father, after your accouchement, you will belong to me, soul and body, and I will seize upon you in order that you may burn forever with me."

But the popess, in order to appease divine wrath, imposed upon herself severe penances, covering her person with rough hair cloth and sleeping upon ashes. At length, an angel appeared to her and offered her the alternative between "the eternal flames of hell" or an exposure before all the people of Rome. Joan accepted the latter.

Soon after this, on one of the great festivals, Joan mounted on her horse, went to the church of St. Peter, in solemn pageantry, surrounded by her ecclesiastical dignitaries, nobles, magistrates, and accompanied by a vast crowd of people; coming forth from the cathedral, the procession, on its way towards the church of St. John of the Lateran, but, before arriving upon the public square, between the church of St. Clement and the Colliseum, the pains of child-birth seized the popess, the reins escaped from her hand, and she fell from her horse upon the pavement. Her convulsions were frightful; she was disrobed of the sacred ornaments, her sex was exposed, and, in the presence of the immense crowd, she gave birth to a child. In spite of her horrid suffering, the priests surrounded her to hide her from all eyes, and threatening her with their vengeance. Unable to survive the terrible scene of her shame and her pains, Joan rallied her strength to bid adieu to the cardinal priest who held her in his arms, and ended her mortal career. The child was strangled by the priests who surrounded her; but the Romans in remembrance of their former respect and attachment for her, performed for her the last duties of the Church, and placed the child in the same tomb with her. She was not, however, interred within the limits of a church, but on the spot of the tragedy; but over her tomb a chapel was built, with a marble statue representing the popess in her pontifical robes, a tiara upon her head, and a child in her arms. Benedict the Third demolished this statue; but the ruins of her chapel remained till the fifteenth century. Some of the visionaries of the Romish Church profess to have discovered Joan's tortures in hell, where she is suspended, according to them, throughout eternity on one side of its gates and her lover on the other side, without being able to be reünited.

Out of this singular circumstance of the reign of a popess grew up a curious custom at the inauguration of the successors of St. Peter, called the proof of the pierced chair.

As soon as a pope was chosen, he was conducted to the palace of the Lateran to be consecrated. He was first seated upon a chair of white marble placed between the two gates of honor. Rising from this chair, he thundered forth: "God has raised the poor out of the dust, and the needy from the dunghill, to seat him above the princes." Then the great dignitaries of the Church took him by the hand and conducted him to the oratory of St. Sylvester, where he was seated on a similar chair, but pierced in the bottom. Here his person was exposed, and two deacons approached him to satisfy themselves anatomically that their sight had not deceived them. Then they testified with a loud voice—"We have a pope!" and the assembly responded—"Thanks be to God!" The priests then came forward and prostrated themselves before the chosen one, raised him from the chair, encircled him with a silken girdle, and kissed his feet. Next followed the enthronement. This ceremony of the pierced chair lasted till the sixteenth century, and the curious and unseemly test grew out of the fact that a woman once deceived the cardinals, and sat two years upon the throne of St. Peter. Such is the romantic history of the "Popess Joan."

LYCURGUS AND PERICLES COMPARED.

OR, HOW THE WORLD HAS GROWN.

BY ELI B. KELSEY.

Pericles will compare favorably in statesmanship with the brightest intellect that the world has ever known. He was not, like Lycurgus, a lawgiver; he did not strive to seize society by the tail and by the law of force, arrogate to himself the right to determine the future of his country. Pericles gave evidence in the acts of his whole life, that he possessed a lively sense that the world had existed for many ages before he was born. Finding that it was peopled by mighty nations, and adorned with thousands of beautiful cities, at the time of his advent upon the stage of life, and that permanency was written on the pages of the history of the past, he evidently admitted the possibility of its getting along pretty well long after his term of life's probation was ended. Pericles is to be admired from the fact that he accepted the existing state of things, as palpable facts; in other words, he accepted the world as he found it, and believed it was much easier to direct than to snub society. We admire Lycurgus for his honesty, but we admire Pericles more, because he was not only honest, but was also cosmopolitan in all his characteristics; and did not like "Simon," of jocose memory, strive to "wig-wag" society at his pleasure; but sought rather to use the existing winds, tides and currents of actual life in guiding the ship of state, and reaching the best harbor possible under the circumstances.

Pericles did not originate the characteristics of the Athenian State—that was pretty well established before he was born. In like manner, we may say, Spartans were exclusive, sombre, and intolerant in character, long before the days of Lycurgus. The Spartans never partook much of the spirit of colonization. The laws of Lycurgus extinguished what little was left in the Spartans of the spirit of colonization. Athens on the other hand, had been an active colonizer long before the days of Pericles. This great statesman fanned and kept alive the spirit of colonization, and by judicious contributions of food, and free transportation, he periodically rid Athenian society of dissatisfied and adventurous spirits, who were always captivated by the vision of far-distant and far better lands; where they soon found to their astonishment that to begin at the "stump" brought them in direct contact with the sternest and most trying realities of a hard life. Sobriety, industry and economy, were taught by that most stern and inexorable teacher, necessity. The maternal instincts of the "mother country," combined with the fraternal reliance of the humbled colonists, cultivated and developed social and commercial intercourse with distant lands.

In proportion as the commerce of Athens was more extensive than that of Sparta, so was her knowledge of, and intercourse with, the races that divided the sovereignty of the earth more extensive than that of her exclusive neighbor. Who, that is at all conversant with the world as it is in the nineteenth century, will fail to see at once the natural irresistible result of this difference in the habits and customs between the Spartans and Athenians.

While the Athenians, in their commercial voyages, were brought in contact with more advanced civilizations, and received the impress of more advanced social developments, and artistic forms, from being at first imitators, they would, in time, equal, and finally surpass the originals. The rude, exclusive Spartans, living in burrows, huts of turf, or primitive log-cabins, supported by the labor of their women and slaves, while they sat around in idleness, or at the public tables discussed their little subjects, would inevitably increase in pride, self sufficiency and ignorance. Is it astonishing, then, that a leading Spartan would, when circumstances rendered it necessary for him to go out among men, open his eyes in wonder. In such case he would have to confess himself just what he was—a barbarian, or entrench himself behind his ignorance, and contemptuously inquire of the architectural Athenian, "Sir, do trees grow square in your country?"

Pericles did not inherit a throne. He was not heir to a sovereignty that ruled by Divine right—he was born a private citizen of a republic. It is true that the forms of republicanism which prevailed in Greece were of the rudest discription. The custom of the Athenians of discussing all the great questions of state, as well as matters of minor importance, in the public assemblies of the people, and by acclamation receiving or rejecting measures of the utmost importance, was productive of nearly all the evils that befel her as a republic. It often gave opportunity for the orator with the longest tongue and most engaging address, to sway the multitudes by appealing to their passions, rather than their judgment. The noisiest and most forward persons in a mixed assembly are generally those who are the least troubled with brains. The right to vote by acclamation, or a show of the palm, was the privilege of all present. The inexperienced youth, and the imbecile brawler from the street, ranked equal with the wisest statesmen in a show of hands. In the language of a celebrated writer, "The measures presented were the productions of the wisest men, while the judgment upon them was often left to fools."

The Athenians were, as a people, extremely jealous of their liberties. Taught by the experience of the past the value of liberty, they were very watchful with regard to the conduct of any man whose wealth, talent, or influence made it at all likely that he might be dangerous to the State. We give these particulars of Athenian life and political condition, to show more clearly the difficult role that Pericles had to play in his capacity of ruler of Athens.

Pericles inherited a very large estate from his father; but in this he was in no way superior to very many of the leading men of Athens. His influence and power was based altogether, and alone on the people's confidence in his integrity as a man. So honest and just was he—so far above all the temptations of avarice, that although he controlled for a period of nearly forty years the whole political, commercial, and financial operations of the government, he never added so much as a drachm to the estate left him by his father. His perfect disinterestedness was admitted by his political opponents. His perfect control over himself is finely illustrated in a circumstance that is recorded in Athenian history. A rude, passionate, and hasty fellow, once became offended at him for some supposed injury done himself. While Pericles was in public transacting some important state business, this fellow opened his batteries upon him, denouncing him with the most opprobrious epithets, as every thing mean, vicious and contemptible. This he repeated from time to time during the whole day, and at night followed him all the way to his residence, abusing him in the same strain. Pericles' equanimity was not in the least disturbed; he transacted his public business as if nothing unpleasant had happened; and, upon his arrival at his own door, called for a servant with a torch, and bade him light the gentleman to his home.

This great statesman was an enthusiastic patron of the arts. Nearly all of the great buildings, whose magnificent ruins astonish and delight the beholder to-day, were erected under the auspices of Pericles. It was only during the ascendency of such a man that a Phidias could flourish. That great artist lost his own life, and risked the ruin of his noble patron by the exercise of a piece of harmless vanity. In one of the great battle-scenes adorning one of the temples, executed by him, he sought to hand down the impress of his own physiognomy and that of his friend Pericles, in the personages of two of the chief actors in the great contest. The jealous Athenians starved him to death in prison, and would have banished Pericles, could they have fastened upon him the fact of his collusion in the sacrilege. Not wishing to prolong this article, we will close with the declaration that Lycurgus perpetuated a warlike barbarism in Sparta, while Pericles enlarged and beautified Athens and led her people on in the paths of social and artistic greatness and renown.

HOW SWEET.

How doth the little crocodile
Improve his shining tail,
And pour the water of the Nile
On every golden scale.

How cheerfully he seems to grin,
How neatly spreads his claws,
And welcomes little fishes in
With gently smiling jaws.

TERESE, THE HEBREW MAIDEN;

OR,

NOT ALL DROSS.

BY EDWARD W. TULLIDGE.

CHAPTER LI.

ALMOST HOME.

Spiritual Alice Courtney was almost home. She was pillowed up in her bed, from which she never rose again in mortal life. She had sent for Terese with the request that she would bring the bridal wreath of flowers which her hand had thrown. The family, who were gathered in the chamber of the dying maiden, awaited the coming of Terese.

Footsteps were heard without; a slight agitation was manifested by those within; but a feeling of solemnity pervaded every heart excepting that of Alice, which was filled with a divine peace.

Terese entered the room, led by her venerable grandfather, and Judah Nathans followed.

"Sister Terese, come to me." The Hebrew Maiden obeyed the call, and flew to the bedside of the dying maiden, and kneeling, she took her hands and saluted them with kisses and tears, for she could not speak.

"Terese, kiss me as a sister: let me kiss you as Walter's future bride."

"My sister, O my sister!" returned our heroine, and the two brides elect kissed each other with more than mortal love.

It was the presence of death, perhaps, that brought these angels of earth to this state of perfect affection. But the very fact that such peculiar circumstances as those which now encircled the two destined brides of Walter Templar, bringing them to the state of perfect love, without jealousy, shows that in heaven where love is perfect indeed, these two holy ones would not be less in harmony. They were in harmony now on earth.

"Sister Terese, your grandfather has told you all?"

"Yes, sister Alice."

"And you consent, sister Terese?"

"Oh my sister, my more than sister, would to God I could die in your stead;" and the Hebrew Maiden threw her arms around the neck of Alice Courtney, but she answered not directly to the question. Alice, however, took it as a sufficient reply.

"You must live to fill my place, sister Terese. God has willed it so. You, He has called to be Walter's bride of earth for many a happy year; me, He has called to be Walter's spirit-bride. I will watch over you both, and share in all your joys. There will no jealousy enter my heart there to see you and dear Walter blessed. If Alice has not felt that baser passion on earth, she will not be tortured with it in our second Paradise where all is love. I should never have allowed Walter to have plighted his troth to me, had I not known I was not long for earth. Sister, I loved him as you love him: I know that he loves you; I feel that he loves me also like unto you; and in loving him, there was joy in the thought of being united to him before I departed for my spirit home. But I would not have parted him from you; so I designed in my union, and through my death, as we of earth call it, to overcome these errors of religion, which have perverted the conscience of your good grandfather, and my beloved papa."

"My darling, you have prevailed," said Sir Richard Courtney.

"The God of Abraham has made the child wise," said Isaac Ben Ammon.

"The human heart is the divinest book of revelation" added the infidel Judah Nathans.

"Our families, Terese," resumed Alice, "declared that the Christian and the Jewess could not wed, even though they loved as truly and righteously as you and Walter loved, and the stern conscientiousness of your grandfather and my father, in maintaining the fidelity of their covenants of religion and division of races, parted for a time the twain whom God had joined together, and whose hearts were still one after the cruel divorce which they had wrought. Pardon me, papa, for thus judging you."

"You are, my child, judging me indeed, and giving to my darkened mind new light."

"Pardon me, good old man, for also judging you, who seem to me like one of the Patriarchs of your chosen race."

"Maiden, thou art weighing me in the balances," answered the Patriarch with humility.

"At the first visit of your uncle Judah to my family, sister Terese," resumed Alice, still addressing our heroine, "I knew not the secret of my own heart. Indeed it had none then, yet I wept and wickedly thought that I should not have been as noble as my sister Eleanor, in resigning Walter, and then, when the stern fiat came that the Christian and the Jewess must not mate, I wept at this. I saw my cousin Walter stricken down, and his life threatened with the blight of a great sorrow. Then I tried to comfort him, but he would not be comforted. Daily I shared his solitude, and my presence alone was endurable to him. This pleased me, but I was careful not to let my presence disturb his sorrow. I grew to love him, sister Terese; but with that love, came the realization that, like my angel mother who is waiting for me above, my mortal days were ordained to be but few. My noble Walter towered above me like a God by my side, in his grand sorrow, and I felt that he was long for earth. Almost an idolatry for him possessed me: but no jealousy for you, for it was then that I thought most of you. It was at that time that there grew up in my mind the fancy that you were destined to be his bride of earth, I his bride of Heaven. Instead of feeling as your rival, I became as one with you in my dream. It was still these twain whom God had joined together, but I became identified in your oneness, and I saw myself as a spirit hovering above you both. Then came the accident, when I was thrown from my horse, which brought me nearer home. My former fancies now altogether possessed me, and I resolved to imitate the nobleness of my sister Eleanor."

"My beloved Alice, you have more than imitated her" said Courtney's eldest daughter.

"Resolving to bring you and Walter together again," continued the dying maiden, "I consented to become his spirit bride for in doing so I believed that I should convert my father to a higher wisdom, for I knew that he could not withhold from his dying child: and then my union with Walter seemed to give me the right to live for him and you on earth, and afterwards above. As I rose towards my spirit home, I saw the love and unity of heaven, and Jesus was revealed to me in his own divine nature. Oh, papa, I knew then how wrong you and Terese's grandfather had been. There is no division of races where He dwells; no discords of creeds disturb the harmony of those who have put on Christ in heaven. When He reigns on earth the Christian and the Jew will mate in love; and all mankind be as God's children."

"Angel Alice, you have converted your father to a Christian religion," said Sir Richard to his daughter, feeling then as one of those little children.

"Maiden, the Nazarine is beautified to Isaac Ben Ammon, in thee," said Terese's grandfather.

"Philosopher, bow thy head to this angelic teacher. I have solved the problem at last. Faith is the highest wisdom."

Thus spoke Judah, the infidel.

"And now, sister Terese, leave me, for the angels are coming soon. Leave with me that bridal crown of flowers. Their presence will consecrate it to-night. You shall give me to Walter to-morrow, as his bride of earth, for a moment, and I will betroth you by my bridal gift of flowers, and then the angels will come."

CHAPTER LII.

GONE JUST ABOVE HIM.

It was on the following day and near the hour of sun-set. A bridal group were gathered in the chamber of Alice Courtney. The ceremony of marriage was about to be performed—the linking of hands, typical of the union of souls. In this case, it was touchingly suggestive of the glorious conception of marriage for eternity, for the spirit of the bride was waiting to soar above. There was also foreshadowed that blending of earth and heaven, to which the highest inspirations of the human race mount up as on the wings of a present immortality. Even should earth never reach its state of spirit-blending, that throbbing immortality within us, will ever be yearning after that blessed consummation. Linked with the spirits just above us is the conception which is always coming towards us, and our subtler being senses that linking when we are in the very night of spiritual darkness.

"Could there be but light on this—oh could there be but light, how near should we find ourselves to those above—just above—just above!"

Thus thought Alice Courtney, Church of England divines had not taught her this, orthodoxy had obscured her vision as it has that of the whole world, but she was now so near her spirit-home that she began to see its light.

"Death is a great blessing, not a curse," mused the infidel Judah Nathans. "Adam gave us everlasting light, when, by death, he gave us spiritual immortality, if there be such a hereafter state. He took us out of a mummied mortality, to which it matters not if no resurrection brings us back."

Alice Courtney was just rising into that state of higher life to which death exalts us, but before departing, a priest of the English Protestant Church, was present ready to link her in marriage with the beloved one of earth. She wore upon her spiritual brow the wreath of flowers which she had thrown to Terese. They were almost withered, but still she wore them, for their language pleased the fancies of her mind. The Hebrew Maiden was by her side, dressed in white, to give to Walter his bride of heaven. Isaac Ben Ammon was there, gazing upon the dying maiden, appearing in the scene like one of the ancients, waiting to bear a spirit above; Sir Richard Courtney was there; his sister was there; Eleanor and young De Lacy, her lover, were there; imagination must picture them; language cannot describe the state of mind of the Courtney family. Walter held his "spirit-bride" by the hand; the clergyman, with his book open, was about to begin the service. There was another present; it was Judah Nathans. But he kept himself in the back-ground, as though he felt himself not good enough for that circle—not near enough to Alice even to be her witness, but never did he in his nature so well illustrate—Not All Dross,—as at that moment

The marriage service of the Church of England was performed. Alice and Walter were one forever.

"Until death us do part!" had no meaning in that solemn ceremony, though the form of words was used. All felt, even to the orthodox minister, that the union was one of eternity, not of time; and the phrase—"Until death us do part" never sounded out of place to the Rev. Arthur Blair, until he united Alice Courtney to Walter Templar. Indeed, the Church of England divine paused when he came to the passage; and for a moment there was a silence more expressive than a book of commentaries; and when the reverend gentleman broke that silence with a voice sonorous with solemnity and uttered "Until death us do part!" a kindred thought ran through the minds of all—"Death has nought with this." That single instant gave them more light of revelation on marriage than they had ever received before. They had now met one case of a marriage for eternity.

That union of two souls, not to be separated by death, had received an earthly ceremonial form. It was a type of countless millions of such unions which we shall find hereafter in our Paradise above.

"Let the bridegroom kiss the bride!" added the Rev. Arthur Blair, as he closed the ceremony.

Walter Templar kissed his bride of heaven, and wept; Terese kissed her sister bride and wept; Sir Richard and Lady Templar kissed the bride and wept; indeed, there was not an eye of any present, which was not baptized in tears. Even Judah Nathans felt that he was as in the waters of Jordan then. It is the heart more than the intellect that brings us all to the state of grace.

"Walter—my Walter—husband! the angels are come."

These were the first words of Alice Courtney, after the close of the ceremony. None answered, for all knew that the moments of parting were indeed come. They were silent to catch the last words of the dying maiden-wife.

"Sister Terese, the angels have come! Your hand, sister. Weep not for me,—all is well. I give you to my husband, to fill my place on earth, even as you just now gave him you love to me. Sister Terese we are not two but one in him."

"Kneel, my beloved ones, that I may be able to reach your heads." And when they knelt she said, "Sister Terese I place on your head my bridal-wreath. When the flowers are withered and dead keep them in remembrance of me. Like my spirit their perfumes will have gone to heaven. Walter, my husband, let my hands bless you."

"My wife—oh my wife! Thou art indeed my spirit-bride!

It was the first time that Walter had dared to break with speech the spell of the heavenly presence after the marriage, and rapturous was the look which Alice gave her husband, when she heard from his lips, for the first time, the holy name of wife.

"Husband," she said, in a tone of ineffable love, "I shall be only just above you—only just above. My spirit shall minister to you and Terese, and shall share in all your joys. I know the angels mingle with their dear ones on earth."

"I believe you, Alice: I believe you, my wife."

"You will always believe that I am near you, Walter?"

"Always will I believe my bride of heaven is near me."

"And you, sister Terese?"

"I will always believe my angel-sister Alice is near me, also."

"She will be near you both. But there is a cloud in your future: it has troubled me: yet I see all bright beyond it. If that cloud should overshadow you, husband, sister, will you believe Alice near you then?"

"We will!" was the simultaneous response.

"All is well: all is well," returned the maiden-wife; and then, after a moment's pause, she said in a wearied voice, as though languishing to be gone.

"Papa, kiss me; mother, kiss me!"

Sir Richard and Lady Templar, in turn, hung over their dying daughter an instant and wept again, for they knew it was the last kiss on earth.

"Sister Terese, kiss me." The arms of the brides encircled for a moment in a fond embrace. Perfect love was indeed between them. Alice fell back upon her pillow, exhausted by the effort, but recovering with a great struggle, she said:

"Walter—husband! you the last!"

The bridegroom took his bride in his arms and kissed her gently, again and again, then held her to his heart for the space of five minutes, amid breathless silence, which Alice broke with her dying voice, which scarcely seemed to be a sound:

"Walter, the angels are come. I am going! Only just above—just—above!"

And the spirit of the bride went only just above him! Walter Templar held in his arms the inanimate clay.

We must pass over the first half-hour after the "flight" of the spirit of Alice Courtney, and the scene of the weeping family who stood around her bed. Judah Nathans was the first to leave the chamber; and he went forth from that angel-presence, musing to himself in profound thought:

"I think, to-day, there is an immortality; I wish I could solve the problem!"

Such was the state of that strange man's mind. To-day, he thought there is an immortality; to-morrow, perhaps he would doubt again. Yet Judah Nathans was traveling towards a state of faith.

The ministering care of friends for the beautiful tabernacle of the departed one was performed, while the angels were ministering to a spirit new born into their sphere.

At length, Walter Templar was alone with his dead—dead! Oh! not dead, but more abundantly living. All that night, he remained alone with her feeling in close communion with her spirit. To him, her presence was as palpable as before. All that night, she seemed with him. Indeed, he had never felt her influence and presence as much as then. Her very being was suddenly blended with his own being. His soul went out of him into her, and her soul took up a new abode in him. They were one more than though she had remained on earth—one, not in flesh, but in soul. He realized her own beautiful views of spirit-blending from the sphere above into the sphere of earth. Heaven and earth were married that night in those two.

Thus spent Walter Templar his nuptual night in holy communion with his "spirit bride;" and when he went forth from her chamber in the morning, he said to the bereaved parent:

"Father, my bride is gone only just above me!"

CHAPTER LIII.

MIDNIGHT BEFORE DAY.

Nine months have fled since the death of Alice Courtney. Her mortal remains were embalmed and brought to England where she was sepulchred with her race. The first grief of her family has subsided into a holy remembrance of the sainted dead. They deemed that to mourn for her would trouble her gentle spirit in her home of peace. It is more fit that we lament over the unblessed, than over our angels who have gone before us, to prepare our way—to be as ministering spirits to us and perchance to plead often to the Angel of Mercy in our behalf. There is a profound philosophy in the Catholic notion of the intercession of the Saints, which our own faith continues, at least, in one case:

"Mingling with Gods, he can plan for his brethren"

This intercessional and ministering agency of those whom we term the "dead" in behalf of the living of earth, who are more properly the dead, is perhaps more universal than we deem. And so the Courtney family, thus impressed by the beautiful termination of Alice's mortal life, looked up to her, not as dead, but as their ministering spirit in her sphere "just above."

Hence, Sir Richard Courtney and his family had already begun to prepare to carry out the intentions of Alice in the consummation of the union between Walter Templar and Terese Ben Ammon. Moreover, Courtney and his sister were desirous to accomplish the union between Eleanor and Frederick De Lacy. There was, too, the redemption of the De Lacy estates close in the prospective, and Sir Richard and Lady Templar were now overjoyed to see their hopes of twenty years so near fulfillment. There were, therefore, so many reasons for the immediate marriage of Eleanor with Frederick De Lacy, and Walter with Terese, that six weeks from the date of our present chapter the grand wedding was arranged to take place.

Judah Nathans, the sceptic and the man of evil—for, with his strange perversion of mind, he still persisted in thus classifying himself—he had resolved to clear the mortgage from the De Lacy estates that his niece might present the canceled bond to her husband on her wedding day. Sir Herbert Blakely's agent, Lawyer Wortley, had been duly notified by Judah, who had also written to his former master whom he had too well served. Indeed, Walter Templar had been for the last three weeks in London with Terese's uncle and Lawyer Wortley, to settle the De Lacy affairs. A singular circumstance connected with the matter was that Sir Herbert Blakely had accepted the new situation, and had written to his lawyer, authorizing him to conclude the business in his behalf, on a certain date, providing he himself had not returned to England at that date. He said in his letter that, notwithstanding his great disappointment and rage at first, he knew that what "Snap" had resolved as a necessity, he would accomplish; and, therefore, there was left to himself no alternative but to bow to that necessity. He, however, was profuse in his reproaches against his ancient mentor, whom, he observed, had betrayed both him and his father. So far, all this seemed genuine, and the date named by Sir Herbert was the day fixed upon for the redemption of the De Lacy estates with or without the presence of Blakely. That date was one week before the marriage of Walter and Terese, which had been arranged accordingly. But had Judah Nathans known that Sir Herbert's letter had been written in England, though sent to Italy to be posted, he would have understood that his former master was about to play some treacherous part, and the dark sequel of our story would not have been now to come.

The departing spirit of Alice Courtney had forseen the dark cloud in the future of Walter and Terese, before the bursting of the refulgent sun. The fulfillment is near; it is now the "midnight before day." This is so generally found true in our common experience that the fact has given rise to a familiar proverb: It does oftentimes seem that the very fiends are at work most vigorously just at the point where our happiness is to be consummated. How often does the home-bound sailor get wrecked on his native shores. But then, this is all simple enough in its explanation. It is because he is nearer the rocks of his native land, instead of far out in the deep ocean, where it is always safest to be in a treacherous storm. Sir Herbert Blakely and the De Lacy estates were Walter Templar's rocks; and he was nearer upon them because he was nearer to his shore. This fact made his "midnight before day." Will any of the characters of our story be wrecked upon those rocks?

CHAPTER LIV.

THE SUPPLANTER AT WORK.

There was a lone inn on the London road between Bath and Sherbourne, about twenty-five miles from Courtney House. Turning off about two miles below, a horseman journeying to Sir Richard's mansion would find his shortest way through an unfrequented English forest which was just the place for a dark deed. The Bath and Weymouth coaches were in the habit of stopping at that inn for their changes of horses, and the landlord had received instructions from Sir Richard Courtney to have ready on the afternoon of the 10th of November, 1824, two of his best horses for gentlemen on their way from London. The keeper of that inn was Jacob Blakely, a plebeian first-cousin of Sir Herbert Blakely, though the relationship in society had been somewhat ignored.

On the afternoon of this tenth of November, two horsemen muffled in cloaks, entered the coachyard of the "Dragon's Head"—the sign of the inn They dismounted and entered. The landlord who seemed to expect them, showed them into a little back parlor. One of the horsemen was an Italian, the other an Englishman.

"Jacob," observed the Englishman to the landlord as he threw off his cloak and laid his pistols on the table, "is all prepared?"

"Yes, Sir Herbert."

"And the men whom I dispatched here?"

"Yes, Sir Herbert; and six more villainous-looking rascals I never saw."

"They better suit my purpose, then. Bid them here at once for their orders, for Sir Walter Templar and his companion are not more than an hour's ride from the inn. Is my carriage also ready, blinds down, chains fixed to bind our man,—for he will be like a lion caged;—in short, is all ready?"

"I have myself attended to every thing, Sir Herbert."

"Then show these villainous cut-throats in. They should cut his throat," Blakely added to his companion, after the landlord had departed, "but that I have a sweeter morsel of revenge in store."

"My friend, the blood-letting is the better way to rid yourself forever of your enemy," observed the Italian.

"What, Orsini, do you not better understand revenge? Sir Walter Templar shall rot in the dungeon of De Lacy castle. Will it not be better than sunlight to your eyes to see him in that dark dungeon with but a little flickering lamp to show him the misery of his years of captivity, for such it shall be to him. I swear it by the iron will of my father."

"I confess your view is pleasant, Blakely. I would give much to see him daily rage in that dungeon of your castle, for I have not forgotten the humbling Sir Walter Templar gave me before my companions in Rome"

"Aye, by the fiend, that castle shall be mine yet. I will strike the very name of De Lacy from it. I will be Templar's jailor, though it should cost me the rest of my days to do him this service. But he will rot;—he will rot: two years at most, and his carcass will be food for the rats in his dungeon. But hist! here come our men. On with our masks, Orsini."

The six ruffians entered and crowded aronnd the table, almost filling the room. The landlord placed a decanter of brandy on the table and left.

"Well, my men, are you all ready," asked Sir Herbert Blakely.

"We are," replied their leader.

"Then let five of you away to the old lodge in the forest. Let the other be at the cross roads with the carriage. Two hours hence the work must be done. It will be then just about dark. I and my friend will follow our men. We will keep a little out of sight, until just before they reach the old lodge, when we will put spurs to our horses and in a moment be to your assistance. Come, drink, but not too deeply, for remember you have no lamb to play with to-night."

"There is a purse—fifty guinias for each. To-morrow morning you shall have the like sum. Six months hence the dose shall be repeated, if you hold your tongues; if you don't, they will bring you all to the gallows. Now, be off with you."

In another minute, Count Orsini and Sir Herbert were alone, when the Italian observed:

"It is lucky that Farinelli is with Sir Walter Templar."

"You are right, Orsini, for all the suspicion of foul play will rest upon him. They are known to have been once rivals;and we will let the other be known that Farinelli attempted to assassinate his rival in the old monastry at Rome."

"Yes, Blakely, the jealous Donna Clara must be brought in to reveal that part. I left her in a towering rage, last night, when I told her that Farinelli was about to leave London, to visit Terese at Courtney House; and when Sir Walter is missing, it will be easy to pursuade the prima donna that he put him out of the way to make the prize his own. I hate Farinelli as much for spoiling my game with Donna Clara Garcia, as I do Templar for defeating me in the duel."

"Well, we shall have revenge on them both, Orsini. I have no cause against the foster-brother, but I will profit by the former advice of my old mentor. Yes, Snap was wise. Farinelli was chosen well by him to bear my part in his own, and if I can keep my connection with this night's work, and my presence in England hid from him, all will be as I would have it. Snap would not betray me and my dead father, but for the greater necessity as he calls it of the marriage with his niece. But Templar out of the way, and that necessity will be gone; and the De Lacy estates will still be mine."

Soon afterwards, Sir Walter Templar and Farinelli galloped up to the door of the "Dragon's Head," and lept from their foaming steeds. We need scarcely say that there was perfect good will between these two men who have played principal parts in our story. On Walter's side, he had ever regarded the foster-brother with friendly feeling; and his respect for him was not lessened by his over-jealous care for Terese. In fact, he also knew of his morbid love and the peculiar position which Isaac Ben Ammon had brought him into; but, as Farinelli was the first to withdraw from the proposed misalliance and return to his old relations of foster-brother, Terese and Walter treated him with the same consideration as before. There was one circumstance, however, that Farinelli had hid: it was his attempt to kill our hero in the ruined monastry. Well would it have been for the foster-brother had he confessed all, for it would have helped to clear him from the suspicion of the dark deed which Sir Herbert Blakely had resolved to saddle upon him.

Our hero and the foster-brother entered the lone inn together, having first committed their horses to the care of the hostler and ordered fresh ones to be ready in half an hour. They were both on their way to Courtney House, to which Farinelli had been invited to spend a few weeks with his foster-sister, before her marriage, and to stay till after the wedding. This was done out of tender regard for the young man and to reconcile him by generous treatment to the sacrifice which he had made of his own hopes to secure the happiness of his foster-sister.

In half an hour, our hero and his companion refreshed by rest and generous fare, were again in the coachyard of the "Dragon's Head." A moment afterwards, they were in their saddles, mounted on fresh steeds.

"And now, Farinelli, for a twenty-five mile ride in the dark," said Sir Walter. "I love a ride by night. Away, my friend."

"I am with you, Sir Walter."

And away dashed the young men; but scarcely had they gone, when Sir Herbert and Count Orsini were standing by their own fleet steeds.

"Jacob, is your son George with the carriage?"

"Yes, Sir Herbert."

"Can he be fully trusted, Jacob? for we must dispense with those ruffians when our man is secured. They must not know me nor where Sir Walter Templar is taken. Can George be trusted?"

"You forgot, cousin Herbert, that we are interested as much as yourself in your holding the estates."

"Curse you, I had forgotten that you had a tongue to blab of your relations. Yes, you and George inherit after me, so I may trust you both."

"You may trust us, cousin Herbert," retorted Jacob Blakely with a grim smile.

Sir Herbert and Count Orsini again masked, for as it was now dark, there was no fear of their meeting any one on the road. The caution was merely to preserve them from being recognized by Sir Walter Templar and the ruffians in their execution of the work close at hand. The two plotters now galloped off at full speed to the performance of their night's business. The plan was to separate Farinelli from his companion; and, after detaining him for a few hours a prisoner, to let him go unhurt to carry the news to Courtney House that suspicion might afterwards fall upon him, while Sir Walter Templar was to be hurried off to the dungeon of De Lacy castle.

CHAPTER LV.

TOO MANY FOR HIM.

Sir Walter Templar and the foster-brother had turned off into the road through the forest of which we have spoken, and soon they heard the clatter of horses hoofs behind them. They had at first however no thought that they were pursued, for they heard but the sound of two horses in the distance. Other horsemen might lawfully be on the road as well as they, and even if aught sinister was in the circumstance, Walter felt that he and his companion were a match for any two: his bold spirit was nothing daunted. But as they came in sight of the ruins of the lodge in the forest he thought he saw figures moving in the front, for the moon was shining brightly out.

"Farinelli, look to your pistols" he said. "There may be danger abroad. I see figures of men moving in the distance, and the horsemen behind are gaining upon us. Gallop boldly onward but be ready."

"I am in no way alarmed, Sir Walter," was the reply.

Our hero and his companion attempted to pass the lodge at a gallop, but the six ruffians threw themselves across the road, and the horses suddenly finding themselves as facing a wall of masked men, reared on their haunches in fright. Had not the movement been so unexpected, and the horses thus terrified, Sir Walter and his companion would have fired and broken through the robbers, as he at first took them to be. The ruffians siezed upon the reins of the affrighted steeds, and the riders had no power to defend themselves to advantage, though they fired, but without any deadly effect. By this time, Blakely and Orsini were upon the spot, when Sir Herbert, without speaking, shot Templar's horse in the head, for he readily recognized our hero from his companion by his towering form. Walter and his dead steed fell together. Three of the ruffians busied themselves in capturing Farinelli, whom they bore unhurt to the lodge, thus separating him from his friend. Sir Walter, in the meantime, disengaging himself, sprang to his feet and prepared to use the butt of his heavy horse-pistol. The ruffians hovered around him irresolute, for they saw they had no common man to deal with.

"Fools, sieze him." said Sir Herbert in a rage, seeing this irresolution, thus incautiously betraying himself.

"Ha. You!" ejaculated Templar. Then I understand it all.

Thus saying, our hero sprang upon the leader of the ruffians and felled him to the earth. In another instant he was grappling with the other two.

A few words from the Italian, advising Blakely to shoot Templar, told who was the other mysterious personage.

"You, too, Count Orsini!" observed Walter, as he caught up one of the ruffians and hurled him over his head, in true English fashion, and then, with his fist, he sent the other reeling to the ground by a mighty blow from his iron-fibered fist. But before he could profit by the advantage, two from the lodge, who had bound Farinelli with cords, siezed upon our hero, while a blow on the head from Sir Herbert's life-preserver brought Templar senseless upon the ground.

"Bind and gag him, my men," said Blakely in a tone of satisfaction at the capture. "Then look to your comrades."

"Our leader is dead," said one of the men. "His skull is broken," he added.

The one whom Templar had thrown over his head was fearfully bruised, and groaning at a few yards distance, while the other arose bewildered by the blow given him, but muttering curses.

"Away with our man to the carriage while he is senseless, and take your leader afterwards to the inn. If he is dead, his booty is yours."

"Ay, ay, your honor," one of the ruffians replied to the command of their employer, and then they bore Sir Walter Templar to the carriage.

They found George Blakely (the son of the inn-keeper) at the cross roads with the carriage, ready to start on his journey. It was about a quarter of a mile from the spot where the capture had been made, and which they reached by cutting across the forest. Sir Walter was still senseless when the ruffians laid him in the carriage, to which they chained him with the chains which had been fixed on purpose.

"That will do, my men," said Sir Herbert. "Now return to the forest. Let a portion of your number carry to the inn the body of your leader, and see that he is safely buried before the morning. At midnight, let the other stranger go, and be sure that he is unharmed, without as much as a bruise. Touch not his watch nor his purse: but estimate their value, and I will pay the amount extra to the promised reward of this night's work. If, at one in the morning, you are all at the inn, there will be the other fifty pounds each for you, with the share of your dead leader. If one of you is missing, there will be nothing. I will have no spies on my actions or course."

"All right, your honor," said he who now took the lead of the ruffians.

"And now away, my men. But stop a moment. Be sure you reload the pistols of this gentleman whom we have caged, and put them in the holsters of the saddle of his dead mare, so that it might seem that both the horse and its rider have been shot before assistance could be made: shot by his companion—do you understand."

Ay, ay! your honor; a brave plot. The suspicion will then all rest upon him.

"Exactly. Be discreet, and in six months from to-night, call at the Inn and there shall be another fifty guinias each for you. Quick, away with you all."

"Blakely, that is well arranged," observed Orsini, as soon as the hired ruffians were out of hearing.

"I think so, Orsini. All the lawyers in England will not clear Farinelli from this scrape. He will be charged with murder and hung; but that is no concern of mine."

"Not in the least, Blakely; but I must set Donna Clara Garcia on his track. She must be made to think that Farinelli has put Sir Walter Templar out of his way, to marry Terese. I know what a jealous Spanish woman will do: Revenge herself."

"And now, Orsini, we must be off, to reach my castle before the morning."

"You are right: so into the carriage, Blakely."

In another minute they were dashing towards the De Lacy castle.

A CRI-SIS.

A gentleman dined with a friend one day,
Above he heard sobbing and crying;
He inquired of his friend in an anxious way,
"If any were sick or dying?"

"Oh no," said he, smiling his best,
While they were discussing the ices.
"I've refused my dear sister a dress,
And produced a financial cry-sis."

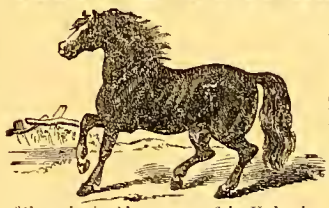
HORSE POWDERS.



These celebrated and renowned powders for horses and cattle have been tested by an intelligent public for sixteen years. Hundreds of the principal horsemen of the Union have pronounced them the only Condition Powders safe to use and work the horse. There is nothing in them to expose the animal, but, on the contrary, everything to improve them. The proprietors of horse railroads, omnibusses, and stage owners in all the principal cities use them; and their combined testimony stamps them one of the wonders of medical science. Letters sufficient to fill a small book are in our possession, testifying to their goodness. Merchants are requested to warrant them, and refund the purchase money should they fail to give satisfaction.

ALLCOCK'S POROUS STRENGTHENING PLASTERS.

ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS are the results of studies and experiments of Dr. Schecut, of South Carolina; of Dr. Wm. Wagstaff, now Baron Wagstaff, of Horace H. Day, the distinguished manufacturer of rubber goods; and of Thomas Allcock, Chemist and member of the College of Pharmacy of New York, now General Allcock, etc., etc.

Step by step this commodity has attained its unprecedented fame. They are universally approved. They support, strengthen, and aid the growth of muscles. They appear to have a peculiar effect upon the nerves, allaying irritability, while supplying warmth. They seem to accumulate electricity, and aid the circulation of the blood through the part where applied, by which healthy actions are induced.

Even in paralysis, where articulation was suspended, the use of the Porous Plasters to the spine restored the articulation, and materially reduced the paralysis. In fact, the patient could help herself, while before the Porous plaster was applied she was as helpless as a baby. We refer to Mrs. Sally Elliot, Springfield, Mass.

Dr. Myer, of Savannah, Ga., says they are the best mechanical supporters for weak muscles ever discovered; that by their warming properties they bring power and health, until the strength of the muscles are entirely restored. That he knows a case where Allcock's Plasters cured a gentleman of a weak spine. That he daily prescribes them in his practice with the happiest results, and desires us to refer to him.

Dr. Henderson, of Farmsville, Louisiana, says:

"The counter-irritant effect of Allcock's Porous Plasters is produced in such a mild and gradual way, they so invigorate the circulation around the parts to which they are applied, and exert upon all nervous diseases such a great sedative influence, that I place them confidently at the head of every plaster now in use."

Dr. Johnson, of Hartford, says:

"My daily experience confirms the very superior excellence of your Porous Plasters. At this moment of writing, a man applies for one, who, by entanglement in a shaft of machinery, had both his legs broken, spine severely injured, and was for nearly a year entirely helpless. This man found relief very soon by the application of a plaster to his spine. He was soon enabled to work, and now he labors as well as ever. He would cheerfully pay five dollars for a single plaster, if they could not be had at a lower rate. Surgeons should make use of these perforated plasters, to the exclusion of all others, as their flexibility and adhesiveness are greatly in advance of all other plasters with which I am acquainted, while the perforations peculiar to them render them greatly superior to all others for ordinary surgical uses. Knowing the plasters to be so useful, I have no scruples that my sentiments should be known.

J. W. JOHNSON, M. D."

Dr. Sterling's testimony:

"For two years, I have been a great sufferer from neuralgia in the head, and found only temporary relief from all the various remedies that I have tried, until I applied one of Allcock's Porous Plasters. I cut it into three strips, placing one under each shoulder blade, and the other over the small of the back; and for the past three months, I have had scarcely a twinge of the old pain.

I advise all who suffer from nervous diseases to lose no time in making a trial of the wonderful Porous Plaster.

A. F. STERLING, Sec. Singer Mfg. Co.

New York, June 8, 1868.

MEDICINAL QUALITIES

—OF THE—

POROUS PLASTERS.

The Porous Plasters possess the soothing, warming and sustaining qualities of the combined plasters of the dispensatories. An Electrician, who has great experience of their effects in Local Rheumatism, in Tic Doloreux, and deep-seated nervous and other pains, and in affections of the kidneys, etc, etc., attributes all their sedative, stimulative and pain-relieving effects to their ELECTRIC qualities. He asserts that they restore the healthy electric condition (equilibrium) of the part, and that being restored pain and morbid action cease. He was amazed at the great number of beneficial indications produced by one of these plasters. He affirms that Head-ache is cured by one worn just below the breast-bone; that one placed over the navel will cure hysterics, as well as dysentery, and affections of the bowels.

PATENT ARION PIANOFORTE

GRANDS AND GRAND SQUARES,

7¼ OCTAVES.

The "ARION" is the very best Piano for the Great West, because it stands in tune longer than any other Piano. It requires no repairing or regulating; shipping any distance, or dampness does not affect them.

WHY?

It commences where the "First Premium" Makers stop, and upon the most improved Modern scale makes four patented improvements: which make the Arion more simple, yet stronger: increasing its volume and beauty of tone, while rendering the instrument more enduring.

WHAT THEY ARE.

First. The patent Arion Reversed Wooden Agraffe Bridge, which retains all the purity of tone only found in a wooden bridge (the rest whereon the strings lay), and obtains all the solid prolonged strength of tone of the metal Agraffe, without that acute metalic noise which the metal Agraffe develops by use.

Secondly. The Patent Arion Compound Wrest-Plank, which holds the tuning pins, is six thicknesses of hard maple, the grain of each layer runs in a different direction. The advantages are, the 20 tons strain of the strings cannot split our Arion wrest-plank, as frequently happens in other Pianos, and when people say "My Piano won't stand in tune," all other makers must use the single wrest plank with the grain running only one way.

The Arion Tuning-Pins have end wood to hold them on every side, while all other makers can have it only upon two sides of their pins.

Thirdly. The Patent Arion Diagonal Sustaining Bar, extending parellel with the steel strings under the over strung Bass strings. The Arion is the only Piano wherein the enormous strain of the large steel strings is resisted in the natural place and direction. Using this bar renders the weakest part in all other over strung Pianos the

STRONGEST IN THE ARION.

THE ARION STANDS UPON ITS OWN MERITS.

unsupported by either buncome, weak facts, or useless or complicated Patents. We append a few unbought opinions of those who

KNOW THE ARION.

The Musical Director of the New York Conservatory of Music, Edward Mollenhauer, says: "The Arion I bought of you is the best Piano I ever played on: that rolling bass and silvery treble, etc."

John H. Woods, Piano Dealer, Oswego, N. Y., says: The tone is truly immense, and surpasses anything in the shape of a Piano we ever saw or heard of, etc."

Horace Greely said: "The Arion is the best Square Piano, superior for its clearness and brilliancy of tone," &c.

Louis Wagner, Fort Leaverworth, says: "My Piano arrived here in splendid order. Its tone fills my parlor with melody—it is the wonder and admiration of all who hear it. Miss ——, who is teaching the Piano desires me to order one for her," &c.

MUSICAL DOINGS.—Since Mr. Waters gave up publishing sheet music, he has devoted his whole capital and attention to the manufacture and sale of Pianos and Melodeons. He has just issued a catalogue of his new instruments, giving a new scale of prices, which shows a marked reduction from former rates, and his Pianos have recently been awarded the First Premium at several Fairs. Many people of the present day, who are attracted, if not confused, with the flaming advertisements of rival piano houses, probably overlook the modest manufacturer like Mr. Waters; but we happen to know that his instruments earned him a good reputation long before Expositions and "honors" connected therewith were ever thought of; indeed, we have one of Mr. Waters' Piano-fortes now in our residence, (where it has stood for years,) of which any manufacturer in the world might be proud. We have always been delighted with it as a sweet-toned and powerful instrument, and there is no doubt of its durability; more than this, some of the best amateur players in the city, and several celebrated pianists, have performed on the said piano, and all pronounce it a superior and first-class Instrument. Stronger indorsement we could not give.—Home Journal,

NEW MEDICAL DISCOVERY.

Dr. CADY'S CATARRH REMEDY.

A CERTAIN CURE FOR CATARRH AND ALL Mucous Diseases of the head, nose and throat.

This is a Medicine never before used or known to the public. Dr. Cady, the discoverer, was a sufferer from this terrible disease for twenty years, and after testing all the remedies extant—without relief—in his efforts to obtain a cure he discovered this UNEQUALLED REMEDY, which cured him in the short space of eight weeks.

It has been thoroughly tested, and has not failed in a single instance. Several of the most obstinate cases have been thoroughly cured by this remedy, after every other known medicine had failed. Every one who has tried it will testify to the truth of the above statement.

Every one afflicted with Catarrh should give it a trial and find out for himself whether it is a humbug.

Price, $2 per Bottle. Sold by GODBE & Co., Salt Lake City.

HOPE!

How pleasant it is to know that, after using Dr. Farr's Invigorating Cordial, you will be restored to better health than you have enjoyed for years. This is no imaginary statement. Thousands can testify to its correctness. For sale by Brown, Weber & Graham, Nos. 10 and 12 North Second street, St. Louis.

BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES

"A SLIGHT COLD," COUGH, Hoarseness, or Sore Throat which might be checked with a simple remedy, if neglected often terminates seriously. Few are aware of the importance of stopping a Cough or "slight cold" in its first stage; that which in the beginning would yield to a mild remedy, if not attended to, soon attacks the lungs.

The efficacy of Brown's Bronchial Troches is demonstrated by testimonials from Physicians, Surgeons in the Army, and eminent men wherever they have been used.

They were introduced in 1850. It has been proved that they are the best article before the public for Coughs, Colds, Bronchitis, Asthma, Catarrh, the Hacking Cough in Consumption, and numerous affections of the Throat, giving immediate relief.

PUBLIC SPEAKERS & SINGERS will find them effectual for clearing and strengthening the voice.

Your Troches are too well and favorably known to need commendation.

HON. CHAS. A. PHELAS, Pres. Mass. Senate.

My communication with the world has been very much enlarged by the Lozenge which now I carry always in my pocket; that trouble in my Throat (for which Throches are a specific) having made me often a mere whisperer.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

Saratoga A WATER.

The Saratoga "A" Spring Water is probably the most effective mineral water found on either continent. It has ten per cent. greater mineral properties than the celebrated Congress Spring; four times that of Baden Baden of Austria; five times that of Aix La Chapelle in Prussia; twice that of Vichy in France; nearly three times greater than the renowned Seltzer of Germany; and equally over the Spas of Bath, England, and Kissengen in Bavaria.

The reputation of this water is based upon its effects in diseases of the stomach, liver, bowels, kidneys and spleen. It acts with wonderful benefit in cases of chronic dyspepsia, constipation, gravel, gout, Scrofula, cutaneous affections, general lethargy, soreness and prostration of the system.

THE SUMMER SHOWER.

Welcome rain or tempest
From yon airy powers,
We have languished for them
Many sultry hours,
And earth is sick and wan, and pines with all her flowers.

What have they been doing
In the burning June?
Riding with the Genii??
Visiting the Moon?
Or sleeping on the ice amid an Arctic noon?

Bring they with them jewels
From the sunset lands?
What are these they scatter
With such lavish hands?
There are no brighter gems in Raolcenda's sands!

Pattering on the gravel,
Dropping from the eaves,
Glancing on the grass, and Tinkling on the leaves,
They flash the liquid pearls, as flung from fairy sieves!

Meanwhile, unreluctant,
Earth like Danaë lies;
Listen! is it fancy
That beneath us sighs,
As that warm lap receives the largess of the skies?

Jove it is descendeth
In those crystal rills,
And this world-wide tremor
Is a pulse that thrills
To a god's life infused through veins of velvet hills!

Wait, thou jealous sunshine,
Break not on their bliss!
Earth will blush in roses
Many a day for this,
And bend a brighter brow beneath thy burning kiss!

GLIMMERLY GAP.

CONCLUDED.

As Marks read those words, I broke out with a curse.

"What's the row?" he said. "Hold on. There's more."

I jumped at that.

"Go on. Quick!"

"All right. Come on. Be on your guard!"

I rushed out. Morris was watching. I waved my arm. The train moved on. It was scant four miles to Garrowfield, the last this side of Lindenbury. I went forward and looked out ahead. We were running pretty fast; thirty-five miles to the hour, I should say. We were up to our time at last. We were running through the Clitheroe Hills, the road winding up the valley of the Garrow; to the left the river flowed dark and silent. Now and then you caught a gleam from the gloomy current; here and there, the sound of its brawling over a stony bed. You saw the lights of a village, now and again, twinkling among the looming hills across the Garrow. Here we crossed a roaring culvert; then, the river running to the right, ran out on the high embankment at Mack's Ford, and so across by Half Mile Trestle Bridge.

I kept my eyes ahead; a horrible fear tormented me. That strange, four-times repeated telegram tortured me. The words were constantly in my ears. I heard them in the roar of the rushing train—"Come on, come on, come on!" And those other added words; what could they mean? Why were we to be on our guard? Where could that Lake Train be? Why had they not sent me word? It was a terrible muddle altogether. In nine years' running on railway trains I had never known anything like it. All the messages had come from Linden. The Lindenbury telegrapher I had known for years. His name was Henry Glenning, a tall, brown-bearded man of twenty-nine or thirty. I say I had known him long; I do not mean that I was intimate with him, but that I knew him as one knows the men he meets every day. He was a superior man every way, as we railway men go. We all owned to that in a tacit way, and most of us liked and respected him much. He was the last man on the line that any of us would mistrust. Temperate, punctual, somewhat taciturn, he was always at his post and never made mistakes. Of late, he had grown more quiet than ever; it was evident that some secret trouble was wearing on him. His face had got a careworn look; we noticed a streak of gray here and there in his hair and beard. But, if anything, he was more faithful than ever in his work in the Linden office. Of course, we never spoke to him about the change in him; but we did among ourselves, and were all sorry for him, in our way.

Farley said it was his wife was leading him a sorry life of it. He had married, a year or two before, a girl from Caromel Corners, they said, named Mary Winton, I think. Only the day before, coming down with the Garrow and Glen Kilns Express, I had met Blissom, with the up mail, at Haekerby Station, and said to him:

"What's up with Glenning, now? He looks dreadfully cut up."

Blissom was a Lindenbury man; I lived in Tidewater, myself.

"That Mary Winton's a-leading Glenning a naggy tramp of it, I hear," says Blissom; he knew Mary before she was married. "They do say she's a tarrier to go on when her back's up, and gives it to Glenning all-fired." Blissom was a good fellow, but rough.

But, as I said, Glenning seemed all the more faithful since his home troubles; I never thought of doubting him. So we plunged on through the darkness. We had a passenger car that night, as it uncommonly happened, directly behind the tender. I stood on the forward platform, and kept an anxious lookout. The air was full of a thick drizzle; our speed made a strong west wind there, outside. On we went, keeping our pace well up—we had no right to go ahead of time—through Sadler's Drop, in the Clitheroe Hills, out then into the level country beyond. As the whistle blew for Garrowfield Station, I passed back through the forward car. The telegraph office in Garrowfield is a little east of the platform. Seeing the passengers look hard at me, I then first noticed that my clothes were dripping wet. Near the rear end of the car, an Irish woman sat, with her head on the window, fast asleep. I shook her roughly; I hoped she might get down here. She started up with a confused flutter.

"This Hackerby, sir?"

"Last station back," I said. "You're too far on."

"Ow, thin, an' what'll iver I do?" says she. "Shure, Dennis is afther expictin' of me, an' he'll think I'm kilt intirely."

"You must get off here," I said. "Come, be quick." The train was beginning to slow speed.

"Shure, thin, sir," she pleaded, "It's mesilf has an own sisther, in a laundery in Lindingbarry, itself. If ye'd be so kind to lit me down there. I haven't no money, sir; but I'd bring it ye bright in the marnin'."

"Can't do it," I said. We were close upon the station. I hustled her out, roughly enough, I suppose.

A gentleman, sitting by with his wife, had been watching us. I saw his face fire up as I hustled the woman out. He jumped up and faced me.

"What do you mean?" he says, all hot. "It's a brutal shame to put the woman off in the night, in a strange town, with no money. Here, I'll pay her fare."

I pushed her through the door; gave him no answer. He held me by the arm.

"Your name?" he demanded, sternly. "Mine is Charles Holden. I'll report you."

I was not angry with him—he did not know.

"My name is William Whipple."

I saw a fellow I knew on the platform.

"Caley," I calls, "show this woman a decent lodging. Pay—I'll make it all right."

I telegraphed to Linden:

"Shall I come on? Why don't you send me word of the Lime Lake Mail?

I don't think I breathed till the answer came:

"Come on. Be on your guard. Get here by Ten."

Good heaven!—it was maddening. What did it mean? what could it mean?

I rushed out, waved my arm madly to Morris.

"Go on, there—quick!" I yelled.

I ran ahead, and climbed up on the engine. I looked at my watch. It wanted six minutes of ten! I held the slip before his eyes. His face blanched white as a corpse.

"Good God, Whipple! it's seventy miles an hour!"

"I don't know what it means. It's some mad work. But we've got to obey orders. Drive like h—!"

I ran through the train taking the fares. How could they laugh and talk? Every minute I heard the scream of the train ahead, that I dreaded as I shall never fear death. The cars rocked on the springs. The passengers grew uneasy; the women looked fearfully one to another. Some men expostulated:

"Why are you running so fast? Do you want to murder us all?"

"We are ordered to be at Lindenbury by ten," I said. It wanted just four minutes. I saw the glare of Bell's Rolling Mills flash by—five miles and a half to L.!

I ran forward to the platform of the first car. By the forward door sat a lady, with a child in her lap, asleep—a little fair-haired girl of three or four. I see it as plainly now as I saw it then. I hardly know why, but little things that occurred that night seem burnt into my memory in colors of fire. I lie back now, here on this bed, where I have met, at stranger's hands, more true kindness and Christian courtesy than I had believed in before; and, shutting my eyes, I see that sweet child's face smiling in it's pure dreams, the mother's beautiful face brooding above it with a look of heavenly tenderness and love. I feel the heave of the hurling train, feel the car sway and spring with the terrible speed. I remember all, as I saw it hurrying through the car. I passed out on the platform. It wanted three minutes of ten. I knew we could not make it, though Morris was driving on with every pound of steam. I saw him standing at the levers, brawny and stalwart against the glare of the headlight, flying ahead on the track, one arm raised and grasping the lever, looking steadfastly forward, never turning his head to the right or left. I knew what he looked for—only too well! I shudder and turn sick to think of it now.

Before heaven, it was awful. To stand out there in that rushing whirlwind, clinging as for your life in that swaying, hurling flight; to stare forward into that awful darkness; to strain your sight until you were dizzy and blind, and your eyes were fire; and yet not dare to close them or turn away—deafened and stunned by the terrible jar and roar; heart and pulse faint with a horrible fear—the fear of sudden death!

Was I a coward?—who says it? May he be tried alike! God forgive me—what do I say? Pray heaven, no—that were a fiend's prayer. I do not say I did not care for myself. I did—who cares not for his life that is man? I thought of a little humble home sixty miles behind; of a little brown-faced boy, smiling in happy sleep; of a dear heart bending over the crib, perhaps; sewing by the lonely lamp; praying for me, it might be, out of her pure, true heart. I thought of these, and I prayed to Heaven to spare me to life and love. But more than of this, I say and I know, I thought of the hundreds that trusted to me for their lives—looked to me to see to it that they encountered no needless peril. To strain ahead into that awful gloom—to think and think of those poor souls in my charge—I swear it was torment.

I lost all sense of time and place, in the intense strain of sight and thought. I could not say where we were; it seemed we were running for hours. I knew what I looked to see—what I feared with a horrible dread; I knew only that.

Morris never slackened the pace; he drove his engine on with every pound of power. They tell me we made five miles in half a minute more.

Suddenly we leaped through a belt of deeper gloom; a heavy roll of thunder struck my ears with a stunning crash. I knew it was Merrill's Gap. The road lay level through the plain ahead to Glimmerly Gap beyond. Half of the way was passed; we hurled on; terrible as fate.

Suddenly, out of the blackness of Glimmerly Gap, there flashed—oh God!—a great, white light!

I went in and shut the door.

They must have seen it in my face. When I turned and looked forward again, the lady with the child stood at my side. I shall never forget the look in her face; the child was clasped to her heart. "What is it?" she said.

She spoke in a whisper, more awful than any cry. The two engines screamed like charging demons; wheels reversed, and every brake hard down, we went staggering, shuddering, grinding on to our doom. But, through all that terrible din, I heard that awful whisper from those beautiful, bloodless lips.

I pointed forward to the great, white light, glowing down the line straight upon us.

"It's death," I said.

She answered me not a word. She lifted the child to her face, then clutched it to her heart, "Louise, Louise!" she moaned, and sank back out of my sight.

I stood and looked ahead. At the first alarm, the fireman had jumped. Morris stood to his post. I saw him whistle down brakes, reverse his engine, set his bell ringing, do all that mortal could do. Then he stepped back, steadied himself, and leaped out into the dark. I saw it all; it was only a moment's time.

That terrible white light dashed straight upon us—that awful, blinding glare of death!

I heard a horrid crash, like ten thousand cannon—like the rending of a world. I felt myself lifted and hurled through the air, knocked, battered, pounded, pressed, bruised, twisted, crushed, struck on the back, as with a steam-whirled shaft. Then I was lying on the grass with a blinding glare in my eyes. I heard a low, weak moan. I turned my head—a woman lay close beside me with a child clasped tight to her heart. There was blood on the beautiful lips—both were dead.

I remember no more. Heaven spared me the rest of that horrible night. I was taken up for dead. They brought me here, to St. Stephen's, to this bed, where I have lain these six long months—long months and very weary, though all that gentleness and skillful hands could do has been done for me.

I have the papers with the account of the disaster. There is a sickening list of killed and maimed—so long that I shudder when I look. Among the dead, I read: John Blisson, driver, off duty. Ellen M. Villers and child, Louise, of Glenbrook. Charles K. Holden, President of Clitheroe Bank. He knows me better now—where honor, and a brave, kind heart have found their just reward.

W. T. WHIPPLE.

ST. STEPHEN'S HOSPITAL, 19th October.

From the Tidewater Herald, 23d April.

The wretched operator, Henry C. Glenning, of Lindenbury, whose drunken folly caused the terrible disaster on the T. & L. L. R. R., night before last, hung himself yesterday morning, in a barn near Glimmerly Gap. The evidence at the coroner's inquest went to show that deceased had partaken freely of brandy on the evening of the collision, after he was already in a state of evident intoxication.

In another column of this morning's Herald, we print the only full and reliable lists of the killed and injured. Among the latter, our readers will notice the name of Mrs. Mary W. Glenning, wife of the Lindenbury operator, who received "severe contusions of the head and face," and now lies at a farm house in a critical condition. Thus it strangely happens that the perpetrator of this terrible crime has his own wife for one of his victims. We learn that she intended to have taken the regular Down Night Express: but, being early at the station, caught, most unhappily, the belated Mail. Upon her person was found a through ticket from Hilary, next west of L., to this city. She was escorted, we understand, by a Mr. Mason, an old and esteemed friend of the most unfortunate lady."

J. T. MCKAY.

MENDELSSOHN AND JENNY LIND.

EARLY LIFE OF THE GREAT SINGER.

Mademoiselle Polko's charming "Reminiscences of Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, translated from the German by Lady Wallace," from which we made some extracts upon its original appearance in England, has just been published in beautiful style by Messrs. Leypoldt & Holt, of this city. The following passage relates to the artistic association of the great composer with the great singer:

"During the last winter of Mendelsshon's active labors in the concerts of the Gewandhaus, the apparition of Jenny Lind fell like a ray of light in the chequered world of phenomena.

> "There is a high and holy band
> Whose inspiration needs no guide.
> No ancestry of power and pride,
> To lead them to the promised land."

says Voltaire. And such a being was the fair Swede, whose youthful history Charlotte Birch-Pfeiffer has so poetically described. Even when still a child of three, she seemed the lark of her parents' dusky house; as a girl of nine, she attracted the attention of all lovers of music, and entered the Conservatorium of Stockholm as a pupil, where her charming voice, her fine ear, her marvelous musical memory, her industry, and her captivating modesty, made her the favorite of her singing-master—the most meritorious of musicians and composers—Berg. She appeared in various childish parts, written expressly for her, and the public was enchanted with the silvery tones that streamed from the lips of the little fairy. Probably her continuous studies at so tender an age was the cause of her sudden loss of voice, to the horror of her teacher.

"During four long years did Jenny Lind, with astonishing perseverance, pursue her theoretical and technical musical studies in spite of her organ being almost extinct; and then the full sweet sounds came back almost as suddenly as they had vanished. Her faithful master greeted with delight the melting tones of that sweet voice of which his beloved pupil had been so long deprived, and again brought her forward in triumph before the astonished public. She appeared as Agathe, in Weber's 'Freischütz,' amid an unparalleled storm of applause and delight. But there burned within her soul the longing to learn more, to hear more; the wings of this great artistic soul fluttered impatiently; the limits were too confined; so Jenny Lind went to Paris, in order to study with Manuel Garcia, the accomplished brother of Malibran and Pauline Viardot, those wondrous double stars in the firmament of vocal art. The severance from her home, the fatigue of the journey, and a feeling of isolation affected the tender organ of the young girl to such an extent that the celebrated maestro, after having tried the voice of his new pupil, uttered that well-known verdict. 'Mon enfant, vous n'avez plus de voix! Take entire rest for three months; exercise your voice with caution et puis je seriacharme de vous revoir.'

"A quiet tearful year ensued—a year of hopeless study, of deepest sorrow and ardent longing for home. After the lapse of three months Jenny Lind began to study, with incomparable energy, under the direction of Garcia, day by day, shedding tears on her pillow at night, and dreaming of her distant home; but, amid all her dreams, she seemed always to hear that pitiless voice, saying, 'mon enfant, vous n'avez plus de voix!' Like the young palm-tree, however, under the pressure of the heavy rock, which every one thought must have crushed it, so did this regal talent continue to shoot upward to the blue sky, under the weight of home sickness. Still, no word of praise escaped Garcia's lips; he only commended the industry, perseverance, and the facile organ of his pale, quiet pupil, whose voice appeared to him irremediably injured and feeble. Many other brilliant vocal talents, too, were at that very time blooming in his parterre, before whose glowing tints the delicate water-lily paled.

"It was reserved for a grand and fervent artistic soul to discover her value, and to transport her from darkness into light.

Searching artistic eyes found her out; the most exquisite artistic ear felt the ineffable magic of her voice. To Giacomo Meyerbeer the world is indebted for the gift of Jenny Lind. He heard her one evening sing Alice's aria in 'Robert.' 'Va, va, dit-elle, mon enfant!' and was deeply moved. No other voice had ever conveyed this sweet and tender entreaty of a dying mother to her son with such touching fervor; it became almost a prayer, and the composer of 'Robert' felt that it was tones such as these that had floated in his soul when he wrote down that 'last greeting, from a departing soul.'

"Jenny Lind now returned for a short space to her northern home in order previously to study the German language in Dresden, and to prepare in entire seclusion for her first appearance in Berlin.

"In October, 1844, she made her debut in the Royal Opera House as 'Norma,' and then as Vielka, in Meyerbeer's 'Feldlager,' exciting a degree of enthusiasm quite unparalleled on these boards either before or since.

"When she appeared in Leipzig, on December 4, 1845, the concert public were in a state of feverish excitement; and when at length she came forward on the raised platform, a slender girlish form, with luxuriant fair hair, dressed in pink silk, and white and pink camellias on her breast and in her hair, in all the chaste grace of her deportment, and so utterly devoid of all pretension, the spell was dissolved, and the most joyous acclamations ensued.

"Jenny Lind only looked beautiful when she sang, and also in the portrait of her done by Magnus in Berlin, now in the possession of Professor Wichman, and which may well be called a glorified one. She was pale, and had no freshness of complexion, nor were her features either regular or in any way remarkable. Music alone, and nothing else, transfigured her countenance so wonderfully; it then became actually transparent, the soul within shining brightly through the earthly veil in the most enchanting manner.

"And it was thus she sang, on that evening in the Gewandhaus, Bellini's 'Casta Diva,' the duet from the 'Montecchi e Capuletti,' 'Se fuggire,' with Miss Dolby, the letter aria from Mozart's 'Don Juan,' and two of Mendelssohn's songs, 'Auf Flügeln des Gesanges,' and 'Leise zieht durch mein Gemüth.'

"I cannot remember how I got home after that concert; I only know that I trembled and wept, and never closed my eyes all night. It was not, however, the 'Casta Diva,' with all its pearly adornment and florid graces, not the lovely Giuhetta, nor the stately Donna Anna who haunted my thoughts, and whom I seemed ever to hear; it was exclusively the ineffably sweet, ethereal, almost unearthly; 'By the first rose thou hap'st to meet.' And what must Mendelssohn have felt, who was seated at the piano, accompanying the singer, and from whose soul this lovely flower of song had sprung!"

ALFRED THE GREAT.

NO. I.

THE WORLD'S HISTORY ILLUSTRATED IN ITS GREAT CHARACTERS

Here we come to the very best type of civilized man, and the most exalted Christian that the middle ages produced. Born in barbaric times, it is surprising to find how little of the barbarian there was in Alfred. His intellectual tone of mind, and the truly Christ-spirit which he sought to inculcate, is in happy concord with the enlightened and advanced views of modern times. We can endorse nearly all of Alfred's philosophic conceptions of religion to-day, and his state policy and illustration of just Monarchical economy stand out as the brightest example in the history of kings. James Stuart's execrable economy of kingcraft and divine right of princes is put to shame by the enlightened views of the great Saxon lawgiver. He conceived the grand thought that to be truly great was to be truly good, and that goodness should be the attribute of the king preëminently. This goodness was his highest divine right to reign over his fellows. The king must be a father to his people or he was no proper king. This view of the Saxon lawgiver has a very touching and practical illustration in his counsel to his son and successor, Edward, just before his death.

"Thou, my dear son," said this wise man, "sit thee now beside me, and I will deliver thee two instructions. My son, I feel that my hour is coming. My countenance is wan. My days are almost done. We must now part. I shall to another world and thou shalt be left alone in all my wealth. I pray thee (for thou art my dear child), strive to be a father and a lord to thy people. Be thou the children's father and the widow's friend. Comfort thou the poor and shelter the weak; and, with all thy might, right that which is wrong. And, son, govern thyself by law; then shall the Lord love thee, and God, above all things, be thy reward. Call thou upon Him to advise thee in all thy need, and so shall He help thee, the better to compass that which thou wouldst."

Here is political wisdom of the very highest order. No kingcraft is in this. It is sound state-policy grandly noble in its philosophy of a sovereign's duties and supremely touching in its beautiful simplicity.

Alfred's conceptions are purely Saxon. There is no priestly mysticism of divine right, but a thorough English view of religion and human liberties. Indeed we see how natural it is for that nation which brought forth an Alfred to also bring forth constitutional governments, and lastly republican institutions. Alfred is no accident of his race, but its legitimate offspring, and his genius and character are English to the last degree. He is, moreover, Protestant; as much so as Oliver Cromwell, John Milton and the rest of the Puritan demolishers of kingcraft of England and America. His legacy of wisdom to his son Edward, as well as the literary and philosophical fragments which he has left, manifest that healthy simplicity so characteristic of Protestantism in its religious and political economies. That grand mysticism of the Romish priesthood, which awed nations and reduced them to mental and spiritual servitude is altogether un-English and un-American; and that it is so, we have only to go back nearly a thousand years to Alfred to find the proof thereof. George Washington himself was not a better illustration that the Saxon race are in their genius both Protestant and republican than was the immortal lawgiver of England. Absolutism and despotism are as unnatural to it, as kingcraft must ever be to the American mind. This race is, therefore, the proper parent of liberties and human progress, as much in its own essential nature and genius as it has been in the actual facts of history.

Mark how the great Alfred places the law above kings: "And, son, govern thyself by law." Here is the opposite conception to that blasphemous assumption "The king can do no wrong." "The law is not made for kings." "The king is above the law!" Such doctrines are monstrous even in barbarous ages but they are supremely repulsive when attempted to be applied in modern times. They have cursed the world for ages and would curse the world for ages yet to come, were they still maintained. But they are irreconcilable with the Saxon genius, whether applied in Church or State, and Alfred only anticipated a universal sentiment of his race when he placed the law of right and truth above the throne.

We have seen that Charlemagne, in working out the new civilization of the world, was a necessity to Popes; but Alfred the Great had a higher character and a diviner mission. He was a necessity to Christ, for he was more like Christ in his genius and nature than Charlemagne. The one gave the imperial tone to the world, and it was warlike and barbaric, true it was more than up to the state of the popes, but nowhere near the state of Jesus; but Alfred gave the world its christianizing and humanizing tone. The one was something of a Cæsar and though he blended the priest with the king, which made him also something of a David, he better illustrated the imperial potency of a Christendom, than its divine spirit of love and its ultimate aims—human good; but Alfred was truly an apostle of humanity; as a lawgiver he was the prophet of constitutional rights both for subjects and rulers, and, as the king, he was a witness that the sovereign should be a father to his people. That part of civilization, then foreshadowed in Alfred the Great, was a radical necessity, not only in the Christian economy, but also in human development. This is a necessity independent of Christ, though since he has come, we take him as the type of all the ultimates of good ordained for man.

Alfred, and the part of civilization which he represents, we consider, belong to the advanced conditions of the race. He is, very properly, raised up by Providence after Charlemagne, for, though we do not claim for him any preördination, nor imagine that any of these great men of history are brought up by Heaven in a special and definite design, yet the course of human progress cast them up on the surface of events, and, in a general sense, the times may be said to bring forth the men. Alfred and a Saxon race were among the world's necessities, as much as Christ and Christianity; and Alfred and a Saxon race have been among the mightiest and most blessed facts of history. Without them indeed Christ and his civilization would not stand to-day where now they stand. Charlemagne and the French nation could no more have filled in the better part of human progress and brought forth a Protestant Christianity than did Napoleon and his grand army of conquest. That part specially belonged to the nation which brought forth an Alfred and a George Washington; for, though separated by ages, these two men and their works were the natural outgrowths and manifestations of the Saxon people and genius.

More than to any other nation we believe that Providence gave to England and, after her, to America—the lands of Alfred and Washington—the mission to work out human liberties and a Protestant Christianity. And, just at this point we are brought to the difference between a philosophical infidelity to which France and Germany have come from despotic forms of Church and State and that enlightened faith which always characterized England and America. The continent of Europe, in embracing Christianity, received it more in the grandeur of ancient superstitions and priestly mysticism belonging to heathenism rather than in that beautiful simplicity of a divine spirit and principle exemplified in Jesus and the fishermen of Galilee. Indeed the Roman and the Grecian genius which in former civilizations had received the finest elaborations both imperially and intellectually, had demanded as a necessary condition of acceptance a Christianity as imposing as the Roman empire, and as captivating as Grecian philosophy and art. A magnificent priesthood was, therefore, necessary, and a magnificent religion, with its trappings and tinsel. Charlemagne rising up, after the dissolution of the Roman empire, as the sucessor of the Cæsar's rule and the Cæsar's mission, both to the nations and to the Church perpetuated the genius of empire and Christianity blended, and continental Europe was typed with absolutisms both of Church and State. To this Romish form of civilization represented by Charlemagne and his successors in conjunction with popedom, there was needed another form to balance the world, and finally to save it by securing to it human liberties and the simplicity of the Christ-spirit and principle. That better form was the Protestant or Saxon, which is very much the same in effect and nationally—not ecclesiastically speaking—Alfred the Great and George Washington are the two proper types—the one the beginning, the other the culmination. From Alfred to Washington, the genius which inspired them, as the two "Fathers of their country," has traveled persistently to human liberties and a broad vigorous Christianity, which has much of faith but little of priestcraft and absolutism in it. On the other hand, from the successors of Charlemagne and the successors of St. Peter, have come absolutisms of Church and State, which, finding an explosion—not a solution—in the revolutions of modern times, loses religious faith in German mysticism and French infidelity. These are the issues of two civilizations—the Catholic and the Protestant—the absolute and the republican. Let us go back to the writings of the great Saxon lawgiver, and see how much like a republican George Washington he evolved his economy of government, and how much like a Puritan he manifested Christianity. Here is Alfred's exposition of divine right,—it is that of goodness:

> If then it should ever happen, as it very seldom happens, that power and dignity come to good men, and to wise ones, what is there then worth liking but the goodness and dignity of these persons; of the good king, not of the power? Hence power is never a good, unless he be good that has it; and that is the good of the man, not of the power. If power be goodness, it is so far this, that no man by his dominion comes to the virtues, and to merit; but by his virtues and merit he comes to dominion and power. Thus no man is better for his power; but if he be good, it is from his virtues that he is good. From his virtues he becomes worthy of power, if he be worthy of it.

This is eminently republican in principle and strikingly illustrative of the Saxon or Protestant conception of Christianity even as far back as Alfred himself, and that simple thought that good was the only divinity either in Church or State, in after ages led the men of England under Cromwell to demolish kingcraft and priestcraft with one mighty blow; since which, the Saxon race have never fairly set either up again. The following is another passage from Alfred, expressive of his views and feelings as a king, and containing an allusion to his hesitation in accepting the crown of England:

> O Reason, thou knowest that covetousness and the possession of this earthly power, I did not well like, nor strongly desired at all this earthly kingdom, but, oh! I desired materials for the work that I was commanded to do. This was that I might unfractiously and becomingly steer and rule the power that was committed to me. * * * * * * *
> These are the materials of a king's work, and his tools to govern with; that he have his land fully peopled; that he should have prayer-men and army-men and workmen. * * *
> "For this purpose I desired materials to employ that power with, that my skill and power might not be given up and concealed. But every virtue and every power will soon become oldened and silenced if they be without wisdom. Therefore no man can bring forth any virtue without wisdom, hence whatsoever is done through folly, man can never make that to be virtue.
> This I can now truly say, that I have desired to live worthily while I lived, and after my life to leave to the men that should be after me my remembrance in good works.

Here is another passage from the literary works of the English lawgiver, upon the equality of man and what constitutes nobility.

> What! all men have a like beginning; because they all come of one father and mother. They are all yet born alike. This is no wonder; because God alone is the father of all creatures. He made them all and governs all. He gave us the sun's light, and the moon, and placed all the stars. He created men on the earth. He has connected the soul and the body by His power, and made all men equally noble in their first nature. Why, then, do ye arrogate over other men for your birth without works? Now you can find none unnoble. But all are equally noble, if you will think of your beginning, creation, and the Creator, and afterwards of your own nativity; yet the right nobility is in the mind. It is not in the flesh as we said before. But every man that is at all subjected to his vices, forsakes his creator and his nobility; and thence becomes more ignoble than if he were not nobly born.

Alfred entertained the very lofty view that no nation could be great whose subjects did not possess the fullest extent of constitutional liberties, and pursuing the same vein of philosophic logic, no king could be truly great, who governed a servile people. So impressed was he with this judgment that he has applied it to God to affirm his wise policy in permitting man to do good or evil, inferring that even God could be only truly great in ruling over free men. The passage is in the form of dialogue.

I said, "I am sometimes very much disturbed." Quoth he, "At what?" I answered:

"It is at this which thou sayest, that God gives to everyone freedom to do evil as well as good, whichsoever he will." * *

"Then," quoth he, "I may very easily answer thee this remark. How would I now look to you, if there were any very powerful king, and he had no freemen in all his kingdom, but that all were slaves?"

"Then," said I, "It would not be thought by me right, nor also reasonable, if servile men only should attend upon me."

"Then," quoth he, "It would be more unnatural, if God in all his kingdom, had no free creatures under his power. Therefore he made two rational creatures free; angels and men. He gave them the great gift of freedom. Hence they could do evil as well as good, whichsoever they would. He gave this very fixed gift, and a very fixed law with that gift to every man unto his end."

Thus we see that Alfred the Great was eminently Protestant and republican in his conceptions of religion and State government. The nation which brought forth an Alfred was certain to enlarge human liberties, and in time, work out a Christianity which should embody the noble simplicity of the spirit and gospel of Jesus, stripped of all mysticism and priestcraft. And thus it has been: Protestant constitutional monarchy came first, and then in America, the still grander exposition of Protestant republicanism. Alfred the great and George Washington are at length on one platform.

ABOUT THE SOUTH SEA ISLANDERS.

BY MRS. L. B. PRATT.

We reprint the following from the Phrenological Journal:

MANNER OF BURYING THE DEAD.

When one of the islanders dies, the relatives and friends assemble and mourn. they commence with a low wail which rises and increases in volume till it can be heard half a mile. These exercises continue for some time, but are suspended whenever a new friend enters the house. Then they begin to eulogize the dear departed. Their excited imaginations and overwrought tenderness lead them to portray in the most glowing terms, the many excellencies of the deceased. Each in his turn extols and magnifies the virtues of the lost one. The more immediate relatives, hearing these things repeated over and over, are more deeply impressed than ever with a sense of their irreparable loss, and again they all resume their loud wailings. A listener, though a stranger to the bereaved, can not refrain from tears. These exercises sometimes last for several hours.

Another of their peculiarities is the bringing of presents to the dead. Each friend brings a piece of cloth, and every piece is bound about the body of the dead, often making a package the size of a common barrel. This envelop answers the purpose of a coffin. The native cloth is not porous, and when made thick, will not admit air. Mr. Pratt knew a man who wrapped his deceased wife in such quantities of tapa (native cloth), that he was enabled to keep her body a whole year on his bedstead, where he slept by her side. At length the sorrowing man was persuaded to bury his dead.

It was a custom on Tuboui to leave a habitation where a beloved relative had died, never entering it again, but going away and building another. I went into a house on that island where, five years before, a young girl fourteen years old had died. Her parents had immediately moved to another village, and occupied the house no more. There was standing in it a large mahogany chest, containing everything that formerly belonged to the beloved daughter, even her books and the toys of her childhood. The house was considered as the grave of the departed. Her mother, true to her own affectionate nature, cut off her beautiful, long, glossy hair, spread a thick covering over herself, sat down upon the ground, and refused all consolation. Mr. Pratt, being absent at the time, returned while she was indulging her inordinate grief. He went to her, told her that the Lord would be displeased with such excessive repinings; that she must arise and be baptized, and she would find peace and comfort. She harkened to his words, embraced the gospel, and was ever after a faithful member of the church. She had one daughter left, an interesting girl, whom we all admired for her beauty and modest deportment. Her mother watched over her with all the solicitude that a cultivated mother could manifest toward a beloved daughter in our civilized country. The religion of Jesus Christ refines and purifies the hearts of those who live for it, whether white or black.

MARRIAGE CUSTOMS.

The parents make contracts of marriage for their children while they are very young. This is kept a secret from them until they are of suitable age to understand and appreciate it. Under some circumstances they frequently come together and live very happily. At other times, the knowledge of the contract creates an aversion, either in one or both, and they refuse to be joined. Very few of the elderly people know their own ages. Some plant a tree at the birth of a child. They are particular in observing the changes which take place in the appearance of the bark of that tree from one season to another, and in that way determine the age of the child. The young children learn to write with great facility. Another of their peculiarities is changing their names whenever an important event transpires in their history. If a child sickens and dies, the father perhaps assumes the name of the diseased, and ever after bears it. A child fell from a tree and was killed, and the mother took the name of the tree.

REAL WEALTH.

The following is from the pen of an esteemed correspondent at Eagleville. We do not give his name, but many know him "A. Little," be the same more or less. Shall be glad to hear from him again.—Ed.

The means of gratifying all the wants of our fallen natures is not real wealth. It is but the floating within our reach the passing substance of transitory things, in which we can take but a short interest; for, if they do not leave us before, at death we must leave them.

There is no real wealth without eternal possession; it is not affected by the changes of mortality; it consists of pure affections and holy desires: of knowledge that cannot pass away, and which connects the mortal with the immortal, and a possession of the keys of power to open the way to eternal progress and development.

Viewed in this light, many who think they are rich will, in the end, find themselves poor, very poor; and some who are now thought to be poor, will prove to be rich in the elements of life eternal.

If the source of our happiness passes away, then must our joy cease. The cottage of the laborer is as capable of being the abode of felicity as the palace of the noble. It may exist in the humble cot as well as in the luxurious home of the wealthy.

There is no easy road to lasting peace and joy. There are no blessings without labor and sacrifice; no pleasure without pain; no sources of joy like those which we know cannot pass away; and we can realize no other heaven than that we fit ourselves for.

The blessings of life are more equally divided than many suppose. Men, whether rich or poor, generally have about as much trouble as they feel the ability to endure. If there are exceptions, they are as often with the poor as the rich. None get through this world without sharing the evil with the good. This is the order of creation. This is man's destiny, without which he would not feel the measure of his creation.

MUSIC IN THE SOUTHERN SETTLEMENTS.

NUMBER ONE.

THE CHOIR AND BAND OF AMERICAN FORK.

We have long desired to become thoroughly acquainted with the progress of music in the settlements; and, in our tour through the South, we have taken every opportunity to hear for ourselves the advancement of the art.

When visiting towns and cities outside of Salt Lake, we have endeavored to stimulate both the local bands and choirs, by inviting them to appear before the public in conjunction with our professionals, in giving musical entertainments; for experience has proved to us that the mixing of amateurs with professionals is the best plan to stimulate them to the study of music.

The first choir and band that drew our attention was at American Fork. On conversing with Bishop Harrington, we found that he was not only a true lover of sweet sounds, but was anxious to inspire others with the same feeling; he not only sanctioned the study of music, but has stimulated his band and choir to excel, by attending their rehearsals; and, notwithstanding that the Bishop is a great admirer of good melodies and varied harmonic combinations—to be found in classical compositions,—he is fond of a joke, and can hear without a shudder a good comic song, when judiciously rendered.

On our first visit to American Fork, we were much pleased by the willingness and promptitude of Mr. Hunter, the choir conductor, and Mr. Grant, the band master, in coming forward to render their assistance to the profession, without fee or reward, in a public entertainment for the amusement of their fellow-citizens. In fact, very little notice was required in bringing together an audience. The united exertions of choir conductor, band master, and their members, gave more publicity, and excited more interest in the settlement than five hundred bills would have done posted against the walls, when coupled with the Bishop's remarks at a public meeting. This unselfish assistance, is worthy of notice, and amateurs in general should follow the like example instead of expecting pay for their services, when the instruction they receive by mixing with professionals at public entertainments is an adequate compensation for their trouble, not to mention the amusement they have themselves at the entertainment.

Should they have to devote their time for the purpose, when it should be employed in their daily avocations, then they should be remunerated for that loss of time.

In returning to our subject, we must say we were also much pleased on finding that a number in both band and choir were creditable sight-readers. The advantage of knowledge, experience and practice in music is above all things for perfect rendition. Look at the time that is saved by the study of reading music at sight. There are many passages in musical compositions that the ear cannot fathom; and more especially in classical music, which are next to an impossibility to be caught up by ear, without an expense of time and practice. With a good conductor, a choir of perfect sight-readers, the interpretation of the works of the giant authors are rendered practicable.

There are two ladies in the American Fork choir, who are very creditable vocal amateur sight readers. Their names are Mrs. Evans and Mrs. Featherstone. They sing duettos very prettily together, and the qualities of Mrs. Evans, we have proved. At the last concert which we gave at American Fork, we sang a duetto, sung by the Rainer family when in England, —which composition is out of print; Mrs. Evans only ran it over twice at a rehearsal, and we sang it at night at the concert, though the execution of that piece was not so very simple, yet she gave much satisfaction.

We have also heard the choir rehearse anthems somewhat classical in their construction and harmonic combinations, and we have been told by the conductor that many of the members were reading them at first sight. We do not assert that the interpretation of the poet and musician was fully brought out by them, because that would require good professional rendering, but the performance at sight was creditable for amateurs, and proved what could be done by perseverance and practice.

Mr. Grant, the choir master, has opened a small musical establishment for the sale of cheap musical instruments and works of instruction, and he told me, when on my last visit, that he was pretty well patronized; and many were studying the divine art for their own and their fellow-citizen's amusement.

This is progression.

MURPHY AND MACK'S MINSTRELS have just closed a successful engagement in the Salt Lake Theater. The Daily Telegraph and the Evening News have written extensively, though not very critically, upon their popular musical performances. The Musical Editor promises a review next week of the Murphy and Mack Minstrels, and especially of the rival performance between Mr. Mark Croxall, of this city, and the celebrated cornet player, R. W. Kohler.

PLEASE FORWARD AT ONCE.—Such of our subscribers, whose subscriptions are now due, are requested to forward the pay at once, as we need it. The present great dearth of means has kept back so much of the pay due to us that scarcely one subscription in four has yet reached us. We blame no one for this, but we ask all to remember that our expenses are very great and that every little helps.

Such of our friends as have PROMISED TO PAY AT CONFERENCE TIME, are requested not to forget their promises, as we RELY UPON THEM.

THE "JOSEPHITE" PLATFORM.

Lately, two sons of the prophet Joseph, Alexander and David Smith, have arrived in our city on a mission from a little body in Illinois. We have conversed with these young men, and are of opinion that they are conscientious and desire in their way to do good, but are singularly ignorant of the spirit of their father's movement as presented to the world at large, and accepted by ourselves. On this account we think their experience here may be useful to them, as they have evidently, never yet looked at their father's mission from our stand-point and are therefore, unconscious how monstrous their propositions look to us. For their sakes, as much as our own, we shall portray their proposition in our own colors, that they may see how it looks to those who have, for over a score of years, fought the battle of their father's movement in this land. If satire or ridicule appears to edge our pen, it will be, simply, because the movement they unfortunately represent is a satire on itself and ridiculous in its own right. To us, the "Josephite" movement is one thing and the sons of Joseph another. They are its disciples and not its originators. As to Joseph Smith, the head of the system itself, we have reason to believe him honorable and highminded. His assertions of his father's non-practice of polygamy—so inexplicable to our people—being to our minds the unfortunate result of the tutorings and impressions of his early youth. We say this fearlessly, having long since got past the idea that everybody who opposes us is wicked and corrupt. At the same time, just as fearlessly we wish to exhibit to our misguided brethren the inconsistency of their platform as it appears to us.

As we understand it, these sons of the Prophet have visited our city on the grateful mission to inform those members of the church who maintained at the peril of their lives, the organization of their father's church when it was threatened with destruction, that they are under the curse of God for so doing. They come to tell them that they should have allowed the organization to have gone to pieces, and that they, and the whole church, should have waited, lifeless, dead, disorganized and unknown in the world, until their brother Joseph, then a boy, grew up to be a man. They also come to tell all who joined this church since Brigham Young has presided over it, that all we have felt in our souls as tokens of a divine movement in this land, has been delusive, and only so much leading us to a sink of apostacy and the work of the devil. This is strong language, but it is what their doctrines practically amount to. After this statement of our condition, apparently ignorant of the inconsistency of their proposition, they request us still to believe in their father's mission—not perceiving that when we cut out of our lives all the spiritual testimony that brought us here, they and their father are cut out with it.

This view of the case, however, strong as it is, only represents a little of the folly to which we are invited by our young friends. To show fully the weakness of their position, in our eyes, we must go back and exhibit the character of the movement presented to us by their father, and compare it with the programme and organization they offer to us in exchange.

When, nearly forty years ago, Joseph the Prophet presented himself before the world, it was with the unqualified assertion that he was sent to open a dispensation of Revelation which should never be closed or interrupted in its progress, until the institutions of the heavenly world were everlastingly established upon the earth.

Whether his Elders traveled through Great Britain or America, they called special attention to this point. Well do we all remember, with what prolonged emphasis and unction, they dwelt upon the idea that such of the ancient church as thought their day of revelation would never cease, were deceived—for an apostacy had to come in their case. But not so with this dispensation. Here was to be the grand contrast. No apostacies—except such futile ones that the church would easily triumph over—were ever to occur again.

All who were members of the church in America or England, in the days of Joseph, know this was the programme announced, and to which we pledged our faith. On the strength of this statement, the thousands of Mormonism joined the church abroad, and on the strength of it, we have all followed the organization to these mountains. To this the entire Territory will bear witness—whether from this country, England, Wales or Scotland, it is the same. We never knew or heard any other doctrine; and now, at this late hour, after from twenty to forty years uninterrupted reliance on this great proposition of the Prophet Joseph, along come two of his sons to tell us, in effect, that their father and his Elders grossly deceived us—to assure us his mission did not fulfill its programme, but fell through; that a grand apostacy and breaking up of the entire organization of the church did take place—no matter how much denied; that all the predictions about the "fullness of times" and the "last dispensation which was never to fall away" were mere flourish,—in a word, that the church was based and extended and flourished on a lie;—which church, in the innocence of their souls, they ask us still to accept as divine.

Let us sketch the history of the little body that send us this manifesto: Some nine or ten years ago, a few of the former members of the church in Illinois persuaded the eldest son, Joseph, to accept the presidency of their body. Up to this hour, the world was utterly unconscious of their presence as, indeed, it is to day—with the exception of so much notoriety, as their opposition to Brigham Young, and the simple name of Joseph Smith's son attaches to them.

This little body was in existence some time before they could induce the son of Joseph to attach himself to their organization. When he did so, he was followed in due time by his brothers, Alexander and David. The "Reörganized Church of Latter-day Saints," consequently, was not started by "young" Joseph Smith or his brothers,—they are simply converts to it. It was, therefore, no church started by the Revelations of God and angels;—the church came first and the revelations—two we believe in number—have arrived since

After an existence of about nine years, this "quiet inoffensive" little system, as it is generally termed, when an occasional reference is made to it in the East, although presided over by a "prophet" and "twelve apostles" and heralded, with a grand statement about "revelations and latter-day glory," has not made half as many converts, or stir in the world, as plain, unadorned John Wesley, who pretended to no special inspiration, did in a couple of months; for the bulk of its disciples are simply such as were converted to "Mormonism" years ago. In a word, we do this "reörganized church" no injustice when we say that it has not made America feel its presence as much in nine years as Joseph the Prophet did in one. They only come up into sight once in a while, when some editor discussing the future of Utah, incidentally informs his readers that there is a society in Illinois who do not believe in Brigham Young or polygamy; when they receive a patronizing pat on the head in passing, and are again forgotten.

This statement may appear overcolored to our "Josephite" friends, but it is true to our experience. In our Eastern trips on Magazine business, we have, personally, traveled seven thousand miles through the United States without hearing a solitary reference to their existence. Now we, by no means, intend to infer that obscurity in the beginning of a system, argues against its divinity; but a Divine mission certainly will have vitality and force enough to make the world aware of its presence; and this, the "Josephite" movement has certainly failed to accomplish.

It is an obscure system of this kind, then, that calls upon us to throw away our faith in the imperishable nature of Joseph's movement and accept their discordant and powerless one in exchange. Had brothers David and Alexander gone to a strange people who never heard their father's programme, we could comprehend their position; or did they come to ask us to *dis*believe in him, we could understand that. But to ask those whose souls have been animated with the sublime faith of an eternal system let down from the upper worlds, never more to return until humanity was beautified and lifted up to God, to throw away their faith in the power of the Heavenly World to carry through a grand movement in spite of every obstacle when once begun; and believe in the Divinity of a movement that belied all its promises and was broken up and perished ere it had scarce commenced, is to ask us to reject the whole thing as a humbug. The fact is, we neither want Joseph Smith's system or that of his sons', if their statement of the apostacy be true.

Among other pleasant little things growing out of this doctrine of an apostacy, which brothers David and Alexander bring, they come to tell us that God "CUT US OFF WITH OUR DEAD" about twenty years ago, without previously mentioning the fact to us. We cannot help thinking how well a people "cut off from God" can feel, providing they have plenty to eat and don't know it. Now that we do know it, however, we do not feel particularly alarmed, although "our dead" may; for upon them and their still dead-er ancestors, who can scarcely be responsible for our sins, this sort of thing must be uncommonly hard. If they are not astonished at this kind of treatment, it must be because they are used to it.

To prove the "cutting off" of Brigham and his followers, a passage from the Doctrine and Covenants is brought forward, which says in effect, that, if, after having had "sufficient time" to build a temple for baptisms for the dead, the church should fail to comply, they should be rejected. But there is another passage in the same Revelation, which is not brought forward, but, upon which, a very wise silence is preserved, which brings in a proviso—that if "their enemies come upon them and hinder them from performing that work," the Lord will no longer require the completion of the temple, but accept of their work as it is. How the poor Saints went to with their might; how, with sword in one hand and the trowel in the other, they built that house; how their enemies did "come upon them and hinder them," as anticipated in the Revelation; how they, nevertheless, through blood and tribulation, consecrated it, incomplete as it necessarily was, and thus bore testimony of their zeal and devotion, is no more mentioned by "Josephite" preachers, than is the statement of the Revelation that in such case, the threatened rejection would all fall to the ground.

Next to the apostacy of the church, the falsity of polygamy is the text of our young friends. Not that they specially exert themselves to prove it contrary to the Bible or to nature. Their especial zeal is spent in trying to prove that their father did not practise polygamy, basing their arguments on certain assertions in the Book of Mormon, Doctrine and Covenants and in the Times and Seasons.

Now, we all know, that before to-day, in this very city, members of this very "Josephite" party have admitted that Joseph Smith did practise polygamy, and have absolutely argued that God permitted him to be killed as a punishment for so doing; but we will pass this contradiction and muddling of their own statements, and accept their present view. It is just as good as any. Here, in this city, with a dozen women who were married to Joseph Smith; with scores who were married by him, personally, to other men in polygamy; with hundreds who were taught the doctrine from his own lips, they expect us to believe their father never taught it to the church.

Their grand argument in opposition to this mass of living testimony, is found in certain letters of Joseph and Hyrum Smith, which simply prove that they consider the denial of the principle for a time preferable to bringing destruction and death to thousands. But what does this amount to? David and Alexander can prove Joseph Smith denied polygamy, and we can prove he practised it. Both are true. He both practised and denied it. Why not believe both facts? There is no question about either. The only point left for anybody to decide is whether he acted wisely in so doing—whether, in fact, it would have been wiser to have acknowledged polygamy and periled the lives of his people, or retained the fact until he believed he could safely announce it. It is simply a matter of opinion upon which everybody must judge for themselves; and Joseph Smith had as good a right to judge for himself as any other man upon whose shoulders rested the safety of thousands.

Years ago, the mass of this people accepted both these facts, as well as another one: that former revelations of Joseph's confined a man to one wife. The only difference between ourselves and the "Josephite" faction on that subject being, that we have grown to understand that Revelations are progressive, while our Plano opponents are ignorant of this great truth. If they do not want to waste their time and ours, let them cease the stringing together of texts, and prove that God does not give Revelations to suit the Times; and when they have succeeded, we will worship a wooden God in preference to such a Deity—one who belies every instinct of light he has placed within us.

We want to tell our misguided brethren in Illinois, and elsewhere, that the truth of polygamy does not rest upon Revelations; it rests upon the facts of human nature. If it is not possible for one man to purely love two women, and for two women to purely love and live with that man, then all the belchings or thunders of Sinia cannot make it right to practise polygamy. Revelations can bring a truth to light, but they cannot create it. Either Polygamy is in harmony with our true natures or it is not. If it is not, all the Revelations of Joseph Smith or any other prophet are not worth the snap of our fingers. What matters it then, whether Joseph did or did not deny it. Is it true is all we ask. Supposing Joseph Smith had revealed that Geology was a true science, and that his sons could now show us a ton of his letters declaring it was false, what should we care while the rocks remained as evidences of the science? We should go to the earth's strata to test the question, and not to his letters or Revelations. And so with polygamy: Joseph but revealed a principle, and we now go to the facts of men and women's natures for its confirmation or rejection.

So much we say as to Polygamy resting upon letters or Revelations. As to the bare question whether Joseph Smith practiced it, no court of justice ever had as much living testimony to prove any man ever did anything, as we can present to prove his endorsement of polygamy. His wives that he lived with, his friends that he tutored in it, all are present for reference. But Alexander and David declare that no amount of evidence shall convince them. While in their present frame of mind, we do not see how their own father could convince them upon his oath. It is certainly evident that, could he reappear upon earth with a score of wives and a hundred children, they would still refer to the Times and Seasons to prove it was all delusion. There is one comfort in all this, however: should the government ever want to handle our people for polygamy, Alexander and David can prove—notwithstanding their wives—that they never practiced it, having, in times past, denied it equally with Joseph Smith, they ought to be able to clear them on the same grounds.

And now let us say a word as to Heirship and Presidency. We have heard a great deal said about Joseph Smith of Plano being entitled to lead the church, because he was the son of the martyred Joseph. So far as any of Joseph Smith's sons are concerned, we simply hope and pray that they may so far grow out of their present position as to obtain both honor and influence among the people to whom their labors legitimately belong; but if we know the true feeling of our brethren, it is that they never intend Joseph Smith's, nor any other man's son, to preside over them, simply because of his sonship. The principle of heirship has cursed the world for ages, and with our brethren we expect to fight it till, with every other relic of tyranny, it is trodden under foot.

What the world needs is not heirship, but inspiration, power, force, life, genius. Can any man give it these, he is called of God, and his ordination is in his heart and brain. When God wants any other man to lead this people, he will bear this royal signet of divinity or he and the people that follow him will wither up together.

In passing, let us say, in the kindest feeling, to these sons of Joseph, whom we love for the good their father's mission has brought to us: you bear an honorable name, but, for all the influence and respect it commands, you are indebted to Utah and its people. Had this community allowed the church to have gone to pieces, when the present members of the "Josephite" body scattered in despair, who would know or care anything about Joseph Smith or his sons to-day? Who, after the leader of an organization had been shot in jail, his disciples scattered, and his system broken up and silent for sixteen years, would have gone hunting for his children, had not the system they have been taught to despise perpetuated his organization, and kept their name before the world?

In sending their missionaries to us, this little "Josephite" band at least show their innocence and simplicity of character. We see in a moment that they know nothing of the liberal and progressive character of the scheme we embraced. True, they talk to us of a church of Revelations that are "going to come;" but they are not to be progressive Revelations. When they do come, they are to harmonize with all past revelations, as if we want Revelations to harmonize with all the misconceptions and traditions, more or less mixed up with the Revelations of every prophet that has ever appeared. What we need are Revelations that will break the fetters of the past, treat all previous prophets and times, as children and days of infancy, and sweep on to those grand conceptions of God, a future life and progress, that are now breaking in upon the human mind. The creed of brother Joseph would tie us down to his father's Revelations whether they denied the testimony of our eyes as seen in the rocks, or the evidence of our senses as to what was babyish in Moses or the prophets. They would pin our faith to the story of the Garden of Eden, with its dust-made man. About twenty years ago, some of us could have listened to the twaddle about Adam and Eve in the Garden, and God Almighty discovering to His surprise that among all the bears, and lions, and tigers, there was not found a suitable companion for Adam. Or, to use the words of Moses, himself, after describing the creation of the beasts,—"But for Adam there was not found a help-mate for him"—as if the Almighty might not have known that very well before; unless He supposed that Adam could have taken an Elephant to his bosom, or induced a tiger to prepare his meals. And then, as if struck by a bright idea, creating woman as an after-thought. Going to work and undoing the mis-made man, taking him to pieces as a little girl would a badly made doll, extracting a rib, and closing up the place again. What we need are Revelations that shall emancipate mankind from all theologies based on such fables as these. And of this, brother Joseph's creed offers us no hope.

With respect to the two or three "Revelations" that have already come through Joseph of Plano, we have examined them, and must say in all kindness, that any uninspired man of average intelligence could impart more valuable truths in ten minutes than they contain together. Joseph, himself, could tell more in the same time, in his most uninspired condition. Doubtless some spirit has given them—for we do not believe for a moment that Joseph is an impostor;—but who the individual is, is of no consequence, because they amount to nothing. Of course they dictate the doing of this or that; but they clear up no mystery of human existence, and reveal no truth that touches our souls with its beauty. They are simply what any ordinary personage in the body or out of it could tell us to do, if he chose.

As to Joseph himself, so far as we can learn, he very modestly claims no converse with angels as his father did. As his brothers say, that was only necessary to establish the church. He has but inspirations or impressions of some kind. Of course, plenty of other people may have no more; but why come to us with a blast of trumpets, about "Revelations and Prophets" "as it was in the beginning," when it amounts to no more than this.

To sum up. If "Josephism" be true the mission of Joseph Smith simply amounts to this:—The Heavenly world after commencing a movement for the benefit of humanity, and proclaiming to all the world that it should never pass away, allowed it to be broken up and perish as an organization for sixteen years. During which entire period, not a sound was uttered or an effort made in its behalf; while its thousands of deceived followers, who had embraced it in love and faith, believing in its immutability, were left scattered and sheperdless, without one word of comfort or direction, and the system as a whole prostrate and dead. After which weary interval it began again in a weakly sort of a way; in ten years of a fresh start obtaining less influence than a tenth-rate sectarian church. This abortion of a divine mission with its interruptions and disorganization; its falsification of its programme; its valueless revelations of to-day; its insignificance and lack of converting power, the Josephites ask us to believe in, as the grand "Dispensation of the fulness of times." All we have to say is, that any movement which brings about no more among earth's millions in nearly forty years than Joseph Smith's has done, if it is to be measured by Plano and its little system, has not much of God in it anyway—and the earth might as well be without it as with it. In a Divine system we have a right to expect power and force, and practical results surpassing the ordinary effects of men's labors. If Joseph Smith's mission has been continued in these mountains, it has accomplished something—it has gathered a people—founded, in fact, an inspirational nation, who, no matter what they may be to-day, can at any moment be awakened by the electric touch of communication with the invisible worlds; and what that fact means "tongues cannot tell." If it has not done this but is to be judged by the results of "Josephism," it has done nothing, but what any sectarian system could have done in a far more powerful way; and the cry should immediately be taken up by every Latter-day Saint throughout the world,—there has been no Prophet—no mission of God amongst us, "To your tents O Israel."

HUGH MILLER AND MOSES.

In the following extract, we give the effort of Hugh Miller, the celebrated geologist, to reconcile the Mosaic account of the Creation, with the facts of science in general and Geology in particular.

That our readers may understand the difficulties which Professor Miller attempts to solve, we must briefly give Moses' account of the order in which things were created, as follows:—

On the "First Day," light was divided from the darkness. On the Second, the "waters above the firmament were separated from those below." On the Third Day the seas were separated by themselves, the dry land appeared, the grass, herbs, and trees sprang into existence. On the Fourth Day, the sun, moon, and stars, were brought into being. On the Fifth Day, enormous fishes, such as great whales, together with winged fowl, were made. On the earlier portion of the Sixth Day, cattle and creeping things were produced, and, at or about its close, man appeared upon the scene.

It will be seen that according to Moses, light was divided from the darkness before the sun, moon or stars were in existence, to divide them. This is a difficulty which some have attempted to explain by the idea that light being a substance latent in the elements, could therefore exist without the aid of the sun or moon. Leaving this to be as it may, a greater difficulty still exists.

According to Moses, we have grass, herbs and trees before there was any sunlight to sustain them in existence; a thing about as easy to understand, as it would be to suppose that Cain was born before his mother. The sun being as much the parent and supporter of vegetable life, as is the mother the fountain and supply of her child's being, only more so.

This, and other difficulties, too numerous to mention, Hugh Miller attempts to explain. Not by supposing Moses historically correct, but by imagining that the story of the Creation was revealed to him by vision and not by description. In other words, he supposes that a series of huge panoramic views, by divine power, were made to appear before him, each representing the earth at a successive stage of its progress; and that Moses described things as they appeared—just like any other looker-on who did not exactly understand the process.

Thus supposing, according to usual geologic theory, that the earth was, in the beginning a molten mass,—within undergoing a cooling process—the seas upon its surface would boil like a pot. The thick stratum of steam covering its surface would "wrap the earth in a darkness, gross and palpable as that of Egypt of old." This, Mr. Miller thinks, would present a view to Moses exactly corresponding with his words that, "In the beginning the earth was without form, and void, and darkness was upon the face of the deep."

After a time, the rays of the sun would struggle through this mass of clouds, forming a faint twilight. This, to Moses' uninformed mind, would, of course, be the "division of the light from the darkness," and be precisely his first day's work.

This process proceeding until the clouds in huge masses separated themselves from the surface of the deep, would naturally be described by Moses as "the waters above the firmament" being separated from the "waters below the firmament" and agree with his second day's work.

Next in order, the dry land would begin to appear as low marshy continents, rising out of the seas, upon the surface of which a rank vegetation—grass, herbs and trees—would appear. This would correspond with the third day's work.

In the next great period, the steam, mist and vapor, having passed away, the sun would shine forth in unobstructed glory by day, while the moon and stars would be seen undimmed at night.—While gazing on this panorama, Moses would imagine that they had but just sprung into being, and hence would ascribe them to the Fourth day's work.

According to the demonstrations of Geology, fish of small and insignificant species, must have existed in the waters long before the fifth period of creation; but Hugh Miller supposes that as these were hidden in the depths of the seas, which in turn were more or less enveloped by clouds and mist, they would be unseen by Moses in his past visions; until the scene becoming serene in its character and grandly illuminated, he would perceive, for the first time, great monsters sporting in the deep, while "winged fowl" flew through "the midst of heaven." Describing things only as they appeared to him, and not as they truly occurred, he would represent these creatures as not being brought into being until the fifth period.

On the Sixth, or last Day, Moses says that cattle and creeping things appeared, and finally man himself. This would correspond with geological research, which shows that gigantic mammals, birds and reptiles received their greatest development about the period immediately preceeding man's advent.

With these remarks, we think Hugh Miller's points will be fully understandable. It will be seen by the acute reader, however, that by this kind of reasoning, the Mosaic account of the Creation is not proved true, we are simply furnished with an explanation of how Moses could have been divinely inspired, and yet describe things contrary to the way we know they must have occurred. With this preface, we present the extract.—Ed.

"Let us suppose that Moses first hears the great doctrine orally enunciated, that 'in the beginning God created the heavens and the earth.' Unreckoned ages, condensed in the vision into a few brief moments, pass away; the creative voice is again heard, 'Let there be light,' and straightway a gray diffused light springs up in the east, and, casting its sickly gleam over a cloud-limited expanse of steaming, vaporous sea, journeys through the heavens towards the west. One heavy, sunless day is made the representative of myriads; the faint light waxes fainter,—it sinks beneath the dim, undefined horizon; the first scene of the drama closes upon the seer.

The light again brightens,—it is day; and over an expanse of ocean without visible bound the horizon has become wider and sharper of outline than before. There is life in that great sea,—invertebrate, mayhap ichthyic, (fishy) life; but, from the comparative distance of the point of view occupied by the prophet, only the slow roll of its waves can be discerned, as they rise and fall in long undulations before a gentle gale; and what most strongly impresses the eye is the change which has taken place in the atmospheric scenery. That lower stratum of the heavens occupied in the previous vision by seething steam, or gray, smoke-like fog, is clear and transparent; and only in an upper region, where the previously invisible vapor of the tepid sea has thickened in the cold, do the clouds appear. But there, in the higher strata of the atmosphere they lie, thick and manifold,—an upper sea of great waves, separated from those beneath by the transparent firmament, and, like them, too, impelled in rolling masses by the wind. A mighty advance has taken place in creation; but its most conspicuous optical sign is the existence of a transparent atmosphere,—of a firmament stretched out over the earth, that separates the waters above from the waters below. But darkness descends for the third time upon the seer, for the evening and the morning have completed the second day.

Yet again the light rises under a canopy of cloud; but the scene has changed, and there is no longer an unbroken expanse of sea. The white surf breaks, at the distant horizon, on an insulated reef formed mayhap by the Silurian or Old Red coral zoophytes ages before, during the bygone yesterday; and beats in long lines of foam, nearer at hand, against a low, winding shore, the seaward barrier of a widely spread country. For at the Divine command the land has arisen from the deep;—not inconspicuously and in scattered islets, as at an earlier time, but in extensive though flat and marshy continents, little raised over the sea level; and a yet further flat has covered them with the great carboniferous flora. The scene is one of mighty forests of cone-bearing trees,—of palms, and tree-ferns, and gigantic club mosses, on the opener slopes, and of great reeds clustering by the sides of quiet lakes and dark rolling rivers. There is deep gloom in the recesses of the thicker woods, and low thick mists creep along the dank marsh or sluggish stream. But there is a general lightening of the sky over head; as the day declines, a redder flush than had hitherto lighted up the prospect falls athwart fern-covered bank and long withdrawing glade. And while the fourth evening has fallen on the prophet, he becomes sensible, as it wears on, and the fourth dawn approaches, that yet another change has taken place. The Creator has spoken, and the stars look out from openings of deep unclouded blue; and as day rises, and the planet of morning pales in the east, the broken cloudlets are transmitted from bronze into gold, and anon the gold becomes fire, and at length the glorious sun arises out of the sea; and enters on his course rejoicing. It is a brilliant day; the waves, of a deeper and softer blue than before, dance and sparkle in the light; the earth, with little else to attract the gaze, has assumed a garb of brighter green; and as the sun declines amid even richer glories than those which had encircled his rising, the moon appears full orbed in the east,—to the human eye the second great luminary of the heavens,—and climbs slowly to the zenith as night advances, shedding its mild radiance on land and sea.

Again the day breaks; the prospect consists, as before, of land and ocean. There are great pine woods, recovered swamps, wide plains, winding rivers, and broad lakes; and a bright sun shines over all. But the landscape derives its interest and novelty from a feature unmarked before. Gigantic birds stalk along the sands, or wade far into the water in quest of their ichthyic (fishy) food; while birds of lesser size float upon the lakes, or scream discordant in hovering flocks, thick as insects in the calm of a summer evening, over the narrower seas, or brighten with the sunlit gleam of their wings the thick woods. And ocean has its monsters: great "tanninim" tempest the deep, as they heave their huge bulk over the surface, to inhale the life-sustaining air; and out of their nostrils goeth smoke, as out of a "seething pot or cauldron." Monstrous creatures, armed in massive scales, haunt the rivers, or scour the flat rank meadows; earth, air, and water are charged with animal life; and the sun sets on a busy scene, in which unerring instinct pursues unremittingly its few simple ends,—the support and preservation of the individual, the propagation of the species, and the protection and maintenance of the young.

Again the night descends, for the fifth day has closed; and morning breaks on the sixth and last day of creation. Cattle and beasts of the fields graze on the plains; the thick-skinned rhinoceros wallows in the marshes; the squat hippopotamus rustles among the reeds, or plunges sullenly into the river; great herds of elephants seek their food amid the young herbage of the woods; while animals of fiercer nature,—the lion, the leopard, and the bear,—harbor in deep caves till the evening, or lie in wait for their prey amid tangled thickets, or beneath some broken bank. At length as the day wanes and the shadows lengthen, man, the responsible lord of creation, formed in God's own image, is introduced upon the scene; and the work of creation ceases forever upon the earth. The night falls once more upon the prospect, and there dawns yet another morrow,—the morrow of God's rest,—that Divine Sabbath in which there is no more creative labor, and which, "blessed and sanctified" beyond all the days that had gone before, has as its special object the moral elevation and final redemption of man. And over it no evening is represented in the record as falling, for its special work is not yet complete. Such seems to have been the sublime panorama of creation exhibited in vision of old to

> "The shepherd who first taught the chosen seed,
> In the beginning how the heavens and earth
> Rose out of chaos;"

and, rightly understood, I know not a single scientific truth that militates against even the minutest or least prominent of its details."

TWILIGHT MUSINGS.

BY J. H. MARTINEAU.

'Tis eve. The sunlight gilds with golden hue,
The snowy, cloud-encircled mountain top;
And in the darkling, shadowy vale, the dew
Of flower and leaflet gathers drop by drop.
The hour is silent, save the murmuring rill
That leaps along its steep and rocky bed,
Or save the distant, faintly tinkling bell,
Or soft-winged bat that circles round my head.

I see again my father's reverend form,
His grave demeanor and his stately air,
His sparkling eye with love and friendship warm,
The forehead—crowned with silver-sprinkled hair.
My mother! Ah how sacred is that word!
The first that by the infant lip is spoken—
The last that on the battle-plain is heard
From thousands, ere their thread of life is broken.
I see again her kind and loving face
That o'er me bent in childhood's blissful slumber,
Her gently beaming eye, her quiet grace;
Ah! who can e'er those happy mem'ries number!

I hear again a spirit-whispered song
My sister used to sing, while at her feet
We nestled closely round. Her voice hath long
Been silent now. The cold, white winding sheet
Enwraps our loved one's form, and on the stone,
Her name engraven is with moss o'ergrown.
A lily pure and spotless blooming bright—
The spring of life she graced, then passed from sight.

I had a brother once—a baby-boy
Scarce two years old, with soft and gentle eye
And waving hair—his mother's latest joy—
And happy as the bird that flitted by.
Years since have passed. I never saw him more,
But have been told that on the battle-plain
Of Murfreesboro, reddened deep with gore,
He rests among our country's valiant slain.
No purer patriotism than his was found;
No braver heart our banner gathered round.

How many tried and trusted friends are gone!
How many a time our aching hearts have bled.
How many an old and half-remembered song
Hath brought to mind those scenes forever fled!
And time is passing still;—to-day will be Soon numbered with the past—eternal past—
While rush we on towards eternity
That stretches out so broad—illimitable—vast!

TERESE, THE HEBREW MAIDEN;
OR,
NOT ALL DROSS

BY EDWARD W. TULLIDGE.

CHAPTER LVI.

IN THE DUNGEON OF THE DE LACY CASTLE.

All that night, the carriage which bore Sir Walter Templar dashed along as fast as a pair of stout coach-horses could go towards the castle of the De Lacys. For the first two hours, our hero remained insensible and then it was noticed that he began to revive, which was indicated by stifled moanings and a struggle to release himself from the cords which bound him. After that, Walter remained quiet, though he occasionally moved himself as if to relieve by change his uncomfortable position. The fact was that, after our hero regained his consciousness, he endeavored to collect his thoughts and grapple in his mind with all the circumstances before him and his present condition, and he deemed it unwise to exhaust himself by useless struggles. He, therefore, was very quiet, but busy with his reflections for the remainder of the journey.

At length, the carriage drove up to the avenue of fir tree on the De Lacy estate, referred to at the opening of our story. Blakely and Orsini then alighted and, with the aid of George, they bore Sir Walter Templar up the dense and winding avenue towards the secret entrance of De Lacy castle. Our hero, though now sensible, was weak and powerless from the loss of blood which had gushed from the wound in his head. Besides, he was still bound with cords and gagged.

In a quarter of an hour afterwards, the conspirators entered the narrow, heavy oaken door which admitted them into the secret apartments of the castle. Reaching the room which "Snap" had named Sir Herbert's Den, they laid down the body of our hero, and placed the lamp, which George had lighted, on the table. The "Den" was as elegantly furnished as when we first introduced our readers to it at the opening of our story. They rested for a moment or two, and each of the men helped himself to a glass of brandy from the decanter on the table, for the apartment had been evidently prepared for occupants, but Walter Templar was not to be one of them.

"Come, let us bear him to the dungeon of the castle," said Sir Herbert Blakely to his companions.

The baronet then touched the spring of the concealed panel which flew open and revealed a passage leading to the picture gallery of the castle. This passage on the outside seemed to be a piece of curious ornamental masonry, connecting the wing built by the recluse of the De Lacy family with the main building. From the outside, it looked something like an arched bridge constructed as much to separate the wing from the castle, as to connect it, and, as on the inside, there was no apparent communication between the two buildings, this bridge was supposed to be a solid mass of stone-work. The passage also being very narrow and low, it seemed nothing like a corridor.

The three villains again took up the body of our hero and entered this passage, which was both dark and damp. Reaching the other end of this tunnel-like piece of stone-work, for such it looked inside, they laid down their prisoner, and Sir Herbert taking hold of the handle of a crank connected with some concealed machine in the wall, turned it round a number of times, though with great difficulty. Gradually what seemed solid masonry moved and a large stone slab forming the door, entered into a groove in the wall. Through this, the men bore our hero, and now found themselves in a legitimate corridor which led them into the picture gallery of the castle, where still hung the portraits of the ancestors of Lord Frederick De Lacy. Almost beneath that gallery where hung those pictured guardians of the De Lacys, deep in the earth was the dungeon where the supplanter designed to entomb Sir Walter Templar during the rest of his life or until, as the vindictive man himself had said, Walter should rot—rot beneath the castle which he had resolved to redeem for his friend. Passing through this picture gallery, they entered another corridor. Here they found a large iron door, which also opened by means of concealed machinery. It was, however, evidently a door and known to connect with the dungeon of the castle, but the secret of its working had been always kept by the master of the castle. It had been communicated to General Blakely by Lord Reginald De Lacy, rather as an antiquated curiosity of barbarous times than with any intentions of present use. The iron door was opened by Sir Herbert, revealing a strong flight of stairs built in spiral form, down which they descended. At the bottom of these, they entered a short passage on the base of the castle, and descended a second flight of stairs—these of stone. At length they reached the passage leading to the dungeon, and, in another minute, the three villains, now thoroughly exhausted, laid Sir Walter Templar down before the heavy iron grating of his prison, into which he was cast, upon a bundle of straw which had been recently placed there to receive him. Sir Herbert Blakely now took the gag from our hero's mouth, and loosed the cords that bound him.

"Sir Walter Templar," he said, addressing his prisoner, "you are now free so far as the limits of this dungeon. Excuse us for gagging and binding you. It was doubtless uncomfortable, but necessary as our mutual friend "Snap" would say."

Walter condescended no reply, but he arose and staggered to an oaken chair in his dungeon, by the side of a rude table on which was a lamp which Sir Herbert had lighted.

"Sir Walter, there is bread and water you will perceive before you. It is but two days old. The fare is not the best, I confess, but it is according to custom. You are my prisoner; I have constituted myself your jailor. At present, the relationship pleases me, though I know not how long it may so please me. You are weak, I see, from loss of blood and your bonds. We will leave you now,—eat and rest,—but will return, for I cannot forego the satisfaction of explaining the exact state of our mutual affairs."

Still Sir Walter made no reply, but he raised his head from the table upon which he had leaned, and threw at his jailor a haughty defiant look which told that his spirit was nothing subdued, though his strength was well nigh gone, from his wound and treatment that night. But had he possessed at that moment all his physical prowess, it would have been dangerous for Sir Herbert and his companions to have been in the dungeon of that lion-like man.

In a few moments more our hero was alone. He then drank deeply of the pitcher of water on the table, for he was parched with thirst; next bathed his face in a bowl of water which he saw near him, and washed the blood from his head: afterwards he partook of his simple fare of bread and drank again from the rude pitcher. His meal done, he knelt for a few moments as in silent prayer, and then rising, approached the heap of straw and laid himself down to rest. In this quiet, self-possessed conduct there was much of heroism and philosophy, for the truly heroic are never petulant in their great trials. Our hero was soon in a peaceful sleep, for he was worn out by the tax upon his system that night. The fact also was that Walter was desirous to fully recover his strength to meet the three villains on their next visit to his dungeon. He meditated an attack upon them, and an escape from the castle if possible.

CHAPTER LVII.

THE SUPPLANTER AND THE AVENGER TOGETHER.

Sir Walter Templar slept for full six hours on his heap of straw, and then he arose and fed his small lamp from a small can of oil which he saw upon the table. He readily appreciated that his jailor designed to allow him the light from his tiny lamp, thus relieving his darkness, but, at the same time, making his situation visible. There was an exquisite sense of revenge manifested in this. Evidently, a long captivity was intended, and our hero at once concluded that his vindictive enemy had resolved to crush his spirit and gloat over his miserable condition, before making away with him, providing he had also resolved to take his life as the sequel. Walter was, however, thankful for this, and he deemed that there was a Providence at work to save him even in his enemy's fine plan of revenge.

Our hero also perceived that, while he had slept, a basket containing his simple faro of bread and water had been passed through an iron-grated window which opened from the outside. This basket he took from the shelf fixed to received it; and then he again bathed his face to prepare for his simple meal. Again he knelt, as he did before, before he partook himself to rest, for Walter had been trained by his uncle Courtney to devotional duties, and from the purity of his life, he had retained the beautiful practice of his boyhood. He was not a praying man in the Methodistical sense, but he was a religious man in the High-churchman form. Rising from his knees, he ate a hearty meal and felt a degree of thankfulness and a wonderful self-possession.

He remembered, too, at that trying hour, what Alice his "spirit-bride" had told him on her death-bed concerning the cloud in his life, which she saw before him, and he remembered her promise that she would be near him then. Exalted and poetic minds, as we have before said, are generally sensible to beautiful superstitions; and Walter was under the fascinating spell of the spirit of his dead bride. He believed that she was near him even in that dungeon, and he experienced a strength of mind and a resolute purpose from the assurance.

After his meal, our hero again bathed his head to comfort the wound, which had not been serious, though it cost him some loss of blood. He felt, however, his strength nearly recovered; and to put his system into its usual vigorous condition, he took rapid exercise to and fro in his dungeon. This he kept up for an hour, and then, hearing footsteps echoing in the stone passage leading to his cell, he returned to his seat and leaned himself upon the table as though from physical weakness. Scarcely was he in this position when the heavy bars fell from the iron-grated door, and Sir Herbert Blakely, Count Orsini and George, the inn-keeper's burly son, entered the dungeon.

"Sir Walter Templar," began Sir Herbert, after he had contemplated our hero for a few moments, "I see you affect not to notice our presence. The same haughty spirit with which you braved me when you was a boy, you still maintain. That spirit I will crush out of you. I promised you, this morning, a statement of our mutual affairs. Will you condescend to listen, Sir Walter Templar?"

"I will listen, sir," replied Sir Walter, who desired to learn the situation.

"You are patient, but I doubt not I shall inspire your rage before I am through."

"Sir Herbert Blakely, I remember the answer of a princess of England to her jailor in the tower. If you remember it, too, you may take it as the answer of my class to such as you."

"What may that answer have been?"

"This, Herbert Blakely: 'We are of the nature of the lion, sir, and do not war with mice.'"

At this answer, the supplanter's face flushed to the very roots of his hair, for he understood the supreme contempt which the remark implies: it was that of one of the proud nobles of England against an upstart who claimed rank with them. Sir Herbert was about to give vent to his usual burst of oaths, but he restrained himself, for Orsini, one of the ancient nobility of Italy, was present, and he wished not to give his captive the opportunity to play the lion, and he be the mouse, then.

"I understand you, Sir Walter," he answered, "and will take up the subject where you have suggestively brought it: one of your class then was beggared; my father, who was much such a man as those who founded the old families who lord over England, made himself more than a match for many of their descendents and won a baronetcy. Among the rest of his acts, he supplanted the De Lacys, and both he and his son swore that this castle and the estates belonging to the old family should be ours. Your uncle and father came between us still, we kept to our purpose. My father, and then your father, died, and I offered a hundred thousand pounds more in behalf of the beggar boy, providing the estates were transferred fully to me. This would have been done but for you. There was a challenge sent through Lawyer Wortley from a haughty boy of fifteen. It ran thus: 'Tell the supplanter that when Sir Walter Templar is a man, he will meet him and exact vengeance for the De Lacys.' Do you remember?"

"That boy is a man, and answers the supplanter in the same spirit."

"It is well, Sir Walter Templar, and now we meet: you are the captive, I your jailor. Now listen! I have resolved to play the avenger—your own character—as well as the supplanter. You designed to redeem this castle. You shall rot in its dungeon. Is not my vengeance poetic? To confess the truth, I am so enticed by it that, instead of killing you at once, I wish to have the pleasure of seeing you pine to death before rotting; and to give you a conception how much you are mastered, I will inform you of matters of which you are ignorant. You remember, Sir Walter, while in Italy, some unknown attempted to assassinate you on the night of the duel with my friend, Orsini, here?"

"I remember the titled ruffian aimed at my life first, and then set on his hireling."

"Liar!" said Orsini, furiously.

"That Orsini had nought to do with the attack upon you," continued Blakely, "you will believe when I inform you that the unknown man was the jealous foster-brother of Terese Ben Ammon."

Walter was overwhelmed with astonishment, and a light broke in upon him; yet, though he saw some wicked design in the revelation, he did not fully understand the connection of the circumstances of Italy with the present case.

"I see you are curious," resumed the supplanter. "Well, this same foster-brother was with you last night. He was captured, but not hurt or robbed. At midnight, he was freed to carry the strange news to Courtney House. This morning, of course, a search was made for you, when, doubtless, your dead horse was found, and in the holsters of the saddle I caused to be placed your pistols loaded, as though they had not been fired. The supposition will be that you and your steed were killed without resistance. Upon whom will the supposed murder rest? The circumstances are singular, are they not?"

"Villains! I see it now. You would attach the supposed murder of myself to an innocent man. But Heaven will thwart you. There can be no motive traced to Farinelli, and my own family will stand by him."

"You forgot, Sir Walter, that Farinelli has the motive of jealousy which, though concealed by your family, will come out on his trial."

"Through your means. Well? Go on, sir."

"And with the fact of his love and jealousy, the greater fact that he attempted to assassinate you in Italy! Is not that enough to hang any man upon the best of circumstantial evidence?"

"You forget, Herbert Blakely, that you are in England, and that you also designed to take my life in Italy."

"So Judah Nathans told you that, did he? But I learned wisdom from him. I am not in England, but in Italy still. There are letters from me on the way at this moment, dated from Rome, to various persons in this country. So you see, we are proof against suspicion. I shall not move in this affair, nor appear in England until after Farinelli is hanged.

"That will I prevent. Templar to the rescue!"

"Templar to the rescue!" was an ancient war-cry of our hero's family. As it rang through that dungeon and echoed in the vaulted passages without, Walter sprang from the chair in which he had been reclining as in a very feeble state, and, bounding towards Sir Herbert Blakely, he caught him with one iron grip at the throat and the other at his waist, and with the tremendous strength which he possessed, now concentrated for the great struggle which he had resolved upon, he hurled his foe far from him. It was another such an effort as he had put forth when he threw Farinelli in the old monastry at Rome. Sir Herbert lay senseless on the dungeon floor.

"Templar to the rescue!" again he shouted as he sprang upon Orsini; but the young noble being somewhat prepared, struggled with all his might. He would, however, have been speedily overcome, but the burly George Blakely, the inn-keeper's son, seized our hero by the throat from behind, and holding him till he was black in the face, he was borne by his two antagonists to the floor, to which, with great difficulty, they contrived to chain him. The noble and the peasant-giant—for George was gigantic—then carried Sir Herbert senseless away with them, leaving our hero chained in the dungeon of the De Lacy castle. Will the guardian spirit of Alice, his bride, watch over him now?

CHAPTER LVIII.

THE MYSTERIOUS DISAPPEARANCE.

The mysterious disappearance of Sir Walter Templar had occupied the public mind during the three weeks which has elapsed since his incarceration in the dungeon of the De Lacy castle. The press throughout the country had filled its pages with the circumstances as far as known, accompanied with numerous speculations and opinions thereon.

Murder in England has always been a crime which has shocked the heart of the country. The English may not be greater lovers of justice than the people of America, but they are by far more strict concerning the majesty of the law, and when the crime touches human life, law does become in our parent country a grand expression of justice. Let but the life of the meanest subject of the realm be touched, and the whole country is in alarm, from the Secretary of State who holds his prerogatives over the criminal, to the crowds assembled at the village taverns, or the knot of workmen in each shoemaker's garret. A murder is the theme of discussion everywhere in the land, until the assassin is captured, and then self-constituted juries in every town, try him before the judges and jury of the crown find him guilty or not guilty. Such a sentiment of severity is there in England touching murder, that a merciful Secretary of State often deems it his imperative duty to let the law take effect, and not to advise the crown to pardon even when the case is doubtful. From this severity in the mind of the English public against murder, have occurred a few executions of innocent persons upon fallable circumstantial evidence. There is perhaps a too severe sense in the public mind that, if a person is murdered, somebody ought to be hung for the awful offence; and this, fifty years ago, was stronger by far than at the present time. Mercy and humanitarianism may doubtless have wise protests against this; but after all, we much prefer the English sentiment of severity against the taking of life to that criminal disregard of authorities which permit innumerable murders in all the States and Territories of America, without bringing the offenders to justice.

So the disappearance of Sir Walter Templar occupied the English mind, and the newspapers were eloquent upon the theme. Sir Richard Courtney offered heavy rewards for the capture of the murderers, if murder had been committed, or for any revelation which would lead to the restoration of our hero to his family, if living. A nobleman of high character and vast estates was missing, and his uncle, whose influence in the country was great, was moving "heaven and earth" to bring his nephew to light alive, or to avenge his foul assassination if slain by the masked men whom Farinelli declared had attacked them. At length, the country became loud in the demand for the arrest and trial of somebody for murder, for the handsome reward of ten thousand pounds which his bride-elect had offered to any person who should be the means of restoring Walter alive to his family, had met with no results. The other reward of five thousand pounds, offered by Sir Richard Courtney, was for the apprehension of the criminals. The anxious heart of Terese had prompted the best policy to offer a large sum for his life, rather than for the knowledge of his death. It is not unlikely the sum would have been claimed by one of the ruffians who had captured our hero, had not Sir Herbert Blakely kept them entirely in the dark, not only as to his own identity, but also the intended fate of his prisoner. Neither of the hirelings knew whether Walter was dead or alive. They were all in nearly as much mystery as the public, and knew not, on the other hand, who to impeach as their employer. To have confessed would have been only to put their own necks in danger without bringing their principals to justice. There was one, however, who could have given light upon the subject, and that was the inn-keeper, Jacob Blakely, but he and his son George deemed themselves the heirs of Sir Herbert, and were as deeply interested in concealing all, as was their rich relative. As for the hirelings, they, through the the inn-keeper of the Dragon's Head, had received a promise of a reward equal to that offered by Sir Richard Courtney, (five thousand pounds) providing the entire secret was kept inviolate.

The efforts made by the uncle and bride-elect of Walter much alarmed Sir Herbert Blakely and Count Orsini, for eminent detectives were scouring the country, to fathom the mystery. Blakely was therefore compelled, not only to give large inducements to his hirelings to keep their secret, but both he and Orsini were more than resolved to fasten suspicion upon Farinelli. Indeed, what to them, at first, was only a wicked provision in their own behalf, soon became an actual necessity. They knew that, with this restless search which was being made, somebody must be convicted, and Sir Herbert saw that, unless that somebody was found, suspicion would travel to himself, in spite of the fact that he was supposed to be in Italy. Moreover, he feared the acute mind of his ancient mentor, "Snap," whose wealth had supplied Terese with the means to set the best detectives of England to work. Blakely knew that, if once "Snap" was fairly on his track, all would be over with him. Therefore it became absolutely necessary to make the foster-brother the victim at once. Indeed, the name of Sir Herbert Blakely had already been connected with the affair. Courtney, before magistrates, had testified upon oath that he knew of no secret enemy of his nephew in all England; but he affirmed that he had reasons for believing that such a one did exist in Italy, whom he also had reasons for believing had entertained designs upon the life of his nephew. At present, he said, he was not prepared to communicate the name of that person. This, which the papers duly recorded, had alarmed Sir Herbert more than all besides. Courtney was evidently on his track, and, as a masterpiece of precaution, Blakely had already returned to Italy, leaving his cousin George as jailor to Sir Walter Templar. He left his prisoner in safe hands, for, as already observed, George and his father deemed themselves Sir Herbert Blakely's heirs.

Three weeks had passed since the disappearance of Sir Walter; and the public began to clamor for the arrest of the some one. At last, the suspicion fell upon Farinelli. The papers at first talked cautiously of his strange connection with the circumstances—the fact that Walter's horse was shot in Farinelli's presence, while he himself was struggling with his own assailant; and stranger than all, that Walter had fired upon the masked men, yet his pistols were found in their holsters as though they had been untouched. All the appearances indicated that both Walter and his horse had been shot before resistance could be made. To this, the papers added the fact that the foster-brother had escaped unhurt, and without being robbed. Finally, it was concluded that, if Farinelli's statement was correct, some wealthy enemy, with more than a common motive, must be at the bottom of the affair; but it was admitted that the motive could not be traced to Farinelli, and that the confidence of Courtney's family at present shielded him from positive suspicion. But yet vague doubts against him existed in the public mind. These were now soon to give place to a revelation of the strongest of human motives—love and jealousy and the most direct circumstantial evidence—the proof of his attempt to assassinate Sir Walter Templar in Rome.

CHAPTER LIX.

DRIVING A WOMAN TO DISTRACTION.

The Courtney family were in London. The capital was deemed the best place from which to operate in investigating the complicated case of Walter's disappearance. From the metropolis agents could be set to work all over England, and their management directed by the most experienced officers of the detective department. Daily, Terese held consultations with them, either at their offices or at her own house. Her woman's instincts led her to believe that Walter was living, and the hope thereof and her resolution to find her lover kept her from giving way to despair.

Several times since our heroine had been in London, Donna Clara Garcia had called upon her, for since her flight from Rome, Terese always received the prima donna with cordial friendship. Moreover, she had before the disappearance of Walter, sought to bring about a union between Donna Clara and her foster-brother, and had cheered that lady with a hope of the event. Appearances were favorable; Farinelli had paid the Spanish woman considerable attention before he left London with Walter to spend a few weeks with his foster-sister. Indeed, Donna Clara thought that several times Farinelli had been upon the point of proposing to her to become his wife; and so he had, but he was not quite cured of his hopeless love for Terese, though fully reconciled to her marriage with Walter. He had, therefore, postponed the avowal of his intentions to Donna Clara until after the union of our hero and heroine; but as he parted from her, who would have given her soul for his love, he breathed into her ear, coupled with his tender farewell for a few weeks, a significant hope for her own happiness. The poor lady was in an ecstasy of bliss, and she looked forward to his return to her with a certainty of a union between them.

But a great calamity had come to interrupt, not only the happiness of Terese, but also her own. Farinelli was again in London; but he was now constantly occupied with his foster-sister to clear up the mystery around them, for he was so deeply involved in it. Moreover, the suspicion had now began to attach itself to him, and he was distracted thereby. This should have been a sufficient reason why he was now always with his foster-sister in her search for her lover, and why he was not at the feet of Donna Clara. But jealousy knows no reasoning. It was enough that Farinelli was with another and not with her. Again the Spanish woman began to look upon our heroine as her rival again. She began to entertain misgivings concerning Farinelli, and, this time, from the many mysterious circumstances; those misgivings threw her into even greater distraction than that in which we saw her in Rome.

This morning, Donna Clara was reading the London newspapers, in which the name of Farinelli was extensively mentioned. After reading the reports and various speculations of the editors, she fell into a profound reverie. There was much concern in her mind, for the safety of the man she loved, lest the crime of murder should be fixed upon him by the conclusions of circumstantial evidence, for almost everybody by this time, believed that Sir Walter Templar was dead. But if Donna Clara was concerned for the safety of the foster-brother, she was also tortured with jealousy, —and jealousy in a Spanish woman's nature is terrible: it overwhelms every other feeling.

"Oh!" she exclaimed in a fiendish burst of passion, "Did the blood-hounds of the law but know, as I know, that Farinelli had the motive, how soon they would pounce upon their prey. Not the motive! Does he not love her? and, therefore, did he not hate him. Yes, Farinelli has deceived me. I think he has put his rival out of the way to possess Terese. He is playing the arch-villain to us both. Ah! were I but certain of this, I would teach him what it is to trifle with me; I would denounce him to the law. No, no, I could not do it. Heaven preserve me! Heaven preserve me."

Again, the Spanish woman fell into a reverie. After a few minutes, she went to her writing table and prepared to write.

"Yes," she said to herself, "I will write to him, and conjure him to fly with me to Italy: he must, he shall fly with me."

The Spanish lady wrote her letter to Farinelli, and was about to seal it, when the servant announced—

"Count Orsini."

"Donna Clara," said Orsini "I am delighted to see you. I have just returned from my provincial tour, and could not resist the pleasure of calling upon you first. Lady, you are diviner than ever."

"Do you think so, Count?"

"To me, Donna Clara you are ever divine, because I worship you. When I am near you, I am a lover, when absent from you, an idolater."

"Indeed, my dear Orsini, it must be confessed you are a very persistent and troublesome wooer."

"And shall still persist, lady, until I win your favor, notwithstanding that some gossips have declared that you are engaged to Farinelli."

"The gossips speak not from the text Orsini. I have not seen the fellow since he has returned to London."

"I had good reasons for thinking as much. He is constantly with the Jewess who rivalled you in Rome. I shall never forgive myself for being one of the sinners who forsook you for her. So Farinelli has deserted you again?"

"Deserted me, sir Count?"

"I but repeat the public scandal Donna Clara. But it is nothing strange that he should desert you, when he has swept so much from his path to reach the Jewess."

The Italian noble was pursuing a bold course. He had come on purpose. His object was not merely to woo the lady, but also to set her fierce jealousy upon the track of Farinelli.

"What has he swept from his path?" asked Donna Clara, turning deadly pale, while her heart sunk within her.

"My dear friend," answered the Count insidiously, "I have naught to do with Farinelli's affairs, but simply to urge my own. He might for aught I care, remove a host of rivals from his path, for, did they stand between me and you, I would do the same, and, therefore, do I seek to win you from him by saying that I believe he has swept Sir Walter Templar from his path to win the Jewess."

"'Tis false, Count Orsini, false as your own heart!" returned the Spanish woman, fiercely, though the tempter's words told upon her fearfully."

"Have you not read the papers, my dear friend?"

"I have read, sir Count, what the fools have written."

"I thought so, Donna Clara. Now mark the logic of the case. The press affirms that no motive for the deed can be traced to Farinelli, but sagely adds that, if the motive had been found attached to him, never was there a case of greater circumstantial evidence: Farinelli would be pronounced by all to be the murderer. But you and I know that there does exist the motive! He has loved the Jewess,—he does love the Jewess. He is madly jealous, as all we Italians are; and like every true Italian, he would kill his rival. Is not that the logic of the case."

"Why, then does the family of the Jewess protect him?"

"Because, Donna Clara, Judah Nathans is himself somewhat implicated."

"In what way, sir Count?"

That is my secret lady. I have said that I have naught to do with Farinelli's affairs, only to win you from him. I have no design to attach public suspicion on my countryman."

"I do not give you credit for so much generosity, Orsini; and to confess the truth, I had concluded in my mind that you were the assassin."

"I the assassin, Donna Clara? What reason have you for such a far-fetched judgment. What motive had I against Sir Walter Templar?"

"Orsini," answered the lady severely "I know more of your affairs and treachery than you imagine. Baglioni, who is in London, and was here to-day informed me fully of the circumstances of your duel with Sir Walter Templar in the old monastery, and of his noble and your ignoble conduct."

"Baglioni shall answer that to me at the cost of his life, or mine," observed the Italian, calmly, but with a fierce scowl upon his countenance.

"Moreover, Baglioni said even to-day that he was more than half resolved to urge his suspicions against you, and to testify to his knowledge that you designed in malice to take Sir Walter's life in Italy."

"Baglioni shall answer to me for this, I repeat. But let that pass. Your words, however, Donna Clara, force me to confess against Farinelli what I just now withheld. Yet,—no, I will not—he is my countryman, and it will but pain you to have your worst suspicions confirmed."

"How know you, Orsini, that I entertain doubts concerning him. But quick. Keep me not in suspense. What is it you conceal touching Farinelli?"

"Orsini answered not for a moment, but seemed to reflect deeply. This suspicion and resolution of Baglioni troubled him. He knew that the Marquis was an honorable man, and that he had entertained since the night of the duel a sincere admiration for Walter Templar. Orsini knew that his word would have great weight; and, at the time when the public mind was impatient to fix upon some one, a charge against himself might turn out seriously. Moreover, it had been testified that two horsemen were seen on the road besides Walter Templar and his companion, which, however, had been rebutted by the counter testimony of the inn-keeper. If therefore, he should be brought into court and be recognized as one of the mysterious horsemen, more might be traced home. He was pleased notwithstanding, that he had found a legitimate excuse to confess to Donna Clara the secret against Farinelli.

"Quick, Orsini; keep me not in this suspense," said the lady, breaking in upon his reflections.

"Be it so. But you will bear me witness, Donna Clara Garcia, that this is forced from me?"

"Yes, yes!"

"Then, my friend, on the very night of the duel, Farinelli attempted to assassinate Sir Walter Templar in that same old monastery, after Baglioni and our company had departed, and he was hurled bleeding and crushed upon the marble floor. Sir Walter, who knew not who it was that assailed him, took no further notice of the would-have-been assassin and left him to his fate. Judah Nathans bore him to the house of the Jew, Isaac Ben Ammon, which led to some interesting family discoveries. Are you satisfied?"

"Holy Virgin. I see it all. It is, indeed, true. He has, then, removed his rival to win the bride. But I will denounce him I have sworn a fearful oath and I will fulfill it. You will be required, Orsini to repeat your statement in court. He shall learn what it is to trifle with Clara Garcia."

"You will bear me witness, lady, that this has been forced from me?"

"Fear not, Count. But now leave me, Orsini, for I would be alone."

Count Orsini immediately obeyed the lady's wish, satisfied that he had struck deep the poisoned arrow. He knew her fierce passions, and rightly judged that, in her distraction, before she fully realized the terrible result of her actions, she would betray her lover.

As soon as Donna Garcia was alone, she went to her chamber, and throwing herself upon the bed, wept bitterly. Her stiffled sobs shook her as a tree is shaken in a fierce storm.

"Mine in life, or in death!" was her fearful vow in Rome, and she was determined to fulfill her oath.

"It will be my death," she wailed as she writhed upon the bed; but it shall also be his. I will denounce him. Oh, he shall know what it is to betray me, when I shall have betrayed him."

BOIL IT DOWN.

Whatever you have to say, my friend,
Whether witty, or grave, or gay
Condense as much as ever you can,
And say in the readiest way;
And whether you write on rural affairs,
Or particular things in town,
Just take a word of friendly advice—
Boil it down.

When writing an article for the press,
Whether prose or verse, just try
To utter your thoughts in the fewest words,
And let them be crisp and dry.
And when it is finished, and you suppose
It is done exactly brown,
Just look it over again, and then
Boil it down.

For editors do not like to print
An article lazily long,
And the general reader does not care
For a couple of yards of song.
So gather your wits in the smallest space
If you'd win the author's crown,
And every time you write, my friend,
Boil it down.

ALLCOCK'S POROUS
STRENGTHENING
PLASTERS.

ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS are the results of studies and experiments of Dr. Scheent, of South Carolina; of Dr. Wm. Wagstaff, now Baron Wagstaff, of Horace H. Day, the distinguished manufacturer of rubber goods; and of Thomas Allcock, Chemist and member of the College of Pharmacy of New York, now General Allcock, etc., etc.

Step by step this commodity has attained its unprecedented fame. They are universally approved. They support, strengthen, and aid the growth of muscles. They appear to have a peculiar effect upon the nerves, allaying irritability, while supplying warmth. They seem to accumulate electricity, and aid the circulation of the blood through the part where applied, by which healthy actions are induced.

Even in paralysis, where articulation was suspended, the use of the Porous Plasters to the spine restored the articulation, and materially reduced the paralysis. In fact, the patient could help herself, while before the Porous plaster was applied she was as helpless as a baby. We refer to Mrs. Sally Elliot, Springfield, Mass.

Dr. Myer, of Savannah, Ga., says they are the best mechanical supporters for weak muscles ever discovered; that by their warming properties they bring power and health, until the strength of the muscles are entirely restored. That he knows a case where Allcock's Plasters cured a gentleman of a weak spine. That he daily prescribes them in his practice with the happiest results, and desires us to refer to him.

Dr. Henderson, of Farmsville, Louisiana, says: "The counter-irritant effect of Allcock's Porous Plasters is produced in such a mild and gradual way, they so invigorate the circulation around the parts to which they are applied, and exert upon all nervous diseases such a great sedative influence, that I place them confidently at the head of every plaster now in use."

Dr. Johnson, of Hartford, says: "My daily experience confirms the very superior excellence of your Porous Plasters. At this moment of writing, a man applies for one, who, by entanglement in a shaft of machinery, had both his legs broken, spine severely injured, and was for nearly a year entirely helpless. This man found relief very soon by the application of a plaster to his spine. He was soon enabled to work, and now he labors as well as ever. He would cheerfully pay five dollars for a single plaster, if they could not be had at a lower rate. Surgeons should make use of these perforated plasters, to the exclusion of all others, as their flexibility and adhesiveness are greatly in advance of all other plasters with which I am acquainted, while the perforations peculiar to them render them greatly superior to all others for ordinary surgical uses. Knowing the plasters to be so useful, I have no scruples that my sentiments should be known.

J. W. JOHNSON, M. D."

Dr. Sterling's testimony: "For two years, I have been a great sufferer from neuralgia in the head, and found only temporary relief from all the various remedies that I have tried, until I applied one of Allcock's Porous Plasters. I cut it into three strips, placing one under each shoulder blade, and the other over the small of the back; and for the past three months, I have had scarcely a twinge of the old pain.

I advise all who suffer from nervous diseases to lose no time in making a trial of the wonderful Porous Plaster.

MEDICINAL QUALITIES
—OF THE—
POROUS PLASTERS.

The Porous Plasters possess the soothing, warming and sustaining qualities of the combined plasters of the dispensatories. An Electrician, who has great experience of their effects in Local Rheumatism, in Tic Doloreux, and deep-seated nervous and other pains, and in affections of the kidneys, etc., etc., attributes all their sedative, stimulative and pain-relieving effects to their ELECTRIC qualities. He asserts that they restore the healthy electric condition (equilibrium) of the part, and that being restored pain and morbid action cease. He was amazed at the great number of beneficial indications produced by one of these plasters. He affirms that Head-ache is cured by one worn just below the breast-bone; that one placed over the navel will cure hysteries, as well as dysentery, and affections of the bowels.

PATENT

ARION PIANOFORTE

GRANDS AND GRAND SQUARES.

7⅓ OCTAVES.

The "ARION" is the very best Piano for the Great West, because it stands in tune longer than any other Piano. It requires no repairing or regulating; shipping any distance, or dampness does not affect them.

WHY?

It commences where the "First Premium" Makers stop, and upon the most improved Modern scale makes four patented improvements; which make the Arion more simple, yet stronger: increasing its volume and beauty of tone, while rendering the instrument more enduring.

WHAT THEY ARE.

First. The patent Arion Reversed Wooden Agraffe Bridge, which retains all the purity of tone only found in a wooden bridge (the rest whereon the strings lay), and obtains all the solid prolonged strength of tone of the metal Agraffe, without that acute metalic noise which the metal Agraffe develops by use.

Secondly, The Patent Arion Compound Wrest-Plank, which holds the tuning pins, is six thicknesses of hard maple, the grain of each layer runs in a different direction. The advantages are, the 20 tons strain of the strings cannot split our Arion wrest-plank, as frequently happens in other Pianos, and when people say "My Piano won't stand in tune," all other makers must use the single wrest plank with the grain running only one way.

The Arion Tuning-Pins have end wood to hold them on every side, while all other makers can have it only upon two sides of their pins.

Thirdly, The Patent Arion Diagonal Sustaining Bar, extending parellel with the steel strings under the over strung Bass strings. The Arion is the only Piano wherein the enormous strain of the large steel strings is resisted in the natural place and direction. Using this bar renders the weakest part in all other over strung Pianos the

STRONGEST IN THE ARION.

Fourthly, The Patent Arion Iron Frame concentrates all the metal in front of the tuning pin line, and its frame is let into (butted) the front edge of the wooden wrest plank, thereby preventing the great strain of the strings upon it from splitting or moving it one particle. All other "Full Iron Frames" cover the entire wrest plank, and when it is split it cannot be seen, the wood of the Arion wrest plank is seen.

THE ARION STANDS UPON ITS OWN MERITS, unsupported by either luncome, weak facts, or useless or complicated Patents. We append a few unbought opinions of those who

KNOW THE ARION.

The Musical Director of the New York Conservatory of Music, Edward Mollenhauer, says: "The Arion I bought of you is the best Piano I ever played on; that rolling bass and silvery treble, etc."

John H. Woods, Piano Dealer, Oswego, N. Y., says: The tone is truly immense, and surpasses anything in the shape of a Piano we ever saw or heard of, etc."

Horace Greely said: "The Arion is the best Square Piano, superior for its clearness and brilliancy of tone," &c.

Louis Wagner, Fort Leaverwerth, says: "My Piano arrived here in splendid order. Its tone fills my parlor with melody—it is the wonder and admiration of all who hear it. Miss ——, who is teaching the Piano desires me to order one for her," &c.

Dr. CADY'S CATARRH REMEDY.

A CERTAIN CURE FOR CATARRH AND ALL Mucous Diseases of the head, nose and throat.
This is a Medicine never before used or known to the public. Dr. Cady, the discoverer, was a sufferer from this terrible disease for twenty years, and after testing all the remedies extant—without relief—in his efforts to obtain a cure he discovered this UNEQUALLED REMEDY, which cured him in the short space of eight weeks.
It has been thoroughly tested, and has not failed in a single instance. Several of the most obstinate cases have been thoroughly cured by this remedy, after every other known medicine had failed. Every one who has tried it will testify to the truth of the above statement.
Every one afflicted with Catarrh should give it a trial and find out for himself whether it is a humbug.
Price, $2 per Bottle. Sold by GODBE & Co., Salt Lake City.

A WATER.

The Saratoga "A" Spring Water is probably the most effective mineral water found on either continent. It has ten per cent. greater mineral properties than the celebrated Congress Spring; four times that of Baden Baden of Austria; five times that of Aix La Chapelle in Prussia; twice that of Vichy in France; nearly three times greater than the renowned Seltzar of Germany; and equally over the Spas of Bath, England, and Kissengen in Bavaria.
The reputation of this water is based upon its effects in diseases of the stomach, liver, bowels, kidneys and spleen. It acts with wonderful benefit in cases of chronic dyspepsia, constipation, gravel, gout, Scrofula, cutaneous affections, general lethargy, soreness and prostration of the system.

PHILIP, MY KING.

BY MISS MCLOCH.

Look at me, with thy large brown eyes,
Philip, my king!
For around thee the purple shadow lies
Of babyhood's regal dignities:
Lay on my neck thy tiny hand
With love's invisible sceptre laden;
I am thine Esther, to command,
Till thou shalt find thy queen-handmaiden,
Philip, my king!

Oh the day when thou goest a-wooing,
Philip, my king!
When thy beautiful lips are suing,
And some gentle heart-bars undoing,
Thou dost enter love-crowned, and there
Sittest all glorified! Rule kindly,
Tenderly over thy kingdom fair,
For we that love, ah! we love so blindly,
Philip, my king!

I gaze from thy sweet mouth up to thy brow,
Philip, my king!
Ay, there lies the spirit, all sleeping now,
That may rise like a giant, and make men bow
As to one God-throned amidst his peers,
My soul, than thy brethren higher and fairer,
Let me behold thee in coming years!
Yet thy head needeth a circlet rarer,
Philip, my king!

A wreath, not of gold, but palm, one day,
Philip, my king!
Thou too must tread, as we tread, a way
Thorny, and bitter, and cold, and gray:
Rebels within thee, and foes without
Will snatch at thy crown. But go on, glorious,
Martyr, yet monarch! till angels shout
As thou sitt'st at the feet of God, victorious,
"Philip, the king!"

CLEVE CLIFF.

A TALE OF THE COAST.

In the autumn of 1860, among the visitors at the pretty watering-place, Clevedown, on the south coast, was Arthur Golding, a good-looking, stalwart young fellow of nine-and-twenty, who had run his yacht into Clevedown Bay at the earnest solicitation of Mr. Burnet, the father of a college chum. It was the holiday season, when most Londoners were at the sea-side or in Scotland; and Golding, tired of law, was glad of the opportunity for a quiet cruise round the coast of Sussex and Hampshire, with an occasional look in at the Isle of Wight. Arthur was tired of another estate besides that of law, and his friend Frederick Burnet, also a young barrister, had set about seriously to look for a wife for him.

"I tell you what, old fellow," said Frederick at last in chambers; "you can't do better than marry Miss Wraxall."

"And who," languidly asked Arthur Golding, filliping the ash from his cigar, as they looked over the London leads at the London sparrows, "is Miss Wraxall? It's a hideous name."

"Yes, isn't it? Golding's a better: make it Golding. At all events, come to Clevedown, where my father is going this season, and where I am to join him and the family, and where Miss Wraxall is to be as well. She's a splendid girl."

So it was arranged that Golding should moor his yacht in Clevedown Bay, and try his fortune with the desirable Miss Wraxall. Frederick wrote to his father, and procured a warm invitation for Arthur; and when the London season terminated, the two young men looked cheerily forward to their next meeting by the sea.

In September, Arthur Golding arrived at Clevedown. Mr. Burnet had rented for the autumn a roomy house on a down overlooking the English Channel, whose breakers tumbled incessantly against the foot of the cliff near the summit of which the house stood. To the right of this residence, facing the sea, were various other villas scattered along the coast. To the left was the coast-guard station, and, further on, a lofty headland overhanging the channel, known as Cleve Cliff. The cliff sloped concavely towards the sea, whose waves had hollowed out a cavern in its rocky sides. At the summit, approached with difficulty even from the land side, and from the sea quite inaccessible, an old and time-eaten railing of wood afforded hazardous protection against falling into the ocean. Behind these rickety rails was a seat, from which the view was magnificent.

When Arthur Golding ran his yacht ashore farther down the coast where there was landing, he found the house pretty full, and among the visitors the desirable Miss Wraxall. Assuredly his friend had not exaggerated her attractions. Tall, dark, of majestic figure, and a southern type of beauty, almost startling in the suddenness with which it fascinated the beholder, hers was the loveliness most splendid when at its dawn, but apt to wane as soon as maturity is reached. The black bands and coils of her hair roofed a brow singularly white for so brune a beauty; but the chief expression of the face lay in the eyes—dark eyes, that blazed rather than lighted at the merest approach to excitement—eyes which were mostly lovely, but might be terrible. A strong and passionate nature was revealed by glimpses in the quick waking of those eyes. A nature which could evidently love ardently, and might hate fatally.

"Your friend—Miss Wraxall, I think you call her—is remarkably handsome," said Arthur to his hostess the evening of his arrival.

"Clara? Yes, Clara is generally admired and used to admiration," answered Mrs. Burnet. "You know she is not only handsome and clever, but rich. To do her justice, though, admiration has not spoiled her. I think she is utterly indifferent alike to flattery and devotion."

"Money has spoiled her, of course," thought Golding, "as it does most women. She regards all men as mercenary who approach her with a civil word. It's plain that my plan, supposing I cared to go in for Frederick's absurd suggestion, would be to adopt the reverse of civility. That is, if I wanted to make an impression. But I must study her a little first."

Whatever course his study might lead him to, it is certain he put his plan into immediate operation. He was barely civil to Miss Wraxall from the first. In a day or two, he contradicted her openly. He would artfully start a general discussion, in which he foresaw that she would take a certain side, whereupon he would immediately adopt the opposite side, and browbeat her. All this, too, without seeming to care to pursue the subject, but with a contemptuous indifference, which at first galled her and raised her anger. Then her dark eyes would flash out their rage, and bitter words sprang to her lips. Having succeeded in rousing her, he would apologise and retire, with a sarcastic smile, which told her plainly (for she was quick-witted at reading expression) that he deferred to her sex, and not to her individual judgment; that he yielded to politeness, not to conviction.

Now Clara Wraxall was strong-minded in some things, and despised the vantage-ground of her sex. She liked to meet an intellectual antagonist in fair fight, and beat him out of the mental field; and Arthur Golding manifestly showed her that, as a woman, she was not worth arguing with at all.

This line of conduct was a new experience to her. She had been accustomed to smooth suitors, who deferred to her in all things; suitors who were fascinated by her beauty, suitors who sought her money, suitors who were afraid of her wit. But here was plainly one—no suitor either—who cared for neither beauty nor wealth, and who scorned her mind. At first she was piqued, then enraged, then interested. She would conquer this handsome and independent antagonist, this man who actually in her presence dared to call his soul his own. She laid her entrenchments for his subjugation. Once more she offered mental battle, but with a repetition of the old result. Then she fell back on her beauty, and put on her most winning and dazzling airs. But Arthur held mockingly aloof, though he laughed to himself to see how well his plan was working.

"I say, old fellow," said Frederick Burnet, one afternoon as they were pulling about the bay in a four-oar, "I believe the gorgeous Clara is actually smitten with you. I never saw her take such evident interest in a fellow before. She absolutely mopes when you are not present, and lightens up when you appear, like—like—"

"Fusees, Fred: you are generally staggered at metaphors. Or say lucifers, if you prefer it."

"Talking of Lucifer," said Burnet, "you never saw Clara thoroughly in a rage, Golding. Somehow I think she has softened down, and got more lamb-like within the last week or two. I wonder if she would take to you? You ought to go in at once, and try."

Golding made no reply; and they pulled towards the beech. Landing, they came upon the coast-guardsman.

This coast-guardsman was quite an institution at Clevedown, as solid and invariable in his way as Cleve Cliff. Stationed in front of an arrangement of flagstaffs which resembled the mast and tackling of a ship, or else marching up and down a line of planks, which was to him as the quarter-deck, from which he from time to time threw a distrustful glance at the ocean, he presented a figure with which the visitors at Clevedown were familiar. They would often stop and speak with him, and take a look-out through the telescope from which he was never dissociated; though they never by any chance succeeded in discovering anything by that dubious medium. In fact, the impossibility of making any object out by means of that telescope afforded to ignorant landsmen a clue to the habitual moodiness of the coast-guardsman. It was generally believed by the Clevedown visitors that no mortal soul had penetrated the haziness of that telescope, not even himself, but that he was pledged to maintain its character before the world, and the necessity of guarding so solemn a secret affected him with chronic depression. Anyway, he was a taciturn, irreconcileable man; one not to be won over to confidences; one who would never acquiesce in any statement, however self-evident, without opposing it first with a flat contradiction.

"Keeping a sharp look-out, Jack, eh? said Burnet in passing.

"No, sir," returned the obstinate coast-guardsman, "I can't say I am. I'm doing my duty. That's what I'm doing."

He shut up his telescope with an air which plainly said, "Tortures shall not wring from me the confession that this instrument is an awful imposition."

"And that duty is to look after the other duty—the national duty—the revenue. And very proper, too, Jack; you're a patriot. Have a pull?"

The coast-guardsman relaxed in grimness at the sight of the proffered pocket-pistol. He even accepted it without qualification.

"Anything stirring?" asked Arthur.

"No, sir," said the coast-guardsman. "There's been a suspicious-looking craft cruising about, and Slippy Jem is not to be found. But we've got our eye on him, for all he's so 'cute."

Slippy Jem, a gentleman suspected of being engaged in the smuggling way, was, like the celebrated telescope, a source of profound uneasiness to the coast-guardsman. He had hitherto been cautious enough to keep clear of direct implication with any smuggling transaction, though not of suspicion. This extreme wariness on Slippy Jem's part was another reputed cause of the officer's depression.

"Desperate villains, smugglers, aren't they, Jack?" observed Burnet.

"Oh, they're not desperate," answered Jack contemptuously. "Lord bless you, they're not game enough to be desperate—at least not on this coast. Up Kent way they show a little fight now and then, but here they haven't the spirit of a tom cat. Why only about ten weeks ago, my mate came on a party of about twenty of 'em, running brandy. They had landed on the rocks out yonder, at night (it was precious dark), and they were hauling the casks with ropes up the cliff. When they caught sight of my mate, down they let the casks and was off in a jiffy. He's less than me, and I ain't a big man, but he was enough for twenty of that sort. And Slippy Jem, he's a nice fellow to call a smuggler, I don't think. If he'd only come out and show himself, I'd know where to have him. But will he come out?" continued the coast-guardsman, in a tone of profound disgust. "No, he won't."

This obstinate spirit on the part of Slippy Jem so affected the coast-guardsman, that there was evidently nothing more to be had out of him. The two young men walked up the down towards the house.

"I wonder what light would come into those eyes, if I made love to her," thought Arthur, with his mind on Clara: "whether they would soften now. Gad! I shouldn't go into raptures if they did—I don't care for her enough, in spite of her beauty. Still, I should like to try, as an experiment in natural history."

He sought her out that evening, and altered his manner towards her. Hitherto sarcastic and indifferent almost to rudeness, he now adopted a gentler—even a tender tone. The change in him threw her into an almost childish delight. Her old enemy was at last striking his colors.

Delicately, and with insidious approaches, he narrowed his entrenchments, nearing the citadel day by day, until he knew that a sudden assault would carry it. As yet he had never told Clara Wraxall that he loved her, but he allowed her to infer it in a hundred nameless ways; and in as many more he knew that she loved him. The inference left her very happy, and somewhat softer in mood—certainly softer towards him. And he? Well, he was not in love with her as yet, though the unspoken love-making gratified him with the pride which conquest brings.

They now spent most of their time together. The household at the Burnets said they were engaged. Arthur and Clara said nothing.

Three or four weeks went by in this pleasant manner, when an arrival roused Arthur Golding to a sense of "his goings on." One day Burnet said—

"Golding, I'm sorry I shall have to leave you to-morrow; but don't let that hurry your departure. I've promised to look after some business for my father in Scotland, and must start at once. By-the-bye, some cousins of ours are coming to-morrow, so you'll be consoled for the loss of one in the domestic circle. I commend Kate Burnet to your special attention, she is a nice little girl. But I forgot; you're taken up already with the magnificent Clara."

Next day the cousins arrived: the said Kate, her brother Edward, a lad of nineteen, and a mamma, a lady so aged and stiff-limbed that she seemed to have been excavated from some geological formation. A very short space of intercourse with the new-comers taught Arthur Golding two important facts. The first was that the youth Edward was as hopelessly and insanely in love with Clara Wraxall as a young man of his age generally is with somebody older than himself; the second was that Kate Burnet was a pretty, gentle girl, whom it would be quite possible to like very much at first sight, and love very much ever after.

And then he fell suddenly and strangely in love with her. He could not tell how it happened, he could not reason on the matter at all; he simply tumbled down a kind of amatory abyss, and came to consciousness when he was at the bottom. He had not interchanged many words with her, and he had been flirting desparately with Clara; yet here he was at the end of it—all but engaged to Clara, and in love with Kate. He took himself to task severely, mentally shook himself, and metaphorically boxed his own ears for a senseless noodle. It was all to no purpose. He did not like Clara a bit, and he loved Miss Burnet to adoration.

He watched that silly young Edward flutter round his goddess, and internally wished he could consign her, a human cargo, to Edward's care, freight and imposts paid. He was afraid of Clara now, afraid lest she should discover the true state of his heart. Not for himself he feared, but for Kate. He could not say what that passionate nature might dare against a successful rival. He would put an end to her hopes at all events by withdrawing himself. He had never declared his love; it was only a mild flirtation, nothing more. Of what, then, could she complain?

It was a well-meant but a wrong headed resolution, viewing the woman with whom he had to deal; and again he blundered in trusting to his own nature. True, he could withdraw himself from Clara's society, but it was not so easy to keep out of Kate's way. The "metal more attractive" exerted a fatal influence over him. School himself as he would, he found himself irresistibly impelled to Kate's side. He might have put an end to this conflict for ever, by leaving Clevedown. He was a free agent of course. But then, what man in love is a free agent? Thus he lingered on, and the days sped by, and Clara Wraxall, he could see, was brooding over his altered manner. She had tried various little arts to win him back; she had even endeavored to excite his jealousy by flirting with the infatuated Edward, transporting that youth to the seventh heaven, from which she soon precipitated him by comparing him disadvantageously with Mr. Golding. From that moment the young lover hated Arthur with a devouring, jealous hatred.

Not altogether in idle purpose had she struck this chord in her young lover's breast. For the slight which she felt Arthur had offered her had grown with broodings over it into an insult, and Clara was one of those women whom it is not safe to insult. She had already conceived the wish to do him a sudden and deadly injury, for she knew she was supplanted. Once or twice the temptation had occurred to her to wreak some evil on Kate, but she rejected that thought as impracticable. "It would only turn his liking for her into love," thought Clara, "if he thought she had suffered for his sake. Besides, my quarrel is not with that poor doll, it is with him. I would rather he suffered if any one." And then, with a somewhat vague purpose, though it pointed to the one end —namely, the design of dealing him a blow, though how or when she could not determine—she bethought herself of the plan to secure an instrument for herself and an enemy to Arthur in her young lover Edward.

One morning the family were discussing over the breakfast-table the particulars of a tragedy recorded in the newspapers. A woman of the lower order, stung by jealousy, had stabbed to the heart the mistress of her husband, and had been placed on her trial for murder. Mr. Burnet was laying down his opinion that the accused would escape with penal servitude, having received such strong provocation.

"She was a fool," burst out Clara, her dark eyes lighting; "she should have killed her husband; that would have been the fuller revenge. Did she think to hurt him by destroying his paramour? Why, even though she had done it with impunity, what would have been the result? That he would have forgotten his loss in a month, and taken another. It is the nature of men to sin, and to wrong, and to forget. The coward—the mean dastard! she should have stabbed him."

"Hallo, Clara," exclaimed Mr. Burnet, opening his eyes, "we shall have you coming out in the tragic line next—a Medea of the nineteenth century."

She rose from the table, leaving Arthur decidedly uncomfortable, and walked down to the beach, her passionate spirit on fire. Walking fiercely onward, she came on the coast-guardsman.

"Is anybody ever drowned hereabouts?" she asked the coast-guardsman abruptly.

"No," returned that obstinate functionary; immediately adding, "three years ago a man tumbled off Cleve Cliff, and never came up again."

She looked toward the cliff.

"Well, then he was drowned, wasn't he?"

"Some say he was dashed on the rocks," answered the coast-guardsman grudgingly.

"Was anybody with him when he fell?"

"His sweetheart."

"Perhaps she pushed him over."

"Good Lord!" ejaculated the coast-guardsman; "what should she push him over for?"

Clara Wraxall made no reply, but walked to the summit of Cleve Cliff. The placid ocean, beautiful in the morning sunlight, was laving the foot of the rock beneath her as she bent over the hazardous railing.

"An easy plunge and a swift death here," she thought, "if the worst came to the worst. Depend upon it that girl pushed her lover down. Perhaps he deserved it."

She stayed there an hour ruminating. "I don't know," she reflected, "that I could ever kill a man with my own hand, however much I might hate him; but I know I could see him killed without putting forth a finger to save him." So saying, she descended the cliff and returned to the house, where, with the irresolution which was her one claim to womanhood, she set about a last effort to win back the straying affections of Arthur Golding.

But all her arts were to no purpose. Arthur remained cold and distant, and her womanly instinct detected a rival. One day Golding had determined, for the seventieth time, to leave Cleavedown on the morrow, and announced his resolution to his host.

"What, leave us now at the best part of the autumn?" exclaimed Mr. Burnet; "oh, nonsense! It's too late to shoot, and for idling purposes there's no place like the south. Besides, we've our picnic to-morrow on Cleve Cliff. You must stay for the picnic."

And Arthur yielded and stayed. Oh, those picnics—disastrous ever to the peace of incipient lovers! Blessed beyond the name (unfortunately unrecorded) of the man who invented sleep—blessed by young hearts is the man who invented picnics. If Arthur had been as learned in psychology as he was in the law, he would have shunned the new danger. But he was ignorant, or perhaps courted danger—at all events, he went. The inevitable fate befel him. A row to Cleve; a shifty banquet on the grass; a stroll over the headlands looking on the sea; a ramble down the rocks to the blue water; and he found himself with Kate. They were alone, and the tide was coming in. (I have remarked that tender hearts are always softer when the tide is coming in; doubtless because the moon regulates both alike—love and water.) The day was declining; an autumn evening, calm and cool, growing apace. Arthur Golding could stand it no longer.

"Miss Burnet," he began; "Miss Burnet—Kate—may I call you Kate?"

You know what followed. When a gentleman begins by addressing a young lady by her surname, and immediately substitutes the Christian name, it usually leads to one result. Arthur Golding obeyed the immutable law; and before the sea had advanced another foot it was all over; his love was told, and a sweet admission obtained in return.

The tide was at its flood.

He walked up Cleve Cliff, a cooler man. Kate Burnet had rejoined her fossil mamma. Kate loved him, and had confessed it. So far, that was satisfactory. But how about Miss Wraxall? He lit a cigar, and pondered over that problem, looking down over the rickety rail on the cliff-head into the sea, on which the shades of night were thickly falling. He thought over it until the difficulty of the situation had melted into clouds as thin and unsubstantial as the wreaths of smoke curling from his cigar. Turning to join the picnic party, now wending homeward, he encountered the subject of his meditation.

"Miss Wraxall!"

She was pale, and unnaturally calm; he could see that, dark as it was getting. She advanced full upon him.

"Sit," she said. "They are going home. You are too late to overtake them. You are too late to overtake her. Sit down."

"Pardon me—I——"

"Sit, I say. I have something to speak to you about."

He bowed, and sat down on the rustic seat on the cliff. He could do little else, in common politeness. She took a seat beside him, placed her hands on his knees, and looked into his face.

"Arthur"—her voice was troubled: "why have you changed towards me?"

He did not reply; the truth being that he was for the moment nonplussed.

"Arthur Golding," she resumed, after an awkward pause, "for the last month you have led me to believe you loved me. You told me so. Silence, sir! If ever looks—lying looks—spoke love, yours did. Did they not?"

He had recovered himself somewhat by this time. "If they did" he answered coldly, "I am unfortunate. I do not love you, and have never loved you."

She started up, her hot blood on fire, and her passion overmastering her. "You love that chit—that doll—that baby-face; you have thrown away me for her; you have trampled on a woman's heart for a thing of plaster, with the soul of a puling child! Is it not so?"

Her fierce incentive almost bore him down. He rose, and stepped back towards the railing on the edge of the cliff, she fiercely following.

"Speak, you smooth-tongued villain!" hissed Clara Wraxall; "am I not right? Do you not love Miss Weazen-face?"

"You can say nothing of Miss Burnet," answered Arthur, "that does not raise her in my estimation and make me loathe you more."

She threw up her clenched fists in the whirlwind of her passion. "If I were a man, I would throw you into the sea for those words. I would strike you dead before me if I could. Hah!" she cried, looking over his shoulder, down the path which led to the land side of the cliff; and to his intense surprise she flung herself into his arms, clasping him close, swaying backward and forward, and emitting shriek upon shriek of piercing shrillness.

"Good heavens, Clara, what can you mean?" exclaimed Arthur Golding. "Are you mad?—Clara!"

Still she clung to him, screaming, and affecting to battle with him. A dim figure ascended the cliff by the pathway—came nearer, and revealed Edward Burnet in the shadows of the growing night.

Clara Wraxall burst away from Arthur, and flew to the new-comer. "Oh, Mr. Burnet," she cried; "you—you will at least protect me! That man has insulted me—has offered me violence."

"Mr. Golding!" exclaimed the astonished Edward, recognising him.

"Thank heaven you came," she sobbed. "He—I cannot say how grossly he endeavored to wrong me."

Arthur Golding, standing against the railing, had, up to this, had no opportunity to interpose a word. With an infatuated cry of fury the young man rushed at him and aimed a blow at his head with a thick stick which had aided his ascent.

"Scoundrel!" cried Edward, delivering the blow.

Interposing his arm, Arthur Golding received the blow—a severe one—while with the other hand he stopped the young man's mad rush. There was a momentary scuffle, a push from Golding, and Edward Burnet was hurled against the railing, which crashed beneath his weight, and he disappeared over the edge of the cliff.

"Merciful heaven!" cried Arthur Golding, horror-stricken. "What have I done?"

"You have killed him," screamed Clara Wraxall. "He is dead. You have murdered the brother of your beloved."

And like one possessed she fled screaming down the path and was lost in the darkness.

ARRIVAL OF A "PRESIDENTIAL TRAIN."

IMMENSE EXCITEMENT IN SALT LAKE CITY!

THE LIGHTS HAVE TO BE EXTINGUISHED!!

A TRAIN THROWN OFF THE TRACK IN CONSEQUENCE!!!

Jingo, our special reporter, sends us the following account of the arrival of an Express Train. We are somewhat behind the times in presenting it; but, as many persons living in the country were not present, and should they come to the city now, could not possibly catch that Train, as it left about a week ago, we present the following for their especial benefit:

Stirred up by the occasion, our reporter commences with the following beautiful poetical effusion:

Oh were ye ne'er a school-boy!
And did you never, Train,
And feel that swelling of the heart
You ne'er shall feel again?

The first Train on the U. P. R. R. arrived; a stage belonging to Clawson and Caine was run over by it. An immense crowd gathered immediately. Strange to relate, this Train ran all the way from Boston without a tender behind, and was propelled entirely by gas instead of steam. Fearing an explosion, a portion of the gas was turned off immediately, but there was still enough left to run the Train for an hour and a half. Gentle reader, did you ever see a Train? 'Tis quite a sight—we stepped on a train once, and we saw sights —shall never forget it. From what we saw of this Train, we think it couldn't be easily switched off. On examination this Train was ascertained to be Geo. Francis Train. The proprietor held forth on his grievances at the theater. We didn't go into the gal-lery fearing we should find too many gals there, and might step on a few trains; besides we are not accustomed to moving in the upper circles of society. These circles are much frequented by individuals who have been re-fined by Alderman Clinton, whose services in this respect cannot be over-estimated. No matter how coarse, how ignorant or how illiterate a man may be, he can seldom appear twice before the Alderman without becoming re-fined. In fact, his refining influence can only be equalled by his philanthropy: he loves to place lost characters on the road, advising them, at the same time, to work out their own salvation.

On entering the theater, we were much affected to see all the people sitting in tiers. After clapping some time, Train made his appearance and remarked that he ought to be in bed—said he would just as soon be hissed as clapped—we suppose his indifference in this respect arises from the fact that he has recently been clapped into jail.

As the audience voted for an "incoherent" account, we determined on the spot to satisfy them. The people were charged 75cts. and 100cts. a head. George Francis assured us he always took the cents of the people, whether they had any or not, but never kept any sense himself; here's where we felt to goinside with him (it being our own practice.)

Said he had spoken one hundred and seventy-eight nights, which he attributed to the fact that he didn't chew nor drink, nor spend any time in gamboling. We don't perceive anything remarkable in this, our wife has addressed us two hundred and seventy-eight consecutive nights in this city, and don't seem to weaken—we must admit, however, that she drinks and chews, as far as the dilapidated state of her teeth will admit.

The lecturer is a figurative speaker we should judge from the illustrations on the black-board: in the first place, he drew a large audience; also drew a thing like a balloon, which he said was San Francisco; said it was about to go up, but explained that the railroad cut the gas out of it. We suppose it is all right, but not being accustomed to gas, didn't see it in that light. His strongest point was where he pointed out the U. P. money on the black-board; many present couldn't see that, but would have been very glad to have done so. He got off the track two or three times, but this is excusable in a Train that runs on the U. P. R. R. It was 9½ o'clock before he became a through Train.

We understand that George Francis held forth a second night, proving himself a swifter Train than ever, running at the rate of about ten thousand words an hour. Photographs of his powerful sketches on the black-board can be purchased of Savage & Ottinger—or elsewhere.

You may re-lie on this report.

PLEASE FORWARD AT ONCE.—Such of our subscribers, whose subscriptions are now due, are requested to forward the pay at once, as we need it. The present great dearth of means has kept back so much of the pay due to us that scarcely one subscription in four has yet reached us. We blame no one for this, but we ask all to remember that our expenses are very great and that every little helps.

Such of our friends as have PROMISED TO PAY AT CONFERENCE TIME, are requested not to forget their promises, as we RELY UPON THEM.

"Well, my good fellow," said a victorious general to a brave son of Erin, after a battle, "and what did you do to help us to gain this victory?"—"Do!" replied Mike; "may it please your honor, I walked up bouldly to one of the inimy, and cut off his feet."—"Cut off his feet! and why did you not cut off his head?" asked the general. "Ah, an' faith that was off already," replied Mike.

"What's that?" asked Mrs. Partington, looking up at the column of the Place Vendôme, during her late visit to Paris. "The pillar of Napoleon," she was answered.—"Well, I never did!" she exclaimed; "and that's his pillow—he was a great man to use that! But its more like a bolster. And it's made of iron, I do believe. Ah, Isaac, see what it is to be great! How hard his head must have rested on his ironical pillow.

PAT CROWLEY.—'Tis the swate morn of Saint Valentine, Mrs O'Flam—and we ought to be pairing. I've brought ye some of the craythur that'll warm ye as much as the bright stars in your charming face devour me. And I've brought ye some geeses from my bit of a farm. Hark! to the music they make; and better than all—Pat Crowley has brought you his heart—his heart—Mrs O'Flam, and swears by the saint, who taught fond couples to pair, that he cannot do without ye, at all, at all. Consint to be mine.

[Mrs O'Flam cast her eyes on the "geeses," and "consinted!"]

Our "boy," a new importation, wants to know if the Indians in this country are generally well educated, because he has heard that Washakee is the best red (read) man in the Rocky Mountains.

WOMEN AND THEIR "VANITIES."

It is hard for men who do not comprehend a woman's nature to understand the passion for personal adornment which possesses the sex. We call it vanity; it is no such thing. It is pure nature, and a divine nature, too, manifesting itself. Every instinct of woman's being leads her to desire to appear beautiful, she can no more help it than she can help breathing. It is a passion that has been implanted within her as much for man's gratification as her own. To kill it, is not only to crush one half of the life and happiness out of her being but to kill our own. It is a sorrowful fact—no matter whether produced against our will or not—but all conditions of life where women are compelled to wear poor, ill-shaped, or wretched clothing, are depressing to her spirits and destructive of her vitality. These remarks are called forth by the fact that from our earliest youth we have been afflicted with homilies and lectures on the sinfulness of finery and show in woman. On examination, we have come to the conclusion that the difficulty lies in the fact that most of our human teachers are afflicted with an incurable desire to grip human nature by the tail and steer it, instead of allowing it to direct itself.

So it is, anyway, with this subject of women and personal adornment in particular. Men try to crush it in one generation and it comes up like an overwhelming sea in the next. It never has, nor ever will be cured. It will never die out till the passion for love and mating between the sexes expires. It has to be accepted as a great divine outworking in the female bosom, implanted to play its part in producing the life and variety of this state of existence, as well as that of worlds to come.

The great truth concerning this world is, that man, unaided by woman's faculties, cannot make this life as beautiful as it can be made. All the conceptions of all the men that ever lived, put together, would leave a void. There are elements of pleasure—charms of existence which a woman's brain alone can conceive of. Woman can appreciate intensity and depth of spirit and that which is eternal in affection, but she has a more vivid conception of what is necessary in the way of external beauty. She feels, without understanding why, the benefit of colors and forms to our wearied senses; and yet it is not she that loves them, it is great Nature within her that realizes our needs, and seeks to gratify us through her brain. In following her instincts for self-adornment, she but yields to a force, no less than God, working to surround us with beauty and grace.

Why cannot women do without such an eternal change in fashions? asks one. Why not get one good perfect pattern of a bonnet or a dress and stay at that? For about the same reason, we reply, that great grandam Nature cannot be content with one style of face, eyes of one expression, or noses of one cut, but exhibits herself in a thousand shades of variety. There is an echo of this divine passion for change and variety in woman's nature. To be fully happy, she must not only be adorned with what is beautiful or pretty, but she must have constant change. This is no weakness, folly, or vanity; it is a spirit inborn within her organization, calculated for the pleasures of the present life; but the full utility of which will never be seen till in the spheres of eternal beauty in worlds to come; women shall bring this very power and quality to bear in producing a paradise in which the senses will never tire.

We consider, then, that instead of repressing the yearnings of the female heart for objects of decoration, the taste should be cultivated within all reasonable bounds. The wife may indulge these desires, reckless of the anxieties that fill her husband's mind. But this is simply an extreme, and one that should never be argued as a reason why the considerate and loving wife should not be indulged to the fullest legitimate extent. We hold that every husband should cultivate in his wife the love of beauty and variety for his own sake. If poverty binds his hands, let the desire still prevail—even if he cannot gratify it as fully as he might wish. He should cherish every manifestation of this womanly nature, down to the simple adornment of a flower in the bosom or a rose in the hair. It is Nature outspeaking what she would have woman look and be.

Of course we look for something in a wife besides attention to external beauty or grace. We need womanly tenderness, motherly love, and wifely devotion,—without these no woman is complete. They are imperishable qualities that never can be replaced by external show; but to our mind, there never will come a time when women will become so good, pure, or loving, that they will be able to afford to dispense with the least outward perfection. In fact, the more truly a woman's mind becomes cultivated—unless it is a mere half cultivation of one side of her nature—the more will she desire to harmonize, not only her appearance, but every external amidst which she moves, with the purity and loveliness that reigns within her being.

We are aware that there are two sides to every subject, and there is an opposite side to this, which every true woman will realize in advance. But we are pleading now the woman's side of the question, and we would plead it on more points than that of personal appearance alone, because everything which brings light into women's eyes and pleasure to their hearts is a bequest to man. Some men go along shutting their hearts against everything a woman needs but the bare utilities of life. They cannot see that food, clothing and shelter are not half what a woman needs. She can exist on these—as thousands do—but she does not live: she is organized to need far more, and will perish from her heart outward, unless she has it. Tens of thousands of poor, petrified women, with scarcely a vestige of the merry girls that were each once the life of home, drag through a miserable existence, because men cannot understand that what they call their follies, are their necessities, their life—the very food upon which they feed. Women were not made simply to bear children, and do man's drudgery, shut up within a weary round of domestic duties, wearing out their pleasureless lives. They can be made to do this; but the husband, even when he cannot fully help it, pays a fearful price in the loss of that brightness and life that should animate his home. He gets a mummy instead of a wife. Women need life, variety, change,—in one word, they need pleasure far more than man. They cannot properly subsist without it. They are made for it more than man. They need attentions, and must have them, or they do not live. Few understand how cheap a woman's pleasures are. A trifling present, a manifestation of thought or affection concerning her, outweighs the value of a kingdom in her estimation. It has to be learned that women have no slight gratifications. The least are immense to them. Of course, they need love more than all. They need not the follies, but thet enderness of courtship carried along their whole lives. For this, thousands pine and live a daily death. What is a home, clothing, and food to them but the barest mockery of existence, without attention and love. It is the element which alone they fully breathe. Neither can they be fully happy, nor reflect half the sunlight, embosomed within their natures, back upon their homes, unless opportunities to gratify their taste for external beauty exist, more or less, around them. There are, of course, exceptions to every rule, but these are important, general truths; and we have no hesitation in saying, that, until men understand these necessities of woman's nature and make a business of gratifying them, they will rob themselves of half their pleasures, stunt their own natures, and kill the life and sweetness of their own homes.

"STEADYING THE ARK."

There are a few people in our Territory who, whenever an independent idea is expressed on any philosophical or theological subject, immediately call out, alarmed, that the speaker or writer in question is "steadying the ark," meaning thereby that such person is trying to dictate the church. As if—whether the speaker's intention was such or not—the action of independent thought could, by any possibility, be dangerous to an imperishable system like ours. It is a fear of having something of this kind said about them that has deterred many a person from expressing conceptions of the truth of which they were assured,—but which did not happen to tally with popular opinion. The existence of such a fear dwarfs and stunts the intellect as well as the spiritual growth of men; and being contrary to "Mormonism" which was offered to us all as a gospel of free thought—and free speech, too—should be broken down.

Why should men, who believe they have a gospel founded on the laws of eternal nature, fear that such an ark should be steadied or jostled? Fancy, the architect of the Temple, with its ten-foot granite walls and its thousand-tonned foundation, getting excited and calling out that somebody was trying to "steady" the Temple; and then fancy a gospel, ancient and imperishable as the fixed stars of eternity, being "steadied" by anybody. Men can have but little faith in the sublime immovability of their gospel who talk this way.

Those who feel in their hearts that they are built on final and unalterable truth, can afford to look calmly on at the wildest effort of free thought, knowing that every new scrutiny will only reveal to the truly intelligent mind a new beauty—a new point of harmony with all other facts. Instead of being alarmed or annoyed, their cry continually is—"steady us if you can." On this point, we feel much as our Delegate, Hooper, expressed himself about the Railroad bringing us to the scrutiny of the world: said he, in effect, "If our system won't bear to be brought face to face with the world, the sooner the miserable thing is broken up the better;" and all proud of their religion will say Amen. But here comes in a curious fact of human nature: the very same men who will say Amen to Bro. Hooper's remarks and who will trumpet to all the world their challenge for scrutiny of "Mormonism," and glory in every outside attack, the moment one of their own brethren expresses a thought ahead of their own, will point him out and say—"That's a dangerous kind of thinker—he's trying to steady the ark." And, with a whip of this kind—which, of course, is unsanctioned by the spirit of our divine priesthood—they unintentionally crush free thought out of their brethren's souls.

Our own opinion is that, when we invite men to use free speech and free thought to get into the Church, we should not call upon them, or ourselves, to "kick down the ladder by which they and we ascended to Mormonism." They should be called upon to think on as before, no matter who has or has not thought in the same direction.

There is one fatal error, however, which possesses the minds of some, and out of which this fear of "steadying the ark" has grown; it is this: that God Almighty intended the priesthood to do our thinking. Hence, if you say to such men, "What do you think on such a subject?" they will answer, "I don't know. What does the Priesthood say about it?" This is an extreme of a true doctrine. It is right to respect the priesthood but never to the crushing out of our own individuality. It is folly to suppose that the priesthood requires this. As far as we understand the spirit of that divine priesthood which rules this and all other worlds, it glories in bringing out the individuality of every man to the utmost. Instead of seeking to bring all to one dead level, and regulate all by one brain or twenty, it throws men back on to themselves to learn God there. It says: "Look within; you are a lens in which God is mirrored; His bright reflection is upon you; His voice is within you, speaking." Priesthood is simply an external oganization, instituted for the sake of order, and for the more correct and speedy promulgation of true principles. Its authority is to teach, and help the growth of the individual—not to swallow him up. God has taught more to the individual soul, directly, than he ever has through any external organization He ever instituted. Even when He teaches through the organization, He has to witness it within the soul after all, or it is worthless to the man. Still, it is priesthood that does it even then, for it is the invisible priesthood that is around us—"the spirits of the just made perfect," who whisper to the soul the way, the truth, and the light. But they cannot whisper to him who dares not think, for it is in and through thought alone that they can get at us. They work in harmony with all who truly represent the spirit of the priesthood in this life; and all go on together without discord. Could such fill us with their divine inspirations, their voice would be: "Think freely, and think forever; and above all, never fear that the 'Ark' of everlasting truth can ever be 'steadied' by mortal hand or shaken."

MY SISTER, CHARITY.

BY JOHN LYON.

What a world of thought gleamed from her blue eyes!
So chequered and spangled with glowing light—
Like the gold-tinged clouds of a thousand dyes
That peopled a scene of visions bright;
And the light that sparkled from out each pole,
Around the ball of each lovely star,
Was the fire of heaven, that lightened the soul—
And shone from her father's home afar.

She laughed as she looked beyond earthly space,
In the joyous smile of her infant glee.
As she gazed on the angels, whose fond embrace
She longed to regain, in eternity.
Her eyes were dimmed by the mists of time,
For the veil of earth was yet unriven;
She saw and conversed with those souls sublime,
That she loved and knew, in the courts of heaven.

Her infant innocence gladdened the heart,
That love from the well of affection drew,
But those hopeful tears had a burning smart,
In the mother's eyes, when she sighed adieu—
For her eyes grew dim in their heavenward gaze,
And their motionless light grew cold and dead,
Yet they gazed on, from their marble vase,
Long after the spirit from earth had fled.

GEORGE FRANCIS TRAIN.

BY EDWARD W. TULLIDGE.

Train is a man of marvelous idiosyncrasies of character. He has thereby puzzled the world. "Where shall we class the man" is the thought of nearly every one who has listened to his great speeches; "where shall we class him" you ask again, after having spent a few hours in private abandon with him. He is most extraordinary, unique, is your most sage conclusion; and then you go to sleep to dream about him, more mystified than ever. Yet this mystery is not because he is an unsolvable problem, but for the reason that he is an uncommon one.

The simple truth is—George Francis Train is a man of genius. He is charged with marvelous inspirations. A prophet in his sphere, he is carried along by the torrents of thought and agitation that overwhelm our times. The farcical finds in him its expositions, because the age is more farcical than serious; but the farce is not his. His mimiery is the rebuke. Society is insincere; brother George is earnest; and in his terrible earnestness, he caricatures, not his own metaphysics to make himself palpable, but the great men of his times; he crowds them pictorially into the public mind to force it to realize how infinitesimal they are, and how much of petty quackery there is in the policy of nations. But there is a subtle method in all this, not charlatanism—the capacity of a man mastering exploded policies to give to national administration a new era. Were George Francis Train living in an age terribly earnest like himself, we then should see him simply an earnest prophet of the times gravely propounding to legislators his vast schemes, and interpreting the voices of propheecy which he hears everywhere around him, proclaiming coming events. But the world is practically infidel and will not hear the grand but awful inspirations of races redeemed from slavery, of the women sovereignized, despotic empires or dilapidated monarchies overturned, and virgin republics conceived throughout the earth. In spite of the fact that the black race has been redeemed in an epic war, by the side of which the action of a thousand Iliads would be but as petty squabbles, the unfulfilled part of a Providential programme still seems madness when proclaimed by the Prophet of the Irish nationality—the champion of woman's rights. The earnest heart of the man is pained; and in fierce scorn, he turns back the ridicule by consummate acting. Hence the charlatan,—hence the mountebank. Does he accept the epithets? Not for a moment. Yet he tells you he does, and fools you more abundantly in proving it. But the words of Napoleon at the college of Brienne, when he was stung by the railleries of his proud school-fellows—"Bourrinne, I will do these Frenchmen of thine all the mischief in my power"—would be aptly paraphrased in the mouth of George Francis Train.

One of the prophecies which the man has heard the age utter is that he shall be the President of the United States. How wondrously extravagant! That is so. And so it would have been wondrously extravagant in any of the former Presidents, from Greoge Washington to General Grant, had either declared it prematurely. But this "prematurely" is a stupid word, meaning nothing touching great events. There is more probability to-day of Train being our next President than there was, before the Revolutionary war, of Washington founding the mightiest republic the world has ever seen, or before the Southern Rebellion, of Grant being in the White House, in 1869. Is the question then one of capacity? Surely Train is equal to Grant. That is practically decided by the present disgust of the nation; for our General-in-Chief has not sufficient capacity even to entertain us. Now over and above the very common capacity needed for a king or a president, Train has his splendid madness; in the possession of which he is the equal of any man living.

It is wondrously extravagant to expect to see Train in the Presidential Chair! I have said it is, and yet he will be there. I repent having written the last part of my sentence, but I am proving a point on paper as George does on his blackboard; for this impulsive affirmative, followed by the fear of having made a fool of one's self in affirming, is what tens of thousands of thinking men will feel, while the million will say ay and not take it back. Train is a philosopher and knows this. And so he affirms in his supreme egotism—I am going to the White House—I will go to the White House—You shall see me at the White House; get out of my way, for I am impatient to be in the White House; I will play Napoleon to you all, if you won't let me into the White House. This impresses society, and the man knows it. Yet he says it, not for effect, but because he cannot help saying it. He is a volcano of presidential prophecies concerning himself. It is his policy to let you know his programme, but then he is a mountain of aches to let every hill realize his eminence: so his subtle policy goes hand-in-hand with his simplest necessities, his vast ambitions germinate his noblest inspirations.

This prophecy about himself is to Train the greatest prophecy of the age, for it involves all others. For him, all things were created and all opportunities born. The woman's cause was made for him; and their cause has just come up at this nick of time for his special glory. He is the self-constituted Adam of all the female race—a thousand times greater polygamist than Brigham Young; and the woman's platform is, for the future, morally and socially the uppermost one and the most unique-looking plank ever erected by a political agitator. George Francis also knows this, and he and the ladies share the glee together. The men on that plank at first are few. Train glories in this, because it is his own special track. The ladies need a champion, and it is peculiarly in conformity with their tastes to have a man to champion them. Together they make a very pretty caricature; but they also make a tremendous cause. There is, therefore, self-congratulations between brother George and the fair sisterhood.

Then, there is the Irish race. They also were created a few thousand years ago specially for Train to run them on the track of their new dispensation. Every event up to the present time has been so much preparation, nothing more. Their Prophet will make them believe this or something very like it. Has he a million Irish votes? He says so. And he will verify his words by the constant assertion—"I am the leader of the Irish race." "Get out of my way, for I am the leader of the Irish race." First a wondrous extravagance is manifested in the man in his affirming that he will be President of the United States; wondrous assumptions ever rapidly follow, and a wondrous audacity maintains them. Ten to one, if he lives, these combinations will make him President of the United States, almost in defiance of America: her permission is not asked. Oh, do not think it difficult to reach the Presidential chair. It would be impossible for a man in the street to reach the roof of his house, but there are men who can fly to the moon. George is one of them. Things seemingly distant are closer to genius than things near, for genius is always in the air, while common talent is on the solid ground. Train understands this, for he understands himself. He is flying, not reaching. He will get the moon; and the majority will say, by-and-by,—"Confound the fellow, let him have her, for she has her woman's rights in the case, to choose." Grant found the moon in his flight, having been blown up to her from the mouth of the cannon, and he has been in a cloud ever since. Most likely he will amuse himself by cutting his bride up into little stars. Now George is flying after a new one by design, and he is blown up by his own volcanic genius.

Train is a Prophet of new inspirations—not an egotist. Let that be distinctly marked, for it is the correct psychological reading of the man. He hears the prophecies of his mission always and everywhere. He eats with them, drinks with them, goes to bed with them, and gets up with them. He is also one of the very few prophets who have gone about fulfilling his inspirations. And he is ever meeting society with—"You carry Cæsar and his fortunes: Be not afraid, Cæsar is in your boat." The assumptions are like his earnest spirit, immense, but there will be tens of thousands strengthened thereby. A paragraph now upon the solidity of his platform, and then a metaphysical and physical summary upon the man.

In the first place, the woman's cause is the cause of the age, revolution is the method of that age, and republics are the institutions of the future. Not sectional, but universal revolutions are demanded. The very atmosphere is charged with their tremendous combined agencies, the human heart everywhere palpitates with the throbs of the mighty change. There is an awful prophecy abroad; its voices startle every man's ear who is in psychological communion with the times. The burden of the prophecy is—"And I will overturn, overturn, overturn until he comes whose right it is to rule, and I will give it him." George Francis has heard this, and thinks he is the man meant, and so he is, unless some greater man steps forward to lay a mightier claim. There is then a seeming fitness in him to society's necessities. The women most certainly will hold the balance of power, a million Irish votes will back him, and revolution everywhere will need a general leader, Train is incoherent enough for all. Therefore the programme is sound.

Now for his personality: He is the most Napoleonic man of the age; his schemes are not less vast, his ambition equal, his belief in his mission unsurpassed, his will and audacity tremendous. His physique is like a mountain; he is an image-smasher by nature, and a champion of the weak and wronged, because he feels so much his own strength and power to defend. In this, he is a thorough American—he is, in fact, America incarnate—a type of her might, her splendid destiny, and her egotism;—the man is of a strange genius. Then he speaks from a battery of inspiration, and he feels somebody behind him, though he don't know who it is. He is a wonderful medium, but not a seer; and every inspirational people will find in him a champion, because he can't help it, and that is why the women have him in their Train, for women, like the Mormons, are inspirational.

THE SPIRIT IN THE WHOLE BODY.

BY JOHN LYON.

If philosophers and theologians, instead of laying down a theory that the head is the sole workshop and residence of the spirit in man, had established the fact that the spirit occupied the whole body and actuated every member thereof, they would have obviated many seeming contradictions, and given greater scope for their deductions on the capacity and nature of man, as a rational and accountable being.

Phrenology inculcates that all our faculties of reflection, feeling, and propensities are developed in accordance with the bumps on our heads. We do not intend in the forthcoming reflections to dispute this fact, but to show that the whole system of man's organization is actuated by the spirit which is in him, and not confined entirely to the formation enclosed by his skull.

It is affirmed, that the development of language is directly behind the eye; but will the brain give the eye its penetration, its beautiful lustre, its dullness, or its treacherous sneaking look? By no means. The expression of the eye, we should think, is brightened, or downcast in accordance with the pursuits and practices of life, and this must proceed from another source than the development of the organ itself. All these qualities of feature and expression may be seen at differents period in the same pair of eyes. Large eyes are said to indicate artificial language. What we understand by artificial language, is that power of speech which is acquired by imitation. This brings to my recollection the fact that, when at school, all the noisy rascals were large-eyed; but their vociferous disturbances did not proceed from imitation—the birch was the provocation. Their language was anything but imitation of what they had heard at home, or in school. And none of them ever became eminent linguists or orators.

It is the spirit that portrays in the eye the conceptions of hidden thought, which can be expressed without the organs of articulation, the joy, the grief, the knavery or murder, that beams or lurks in this wonderful organ, as it is influenced by passion.

We are taught that there is no brain beneath the ridge of the nose, yet how much of character can be read from a Roman, an aquiline, a straight, a snub, or a pug nose. The cheek bones, the lips, the chin, and the neck, are all proportionally illustrative of character as well as the breast, the body, the arms, the legs, and the feet. [thanks to Lavater!] and are just as significant to illustrate certain kinds of character, as, large bumps of comparison, firmness, or philoprogenitiveness.

And what is still more conclusive, we have found great mental activity in persons who were deformed by accident in their birth, or by misfortunes in after life, who, had their mental powers been dependent on their organization, they never could have become the wonderful prodigies of mental acquirements that they were.

REFLECTIONS ON THE NATURE OF MAN'S FORMATION.

Think for a moment of men bordering on idiocy, being the greatest mathematicians in the world, and that by mental calculation, without the use of figures. Think of Byron having less brains than Southey, and then think of the whole character being expressed by the head. There is, also, the sense of feeling, which has the entire body for its development and operates in many ways, without the needful aid of brain assistance. How acute must be the feelings of a person born blind, when taught to read by the touch of his fingers, while running them over letters raised on paper, seemingly with as much ease as another person can read by the use of his eyes.

It is true that the senses of hearing, seeing, tasting and smelling, exercise their powers of sensibility through the organ of the brain; but who will affirm, or who knows that the head is the spirit's dwelling place? These faculties are so situated that they must, of necessity, act through the head to the other parts of the body. It is the highway, so to speak, to the heart, the stomach, and all the nervous system of man. In corroboration of this idea, musicians have been observed, after playing the greater part of an evening and morning, at dancing parties, to play tunes familiar to them with accuracy while sleep had so closed up their senses that they would start when spoken to, as if in a dream.

There was a blind mathematical philospher by the name of Sanderson who could distinguish counterfeit medals, and coin by the touch of his fingers, and who could tell the approach of a horse at a very great distance by the same faculty. He discovered a horse to be blind by the cautious tread of its feet upon the ground. Here we have figure, distance, and sound, as well as the familiar use of a musical instrument where there was no large development of corresponding phrenological signs—and, in cases where the outer senses were dormant, showing that perception is not confined to the eye, nor sensation to the feeling of touch—all of which proves the existence of a discerning spirit in man, working throughout the whole body.

MURPHY AND MACK'S MINSTREL TROUPE.

The Daily Telegraph and the Evening News having left us one little subject for criticism on the performances of the Murphy and Mack Minstrel Troupe, we will, in conjunction with our intended notice on the cornet duets performed by Mr. Mark Croxall and Mr. R. W. Kohler on Friday evening, August 26, commence our remarks with the untouched subject, namely, choral finales to songs.

Songs and ballads, when brought before the public by some popular and favorite vocalist, either male or female, are sure, not only to make a favorable impression with the audience, but the critic also will catch the inspiration, by the applause tendered to that priest or priestess of song. But in harmonic combinations, notwithstanding the purity of delivering united sounds, little notice is taken of such performances—when there is no melodial introduction—except by the musician, who delights in harmony as well as melody.

As simply constructed songs and ballads are the rage of modern times, we must certainly say that compositions that have a chorus finale are preferable to those composed principally for the display of the solo vocalist.

The harmonic finale, instead of being detrimental to the solo singer, is the enhancing portion of the song or ballad, and is frequently the cause of an encore, if the chorus is effectually interpreted.

We trust that no one will think, from the above remarks, that we are opposed to the expressive rendering of cavatinas and such like composition where the rouladial and other ornamental passages are written for the effective display of the vocal artiste, as we admire the varieties that music is capable of producing to its votaries; but it is the general non-appreciation of harmony with the mass where our remarks are directed, and we will now say that, in the song-choral branch of the divine art, we are inclined to the belief that Murphy and Mack's minstrel troupe cannot be excelled.

The greatest points of choral perfection are the unity of voices in producing the amalgamative blending varieties of intonation, and a practical use of the diaphragm for the full chest and sotto voce variations.

Also the method of bringing out with clear distinctness the combinations of direct and inverted harmonies that they might be known by the musician by their preparation and resolution. We noticed the perfection of these points in the rendition of many harmonic varieties contained in the choruses sung by the Murphy and Mack Minstrel troupe. We would also add that the voices were all excellent for the above style of harmonic vocalization; and we must also say that we have rarely met with a more pure and silver-like tone of falsetto than was produced by the alto singer in the choruses.

With these few remarks on the minstrel troupe, we will now refer to the two duets performed on the same evening by Mr. Mark Croxall and Mr. J. H. Kohler on their cornets of Horn's vocal duetto, "I know a bank," and Mendelssohn's composition, "I would that my love."

The part selected by Mr. Croxall at the rehearsal on Friday noon, Aug. 26th, was the one generally sung by the primo soprano, and Mr. Kohler took the mezzo soprano, for rendition.

This duet of Horn's being composed for the effective display of two principal voices, each of the performers on the cornet were on the same ground, both of them having the same advantage of proving their skill as solo executionists on the above instrument.

After the introductory symphony of eight measures, played by Professor Pratt on the piano-forte, Mr. Kohler opened the duet with a two-bar solo phrase, which he rendered with purity of tone and artistic variety.

The duet then commenced; but, in the first three or four bars, we discovered a nervousness in Mr. Croxall's tone on the cornet. The effect of nervousness is the disturbing tremolo in what is termed the vocal chords situated in the throat; which disturbance produces non-purity of tone and volume. With the singer, it is not only injurious to the tone, but it affects the enunciation also. However, Mr. Croxall soon recovered, and the two performers were then equally matched; and then came such breadth, such fullness and blending purity of sound delivered from the two cornets that we have not heard for many years, except at their rehearsal on the same day at the theater.

In the eleventh bar, closing the first division of subject, the double trill was introduced; but in the execution of this grace, we perceived a slight indecision as to the manner of rapidity in their performance of the double shake.

By the way of explanation, we will observe that there are different methods employed by the vocalist and instrumentalist in the execution of the trill or shake: some will commence this grace with extreme rapidity in starting, while others will analyze the trill and produce it slowly and increase with gradual velocity until they arrive at the demi-semiquaver quickness. Doubtless it was Mr. Croxall's and Mr. Kohler's non-knowledge of each other's method, and for want of more practice together, that caused the indecision we noticed in their execution of the shake. In fact, much united practice is required before perfection can be obtained in this most difficult ornamental finish.

With the vocalist, this grace is seldom used in the present day, excepting with female voices. The reason why it is not fashionable with male voices is, it takes too lengthened a practice to produce a perfect trill; and in fact the ornament cannot be rendered effective with the male voice; it belongs only to the female, because it is an imitation of the nightingale grace, and can only be imitated by the soprano, mezzo soprano and contralto voices, and such instruments as are smooth in tone.

In returning to the subject of the duet, we will observe that at the opening of the second division, the parts are inverted, and Mr. Kohler took the highest one, according to the inversion. It was evident that, when he caught up the melody, the musician was aroused within him; the occasional carelessness which we have noticed was thrown aside; he was matched with a player that put him on his mettle, and his reputation was at stake, and he was alive to the necessity of being the artiste, and then his tones were excellent; in fact, both performers were warmed up, and they gave us a most effective variety of intonation, and also a most spirited and truthful interpretation of passages contained in this division of subject, and again closed with the double trill.

This time, the shake was more equal and distinct: there was more care exhibited by both performers and a more perfect intonation was produced by them; and they also watched each other's rapidity of executing this much varied ornament; and success was the result.

The third division opens with solos containing four measures in each and placed in the form of question and answer. This method of constructing the sections in the composition gave both artistes an opportunity of displaying their skill in expression, and varied coloring in the under and full chest intoning. This was a careful bit of friendly competition; each of the artistes striving to give full effect to the interpretation of the composition. The friendly trial produced a decided success, neither of them bearing off the palm of superiority, both aiming to render perfect the beautiful phrasing of the composer in this division.

The dancing triplets which followed in the last division of the duet, were gracefully and equally delivered in tone and in time; and the closing six-bar accelerando, was most energetically and effectively brought out; and considering the disadvantage of non-practice together—and that with Mr. Croxall it was almost at first sight, having only ran it through twice—we must in honesty say it was a fine rendering by both performers; and we were pleased to find that it elicited from the audience an enthusiastic—and we believe they considered it a well deserved—encore.

The duet that followed the encore was one of Mendelssohn's divine compositions called—"I would that my love." In this duet, Mr. Kohler took the principal subject, and here his fine-tone upper notes were heard with great effect. In changing the parts, Mr. Croxall took the mezzo or under one throughout the duet. There was no moving from one part to the other for display of the two registers of notes. But notwithstanding this change from the primo to the mezzo arrangement, it did not lessen the quality or purity of Mr. Croxall's tone on the cornet. This gentleman's method of practice is to render the lower tones equal to the higher ones, therefore, the change, as we have observed, did not lessen the effect of his delivery.

In this composition the performers had to vary their style of playing. There were no light tripping passages, or florid points of execution to display their skill in this line of rendering; but there were many effective and changing phrases of expressive beauty to bring out. There was a fine opportunity also opened to both artistes to display the under and full chest intonation on their instruments. There were also the advantages of the decrescendo and crescendo notes to render effective, and in all these points the performers were well up, and throughout the whole of this beautiful composition, the rendition was satisfactory to the learned, as well as the unlearned, in the divine art of music.

It must be remembered that it was no little trial to place Mr. Croxall—whose daily avocation prevents him from professional practice—by the side of such an artiste as Mr. Kohler, who, we well remember to have held the position as the principal cornet soloist at the Theatre Royal and Amphitheatre, Liverpool, England, where a first class band of professionals was employed. And to be enabled to draw a favorable comparison of Mr. Croxall's performance on the cornet, with Mr. Kohler, is a credit to our city; and we are pleased to have such an artiste residing among us.

We must not omit to mention the easy and watching method of Professor Pratt's accompaniment on the pianoforte, which added much effect to the rendering of both compositions.

In our next review of music by local talent, we intend to speak of the performance of our Orchestra at the Theatre.

The interpretations of the overture and other pieces played by the band on the reöpening night, deserve honorable mention. In our next we will be more explicit. The want of space is the reason of its omission in this number.

DAILY LIFE OF NAPOLEON AND EUGENIE.

Perhaps our readers may be curious on the subject of the Imperial manner of life when staying at Fontainebleau. The Emperor rises very early, as indeed is his habit everywhere. By eight o'clock he has got through a certain amount of governmental business, and settled more than one important affair. It is only after occupying himself with these State matters that he retires to inspect his flowers, he is extremely fond of his plants, and waters them himself. The empress is not so matutinal; she seldom rises until half-past seven. It is well known that at Fontainebleau her majesty occupies Marie Antoinette's apartments, where she is surrounded by many of the belongings of that unfortunate queen. Her bed, which is gilded, at one time belonged to Mme. Dubarry; afterward the Dauphine had it, and retained it after she became Queen, and ultimately it was removed to Fontainebleau, where it remains stationary. At 11 o'clock the Emperor and Empress breakfast; when their majesties are at the Tuilleries, they are usually tete a tete, but at Fontainebleau all the household join in the breakfast table. When the repast is concluded, the Emperor takes a turn or two in the garden, and then return to his study for hard work. The Council of Ministers who assemble in Paris at one o'clock, do not meet at Fontainebleau until 4 o'clock. At 7 o'clock, dinner is announced; the household assemble at it, and generally some guests are invited from Paris. Dinner over, the company meet again in the Empress' department after a stroll in the park. The Emperor retires early, between 9½ and 10, but the Empress rarely bids good night before 11.

BEAUTIFUL FIGURE.

Two painters were employed to fresco the walls of a magnificent cathedral; both stood on a rude scaffolding constructed for the purpose, some eighty feet from the floor. One of them was so intent upon his work that he became wholly absorbed, and in admiration stood off from the picture, gazing with delight. Forgetting where he was, he moved backward slowly, surveying critically the work of his pencil, until he had neared the end of the plank upon which he stood. At this critical moment, his companion turned suddenly, and, almost frozen with terror, beheld his great peril. Another instant and the enthusiast would be precipitated upon the pavement beneath. If he spoke to him, it was certain death; if he held his peace, death was equally sure. Suddenly he regained his presence of mind, and seizing a wet brush, flung it against the wall, spattering the beautiful picture with unsightly blotches of coloring. The painter flew forward and turned upon his friend with fierce imprecations, but, startled at his ghastly face, he listened to the recital of danger, looked over the space below, and, with tears of gratitude, blessed the hand that saved him.

LUNET.

BY A DALRYMPLE.

Oh the grave, the grave, oh who can tell
How many loved ones in thy bosom dwell?
Thou hast one, at least, I can't forget,
My darling bright-eyed sweet Lunet.

Lovely while living, fair and bright,
In death, still lovely robed in white,
Her cold lips I kissed, can I forget
My darling bright-eyed sweet Lunet.

Around my heart she'd fondly flung
Affection's cords while yet so young;
So dear to me, I called her pet,
My darling bright-eyed sweet Lunet.

TERESE, THE HEBREW MAIDEN;
OR,
NOT ALL DROSS.

BY EDWARD W. TULLIDGE.

CHAPTER LX.

A WOMAN'S PLAN.

For the space of an hour the Spanish woman lay upon her bed, convulsed. Her grief, her jealousy, her ecstasies of revenge were followed by agonies of despair. The belief, which now possessed her, that Farinelli had murdered Walter Templar, to bring Terese at last to his arms, was torture, for, to her mind, insane with the one great passion, that seemed possible. Walter gone for ever, time, and the persistency of Farinelli's love, would conquer the Jewess at last. Many such cases had been, and why not this another? In her distraction she even doubted Terese. Yet her resolve to betray Farinelli was agony. For a moment she would relent, and prefer to see him triumph and herself forsaken, but at the next moment she would return to her fearful vow made in Rome —"Mine in life or in death."

At length Clara Garcia arose, having subsided to a calmness like that which succeeds the thunder-storm after its first expressions of fury, leaving nature doubtful whether or not a second burst more terrific than the first, would follow.

"I will save him," she said in this mood of frightful calmness; "I will save, not betray him; but I will save him upon one condition only."

The Spanish woman wiped her tears away impatiently, bathed her face and dressed to go out, after which she ordered her carriage.

"Yes, I will save him upon the condition that he will fly with me to Italy. But if not—well, never mind, that will come too soon if he refuses. Death to us both—Oh death to us both!"

"Shall I drive to the Park to-day?" inquired the coachman, as Donna Garcia stepped into her carriage.

"No; to Sir Richard Courtney's, No. 10 Grosvenor Square, haste, for I have an appointment there." And away flew the carriage to Sir Richard's house in Grosvenor Square.

Donna Clara found the family of the Courtney's at home, and in consultation with Sir Richard Brine, the most acute and indefatigable magistrate of the city, and chief of the London detective force. There were present also Farinelli and Judah Nathans. Terese now formed a part of Courtney's household, for since the disappearance of her son, Lady Templar in her affliction, cleaved unto the Hebrew Maiden as a sacred relic. Moreover, Terese's faith that Walter was still living, was now almost the only consolation left to the family. Donna Clara, therefore, though not particularly intimate with the Courtney's, visited Terese as at her own house, and received a cordial welcome. Farinelli was staying with Judah Nathans, but the prima-donna had not been wrong in expecting to find him at Sir Richard Courtney's

"Signorina Terese, you must pardon me for intruding upon you in your afflictions," observed Donna Garcia, "but I could not leave England for Italy without calling to bid you adieu."

"What, do you leave England so soon? I am very sorry for that" returned our heroine.

"Yes; I have received a most princely offer from the management at Rome to engage me for a year. Ha! Farinelli; you here? That is fortunate."

The foster-brother, who had been in conversation with Sir Richard Brine, came forward to speak to the lady, who pretended not to have noticed him before, though her eye had singled him out in deep conversation with Brine as soon as she entered.

"Clara!" Farinelli said aside as he shook her by the hand. "I pray you forgive me for not calling upon you since my return to London. This sad affair, and my own implication in it, have entirely absorbed my thoughts day and night."

The Spanish woman regarded him with a tender eye and a yearning heart, for the familiar name of "Clara" from him touched her, and in a moment made her disposed to doubt everybody rather than him.

"Farinelli, I must speak to you alone, this very night! I have that to say which must not even be whispered into any ear but yours. Where can we speak alone and without mistrust. I must tell you all, for this I came here to-day, and not to see her. Your very life is concerned."

"Why, Clara, what is it that so agitates you?"

"Not another word, Farinelli, here. The eyes of that man are upon us. Who is he?"

"Sir Richard Brine, the great mover of the detective force of England."

"Ah! avoid him, Farinelli, avoid him!" she said with a shudder, and then joining our heroine again added carlessly.

"Terese, I was just informing your foster-brother of the brilliant offer which I have received from Rome, and my intentions to accept the engagement and return at once to my sunny Italy. This foggy land kills the artiste. Three months singing in England destroys the voice for a year. I have not sung once to my own satisfaction since I have been in London, and I am sure the public is never satisfied when the singer is not."

"And yet the public is satisfied with Donna Garcia's wonderful vocal powers—more, that same public not longer ago than last night was carried beyond itself with admiration—for a London public is coldly critical—and to-day, lady, you are the theme of the papers as much as my friend Signor Farinelli."

It was Sir Richard Brine who spoke. He had marked the eagerness of her conversation with the foster-brother, and her sudden change of manner, and now her observation that she was about to leave England for Italy, at a time when London was taken by storm with her singing, was another item to note. Not that Sir Richard Brine suspected anything, but it was his professional business to observe all, note all, unravel complications, and, from apparent disconnections, trace out wonderful conclusions. Hence he had made one of his hazardous connections between the public talk about Donna Clara's singing and Farinelli's peculiar relations with the great Templar case without any special intention, yet not without some general method. Indeed, this method, of leaping from a striking circumstance to some other, seemingly very remote from it, Sir Richard Brine had found more than once to lead him to the identical clue, after which he had been diligently searching. He had often found, moreover, that the closest connections turned up appearing to the superficial eye the farthest apart. This, in criminal cases, where parties designingly place their connections at a distance to escape detection, he had also found to hold good especially. Hence, his peculiar method.

Donna Garcia saw in a moment that she had no mean person to match herself against in Sir Richard Brine, and she also realized how difficult it would be, even for Farinelli to leave England with her, providing he consented. Yet, that very increase of the sense of his danger made her more resolved to rescue him, if he only consented. The subtility of a woman's heart and brain, in protecting the one she loves, will, however, more than match the subtility of the detective, and so Donna Garcia felt herself a match for Sir Richard Brine. But boldness and originality were required, as well as subtilty; yet her plan was arranged during the conversation, which followed, and which she herself drew out concerning the speculation of the press upon Farinelli. Her policy was not to appear timid: and so she made a sudden charge upon the Director of the London detective force.

"I see you have Farinelli completely caged in London—absolutely prisoned!"

"Not so, lady. I must protest against your view."

"But I say yes, Sir Richard Brine; and I am more than ever resolved to fly from England."

"Donna Garcia has the world for her wings. England is to her no prison."

"Nor shall it be to Farinelli. He flies with me to Rome."

"Indeed, lady?"

"And, indeed, Sir Richard Brine! I have promised my hand to him in marriage" said the lady, boldly, lying to save him.

"I was not aware of that, Donna Garcia" observed Brine, somewhat embarrassed, for he was thus abruptly brought face to face with a case which he was inclined to grapple with, but knew not how, from its delicacy intrenched by boldness.

"Yes, indeed, Sir Richard! And as for your being aware that I had promised my hand in marriage to Farinelli on his return to London, that is not marvelous, nor would you now know it, but that I leave for Rome and am resolved on Farinelli's going with me—to escape you, Sir Richard Brine—to escape you, I say."

"Donna Garcia, you are unanswerable, and yet it certainly would not be wise for Signor Farinelli to leave England just at present. I grant, however, a justification for your anxiety, and also for this somewhat uncommon announcement."

"Do you hold my affianced husband a prisoner, Sir Richard?"

"No."

"Is he not, then, free to accompany me to Rome?"

"Friend Brine" observed Courtney, at this point, "I believe we have no right to interfere in this case. Farinelli is as free as ourselves. Not one of my family has the least doubts touching him. Nor has Mr. Nathans."

"None at all, I assure you," was the prompt reply of Judah.

"My niece told me before the disappearance of Sir Walter Templar of her anticipation of a union between her foster-brother and friend; and, from my knowledge, there has been no concertation between the lovers since the sad affair, which has occupied his attention."

"Well, well, gentlemen" observed Brine, "I am not authorized to interrupt our friend's departure from England under the very peculiar circumstances. So happiness and long life to the bride and bridegroom."

"God grant it!" responded Sir Richard Courtney.

Terese arose and kissed Donna Garcia. She understood the motive which had prompted her to her course, that afternoon, as indeed did all present; for, as we have seen the Spanish woman in her bold effort to save Farinelli, had not attempted to hide her motive. Sir Richard Brine was especially alive to this; and he experienced a professional admiration for the woman who could play such an original and determined part to get her lover out of his difficulties. He did not, however, think that Farinelli was guilty of any wrong, though he confessed to himself that he was much involved in complications from which a woman's wit had just rescued him. All things considered, now Donna Garcia had matched him, the director of the detectives was almost as much pleased as the Courtney family to find a legitimate excuse to allow Farinelli to leave England, for more than once he had felt it his duty to order his arrest. Nothing but his own conviction, backed by the confidence of the Courtneys, touching the foster-brother's innocence, had kept the detective from making that arrest. For the present, Farinelli was saved—not betrayed—by Clara Garcia.

CHAPTER LXI.

THE HIDDEN WITNESS.

The evening shadows were falling in the library of Sir Richard Courtney, and the room altogether possessed a certain gloomy tone. Courtney was, as we know, much of a recluse, and in his sanctum he kept up an antique state which would have well become his ancestors, but the rest of his house was modern enough. Since the disappearance of his nephew, his library had been a deserted place, for he found no pleasure now in meditation, but spent much of his time with Sir Richard Brine or his agents in endeavoring to discover the mystery of Walter's fate. The director of the detective force stealthily entered the library of his friend and closed the door softly after him.

"Strange that Farinelli appointed the library for an interview," mused Brine. "A tender conversation might have passed between them in any part of the house without intrusion. A love gossip would not have interested me, and after the announcement this afternoon, every person would have been good-naturedly disposed to have left the lovers together. This interview has a mysterious import. It is no love gossip. I must find out what it is. Ha! I can conceal myself in this closet."

Though Sir Richard Brine had given permission for Farinelli to leave London for Italy, his professional instincts had been quick to take a new suspicion. He had marked the agitation of Donna Clara, in her first regards of himself, when conversing for a moment with her lover, but her subsequent boldness had thrown him off the track, but no sooner had the Spanish woman won her point than he observed the same troubled manner, when she exchanged words with Farinelli. His quick ear had caught the words, "In the library," and he concluded at once that there was to be an interview of mysterious import. As he felt himself, under the circumstances, responsible for Farinelli, having given him his permission to leave England, he resolved to fathom the present mystery.

"Ha! here they come," he said after he had waited for about five minutes, "and now to hide in this closet. If it is nothing but love nonsense I shall be sufficiently punished for my mistrust."

Sir Richard Brine, with a wry face, jammed himself into the little closet among Courtney's manuscripts, just in time to escape the watchful eye of Donna Garcia, who entered the library with the foster-brother.

"Are you certain, Farinelli, quite certain, beyond the possibility of a doubt, that no one can overhear us?"

"Yes, Clara; but what is the meaning of your singular conduct? Do not be offended, I endorse all you have done, for your design has been evident to all—it was to save me from the danger which I know surrounds me. But I cannot consent just now to leave England, though from this day the public shall know that you are my affianced bride."

"No, no, Beppo, you must not stay in England. You will let me call you by the familiar name that your foster-sister gives you?"

"Yes, Clara. Henceforth I will be Beppo to you. And now let us talk calmly of our own affairs, while the family are dining, for our absence will be excused. We have potent pleas, dear Clara," he added with a smile, throwing his arm around her, and imprinting on her lips the first kiss.

It was the first love-kiss that Farinelli had, in all his life bestowed upon a woman. He had, in other days, when Terese was a girl, often kissed her with a timid reverence when she had held up to him her inviting cheek. But this was really his first love-kiss. The Spanish woman, in her passionate devotion, had at length won his heart, which, though it still held Terese as its deity, now took to itself Clara Garcia as its companion. He had himself suffered too much to be pitiless, and, as observed, the devotion of the woman had won him.

For a minute or two the lovers, as we shall now deem them, were locked in each other's embrace, and passionate kisses were exchanged between them. Clara Garcia, in her delirium of joy, forgot her lover's danger—forgot everything in the world that was not compressed into that ecstatic moment. There was, however, one near whose state of mind was anything but pleasant. That one was Sir Richard Brine. He was cursing himself for his suspicions and calculating on an hour's most unpleasant position in the closet, but he had not long to wait for a theme to interest him.

"But, dear Beppo," said the lady, recollecting her lover's danger, and disengaging herself from his embrace, "I had forgotten, in my joy, the terrible subject for which I came to see you to-day and which induced me to take my bold and somewhat unwomanly step."

"Tut, tut, never mind it now, Clara."

"Oh, Beppo, did you but know the secret which has been breathed into my ears you would not say so."

"Well, what is it, Clara? It can not be so dreadful if it concerns me, for I have none."

"It concerns the disappearance of Sir Walter Templar."

"Walter's disappearance and fate! Then it does concern me deeply. What terrible secret have you learned, Clara?"

Sir Richard Brine, in the closet, was repenting his impatience, for he too was now concerned.

"Beppo, I would not be overheard for the world. Go and see if there be any one near the door."

She was obeyed.

"There is something uncommon here," thought the director of the detective force. In a moment Farinelli returned, and Brine threw all his sense into hearing.

"Well, Clara, what is it you have to reveal? There is none to overhear."

"Orsini was with me to-day, Beppo, and he insinuated against you suspicions of foul play towards Sir Walter Templar, and twitted me with what the papers say."

"Bah!" thought Sir Richard Brine, relaxing again, "that Orsini is a fool."

"He spoke to me of the motive," continued the lady, "and asked me what the judges of England would think if they knew of your mad love of old for Terese."

"Ha!" exclaimed the listener, nearly betraying his presence.

"Was that you who spoke Beppo?"

"I think so, Clara. You startled me. True this is known to Sir Richard Courtney's family, but did Brine know it, he would arrest me."

"For a moment, Beppo, I had the best of Orsini, and treated him as a designing villain. I told him a secret concerning himself, that of his duel with Sir Walter in Italy, and of his malicious purpose to kill his antagonist. Baglioni had informed me of this, and the Marquis is more than half resolved to bring about the arrest of Orsini."

"I will have my hand upon Count Orsini to-night," thought Brine.

"When I told Orsini of the Marquis' intention, he reflected deeply, and then he committed to me the terrible secret concerning yourself as he pretended for self-protection. Oh, Beppo, it touches your own life, for if known, nothing could save you in England against the charge of murder."

"What did Orsini say? Clara, I must know all, though I guess it too well."

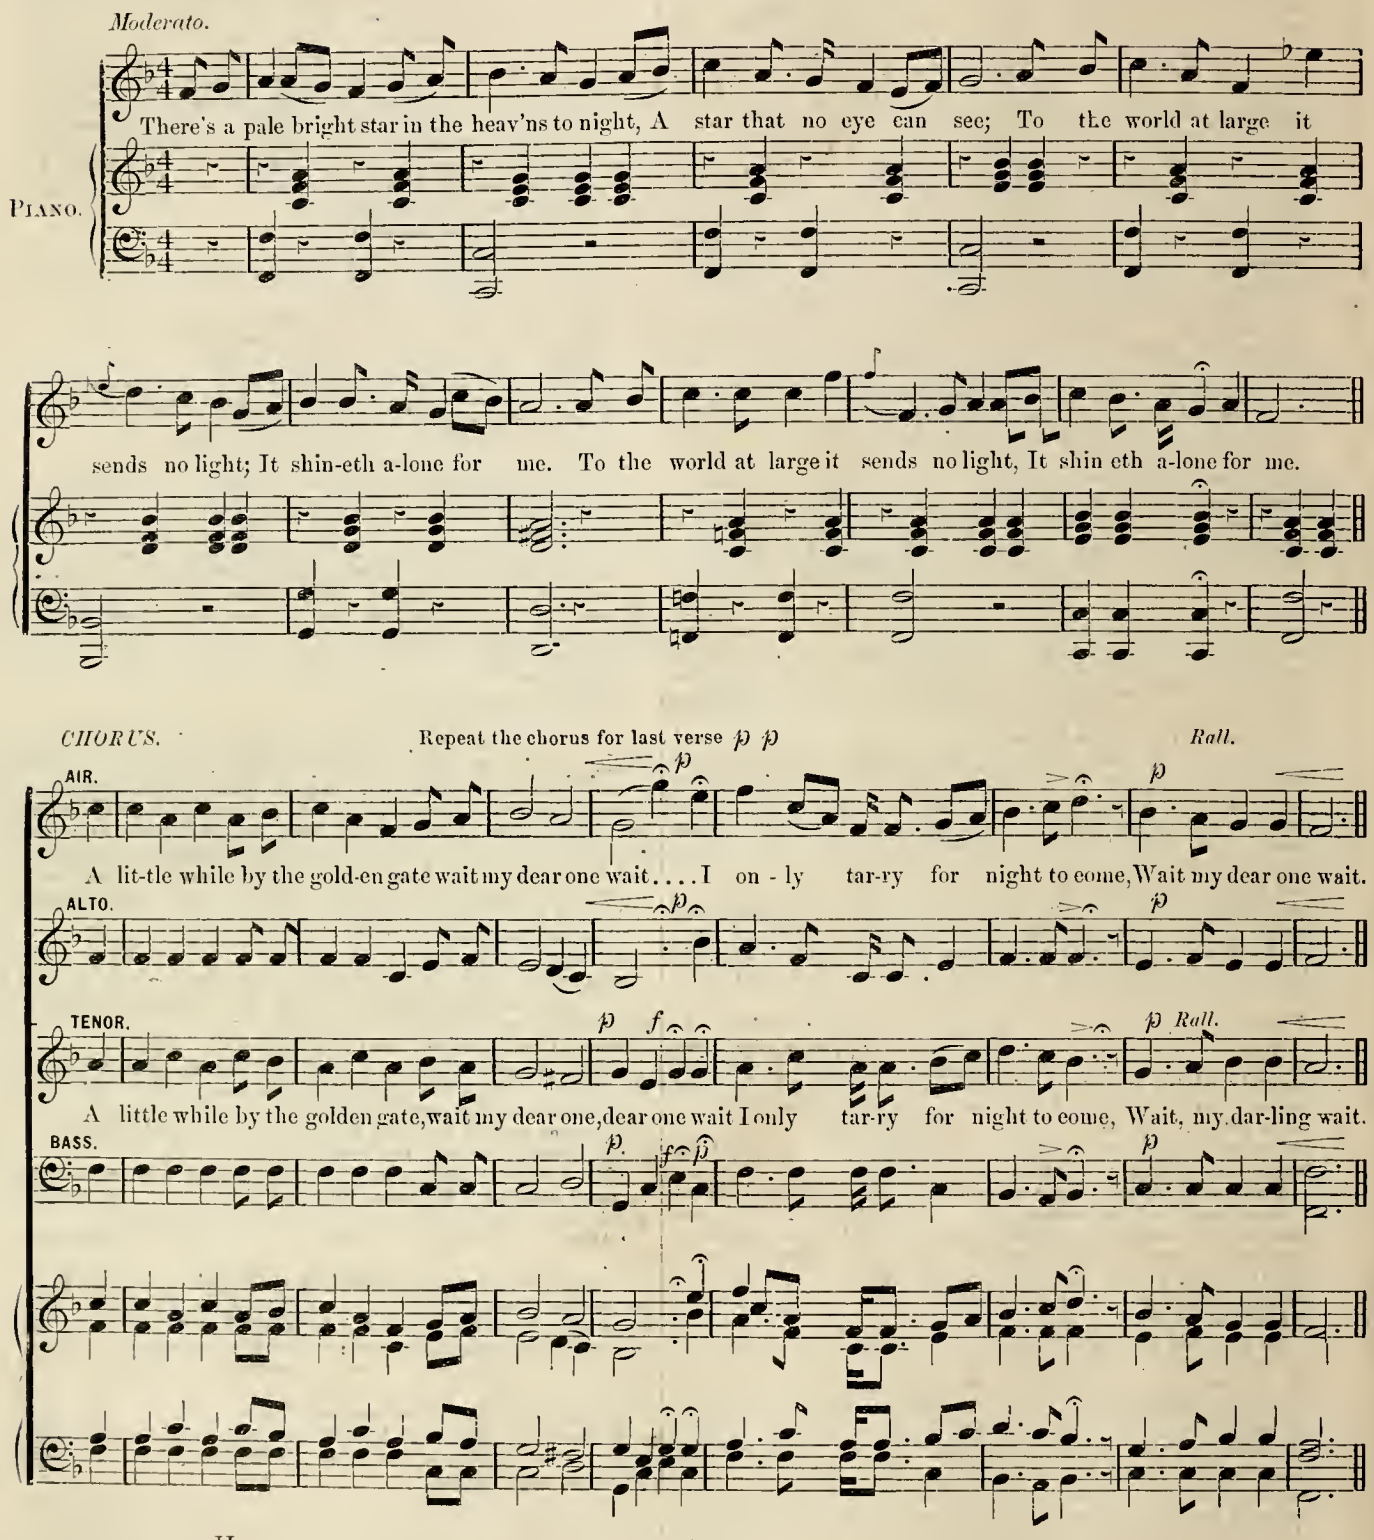
"He said, that on that same night of the duel, you in your mad jealousy, attempted to assassinate Sir Walter Templar. You struck him, but was yourself overpowered and wounded. This is the terrible secret that even Templar knew not, and which did Courtney know, even he would not shield you. Ha! What was that, Beppo."

"'Tis but your own agitation. Still I also fancied I heard a noise like papers falling. Yes, there they are on the floor, they fell from this table I suppose. But Clara, tell me you do not think me guilty of murdering Sir Walter?"

"Wait, my Darling, Wait."

Song and Chorus.

Music by C. J. Thomas.



II.

There's an angel singing in heaven to-night,
Singing a gladsome glee;
But the hurrying world can hear her not—
She singeth alone for me.

III.

I know who it is, for a while ago
We laid her away to rest
On the green hillside, where the wild flowers grow,
And the birds sing with joyous zest.

IV.

She is waiting for me by the golden gate
Of her bright and happy home,
And her crown, a star, casts a blessed light
On the paths where my footsteps roam.

MUSICAL DOINGS.—Since Mr. Waters gave up publishing sheet music, he has devoted his whole capital and attention to the manufacture and sale of Pianos and Melodeons. He has just issued a catalogue of his new instruments, giving a new scale of prices, which shows a marked reduction from former rates, and his Pianos have recently been awarded the First Premium at several Fairs. Many people of the present day, who are attracted, if not confused, with the flaming advertisements of rival piano houses, probably overlook the modest manufacturer like Mr. Waters; but we happen to know that his instruments earned him a good reputation long before Expositions and "honors" connected therewith were ever thought of; indeed, we have one of Mr. Waters' Piano-fortes now in our residence, (where it has stood for years,) of which any manufacturer in the world might be proud. We have always been delighted with it as a sweet-toned and powerful instrument, and there is no doubt of its durability; more than this, some of the best amateur players in the city, and several celebrated pianists, have performed on the said piano, and all pronounce it a superior and first-class Instrument. Stronger indorsement we could not give.—Home Journal.

HARVELL'S

HORSE POWDERS.

These celebrated and renowned powders for horses and cattle have been tested by an intelligent public for sixteen years. Hundreds of the principal horsemen of the Union have pronounced them the only Condition Powders safe to use and work the horse. There is nothing in them to expose the animal, but, on the contrary, everything to improve them. The proprietors of horse railroads, omnibusses, and stage owners in all the principal cities use them; and their combined testimony stamps them one of the wonders of medical science. Letters sufficient to fill a small book are in our possession, testifying to their goodness. Merchants are requested to warrant them, and refund the purchase money should they fail to give satisfaction.

ALLCOCK'S POROUS

STRENGTHENING

PLASTERS.

ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS are the results of studies and experiments of Dr. Scheeut, of South Carolina; of Dr. Wm. Wagstaff, now Baron Wagstaff, of Horace H. Day, the distinguished manufacturer of rubber goods; and of Thomas Allcock, Chemist and member of the College of Pharmacy of New York, now General Allcock, etc., etc.

Step by step this commodity has attained its unprecedented fame. They are universally approved. They support, strengthen, and aid the growth of muscles. They appear to have a peculiar effect upon the nerves, allaying irritability, while supplying warmth. They seem to accumulate electricity, and aid the circulation of the blood through the part where applied, by which healthy actions are induced.

Even in paralysis, where articulation was suspended, the use of the Porous Plasters to the spine restored the articulation, and materially reduced the paralysis. In fact, the patient could help herself, while before the Porous plaster was applied she was as helpless as a baby. We refer to Mrs. Sally Elliot, Springfield, Mass.

Dr. Myer, of Savannah, Ga., says they are the best mechanical supporters for weak muscles ever discovered; that by their warming properties they bring power and health, until the strength of the muscles are entirely restored. That he knows a case where Allcock's Plasters cured a gentleman of a weak spine. That he daily prescribes them in his practice with the happiest results, and desires us to refer to him.

Dr. Henderson, of Farmsville, Louisiana, says:

"The counter-irritant effect of Allcock's Porous Plasters is produced in such a mild and gradual way, they so invigorate the circulation around the parts to which they are applied, and exert upon all nervous diseases such a great sedative influence, that I place them confidently at the head of every plaster now in use."

Dr. Johnson, of Hartford, says:

"My daily experience confirms the very superior excellence of your Porous Plasters. At this moment of writing, a man applies for one, who, by entanglement in a shaft of machinery, had both his legs broken, spine severely injured, and was for nearly a year entirely helpless. This man found relief very soon by the application of a plaster to his spine. He was soon enabled to work, and now he labors as well as ever. He would cheerfully pay five dollars for a single plaster, if they could not be had at a lower rate. Surgeons should make use of these perforated plasters, to the exclusion of all others, as their flexibility and adhesiveness are greatly in advance of all other plasters with which I am acquainted, while the perforations peculiar to them render them greatly superior to all others for ordinary surgical uses. Knowing the plasters to be so useful, I have no scruples that my sentiments should be known.

J. W. JOHNSON, M. D."

Dr. Sterling's testimony:

"For two years, I have been a great sufferer from neuralgia in the head, and found only temporary relief from all the various remedies that I have tried, until I applied one of Allcock's Porous Plasters. I cut it into three strips, placing one under each shoulder blade, and the other over the small of the back; and for the past three months, I have had scarcely a twinge of the old pain.

I advise all who suffer from nervous diseases to lose no time in making a trial of the wonderful Porous Plaster.

A. F. STERLING, Sec. Singer Mfg. Co.

New York, June 8, 1868.

MEDICINAL QUALITIES

—OF THE—

POROUS PLASTERS.

The Porous Plasters possess the soothing, warming and sustaining qualities of the combined plasters of the dispensatories. An Electrician, who has great experience of their effects in Local Rheumatism, in Tic Dolorenx, and deep-seated nervous and other pains, and in affections of the kidneys, etc., etc., attributes all their sedative, stimulative and pain-relieving effects to their ELECTRIC qualities. He asserts that they restore the healthy electric condition (equilibrium) of the part, and that being restored pain and morbid action cease. He was amazed at the great number of beneficial indications produced by one of these plasters. He affirms that Head-ache is cured by one worn just below the breast-bone; that one placed over the navel will cure hysterics, as well as dysentery, and affections of the bowels.

PATENT ARION PIANOFORTE

GRANDS AND GRAND SQUARES.

7⅓ OCTAVES

The "ARION" is the very best Piano for the Great West, because it stands in tune longer than any other Piano. It requires no repairing or regulating; shipping any distance, or dampness does not affect them.

WHY?

It commences where the "First Premium" Makers stop, and upon the most improved Modern scale makes four patented improvements; which make the Arion more simple, yet stronger; increasing its volume and beauty of tone, while rendering the instrument more enduring.

WHAT THEY ARE.

First. The patent Arion Reversed Wooden Agraffe Bridge, which retains all the purity of tone only found in a wooden bridge (the rest whereon the strings lay), and obtains all the solid prolonged strength of tone of the metal Agraffe, without that acute metalic noise which the metal Agraffe develops by use.

Secondly. The Patent Arion Compound Wrest-Plank, which holds the tuning pins, is six thicknesses of hard maple, the grain of each layer runs in a different direction. The advantages are, the 20 tons strain of the strings cannot split our Arion wrest-plank, as frequently happens in other Pianos, and when people say "My Piano won't stand in tune," all other makers must use the single wrest plank with the grain running only one way.

The Arion Tuning-Pins have end wood to hold them on every side, while all other makers can have it only upon two sides of their pins.

Thirdly. The Patent Arion Diagonal Sustaining Bar, extending parellel with the steel strings under the over strung Bass strings. The Arion is the only Piano wherein the enormous strain of the large steel strings is resisted in the natural place and direction. Using this bar renders the weakest part in all other over strung Pianos the

STRONGEST IN THE ARION.

THE ARION STANDS UPON ITS OWN MERITS.

unsupported by either humcome, weak facts, or useless or complicated Patents." We append a few unbought opinions of those who

KNOW THE ARION.

The Musical Director of the New York Conservatory of Music, Edward Mollenhauer, says: "The Arion I bought of you is the best Piano I ever played on; that rolling bass and silvery treble, etc."

John H. Woods, Piano Dealer, Oswego, N. Y., says: "The tone is truly immense, and surpasses anything in the shape of a Piano we ever saw or heard of, etc."

Horace Greely said: "The Arion is the best Square Piano, superior for its clearness and brilliancy of tone," &c.

Louis Wagner, Fort Leavenworth, says: "My Piano arrived here in splendid order. Its tone fills my parlor with melody—it is the wonder and admiration of all who hear it. Miss ——, who is teaching the Piano desires me to order one for her," &c.

Dr. CADY'S CATARRH REMEDY.

A CERTAIN CURE FOR CATARRH AND ALL Mucous Diseases of the head, nose and throat.

This is a Medicine never before used or known to the public. Dr. Cady, the discoverer, was a sufferer from this terrible disease for twenty years, and after testing all the remedies extant—without relief—in his efforts to obtain a cure he discovered this UNEQUALLED REMEDY, which cured him in the short space of eight weeks.

It has been thoroughly tested, and has not failed in a single instance. Several of the most obstinate cases have been thoroughly cured by this remedy, after every other known medicine had failed. Every one who has tried it will testify to the truth of the above statement.

Every one afflicted with Catarrh should give it a trial and find out for himself whether it is a humbug.

Saratoga
WATER.

The Saratoga "A" Spring Water is probably the most effective mineral water found on either continent. It has ten per cent. greater mineral properties than the celebrated Congress Spring; four times that of Baden Baden of Austria; five times that of Aix La Chapelle in Prussia; twice that of Vichy in France; nearly three times greater than the renowned Seltzer of Germany; and equally over the Spas of Bath, England, and Kissengen in Bavaria.

The reputation of this water is based upon its effects in diseases of the stomach, liver, bowels, kidneys and spleen. It acts with wonderful benefit in cases of chronic dyspepsia, constipation, gravel, gout, Scrofula, cutaneous affections, general lethargy, soreness and prostration of the system.

HYMN TO THE SUN.

Oh fountain of beauty, of gladness and light,
Whose pathway is set in the infinite height,
Whose light has no shadow, whose day has no night.

We know not thy birthplace, oh wonderful one!
We count not the ages through which thou hast run,
But we render thee praises, oh life-giving Sun.

All day the glad Earth, in thy loving embrace,
Arrayed by thy bounty in garments of grace,
Lifts up to thy glances her beautiful face.

And at night, when her children need silence and rest,
With the light of her starry-eyed sisterhood blest,
She sleeps like a bride on thy cherishing breast.

When the sky-lark springs up at the coming of morn,
When the golden fringed curtains of night are withdrawn,
Then blushing with beauty the day is new born.

And the pulses of Nature in harmony bound,
To the waves of thy glory which move without sound,
And sweep unimpeded through spaces profound.

Ay, the life-tide that leaps in the bird or the flower—
The rainbow that gleams through the drops of the shower,
Oh wonderful artist! are born of thy power.

And the rush of the whirlwind, the roar of the deep,
The cataract's thunder, the avalanche-sweep,
Are thy forces majestic, aroused from their sleep.

Shall we wonder that, filled with devotion untold,
The awe-stricken Parsee adored thee of old,
Nor dreamed that One greater thy glory controlled.

And He, the Eternal, the Ancient of Days—
Whose splendors are veiled by inscrutable ways,
Did He frown on his blindness, nor envy thee praise?

Oh Sun! in the light of whose presense we see,
We ask—canst thou tell us?—what caused us to be?
And how are we linked to creation and thee?

We must perish—but thou, by thy wonderful powers,
Wilt rescue from darkness these bodies of ours,
And fashion them over to verdure and flowers.

But the jewel of beauty in life's golden bowl—
Oh answer us—say—dost thou also control
That Infinite Essence, the life of the soul?

There is doubt, there is darkness and fear in our cry:
Dost thou drink up the pearl of our lives when we die?
We listen—but silence alone makes reply.

It is well—for our spirits may know by the sign,
That a might hath evoked thee far greater than thine,
And we must seek Truth at life's innermost shrine.

That Center of Being, transcending all thought,
Whose might hath perfection of beauty outwrought,
Returns the great answer of peace which we sought.

And we know, when the race of the planets is run,
And the day shall no longer behold thee, oh Sun!
Our souls shall find light with that Infinite One.

Oh Source of all Being! whose name everywhere
Is sung in hosannas, or murmured in prayer,
We trust, unreserving, our souls to thy care.

CLEVE CLIFF.

A TALE OF THE COAST.

Stunned with the weight of his involuntary crime, Golding crept as near as he could to the edge of the precipice and looked over. To descend in the direction in which the unhappy youth had fallen was impossible; the cliff was as precipitous as the walls of a house, and at its base the retreating sea cast on the rocks a white border of foam. The night, too, had deepened with the swiftness peculiar to the time of year. He could see no trace of the young man. With a heavy heart he made his way quickly down the path on the land side; intending to get a boat and some assistance, and endeavor to find Edward Burnet alive or dead—the alternative he had only too good reason to fear.

At the foot of Cleve Cliff he met a party of alarmed villagers, among them Clara Wraxall raving. Then Mr. Burnet and several gentlemen from the pic-nic party hurried to the spot. And then and there Clara passionately denounced him as Edward's murderer.

The violence of her rage, the falsehood of the charge—false in its minuteness, a terrible lie in every circumstantiality—overwhelmed him. She had witnessed their quarrel: it was Golding who provoked it, she said. His jealousy of the young man had prompted the attack, and he had ruthlessly seized the less powerful stripling, and flung him over the cliff, breaking the railings in the act. He could not repel the hideous accusation which left every cheek pale, and a horror in every eye. Directing two men to guard him, Mr. Burnet procured a couple of boats, and headed a search at once hopeless and unavailing. In an hour's time they sorrowfully returned to land. Not even the dead body could be rescued from the cruel waves that washed the base of Cleve Cliff.

All that night Arthur Golding remained in guarded seclusion in the house of his former entertainer. Next day a magistrate's warrant was procured, and he was committed to prison on the charge of attempt to murder. An examination before the magistrates elicited no new facts beyond the repeated statement of Miss Wraxall as to the circumstances attending the attack. Questioned as to the precise cause of the quarrel between the two young men, she admitted, with some reluctance.that their quarrel had been about herself. She had unconsciously (and oh, how bitterly she reproached herself now) afforded them a pretext for a violence which in the one had led to death, and in the other, to a crime which —judging from ominous expressions which he had confided to her. and which at the same time she had set down to the jealous ravings of a lover—she feared was premeditated. Arthur was then formally committed for trial.

A damaging part of the evidence against him, was the fact that he had had a slight tiff with the deceased on that fatal afternoon, and during the pic-nic excursion. It had amounted merely to a few hasty words provoked by Edward himself, in whose mind a jealous hatred of Arthur had been artfully sown by Miss Wraxall. Still, it was enough to prejudice the case against him. For Miss Wraxall herself a good deal of public commiseration was created, by her unfortunate connection with the crime, by her having been the witness of the murder, and by the manifest suffering which she experienced in giving her evidence. On Golding, public opinion was heavy and strong. Of all interested in the tragedy on Cleve Cliff. there were but two hearts that steadily refused to believe in his guilt—one, the unhappy girl whose lot it was to mourn a brother slain by a lover's hand; the other, sturdy Frederick Burnet, who had been summoned by telegraph, and who undertook, with all his legal energies, to conduct his friend's defence.

And Burnet never wavered in his confidence. "Pooh, pooh, old fellow," he said, in reply to Arthur's indignant denial of his guilt, "I never believed you killed poor Ned. and she doesn't believe it. And if mortal aid can pull you through, we'll do it. Keep your head cool, and make a plain statement of the matter as it happened. Put into writing. We'll pull you through yet."

But Arthur Golding saw little comfort even in being "pulled through." "Though I be acquitted" he said mournfully, "I was still the involuntary agent of his death. How can I ever aspire to her love, red with her brother's blood? I had rather be hanged on the whole."

But Burnet persistently set to work, and sent his scouts about in all directions. Many a confabulation he had with the old coast-guardsman, and never failed to return from these conferences with a cheerful mien. But on the points upon which he relied for the defence he maintained a reserve.

The day fixed for the trial dawned. The court was crowded, so deeply was the interest in the Cliff tragedy felt throughout the county. Mr. Burnet appeared as a witness, though his evidence showed nothing against the accused, and in cross-examination. his son managed to extract several instances which proved the amiability of the prisoner, and the unlikelihood of his committing so grave a crime. Kate Burnet had been cited, but was not called into the box, both counsel sympathizing with her distress. The chief witness for the prosecution was Miss Wraxall, who appeared in a modest garb of mourning, which set off her wondrous beauty, her pale face, and her matchless eyes. Calm, cold, and singularly unimpassioned, she gave her evidence with a clearness which seemed to tighten the halter round the prisoner's neck.

Burnet rose to cross-examine.

"You state, Miss Wraxall, that a bitter feeling existed between the deceased and the accused. Did you ever chance, by words of your own, to aggravate this feeling on the part of the deceased?"

"Never, sir."

"Did you ever signify, by any expressed statement, or by implication, to Mr. Edward Burnet that Mr. Golding occupied a higher place in your regard than he could hope to obtain?"

The counsel for the prosecution objected to this question; but Clara waived the objection.

"I can set this gentleman's doubts at rest. I never did imply to the deceased any such thing."

"What brought you, may I ask, on Cleve Cliff anterior to the accident?" pursued Fred.

"Anterior to the murder?"

"Please confine yourself to the answer."

"I went," said the witness, "to enjoy the evening air."

"Did anything of an excitable nature—any recriminations in short—pass between Mr. Golding and yourself previous to the arrival of Mr. Edward Burnet?"

"No."

"There were no reproaches—no violence of language?"

"Only on the side of the prisoner. He was sullen, and reproached me with slighting his suit; and said he was aware that he had a rival."

"He used no violence, however?"

"In speech he was violent," answered Clara reluctantly.

"But not in action? He did not embrace you, for instance —offered no personal violence?"

"No; he was very calm and collected."

"And you did not, when the deceased approached on the pathway of the cliff, call aloud to the deceased that you apprehended insult from Mr. Golding, and implored Mr. Burnet to protect you?"

"Certainly not," retorted Clara, with an ominous darkening of her brow.

"Please to recapitulate the events when the accused and the deceased met," said Fred Burnet, referring to his notes.

"Mr. Edward Burnet landed on the summit of the cliff, and the prisoner advancing, asked him what he was doing there; said he was aware of his pretensions to my hand, and would adopt immediate means to quash them. On Mr. Burnet's replying warmly, the prisoner struck him in the face. I was terribly frightened, and cannot recall what followed, but was immediately aware of the prisoner, who is an athletic man, dragging poor Burnet to the edge of the cliff, and flinging him over. My next recollection amid that horror" her voice failed here—"was his saying that he would serve me in the same way. On that, I fled down the pathway screaming in terror."

To the surprise of all concerned, the counsel for the defense sat down, and the cross-examination concluded. A few more witnesses were called, who proved the admiration which the deceased had shown for Miss Wraxall. Of these Fred asked no questions at all. Thus ended the case for the prosecution.

Then Burnet rose for the defense. "I propose, my lord, to call but one witness, and trust you will find his testimony sufficient to acquit my client. Let Mr. Edward Burnet be called."

A murmur of surprise ran through the court, deepening to an actual cry of relief and gladness as Edward Burnet, pale but resolute, appeared and made his way to the witness-box.

There was no need of the oath—no need of any crucical test. A hundred eyes recognized him only too gladly. His sister Kate fainted; Mr, Burnet burst into tears; the prisoner himself broke down with a sense of mighty relief. And Clara Wraxall looked at him, and over her face came a look of stony despair. It was Edward returned from the grave to balk her of her deadly revenge.

It all came out—the truth against the lie of the would-be murderess.

"But why," asked the sententious judge, "did you not come forward at once and clear the prisoner?"

Up jumped the irrepressible Burnet.

"I am responsible, my lord, for putting the State to that expense. In the first place, I only found Mr. Burnet quite recently. He had been picked up by a very respectable confraternity, who entertain grave doubts as to the advisability of supporting the revenue by payments on excisable articles; and they kept the young gentleman out of the way after restoring him, for fear of compromising themselves. In the second place I wished to prove to my cousin the utterly worthless character of the person upon whom he had fixed his affections. It was a sharp lesson, but I have saved him from a life of misery."

"Then," commenced the judge, "the evidence of Miss Wraxall——"

"Is, so far as my own knowledge of what she has said goes, a lie," answered Edward; and his lips were pale, but he wore the look of one who had awoke from a sad and bitter dream.

As Arthur Golding, with the sense of unreality still strong on him, walked from the court a free man, surrounded by congratulating friends, he met the coast-guardsman.

"I'll tell you, sir," exclaimed that worthy officer, with a burst of confidence unequalled in the recollection of the oldest fisherman of Clevedown, "how it all came right. That chap Slippy Jem was putting off on one of his expeditions to a smuggler's vessel in the bay at the very moment when Mister Edward tumbled off the cliff, and Jem and his pals picked him up and kept him out of sight after they'd brought him to. And from what I told Mr. Burnet, the lawyer, of Slippy Jem's ways and habits, that put him on the scent. And he found Mr. Edward sure enough, though they was afraid to produce him for fear of getting into a scrape themselves by letting out how they'd found him. But Mr. Burnet, the lawyer, squared Slippy Jem, and he's going to offer him the chance of becoming respectable, either as a missionary or the mate of a revenue cutter—he's free to choose which. And that's how it all came right, and it's the only time I ever knew good to come out of smuggling."

Never in the memory of man had the coast-guardsman delivered himself of so much spontaneous information; nor was he ever afterwards induced to hold forth for so long a time together, even at those subsequent periods when Arthur Golding, now Kate's husband, would pass his autumns at Clevedown with his wife and Frederick Burnet, and muse over the unaccountable disappearance of Clara Wraxall, as some said, over the broken railings of Cleve Cliff.

A CALIFORNIAN INCIDENT.

Some years ago, a poor, penniless adventurer arrived at San Bernardino. His clothes were in rags. His cheeks were hollow; and his eyes had that fierce, restless expression that is seen in one who has not for a long time tasted food. The stranger stopped at a farm-house, and, after some hesitation, asked for a meal. The farmer, who was well-to-do in the world, at once granted the request. Entering into conversation with the stranger, he found that he was endeavoring to make his way to the mines, but, miscalculating the expenses of the route, had found his means inadequate to bear him to his journey's end. The farmer was so impressed with his story, that he voluntarily lent the needy adventurer a sum of money to help him to his destination.

Time sped with its chances and changes, and found the once prosperous farmer, despoiled of his little property, seeking precarious subsistence in San Francisco, and getting a livelihood with difficulty. Such was the condition of his affairs, when, a few weeks since, a splendid carriage drove up to the poor man's door. A richly-attired gentleman alighted therefrom. It proved to be the penniless adventurer whom the now reduced farmer had once so generously assisted. Luck had changed with the former. He had traveled to Washoe, and engaged in the silver-mines, had amassed, like many others once poor, a rapid fortune. He had come to invite his benefactor, with his family, to take a ride, for the purpose of taking a look at a neat villa which he had just been purchasing in the suburbs. The party rode forth in high spirits. The morning was fine, and the air exhilarating. In due time they arrived at the villa, which proved to be one of the neatest in the neighborhood—a bijou of a place, with the cosiest of furniture.

When the visitors had satisfied themselves with admiring everything there was to be admired, and had partaken of a repast spread for the occasion, their entertainer turned to them, and said:—

"It is not so long ago but that you must remember the destitute stranger who came to your gate for wherewithal to satisfy the cravings of hunger, and whom you sent on his way rejoicing with more money than he had seen for a twelvemonth. I am the stranger. With the proceeds of your generosity, I reached the mines. Success crowned my efforts. I am wealthy. I visited San Bernardino for the purpose of discharging my debt of gratitude; but you were not there. I sought you everywhere; and finally found you in your place of refuge, nearly as destitute as myself on the day when, overcome with hunger, I paused at your hospitable threshold. My mission is accomplished. You have been pleased to admire this villa. It is yours. Take it, with all that it contains; and may heaven enable you, my benefactor, to prosper as I have prospered."

To finish the story, the title-deeds were placed in the hands of the astonished farmer; and he is at this moment comfortably installed with his family in his new domicile, the happiest of men.

PLEASE FORWARD AT ONCE.—Such of our subscribers, whose subscriptions are now due, are requested to forward the pay at once, as we need it. The present great dearth of means has kept back so much of the pay due to us that scarcely one subcription in four has yet reached us. We blame no one for this, but we ask all to remember that our expenses are very great and that every little helps.

Such of our friends as have PROMISED TO PAY AT CONFERENCE TIME are requested not to forget their promises, as WE RELY UPON THEM.

PROGRESS OF ELECTRICITY.

Of all the achievements of modern civilization, its discoveries in electricity are the most remarkable. Steam is gross and material; there is little poetical or great in the rattle of the train or the roar of a monstrous engine. We can easily account for the mightiest of machines impelled by boiling water. Gunpowder and nitro-glycerine, oxygen and hydrogen, seem the natural servants of inventive man. But when we attempt to catch the idea of the electric spark, it still appears almost as superhuman and terrible as when it flashed fear into the hearts of Greeks and Romans. It obeys with scrupulous accuracy; it performs the smallest as well as the most important tasks with equal care; it is as docile as was the genie to Solomon's seal; and yet it still remains shadowy, mysterious, and impalpable. It still lives in the skies, and seems to connect the material and the spiritual. Whence come these tongues of fire, these sharp shocks, these pale, ghostly lights that play around us and mocked the master they obey? Who is it that wields this electric elements which seems to be the very base and source of our existence?

Some such sentiment of mysterious awe pressed upon the mind of Thales, the Franklin of Miletus, when, twenty-five centuries ago, he probably discovered electricity. A sage of Greece, the philosopher's keen eye watched the minute phenomena of nature. His mind was eager for every kind of knowledge. He studied morals, metaphysics, life; and upon a narrow field of facts he erected vast fabrics of speculation, which were designed to embrace the whole origin and destiny of man. Phœnician voyagers, who were in the habit, in that dim age, of sailing out of the Straits of Hercules, and perhaps of coasting along the desolate shores of Europe until they reached the Baltic, brought back from the savage seas of Prussia a substance greatly prized by the ancients for its fair color and delicate transparency. It was amber, or electron. The natives found it floating upon the waves, or perhaps gathered it in from the mines which still form a source of the wealth of Prussia; and the amber imported from the distant north was an important article of commerce with the southern nations. But to Thales it possessed a misterious value. He discovered that electron, when rubbed, had the property of attracting to itself various light articles, such as feathers, threads, and floating filaments, as if it were endowed with volition. His discovery was the first step in the great science of electricity. But the philosopher did no more than record his observation, and attempt to account for it, as he had already done with the magnet, by ascribing to amber a soul. He supposed that some hidden principle of life lay in the yellow jewel from the northern seas.

The discovery was never forgotten, and the peculiar property of amber was noticed and commented upon by various ancient philosophers. Theophrastus, three centuries later than Thales, observed the attractive power of electron, and perhaps lectured his two thousand disciples upon the animated gem. Pliny the elder also describes the phenomenon, and believed, apparently, that the amber was rubbed into life by the action of his fingers. But the germ of the great science lay hidden in mystery. No ancient philosopher could for a moment have supposed that there was any connection between the animated electron and the wild electricity of the thunder storm; that the same power was active in both; and and that the secret of the amber was that of the thunder-bolt of Jove; that the precious electron was to create and to give a name to the most wonderful of modern discoveries.

Yet electricity, in all its varied phenomena, never suffered the puzzled ancients to rest. It flashed along the spears of their long array of soldiers, and tipped every helmet with a plume of flame. It filled even the immovable Cæsar with a strange alarm. It leaped down from the clouds and splintered the temples and statues of Rome, and did not spare the effigy of the Thunderer himself. It was seen playing around the ramparts of fortified towns, crowning their sentinels with a strange effulgence. Often the Roman or Greek sailors, far from land on the stormy Mediterranean, saw pale spectral lights dancing along the ropes of their vessels, or clinging in fitful outlines to the masts, and called them Castor and Pollux. But the science of electricity was still unborn. Meantime, in ancient Etruria, the parent-land of Italian superstition, countless students were being instructed in the art of reading by the lightning, the will of the gods. The heavens were divided into various compartments. If the lightning flash appeared in one, it was a favorable omen; if in another, it was fatal. The accomplished augurs, instructed by long years of study and toil, stood upon lofty towers, watching for the sudden gleam or peal of thunder, and knew at once by their divine art what undertakings would be successful, and when their warriors clad in brass, should go forth against Rome. The religion of ancient Etruria was almost a worship of electricity, and the land of Galvani and Volta was famous in the dawn of its history for the close study of electrical phenomena.

But no Tuscan augur or Roman priest made any progress in creating the science. Centuries passed away; Europe was torn by civil convulsions; men sank into barbarism and rose again into new activity; but the famous observation of Thales was never lost; and at length, in the opening of the seventeenth century, an Englishman named Gilbert began to study the properties of the electron. He was rewarded by a series of discoveries that, in the dawn of the science, made his name famous over Europe. Yet they were so meagre as to advance little beyond the early observations of Pliny. He enumerated various substances capable of producing electral action; he noticed the influence of the weather on the electron and the magnet; and from his labors sprang up a science known as Electricity. Gilbert's work, "De Magnet," was published in 1600, and soon the new science began to terrify and astonish men. Every fact, as it was unfolded, seemed spiritual and supernatural. Flames of fire played around the electrical substances in the dark; sparks glittered; sharp sensations, produced by the unknown agent, were felt by astonished operators; and a mysterious awe surrounded the birth of the wonderful principle. Men were almost inclined, like Thales, to invest the electrical substance with a soul.

An Englishman discovered electricity; a Prussian, in the land of amber, invented the first electrical machine. Otto Guericke, of Magdeburg, who also invented the air-pump, formed the instrument by which electricity could be most readily produced: he placed a globe of sulphur on an axle, to be turned by the hand of the operator, while with the other he applied a cloth to the sulphur to produce the necessary friction. It was a rude, imperfect machine, but it was at once found to have made a great revolution in the science. Electricity, which had heretofore been known only in its feebler forms, was now given out in sharp sparks, and displayed a thousand curious properties. Sometimes it attracted objects, at others repelled them. It seemed at times to exercise a kind of volition. The weather effected it sensibly; dampness dissolved its strength; it was capable, too, of influencing bodies at a considerable distance, and was apparently independent of the usual laws of space. Yet the seventeenth century glided away, with its fierce religious wars and its wonderful voyages and settlements, while little progress was made in the knowledge of electricity. Newton paid no particular attention to the new science. He suggested, however, that the electrical substance was a subtle ether, filling nature, which could be set in motion by friction. Yet his bold, inquisitive mind was never strongly attracted by the mysterious study; the flashes and sparks of the electrical machines seemed, perhaps, a puerile entertainment to the great student of nature's laws. Nor did any other eminent philosopher of the age suspect that human hands would ever wield the thunderbolt or unfold by the aid of a globe of sulphur the mightiest principle in nature.

But in the next century electricity sprang at once into startling importance. A series of wonderful discoveries aroused the attention of almost every scientific mind in Europe. England again led the way in the path of investigation; Hawksbee invented the glass electrical machine, a great improvement upon that of Guericke; and in 1730 Stephen Grey began a course of experiments that unfolded the leading principles of the science. France took up the study, and the curious discoveries of Dufaye and Nollet excited the wonder of their contemporaries. Dufaye transmitted the electric spark through a cord thirteen hundred feet long; and at length, in conjunction with the Abbé Nollet, he performed an experiment, with wonder and terror, that seemed the crowning mystery of the science. Dufaye suspended himself by a silken cord, and was then filled with electricity by the abbé. He presented his hand to his companion, half doubting the truth of his own speculations, when a brilliant spark shot from one philosopher to the other, and filled both with an equal surprise. Never had such a wonder been seen since the days of the Gothic warrior Walimer, who, according to Eustathius, flashed out sparks from his body, or the ancient philosopher who could never take off his clothes without emitting flames of fire.

Not long after, however, an event occurred that seems to have filled Europe with still greater wonder and awe. It was known as the Leyden experiment. Professor Muschenbrock, who wrote an account of it to Reaumer, can scarcely express in language the agitation and terror into which his unheard of sufferings had thrown him. He had felt the first shock of electricity prepared by human hands, and not the whole kingdom of France, he declared, could induce him to take another. He had been struck in the arms, shoulders, and breast, and it was two days before he recovered from the mysterious blow. The Professor, in fact, had invented the Leyden-jar. He had been endeavoring for some time to inclose electricity in a safe receptacle from which it could not escape, except with his permission; and at length succeeded in imprisoning the genie in a glass vessel partly filled with water. Suddenly he formed a connection between the two surfaces of the jar. The imprisoned electricity sprang through his body and shook him with a wild convulsion. It was a moment of horror. Novelty added its terrors to the unseen assault; his imagination was filled with an indefinite alarm; he shrank from his glass bottle as if it were tenanted by a demon. Yet we soon after find him recovering his spirits and once more experimenting upon his powerful instrument. The electric jar was soon employed in all the laboratories of Europe, and every where terrified philosophers by the vigor of its shocks. One lost his breath, and believed that his right arm was forever disabled; Professor Winkler was thrown into convulsions, and had recourse to cooling medicines to avoid a fever; Abbé Nollet received a severe blow—his body was bent, his respiration stopped, and he dropped the glass jar in terror. Yet the shock of the Leyden-vial soon became the favorite amusement of court and saloon. It was exhibited before Louis XV. at Versailles, and a chain of two hundred persons, having joined hands, received at once the mysterious blow. Each was severely shaken, and it was curious to observe, says a contemporary account, how the peculiar temperament of every individual displayed itself in the moment of terror. Soon itinerant electricians wandered over Europe, astonishing the unlearned and the rustic by administering electric shocks from the Leyden jar; and the mysterious machine became familiar to the people as well as to the court. The jar was improved by coating its sides with a thin metallic covering; its power was increased; it was used in medicine to revive the paralytic, or to open the lips of the dumb; long sparks were drawn from it that resembled flashes of lightning, and that killed unfortunate little birds; a battery of jars was at length invented by Franklin that gave shocks that reminded one of the terrible power of the thunder-bolt; and the whole scientific world felt that it stood on the brink of some unparalleled discovery.

The name of Franklin had now grown great in electricity. His mind was of a peculiar cast that recalled the vigorous simplicity of the Greeks. He was a modern Solon, a speculative Thales. He had wandered away from Boston a printer's apprentice, and had found employment and success in Philadelphia. From his parents he had received no inheritance except the noble:—a spotless example, a healthful constitution, a sane mind; and after a vigorous struggle and several failures, the philosophic printer had won the respect and attention of his fellow-townsmen. He founded schools, libraries, and various useful institutions in his adopted home, and at forty-five had become one of its most useful citizens. Still Franklin lived obscure except to his narrow world, and his eminent powers had won him no general renown. He had, perhaps, pleased himself in his youth with the hope of excelling in letters; he had formed his style by a careful study of Addison; he wrote clear and sensible essays that showed the purity of his taste and the weakness of his fancy; and yet in literature he had been far excelled in notoriety, if not fame, by his unprincipled companion Ralph. Franklin's rare humor, the wit of a philosopher, shines out in his "Busy-Body," his "Almanac," his "Ephemera," or his famous "Whistle;" he uttered keen apothegms that live like those of Solon, and sharp satires that want the bitter hopelessness of Diogenes. But his literature scarcely possessed the shining marks of genius, and was plain, cold, and lifeless. He was an excellent writer, but he was never great.

His genius, like Bacon's, lay in the power of swift induction from moral or physical facts. In morals he was the wisest of his contemporaries. He taught young mechanics that "time is money," that "credit is money;" that purity, honesty and self-respect were better than wealth, luxury, or any other success. His own labors were unceasing; he wrote, toiled, thought incessantly for his fellow-men; he was noted and observed for his modesty and discretion; his acute mind was ever seeking for useful novelty in science and conduct; and hence, when Franklin came to stand before mankind, covered with his splendid scientific renown, and the representative of the new republic that seemed about to revive the classic refinement of a better age, he was received in the courts of Europe as a worthy successor of the philosophers of Athens and Ionia. As Washington appeared before the world clothed in the purity, the probity, the valor of a Fabricius or a Cato, so Franklin was universally compared with the acute sages and philosophers of Greece.

To Franklin electricity owed the most wonderful of all its achievements in the eighteenth century. The obscure provincial was led by accidental circumstance and his own eager fondness for knowledge to enter upon the study of the new science. Peter Collinson, a member of the Royal Society, sent over an electrical machine to Philadelphia, and Franklin at once commenced a series of experiments that led to remarkable results. Never, he wrote to Collinson in his first letter, March 28, 1747, had he been so engrossed by any pursuit. All his leisure moments were given to his machine. His fellow-townsmen thronged his rooms to watch his novel researches. His labors were rewarded by constant discoveries, and his wonderful inductive powers soon led him to unfold, in his admirable style, the hidden principles of the science.

In 1747, he commenced writing to Collinson, in a series of letters, an account of his researches in electricity. He gave clear directions for the performance of various beautiful or instructive experiments that were wholly new and surprising. He explained the phenomenon of the Leyden-jar; he showed how iron points attracted electricity; and at length he declared that the lightning and the thunder were produced by the same agent that was to be seen in the mysterious bottle, and he urged the English philosophers to draw down the electricity of the skies by placing iron points upon high towers or poles and thus test the accuracy of his theories. His suggestions, it is related, were received by the Royal Society with shouts of laughter. They refused to print Franklin's papers in their Transactions, and they seem to have looked upon his speculations and experiments as scarcely worthy of notice. They thought them the silly dreams of an ignorant provincial.

WOMAN AND PLURAL MARRIAGE.

By special request, we republish our articles on "Woman and Plural Marriage," with some further thoughts on the same subject. These articles are entirely new to two-thirds of our present readers, and most of the subscribers to our former volumes are anxious to preserve them on better paper than that on which they were originally printed.

Hepworth Dixon says, in effect, that the next great question of the world is Marriage. He is correct: the next time the Great Managerial curtain rises, Marriage will be the drama, and it will be played through before it falls. Among other questions, that of plural marriage has to be tried, not versus single marriage, but alongside of it. The Mormon proposition is not to make plural marriage obligatory on the world, but to declare its necessity and legitimacy under certain circumstances. The Mormon proposition amounts to this, that all women are entitled to be married if it takes the institution of plural marriage in the world to effect it. This much it says for society at large and for itself: that plural marriage, practised within certain conditions, is a portion of a divine system based on the facts of men and women's natures. As to polygamy in the abstract, it is, like monogamy, neither pure nor impure. Polygamy, as practised by the Mormons themselves, may be very impure and degrading, or it may be very pure and elevating. In and of itself, it is neither one nor the other, but open to both results. It is just what it is made by its practisers. All that is necessary to make a doctrine divine is that it be capable of producing divine results, when practised in its true spirit; its susceptibility to abuse is nothing to the question.

During our journey East, how often have we heard the shallow remark, made, too, with a look of astonishing wisdom, that if a plurality of wives be right for man, a plurality of husbands must be right for women; for "what is sauce for the goose must be sauce for the gander" you know. Our reply to this has been that a plurality of husbands would be just as right as a plurality of wives, if it was equally in harmony with men and women's true natures, but it is not. It is in the nature of woman to concentrate all her wifely affection upon one object. It is not within the scope of her being to do more; a plurality of husbands is, therefore, impossible to her. Women of a loose, voluptuous order may live with more than one man, but no true woman, since the creation, ever loved more than one man, as a husband, at one time. There are women in the world who feel as though an affection for more than one man was possible to them. This is because they have never yet had their true womanly love drawn out. Let any such woman realize her true ideal of a husband—and all women will do so sooner or later—and her soul will be filled. Beyond that pure point she cannot go. It is not so with a truly developed man. As to the capacities and necessities of a man's soul, he is differently organized to woman in this respect; and all men who do not stifle and overrule the voice of their true nature know it more or less. Polygamy of the brutal, degrading kind is open, we know very well, to all men, and the lower the man the nearer it is to him; but polygamy of the true kind is just a question of growth; a question of enlargement of nature. When a man's nature is sufficiently unfolded, love becomes a necessity of his being, and he loves in exact proportion to the increase of his soul's capacities. Hence polygamy is not a necessity of all men's natures; indeed there are men so low in the scale of being that the domestic relations have never yet been developed within them at all. If they desire women, it is for their sex alone; their natures know no yearning for wife or child. This is simply undevelopment, or lack of growth. They are in the bud yet; they have never blossomed. They may wear beards like Methusaleh's, and be wrinkled with age, nevertheless they are but full-grown children—not men. A quality of manhood has yet to be developed within them. And the same fact applies to women: they may pass into the scar and yellow leaf of age, but unless the wifely attachments and motherly instincts have grown up within, them they have not yet reached perfect womanhood. Upon these facts all marriage is based. Its institution and intention are to cultivate and bring out these qualities, because without them men and women never know the full pleasures of their being, and, not knowing them, cannot enjoy the full felicity of life here or life beyond the grave.

Upon this broad foundation rests the true basework of polygamy. Its object is the development of the whole man, including the growth of the affections, and not the mere accumulation of women and children. There are many sides to a man's nature, and while one wife can draw out and fill one portion, she can do no more. In man, immortal man, type of eternal deity, there sleeps infinite qualities, endless powers only to be developed as they are called out by the necessities of his life. Single marriage does this in degree, but plural marriage with its thousand-fold conditions, can alone act on all sides of his being, develop, and bring into play all the latent powers within him. True, divine polygamy, can do this, but not the polygamy of lust, nor the polygamy of ancient barbarism, multiplying wives and children like cattle,—it must be the polygamy of love. When it is less than this, it is of the earth earthy, gross and degrading.

Where is the justice of polygamy to women? It is here: A woman has a right to all of a man's nature that she can impress and fill, but she has no right to that which she cannot occupy. If in heart and brain man increases beyond her capacity to impress, she has no right to prevent others from yielding that which she cannot herself supply. This is all there is to it. While she can rightfully claim that no woman shall divide the love herself has created, she has no right to that which she cannot draw forth, and which would be locked up in her husband's bosom silent and unused for ever as far as she was concerned.

All this, it will be seen, pre-supposes marriage based in every case on reciprocal affection of the purest and most elevated kind. There are men who believe in mechanical marriage—in the piling up of huge families just for the sake of numbers. Such men accumulate women but not wives. Against such marriages we raise our humble but indignant protest. Such marriage leads but to barrenness and sterility of soul, and is double-dyed damnation to both sexes.

As we have said before, plural marriage is not necessarily obligatory on all men, any more than single marriage. In our humble estimation, it should flow from the necessities of man's higher nature, and be demanded by them. True, there are exceptional cases where single marriage life has developed matrimonial love unknown before; and the same occasionally may be true to an increased degree of plural marriage; but it is a risky business and an inversion of the natural course. Doubtless there are men and women who would forever remain dwarfed and stunted in paternal and other natural instincts, did not God by his providence, or through his servants, throw them into situations which—like hot-houses—draw out qualities which the natural sun failed to ripen; and better to be saved that way than to be lost, to our place in human hearts, or kept back for indefinite periods from holier and happier spheres of life. But the true course appears to be, for marriage of any degree to be induced by love previously germinated within the soul; and for plural marriages to be entered into in exact proportion, only, as the increasing capacities of men's souls, and the enlarging perfection of their natures demand it, through endless ages.

THE PAST AND THE FUTURE.—Next week we shall present an Editorial, which has been crowded out of our present number, on the wonderful story of the Earth and its past and future, as pointed out by the Earth itself

THINGS UNACCOUNTABLE.

CLAIRVOYANTS, ORACLES, VISIONS AND SEERS.

BY MRS. L. M. CHILD.

(From the N. Y. Independent.)

The tendency has been, and now is, to ascribe all inexplicable things to the agency of the Devil. The clouds of ignorance and superstition are perhaps as much expelled from Massachusetts as from any portion of the globe; yet I know several persons who would have thought the French girl, Angelique Cottin, possessed by a devil, if they had seen inanimate things rush violently toward her, and others whirl away, insomuch that she produced a general commotion in the furniture in every room she entered. But the learned Arago, after months of careful examination of these phenomena, decided that they could be mostly explained by laws of electricity; but that there was also some other mundane force present, not yet ascertained. There are many apparently well authenticated accounts of places, as well as persons, characterized by unaccountable sounds and motions. It was very natural that things so much out of the common course should become associated with traditions of crimes committed in such localities—especially with murder, which excites more fear and horror than any other crime. The house where the Rev. John Wesley lived so comfortably, in the midst of knockings, thumpings, rattlings, and rustlings, would have been deserted in the Middle Ages, and reported to posterity as a devil haunted mansion.

We of the 19th century have swung off to the opposite extreme, and scornfully reject all statements not inexplicable by known laws. More than forty years ago I became convinced of the existence of that gift of clairvoyance. I was laughed at by some of my intimates, who attributed what they termed my credulity to a fondness for mystical reading. But, in fact, mysticism had nothing to do with my convictions on that subject; it was the practical side of my nature which had been convinced by an array of evidence examined and published by scientific men in Paris. And, after all, there is nothing new in clairvoyance, except its name. The Grecian Apollonious born a few years before Jesus, was reverenced as one inspired by the gods because he could see the hidden thoughts of others. On one occasion, when he had just landed in Alexandria, where he was a stranger, he met several men, all unknown to him, who were being led to execution for robbery. He stopped the officers who had them in charge, and, pointing to one of the prisoners, he said: "Don't put that man to death. He is not guilty." From respect to the great reputation of Apollonious, they paused to listen to him while he entreated them at least to delay the execution While he was thus keeping them engaged in conversation, a courtier rode towards them in furious haste, crying out, "Spare Phorion! Torture extorted a false confession from him. He is proved innocent." At another time when Apollonious was lecturing in Ephesus, he suddenly stopped in the midst of his discourse, and exclaimed; "The tyrant is killed! This very moment the deed is being done." He then went on to describe the particulars of Domitian's murder, which was afterwards proved to have taken place in far distant Rome, at the precise time and in the manner he had described. I long ago came to the conclusion that clairvoyance furnished an explanation of the universal credit obtained by oracles in ancient Greece and Rome. There is a striking illustration of this in the case of Crœsus, king of Lydia. Wishing to ascertain which of the oracles was most reliable, he sent messengers to seven different places, giving directions to inquire what Crœsus was doing at a specified time. In order to be employed in a manner not likely to be conjectured, he occupied himself with boiling a kid and a tortoise in a covered brazen vessel. Six of the answers were false or evasive; but the reply from the oracle at Delphos was as follows:

> The odors that to my senses now rise
> A tortoise boiling with a kid supplies,

The Pythia at that place was probably, clairvoyant; and seeing things at a distance, described them as she saw them. This power being out of the known laws of nature, was regarded as a direct inspiration of the gods. When the priests were unable to find a person in this abnormal condition, they resorted to trickery and double meanings to keep up a profitable reputation; and thus oracles fell into discredit. Socrates is represented as saying: "The Pythia, when insane, have produced many advantages both public and private: but when they have been in a prudent state they have produced little benefit, or indeed none at all." Modern observers of these strange nervous states will interpret the remark of Socrates by the help of the well known fact that clairvoyant power is developed by disease, and lost by the recovery of health. Cassandra of Troy was probably deranged in her nervous system when she had visions, which we are told uniformly proved true. Cicero describes seers in his time "whose minds inhere not in their bodies, but flying abroad do behold things which they predict" Indeed, the very word seer is akin to clairvoyant. The physical condition of Joan of Arc was in some respects peculiar, and her nerves were in that keenly sensitive state which usually accompanies the development of clairvoyant power. Several things of her are explained by this supposition alone. When the courtiers of Charles the seventh expressed surprise at his implicit faith, in the visions of Joan, his reply was to this effect:—

"One night my mind was in such agitation concerning the wretched state of my affairs that I found it impossible to rest. Long after all were asleep, I lay awake thinking of the perils that surrounded me, and seeing no hope of any earthly succor. In my distress I rose from the bed, and kneeling on the floor, I confessed myself a miserable sinner; but implored God and His glorious mother to have compassion on me, and send some aid by which I could drive the invaders from my kingdom, and govern it in peace. A few days afterward, this maiden craved an audience, to deliver a message, which, she said, Heaven had sent by her. When she came into my presence, she told me what thoughts had revolved through my mind that night, described how I had risen from the bed and knelt upon the floor, and repeated to me the very words of my secret prayer. By that token I was convinced that God had sent her to me."

ROME AND ITS GREAT ONES.

OR, HOW THE WORLD HAS GROWN.

BY ELI B. KELSEY.

We are on sure historical ground, when we assert that there has never yet existed a tribe or nation on the earth who have not endeavored to trace their origin back to some great hero, who had either directly descended from the gods, or was immediately related to some distinguished personage, blessed with that happy relationship. Find a man, if you can, who in imagination traces out the branches of the genealogical tree, to which he belongs, that ever looks downwards in the social scale for the founder or trunk of that tree. Every Anglo-Saxon living has descended from some of the old Saxon Thanes, as every English noble has from William the Conqueror, or some of the great chiefs in his courtly train. Find the man of English blood, if you can, who will acknowledge his descent in a direct line from one of the churls or serfs who sported an iron collar in the days of Harold, or in the time of his victorious successor, William of Normandy. The tiara or crown is more pleasing in perspective, than the gutter or dunghill, the frowning castle or lordly palace than the hut of turf. Who would rend the misty veil of the past and claim his descent from some poor, despised member of the family of Muggins, when it is possible to install some renowned Orlando, as the founder of his house? Who, of all the members of the shoddy aristocracy of America, so honest or so humble, as to put a piece of old iron or a bone, a bar of soap or a tallow candle on the panels of his carriage, as a symbol of the origin of his wealth and grandeur, instead of the Lion and Unicorn, the "Fleur de lis," or the "Shamrock" and the "Thistle?" If, then, such be the pride of our race now, let us make some passable allowance for the proud and haughty Roman in his efforts to aggrandize his progenitors, by claiming that their advent into the world was as grand, marvelous and strange as were the power and greatness of their descendants real.

NUMA.

The great and wise successor of Romulus, (the miraculous), appears to have been a man of wonderful parts. Of course it was discovered that the gods had so managed it that he was born on the twenty-first day of April, the very day upon which Romulus, of happy memory, had first laid the foundations of Rome. He was of distinguished parentage, and an especial favorite of the goddess Egeria. He was of a happy and contemplative character, fond of the deep solitudes of the groves, and with reluctance—very great reluctance—exchanged the quiet garb of a private citizen for the imperial purple. He was blessed by the unseen powers with frequent heavenly interviews. Numa was, intellectually, far in advance of his contemporaries. His conceptions of the Great God of all the gods and goddesses, were, that he "was not an object of sense nor liable to passion, but invisible, incorruptable, and discernable only by the mind." He taught the Romans never to worship the Deity either in the shape of man or beast, thus adopting the Pythagorean or Grecian mythology in preference to the lower and more contemptible worship of the Egyptians.

The Romans, being an agricultural people, could not possibly have received a tradition like that believed in by the descendants of Abraham, who were essentially a pastoral race throughout all the first ages of their history. Abel offered the flesh and blood of his flocks and was accepted, while Cain, an agriculturist, offered the first fruits of the ground and was rejected—what people would follow a mode of life condemned by the gods of their worship? Numa taught the Romans that the gods did not delight in blood, and were only to be propitiated by libations of wine and sacrifice of flour and other fruits of the ground. The Israelites incorporated the oil and the wine, butter and honey, mint and cumin, frankincense and myrrh, with the substances pleasing to Deity as fast as they became producers of the fruits of the soil after their permanent settlement in Palestine. Numa, like all the wise and astute politicians before his time, at once united the tiara with the crown, and claimed to be "Pontifex Maximus," as well as king. This greatest of all the Roman lawgivers, was evidently a man of peace. He sought, by justice and clemency, to break down the barriers of caste and race, and unite all the tribes of Rome into one people. With far-seeing policy he made amity and peace the watchword of his reign—thus proving that peace conduces more to permanency and prosperity in a state than rapine and war. Not only were the people of Rome softened and humanized by his peaceful example and precepts, but his influence extended to the other cities and principalities of Italy. Festivals, games of diversion, and sacrifices to the gods occupied their leisure hours, and the nationalities of Italy mingled together, without apprehension of danger, none molesting or making afraid. There is no record in Roman history of invasion, insurrection or war in the reign of Numa. All was peace and happiness in the reign of this great and good king.

Numa was a writer as well as a king and kept voluminous records of all his laws and the incidents of his reign. He wrote essays on religion and philosophy, which he commanded should be buried with him forbidding the Romans to burn his body; as was their custom with their dead. His body and his records were carefully hid away in two stone coffins.

Four hundred years after his death, a prodigious fall of rain washed the covering off his tomb—the coffin that had contained his body was found entirely empty, while the one containing his manuscripts was, with its contents, in good preservation. Joy filled the hearts of the people. What light for Rome might not be contained in those glorious rolls of parchment. The most dignified Romans were solemnly set apart to examine them, who, to their own astonishment, were obliged to report to the Roman senate, that, for the sake of religion and the state, the contents of those records should not be published. Consequently those sacred records were carried to the "Domitiurn" and burnt. "Glory follows in the train of great men, and increases after their death; for envy does not long survive them, nay, it sometimes dies before them;" the well-known shortcomings of the living representatives of greatness, clothes with immortality dead heroes. Did our readers ever know of a grey-haired sire or matron of three score years and ten, who failed to mourn over the fallen condition of society? "Where now," say the venerable pair, "do you find such sons and daughters as we were in our youth? Where now the parents who govern so wisely and well as we governed our children? Oh, dear, what is the world coming to?" What a shock to the Romans! How must the starch have been taken out of their conceptions of the great personages who figured in the glorious days of Rome, as it had been, to find that the far-famed records of the laws of Numa, together with all his discoveries in religion and science, should be so outrageously behind the times as to be unfit to be published. Tradition had vamped and revamped the laws of Numa, time had lent enchantment to his life and religious teachings, but here was the incontrovertable testimony of his own writings—his own witness of the developments of the age in which he lived; no sacriligious hand had ever handled them; no enthusiastic admirer had ever touched and retouched them, casting their faults into oblivion, and, in fervency of spirit, enlarging upon their excellencies. Here they were, as he himself had left them, four hundred years before; the verdict of the most enthusiastic admirers of Numa and his times declared them unfit to be proclaimed—the interests of State and religion forbade it. Was it that Numa was not a wise, a great and a good king in his day? Was it that he had not improved Rome and her people by his example and precepts in his time? No; it was because tradition upon tradition had impressed upon the Roman mind the exceeding superiority of Rome and the Romans, of past ages, to the Rome and the Romans then living. Numa's own testimony proved that the laws and institutions were but the crude conceptions of a powerful but barbaric mind. That Rome and the Romans had grown, developed, expanded, and had proved to themselves that the fruit of the tree of knowledge was good, and that it was far better to have all their conceptions of the glorious past fall, than again to go back to the barbarism of their forefathers. If the doctrine of the Millerites and all their admirers be true, that man, in his advent into the world, came in at the "big end of the horn" and in the progression of ages, the race is becoming more and more wicked, more profanely ignorant of God and Godliness, and, physically, weaker and weaker, when, we ask, will the end come, and the race fizzle out? If, on the other hand, it be true that mankind entered upon the present life at the small end of the horn and, with the progress of ages, are expanding, and growing in capacity, as the horn enlarges in size, how glorious will be the day when posterity bursts out at the bigger end?

ALFRED AND THE SAXON COMMONWEALTH.

NO. 2.

THE WORLD'S HISTORY ILLUSTRATED IN ITS GREAT CHARACTERS.

Alfred ascended the throne at the period when the Saxon Heptarchy was expiring, and the Danish invaders contended with the Saxon possessors for the dominion. Britain had been divided under eight Anglo-Saxon governments, and the island was, therefore, ruled by an Octarchy, though the Heptarchy—or the seven governments—is the most familiar historical denomination.

And here, with the ascension of Alfred the Great and the Danish invasion, we are brought at once to a very interesting consideration in the growth of England, and the development of her Commonwealth. We see the nation which was destined to play the most important part in the history of the world, passing from its semi-barbaric state, into one of consolidated empire, which, had it not done, England could never largely have contributed to the world's civilization. Ancient Britain had been divided under its petty kings and chiefs, and even to the ascension of Alfred, England had not assumed the form of a capital kingdom, but was portioned out between a number of Saxon Princes, who had by their preeminence and wars among themselves, set up their respective governments. France, it will be seen, had therefore, the start of several centuries before England in her imperial course, under the first dynasty of Clovis, and afterwards that of the family of Charlemagne, but while the huge empire of Charles the Great broke up into smaller empires; kingdoms and dukedoms represented in Germany and France from the day that the Saxon Heptarchy, or more correctly the Octarchy was succeeded by Alfred's consolidated kingdom. England has traveled to unity until at last it culminated in the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. This may be accounted for partially by the peculiar genius of England and her commonwealth, which binds law and order with a supreme love of liberties. England is revolutionary and progressive in her very genius and constitution, and not in diseased epidemics, consequently she has traveled to an imperial unity from the day that Alfred became the father of the English nation, while France and Germany have reached all its forms of popular governments through volcanic irruptions. Indeed, the passage of Great Britain into a modern republic would be as legitimate a development as her passage from a hereditary kingdom into a constitutional elective monarchy, she having already elected William, Prince of Orange, Queen Ann and the Hanoverian dynasty, after the great revolution which threw James Stuart from the British throne.

The great English unity was brought about by the famous invasion of the Danes, and with the rising of Alfred, the Providence of the world shows two phases—a nation destined to lead the vanguard of civilization, forced to consolidated empire by fierce invasions and the raising up of a man worthy to found an empire, and to infuse into it a genius compatable even with our modern forms.

Ethelred, King of Wessex, was mortally wounded in his battles against the invaders, and Alfred, by his brother's death was elevated to the throne of Wessex. Ethelred left children, but the critical state of the country induced his Earls to choose his brother Alfred to succeed him.

During the first year of Alfred's reign, as King of Wessex, a succession of the fiercest conflicts took place between his army and the Northmen. The west Saxons fought eight pitched battles with the invaders, many thousands of whom fell, but new fleets of them perpetually swarmed on the German Ocean, and poured upon England the invading tide. It was now fairly a war between the two people for the occupation of the land, and within a month after the accession of Alfred, the Danes, in his absence, vanquished his troops at Wilton. This made the ninth great battle fought in West Saxony during the year. Alfred now made peace with the enemy, and they quitted his dominions.

For the first seven years of Alfred's reign, England saw a succession of great struggles, with short cessations of hostilities between the invading Danes and the Saxon possessors for the occupation of the country. During this period, Alfred by no means won his immortality, nor fulfilled the promise which his valiant conduct gave in the reign of his brother, Ethelred. Then came that famous historical episode in his life, when he lost his kingdom, and became a fugitive in his own land. But the sequel brought forth Alfred purified and ennobled, and gave to him the dominion of all England. It was not until after he was an outlaw, that he merited his title of the Great king, and the father of his nation.

The "locusts of the Baltic" in the words of the old chroniclers, having spread themselves over a part of the kingdom of Mercia, being joined by new swarms, advanced into Wessex, and next took possession of Chippenham, in Wiltshire. At this formidable invasion, the inhabitants fled to other regions; some passing over to France, while the country generally submitted to the invaders, and Alfred himself became a fugitive.

This part of English history has been a marvel to the Chroniclers; for Alfred seems neither to have played a worthy part, nor his countrymen a very heroic one in submitting, almost without resistance, to the invaders. The cause is supposed to have been chiefly from some grave faults of the Saxon monarch in his early reign. Asser, his loving tutor and biographer confesses his royal master's sin. He says:—

"We believe that this adversity occurred to the king not undeservedly. Because in the first part of his reign, when he was a young man, and governed by a youthful mind; when the men of his kingdom, and his subjects came to him and besought his aid in their necessities; when they were depressed by the powerful, implored his aid and patronage; he would not hear them, nor afford them any assistance, but treated them as of no estimation. Saint Neot, who was then living, his relation, deeply lamented this, and foretold that the greatest adversity would befall him. But Alfred paid no attention to his admonitions, and treated the prediction with disdain." Asser further says. "The Lord permitted him to be often wearied by his enemies, afflicted by adversity, and to be depressed by the contempt of his people."

The following incidents of Alfred's great humiliation in the loss of his kingdom, and fugitive life, we quote from writings about contemporary with the Saxon lawgiver. The author of the life of St. Neot written in Alfred's time, speaking of the meeting of the invaders and the English, says of Alfred, that when the Danish army approached:—"He was soon lost; he took flight, and left all his warriors, and his commanders, and all his people, his treasures and his treasure vessels, and preserved his life. He went hiding over hedges and ways, woods and wilds, till through divine guidance he came safe to the isle of Athelney." Matthew of Westminster continuing the subject, says:—

"In the extreme borders of the English people towards the west, there is a place called Æthelingeie, or the isle of the nobles. It is surrounded by marshes, and so inaccessible that no one can get to it but by a small vessel. It has a great wood of alders, which contains stags and goats, and many animals of that kind. Its solid earth is scarcely two acres in breadth. Alfred having left the few fellow-soldiers whom he had, that he might be concealed from his enemies, sought this place alone, where, seeing the hut of an unknown person, he turned to it, asked and received a shelter. For some days, he remained there as a guest and in poverty, and contented with the fewest necessaries. But the king, being asked who he was and what he sought in such a desert place, answered that he was one of the king's thegns, had been conquered with him in a battle, and flying from his enemies had reached that place. The herdsman believing his words, and moved with pity, carefully supplied him with the necessaries of life."

The famous incident of King Alfred burning the loaves with the scolding he received from the herdsman's wife, is thus described by Assar, Alfred's friend and tutor:—

"He lived an unquiet life there, at his cowherd's. It happened that on a certain day the rustic wife of this man prepared to bake her bread. The king, sitting then near the hearth, was making ready his bow and arrows, and other warlike instruments, when the ill-tempered woman beheld the loaves burning at the fire. She ran hastily and removed them, scolding the king, and exclaiming, 'You man! you will not turn the bread you see burning, but you will be very glad to eat it when done.' This unlucky woman little thought she was addressing the king, Alfred."

We are told that the munificent Alfred afterwards rewarded his peasant host, whose name was Denulf. Observing him to be a man of capacity, the royal prophet of our Saxon civilization advised the peasant to apply his mind to learning and to assume the ecclesiastical profession: he did so, and the king made him his bishop of Winchester, which position he held till his death in 909. The fullest account of Alfred in his little island of refuge, when he began to rise above his abject state, to assert his heroic character, is left by the Abbot of Croyland, who says:—

"The king, overwhelmed with the disgrace of poverty and dejection, and instead of his royal palace being confined to a vile hovel, was one day casually recognized by some of his people, who, being dispersed, and flying all around, stopped where he was. An eager desire then arose both in the king and his knights to devise a remedy for their fugitive condition.

"In a few days they constructed a place of defence as well as they could: and here recovering a little of his strength, and comforted by the protection of his few friends, he began to move in warfare against his enemies. His companions were very few in number, compared with the barbarian multitude; nor could they on the first day, or by their first attacks, obtain any advantages; yet they neither quitted the foe nor submitted to their defeats; but, supported by the hope of victory, as their small number gradually increased, they renewed their efforts, and made one battle but the preparation for another.

"Sometimes conquerors, and sometimes conquered, they learnt to overcome time by chances, and chance by time. The king, both when he failed and when he was successful, preserved a cheerful countenance, and supported his friends by his example."

Alfred and his companions, in their little island of refuge led an uncertain and unquiet life, obtaining their subsistence by plunder, hunting, or fishing in the adjoining districts. With his small force, Alfred constantly harrassed the Danish army, when he found any of their camps or companies exposed. Whether victorious or repulsed by an overwhelming force, he always retreated with such celerity to his unknown asylum, as to baffle his pursuers, and soon he was found again harrassing the enemy in some distant quarter. "By day and night" says the historian "at dawn, and in the evening twilight, from woods and marshes, he was ever rushing on the Northmen, with all the advantage of selection and surprise." By these expeditions Alfred inured himself to war, obtained a knowledge of the country, won the hearts of his followers, gathered recruits to his standard, revived the spirit of the country, and made himself a skillful general.

A touching incident is told of Alfred during his residence in his fenny isle. His troop was abroad on one of their expeditions, but Alfred was at home with his queen and one thegn. As was his custom, he was reading the Holy Scripture, which he would vary with reading the annals of his country, and the actions of illustrious men. While thus engaged, a feeble knock and a cry of hunger was heard at his gate from one of his people. Alfred laid down his book and called his thegn to give the poor claimant some food, but the thegn found only one loaf and a little wine in their store. But the good king, who had now resolved to be the father of his people, divided a pittance between his family, and gave the rest to the mendicant: the beggar for once had the share of a king.

Alfred had been in his retreat six months when he resolved to surprise the main army of the Danes, which still continued in Wiltshire, encamped under Bratton-hill at Eddendun near Westbury. Having resolved to inspect the camp of the enemy, he assumed the character of a harper, and thus disguised, he went to the Danish camp. His early love of Saxon poetry and music stood him in good service now. His executions on the harp and fine singing excited the admiration of the Danish soldiers, and he was placed at their kings table to enchant him and his officers by his vocal and harp performances. Here he heard the conversations of the Danish chief and his officers, and while in the encampment, observed the position of the enemy. His bold design accomplished, he quitted the Danish camp without molestation and returned in safety to his little isle of refuge.

Music.

OUR ORCHESTRA.

It is most astonishing, but nevertheless most true, that, however near to perfection our home-talent may arrive in rendering the works of classical and other authors of modern date and variety, the less, we believe, they are appreciated by those who should encourage them by their applause to greater progress.

Notwithstanding this lack of appreciation of our home legitimate talent, we are not slow in tendering to foreign musicians, not only the approbation they are deserving, but we sometimes go to an excess in our applause, and not unfrequently the house is brought down by a specie of clap-trap so tickling to non-classical understandings.

Our present remarks apply to the Murphy and Mack minstrel band, who, in all truth, deserved much of the applause they received. But, we would ask, were they superior to our own Orchestral band? Let us analyze and see: Did the leading violin player of the Murphy and Mack minstrel band produce more clear, more graceful, more expressive and rapid executions than our own leader, Professor Careless, is in the habit of producing from his instrument—the violin. We answer to this question without fear of contradiction, that he did not. In following up our question, we will ask—Did the second violinist render more effective execution with his instrument than our Mr. Beesley is in the habit of doing? Did the contra-basso player produce more euphoneous and voluminous tones than our own Mr. Midgely produces in general? To each of these questions we answer—They did not.

Of the cornet executions and purity of tone brought out by Mr. Croxall on the above instrument, we have given our opinion in the last number.

There is only one instrument less in value—the flute—than found in the Murphy and Mack minstrel troupe, and to compensate for this disadvantage, we have the brilliant, clear and expressive executions of Professor Pratt on the Grand Piano-forte, which is combined with our Orchestra.

We will follow up our questions still further by asking—If we have as good performers in our Orchestra as we find in imported bands, why is it that we do not appreciate them better by giving them that stimulating applause which they deserve, and is so much needed to keep them up to the mark by constant and punctual practice; for without honest stimulation, they lose their zest for progression.

We noticed that Murphy and Mack's band received encores for many pieces of clap-trap, while we allowed, at the re-opening of our Theater, the very effective rendition of Rosini's Overture to "Semiramide," which is so beautiful in its development of rare and choice subjects, notwithstanding its faithful interpretation by the members of our Orchestra, to pass without a single clap, and without a single expression of approbation for the care bestowed by the performers in rendering effective this fine telling composition.

In conclusion, we will say—Let us throw aside our lethargic propensity of non-appreciation of home-talent, and render to our band the applause they so much deserve by their effective interpretations of the Great Masters; at the same time, let us remember that the Orchestra is no small item in the evening's amusement. We will also advise our Orchestra to persevere in their study and practice which will enable them to compete at all times with any imported talent that may be introduced at our Theater.

The Drama.

THE ADVENT OF NEIL WARNER.

Silence is broken by the advent of Neil Warner; the apathy of the theatrical public is charmed into speech. On the morning after the performance of Richard III, the young English tragedian was the subject of conversation in the city. The public had unexpectedly met an event, and events are very rare. As for the critic, he has found something to say—more he has found the impulse which forces him to an utterance. The highest compliment which the critic can pay to a great artiste is the confession that he cannot be silent. Sheridan's reply to Boswell, upon a certain occasion, is very much the critic's constant feeling. Said the author of the best biography in the world, as he met Sheridan in the street—"Have you read my Life of Johnson." "Yes, d—n you!" was the characteristic reply of Sheridan. "but I wouldn't if I could have helped it!" So the critic goes to see Richard III, with a deep resolve not to be moved to admiration. There must be one, at least, in the house analytic, not enthusiastic. This cynical disposition is doubtless very much because there have been so many Shakspearean celebrities, but so few actors with real dramatic nature. The dramatic genius is the highest endowment of the poet. It was the possession of this in the greater degree that placed Shakspeare a head above Milton. As a poet, Milton was his equal: as a creator of epic subject, his equal; but in the protean nature of the dramatist, which conceives and brings forth character as nature does its offspring, the author of Paradise Lost was very much the inferior of the prophet of the English Drama. Now, no actor can be really great, or claim brotherhood with Garrick, Edmund Kean, the elder Booth, or the Kembles, except he also, as well as the poet, possesses this dramatic genius. Neil Warner is endowed with this very rare gift, and he is one of the very few men now upon the stage of whom this can be affirmed. We care nothing about this gentleman's celebrity; it is his quality that gives him weight, and like a true artiste, he comes to us in the simplicity of his name.

Mr. Warner opened his engagement in Salt Lake City, as Richard III. There is not in all Shakspeare's plays a character so difficult to render as that of Gloster, but from the very moment that this great actor made his first entree, the audience appreciated that Richard was before them, and the illusion remained in their mind throughout the entire performance. We shall give to him a special page of review in our next, after we have seen his full capacity.

Correspondence, Etc.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Payment of Wages.—We have received a very sensible letter from friend Joseph Silver. Joseph, with his usual hard sense, but of course a little ironically, proposes, as workingmen have so long done work in advance of wages, that it would be refreshing to have a change, and get wages for a little while paid in advance of work. There is more truth than poetry in this proposition. As Bro. Silver says, workmen have to wait from one month to two years for pay, and use up more time in its collection than it is worth. This is the experience of us all; we need a radical change, and must have it. What we would urge upon employers and workmen, is a weekly settlement of wages. Labor is the workingman's capital, and there is no more reason why he should give it to an employer, and wait weeks or months for the pay, and then take it in dribbles, than there is that a merchant should hand a calico dress over the counter, and wait months for the money. Weekly settlements, we are aware, are not as easily made in trade as in cash, still, where there is a will there is a way, and this is a reform long needed, and which should be loudly called by both capitalists and workmen. We intend some-day to give our views on the very many bad influences attending the system of trade or barter.

The Days of my Youth.—A piece of poetry with this designation has been received without a name. Our object is to give a local interest to our columns. We cannot, therefore, publish without a name.

Sickness among Children.—We are of opinion that much of the dysentry, distressing our children is more canker than anything else. A little pure olive oil, would, we are assured, do more good than anything else. Try it, all.

THE SPIRIT IN THE WHOLE BODY.

BY JOHN LYON

CONCLUDED.

In continuing my remarks, in proof that the spirit of man has not its seat or residence in the brain more than in any other member of the body, I shall investigate, with as much perspicuity as possible. The next reasons I shall advance are that the outward development, or bumps, have, in some instances, no corresponding cavity in the interior; again, when disease or surgical operations have, in consequence of accidents, physically affected certain, so-called, organs, the patient has still retained the intellectual and moral power and sentiment as formerly. The same result has been proved in the case of the amputation of a leg or an arm, when the actual feeling or sensation has been retained in the region formerly occupied by the toes and fingers, long after they were severed from the body. It may be said that this was in consequence of the nerves having their seat in the brain, and retaining their sensation and sympathy for the dissevered parts. This I admit; but this is only adding to the proof that if our reflection from sensation remains with the nerves in connection with every other part of the body, as it is constituted, it will then follow that the spirit is in every part of the human frame, through the nerves, as well as in the brain. Let us refer to the acuteness of the hands and feet, in the performance of arts, manufactures and trades. For example: the compositor, who sets up type for the press, has not only to remember the orthography of each word (which in most manuscripts is very imperfect), but also the punctuation, and all the different divisions of the cases in which the type is kept; yet, when he is an expert workman, and understands his business thoroughly, he can converse on various subjects and perform his labor at the same time—as if his fingers retained all the consideration necessary to perform their seemingly intellectual task. So it is with many writers and copyists.

In working certain kinds of cloth, the feet of the weaver have often to thread their way among a number of treadles, which are entirely hidden from his sight, yet, after having his feet once trained to work out the pattern, he can go on with his business with as much ease as if it required no trouble or study to accomplish the complicated fabric in hand. His feet will be performing all the movements necessary, with an intelligence akin to the fingers of the compositor, or the copyist, while he is talking politics with his shop mates, or debating some intricate subject on theology. The somnambulist is also a wonderful exemplification of human action, performed without the aid of wide-awake reflection.

In intellectual compositions, however, or any real mental study, the head seems to be more in requisition than any other member of the body. But the art of writing and spelling is as natural to the hand as thoughts are to the head—that is, to a person in the habit of writing. Indeed we sometimes exchange the use of our outer senses, without taking any notice of it; for example: in writing, we speak with the hand, and in reading, we hear with the eyes, just as a blind man can recall the name of a person or place, or thing by the silent touch of his finger on raised letters. To prove this assertion in respect to hearing, it has been observed that persons born deaf can hear sounds otherwise than through or by the auditory nerve, which is said to be placed at the extremity of the inner passage of the ear leading to the brain. The plan to prove this statement is by taking a slim piece of wood, three or four feet long, and placing it between the teeth of the deaf person, putting the other end, in the same manner, between the teeth of the operator, who projects the sound to him. In this way, persons born deaf have been enabled to hear sounds, although unable to understand their meaning, because sound is merely the symbol of something, and has no meaning until one is attached to it. We would here observe that it is evident that the nerves of the teeth communicate to the soul or spirit in man, as well as the auditory nerve. But this does not prove that the brain is not the workshop of the spirit any more than the heart or stomach; indeed, the heart has a greater claim to be called the seat of sensation, as it is there we feel any sudden shock first, when fear causes a momentary stoppage of the circulation. The stomach, also, has a powerful effect, when deranged, on the whole body, being the laboratory in which materials are prepared to nourish and cleanse the blood and to strengthen the nerves and muscles.

In conclusion we would remark that, where there is no phrenological development, to indicate the operations of the mind, that we know of, we often find it in vigorous power, without the appliances of study, in cases where evidently it is not flowing from the head alone, but is dependent on the lesser members of the body as well; demonstrating the statement that the spirit is not particularly confined to the head, but is everywhere diffused throughout the whole body of man, and that itpossesses the same formation, spiritually, as the physical system it inhabits. It will also be seen that physiognomy, physiology and phrenology combined are necessary to elucidate character; and, as a combined philosophy, more consistent with the revelations of God to man than either apart, and more adapted as a science, to man himself as a progressive, intelligent being, formed physically and mentally to attain to the full perfections of his creator, with all the attributes of God, to be developed in time, and throughout all the endless ages of eternity.

THE TRUE JUSTICE.

The French courts have struck the marrow at last. Hitherto, when a betrayed and unhappy girl is driven by want and madness to destroy the fruit of a passion, not regarded as legitimate except under the mummery of statute and priest, she has been roughly laid hold of by the public authorities and handed over to as speedy a punishment as could be meted out to her. In all such cases, only the unfortunate girl becomes the object of condemnation and punishment. The Hester Vaughn tragedy led certain persons, who make it their vocation, to look more closely into the modes of dispensing justice, and with a result not altogether expected even by those who took an active part in the same. The poor girl's pertinacious determination not to reveal the name of her betrayer, by whose direct agency she had been brought into her state of woe, only excited a profounder sympathy for her situation, while it likewise provoked many sharp inquiries as to the right of the guilty partner to screen himself from his just share of the consequences. Possibly a few such glaring instances of injustice will avail at last to direct popular attention to this most important point, and we may then get at something like an equal distribution of a penalty which one person, and she always the most helpless, is forced to bear alone.

A case has recently occured in France that pretty well illustrates the observations above made to our readers. A young girl went from a distance to live in the family of a married man, a manufacturer of embroidery. After a time her friends suspected a criminal intimacy between the man and herself—and endeavored to procure her removal. She stoutly denied the charge, however, and insisted on continuing where she was. Time passed on, and circumstances gave their suspicions the character of facts. She appeared enciente, and then suddenly the symptoms disappeared. The case came to the notice of the authorities, and the girl was taken in hand. But, be it noticed, not the girl alone. The partner of her guilt was arrested along with her, and both were held for trial. The case duly came on, and the evidence brought about a conviction. But it was not such a conviction as we are accustomed to in this country. The girl was acquitted—but the man was found guilty. She went free; he was sent to prison for the term of ten years, to be devoted to hard labor! There is the difference between justice in one country and in another.

Now let our laws be so amended, obediently to the spirit of reform which is abroad; that in every such case the girl goes free and the man gets the punishment—or at least so that the man shall share in the penalty which he would cowardly bring down on her head, and we shall have reached a stage of progress in a most important matter. It is shockingly wrong that so unequal a measure of punishment should be meted out on the party which is the defenseless one.

NOT ALL DROSS.

CHAPTER LXIV.

FARINELLI IN NEWGATE PRISON.

It was the morning after the arrest, and Farinelli was now lying in Newgate prison. To say that he had passed a sleepless night would be telling but little of the state of his case. He had not slept, for he had barely survived a night of torture. How can a man sleep upon the rack! True, his was a mental torture, and the rack upon which he was broken, was his imagination. It is a dreadful thing for a man to be charged with murder, and the higher-toned the mind, the more horrible to it is the charge. In such circumstances, a man cannot help picturing to himself the shuddering horror which runs through a nation at the very mention of the murderer's name, and among another class, the cool manner with which he is morally and almost literally dissected: for there is something very like a dissection in the prospects of an execution. There is also the public trial, with a thousand eager faces staring at you, a thousand eager ears waiting to catch the judgment of "guilty or not guilty." How can one, so charged, shut out that picture? But worse than all, there is the scene of the gallows, with a horrid crowd of twenty thousand human wolves waiting to see you drop into eternity with the last convulsive spasms of strangled life, which may be well supposed to describe the mental agonies of the condemned at the near prospect of entering suddenly into the awful presence of the Creator. How can one charged with murder shut out the picture of that last frightful gallows-scene, or what stoical mind resist the overwhelming sensations and thoughts of that last moment before dropping from the scaffold into eternity. Even, though a man should be innocent like Farinelli, those pictures, on his first night in Newgate, would certainly rise to appall the mind; they would be vivid even when the prospects of an honorable acquittal were bright; but, when the circumstances were as black as those which surrounded the foster-brother of Terese Ben Ammon, then every view which he could take would be dark and ominous indeed. These remarks will sufficiently describe the state and feeling of Farinelli, on his first night in Newgate, charged with murder.

"Sir, can I do anything for your comfort?" said one of the warders of the prison, who entered his cell about ten in the morning, to take away his untouched breakfast.

"No, my good man, I thank you," the prisoner replied.

"Sir Richard Brine has instructed us to show every consideration to you, Mr. Farinelli," said the warder. "All but your liberty is at your order, sir."

"I am grateful to Sir Richard, and also to yourself, for your respectful attention; but I need nothing except an answer as to whether anyone has called to see me; and also, if any particular friend would be permitted to visit me here."

"Most certainly, sir; though no one has called this morning."

"Thank you. That will do," said Farinelli with a sigh; and the warden left him.

"I thought, at least Terese's uncle would have been here this morning to see me," observed the poor fellow, despondingly. "Will my foster-sister visit me here? Oh, could I but see her and receive her forgiveness for my mad act in Rome, with an avowal of her belief in my innocence of this treacherous crime, I should be half reconciled to my fate; but I fear she will not come. Will Clara, too, forsake me? No, she will not. There is one consolation. She would cleave to me even were I guilty."

And thus Farinelli continued to muse and agitate himself with doubts and speculations until three o'clock in the afternoon, when the warden entered and announced Sir Richard Courtney. The baronet was accompanied by Lord Frederick De Lacy, Judah Nathans, and one, more welcome still, his foster-sister, Terese.

Farinelli could not speak, so great was his agitation; but his gentle foster-sister seeing his emotion and understanding his feelings, ran and threw her arms around his neck, and burst into tears.

"Oh my dear brother Beppo," she said in tremulous accents, "I weep to see you here, not in belief of your guilt."

"And do you, indeed, forgive me, sister Terese, for what I did attempt?" asked the poor fellow, anxiously.

"As I hope God will forgive me of my wrong thoughts," she replied, wording it as though Farinelli's had been but a thought and not an act.

"Bless you for that, my sister; bless you for that!"

"My uncle Judah has told us everything and has taken all the blame upon himself," observed our heroine paliatively.

"That is more than his due. He but tempted me."

"And therefore am I—not you—to blame, my friend," put in Judah Nathans. "You were tempted through your better nature. Angels fall—not devils. No fiend ever tempts me, except my own necessity. I fall from nothing, for I am of my father, the devil; but you, Farinelli, were a soul blinded by its own nobility, as much as by its passions; and my master's necessities placed me at your elbow to push you over the brink of your perdition. Legally, I am invulnerable, for several times I held you back from murder; nor was murder my design, for I loathe it. Sir Herbert Blakely designed assassination; your morbid passions fascinated you with the same thought, and I played the Mephistopheles to you. Don't fret yourself with that affair, my friend. You but simply grazed the hand of Walter Templar, while he was nearly the death of you. And then, my dear fellow, were I superstitous, I should say there was a providence in the affair, for it led to the strange discovery of my family; and will even yet lead to the fulfillment of Sir Richard Courtney's family purposes. Walter may not be found, but the De Lacy estates will be redeemed by my niece, which most likely never would have been the case, had you not, in your insanity, struck at Walter's life."

"You aim to take self-reproach from my heart by your considerate sophistry, sir; but I thank you all the same," observed the prisoner gratefully.

"No sophistry; but the simple truth, Farinelli. Now, your mumby-pumby moralists generally call this looking at the truth from all sides, sophistry; but I look in the face of Truth, on every side, for she has many faces. Meet her on one corner of the street and she seems a different person to the one you met on the other corner; yet, it is Truth herself, and not two persons. Now, the stupid judges and jury will meet the facts of your case in Italy and believe that the truth in England has the same face. We must show to them, my friend, that she has another face in England. For this purpose, I start for Italy to-night. I am certain I shall find the solution of this problem in Herbert Blakely."

Sir Richard Courtney had been conversing with Lord Frederick De Lacy aside, leaving Judah Nathans and his niece to speak to the prisoner first; but they now came forward, and Sir Richard Courtney cordially offered his hand to the poor victim of circumstantial evidence.

"My poor friend," said Courtney, sympathetically. "I beg you to consider my presence here to-day as a testimony of my belief in your innocence of this dreadful charge. As for your act in Rome, I forgive as I know my nephew would also forgive."

"I will answer for Walter; here is my hand, both for him and me," joined in Frederick De Lacy; and he shook the hand of the prisoner with the impulsive warmth of youth and that natural generosity which so characterized the friend of Walter Templar.

"Lord Frederick and myself have visited you, Signor Farinelli, to impress upon the public mind the confidence of my family in your innocence. Our visit will, of course, be reported in all the London newspapers."

"Sir Richard, I appreciate your noble generosity towards me," returned the prisoner, deeply affected.

"Count Orsini," continued Courtney, "has stated his case under oath, this morning: but both myself and Lord Frederick have delivered a formal statement in the case, affirming our faith in your innocence, with our grounds of suspicion that Blakely and Orsini were the two mysterious horsemen. Mr. Nathans came not into court, for he will not appear against his old master, unless at the last moment, to save your life. He has been, however, busy preparing to go to Rome for the purpose of establishing the fact that Herbert Blakely was on that night, not in Italy; and tracing his return to England before the date of Walter's disappearance. I have also left other contingencies of the affair entirely in his hands for your sake."

"To be brief, Farinelli," here put in "Snap," "Sir Richard has pledged himself to me that, in case Herbert Blakely has the power, and will restore Walter Templar, no action shall be taken against him. This is as much to save your life as to find Walter, if living. If Herbert Blakely consents, well; if not, I shall have found the necessity; he shall not escape me, his race shall have been run. Now, my friend, we must leave you."

"There is some one else, brother Beppo, waiting to enter when we depart," whispered Terese.

"Is it Clara?" the prisoner enquired anxiously.

"It is Clara Garcia," answered the foster-sister.

In a few minutes more Farinelli's first visitors to his Newgate prison cell had departed, but another comforter flew to him, and was clasped to his throbbing heart: It was Clara Garcia. This terrible adversity had but drawn them nearer together.

CHAPTER LXV.

SNAP AND HERBERT IN ROME.

In Rome again. It was in the evening and at the beginning of the month of May. Herbert Blakely was alone in his luxurious room in one of the most fashionable hotels. He was drinking wine and smoking his cigar, and the fantastic cloud that constantly encircled his head showed the intensity of his thoughts, for he puffed away like a man self-absorbed. He had been reading a letter from his confederate, Orsini, relating the arrest of Farinelli and the other circumstances of the case which so deeply concerned him. One point especially pleased him: it was in the fact that Snap kept aloof from bearing witness against him. His last thoughts were of his ancient mentor. As he reflected upon him, he puffed away at his cigar more furiously, the fire of which was now blazing at his very lips, but he noticed it not. The evening was fairly set in; a man had just entered softly and stood near contemplating him. Suddenly he threw away the bit of cigar which had just burnt his lip, at the same time impulsively confirming his thought aloud:

"Yes, I think I can trust the fidelity of Snap to my dead father. Snap will not betray me."

"You can trust my fidelity, but can you trust your own? I will not betray you, but will you betray yourself?"

"Devil! what brought you hither?" exclaimed Herbert Blakely, starting to his feet in amazement.

"My purpose, as you know, or I should not have come," Snap replied.

"What purpose, rascal?"

"What purpose, Herbert?—your own good, and to prevent my heel from hurting my dead master's son."

"Ha! say you so?" exclaimed Blakely.

"Herbert, you have seen me shudder when that heel has trod upon a worm, for, as you know, I love not hurting."

"Fool, am I your worm? You shall find the serpent's sting in me, if you dare to plant your heel."

"Nay, Herbert, the serpent's sting is mine; and perhaps, being myself a living thing upon the ground, from sympathy I do not like to tread upon the worm. But while I hate to hurt, you have seen me in the dissecting room take the knife from the surgeon's hand and cut up his subject with a passionless celerity that has won the applause of a crowd of surgical students. That was science. The treading on the worm has disgusted me, the scientific cutting-up of the human body fascinated me, for it shuddered not beneath the knife, but provoked me to skill by its lifeless apathy."

"Blockhead! Come at once to your sticking point, for I see you are feeling your way towards it; but remember I am not a lifeless lump of flesh any more than I am your worm."

"I have come to Rome that you might not be a subject for some surgeon's knife, after the hangman has fingered you."

"Bah, fool! To your sticking place, I say."

"Well, Herbert, my illustration was to impress upon you what you so well know, that I am scientific without passion, without hate, without conscience, without morals, without religion, and, until my sister's child entered into my heart, without human affections. Life here and hereafter—if there be a hereafter—is to me a science; and my necessities are my dissecting knives. I come to prevent you, if possible, from putting one of those knives in my hands to cut you up, for I shall do it quickly and passionlessly, if I begin."

"Come, come, Snap, no more of this. Let us talk as of old, and I suppose, as of old, I must bear your monitorship."

"Very good, Herbert; let it be as of old. And now I have lighted the lamp for you, I will help myself to your wine. You should never sit in the dark."

Snap, during his conversation, had taken the lamp from the mantel-piece and lighted it, just as he would have done when he was in Sir Herbert's service; and he threw himself into a chair.

"Well, Snap, what would you say to me. I ought to be angry with you for betraying my father and myself in the De Lacy affair."

"That, Herbert, is not true. I pledged not myself to your father to war against my sister's child, and to blight her life nor to murder the man whom she would choose for her husband. Facts and relationships have met me within the last eighteen months which neither he nor I nor you dreamt would turn up. Herbert, you and I must accept them. I am on the side of my sister's child, but I would preserve you from yourself."

"By the Fiend, Snap, you anger me, but go on. Your business in coming to Rome; pray, what may it be?"

"To ask you to restore Sir Walter Templar to my sister's child, if he be still living, and to save Farinelli from being hung."

"Fool! Do you not remember that we both for years tried to remove Walter Templar from our path, and that it was you who chose Farinelli as our instrument?"

"I deny nothing, but I knew not then that Walter and Terese were nearer to me than all others in the world, nor how much I and mine owed to Farinelli and his dead mother. Herbert, it is in vain for you and me to parley over this matter. What is cannot be changed. The necessities of my family outweigh those of yours in my mind. They have come unbidden and unsought between you and me."

"Well, let the affair rest thus," answered Blakely impatiently.

"Herbert, I would save—not destroy—you, which I certainly shall if you submit not to my necessities."

"Let us end this, Snap. Come, drink and be friends at least in desire."

"I am your friend, Herbert, for the sake of the old bonds and associations. But tell me where is Walter Templar? Have you killed him?"

"Why, what a blockhead you are to think that I should confess to you, if I did."

"You might in safety, if it came not too late. If Walter is dead, tell me, and I will keep your secret; for, if he is not living, to hang you would not bring him to life again. I should regret his death, but would not betray you. But Farinelli must —shall be saved, if possible, though I will not betray your life away even to save him."

"Do you not see then, Snap, that were I concerned in the death of Walter Templar, you are placing impossibilities in the way of both. My confession would not save him, but destroy me."

"No, Herbert, for I believe that Walter Templar is living. Restore him or give some evidence that I can handle to prove that he is living and will return to his family and that Farinelli will be saved."

"And I say again, were this in my power or were I concerned in the disappearance of Templar, of which I have read in the papers, I should destroy myself."

"Not so; I have come with guarantees of your safety. Sir Richard Courtney pledges himself and his nephew that, if Walter is restored, the secret shall be kept, and the world made to believe that common robbers contrived the whole. The story shall be framed to suit the case."

"Fool, do you think that my father and I have aimed for the De Lacy estates so long, that I should play the baby now. What I have done, I have done, and shall stand by it."

"A point more, Herbert, and I have also done. You still calculate on the De Lacy estates. My niece will redeem them."

"Traitor," roared Blakely fiercely, and then adding: "But you are matched there. Neither Courtney, nor the beggar De Lacy would receive the mortgage, as a gift from your niece, without her marriage with Walter Templar, who is dead, and by a deed of special provision, as you know, the mortgage of the estates cannot be transferred from my father and his heirs into strangers' hands. The entail was cut off by Lord Reginald and his son, that we might possess before or at the end of fifty years from that date, with the joint action of both sides. I will never resign, and unless redeemed, not transferred mark, to strangers' hands; even in my lifetime the De Lacy inheritance may be mine by the natural course of events. I have resolved. So let there be no more folly."

"I know every point in the case, Herbert, and as you are aware, I never play a game unless I hold the winning card in my hand. Beware, or I shall crush you. The worm will be beneath my heel. Before I leave Rome, I shall see you again. Consider, and beware how you provoke me!"

And Snap arose and left the room, while Herbert Blakely started to his feet and paced the floor in his rage like a very demon.

"He holds the winning card, does he?" reflected Sir Herbert to himself, after his rage had been tempered a little by reflection. "What in the Fiend's name does he mean? Yet, if Snap says the winning card is in his hand, then it is there for a certainty. I will at once to the Savinelli brothers, they are the three most expert bravos in Rome. So, my ancient mentor, you have pronounced your own doom in telling me you hold the winning card; for, if I now lose a trick, the hangman wins the game against me."

Sir Herbert Blakely took his hat and went out to seek the three notorious bravos whom Count Orsini had recommended to him.

CHAPTER LXVI.

ONE INTELLECT AGAINST THREE CUT-THROATS.

During Snap's stay in Rome, he visited not again his former master until the night before his intended departure for England. Significant notes, however, were sent by him to Sir Herbert, the last one appointing a meeting in the afternoon, but Herbert answered by note that a previous engagement would detain him till the evening at eight o'clock, when he would receive him. Snap dared not delay a day; though he liked not Herbert's appointment at night, he saw no alternative. The appointment was kept.

"So, Snap, you are come," observed Blakely

"I am come, Herbert," was the characteristic reply.

"I am glad of that, old fellow," the other returned with bluff frankness; "and now sit down and let us have the old confidence; or at least, let us know our situations."

"With all my heart," he answered.

"But first, Snap, the wine; I take brandy; yours, I think, is wine."

"Wine with you, Herbert. Remember, I never let the winning card out of my own hand. Poison may be brewing in the cup.

"Wine be it, then; and from the same glass. My toast, Snap: Our oath at my father's death-bed."

"And mine, Herbert: May you have your father's wisdom, and not the fool's design."

"Severe, my Mentor, as usual; but characteristic," returned Blakely, laughing. "And now for your budget."

"Herbert," began the mentor, with sharp directness, "you was one of the mysterious horsemen, who attacked Walter Templar and Farinelli, aided by the six ruffians; Orsini was the other."

"By the Fiend, Snap, a good beginning; go on."

"I have discovered that you left Rome, and was away two months. Your course was towards England. You have copied my method: to be where you seem not to be, which means that you was in England, when your seemings were in Rome.

"Which, my old Mentor, you have to prove."

"Sir Herbert Blakely, now mark me well, for I am not, as you know, a man of many words, when my resolve is at the lip. I will prove that you and Orsini were the mysterious horsemen. If you let me leave you to-night without coming to my terms, if possible, I will save Farinelli, though I destroy you. Decide for I have decided."

"And so have I, Snap. I shall not give a point. For once I will show my father's iron will. So let the matter end. And now for an hour with our wine before we part as old friends."

"Herbert, I implore you to accept the conditions, for, if I depart, your course is run. I would not have the hangman finger you. Again I implore you for your father's sake."

The Mentor spoke with deep feeling. Never in his life till then had he said to any one—"I implore you."

"Snap, for my father's sake, I will not budge an inch. Are you convinced."

"Yes, convinced that you are rushing on your fate."

"Never mind, an hour with our wine, and then we part."

"I fear, Herbert, that when we meet again, it will be death to you."

They drank their wine, spent their hour together and then they parted. That hour showed how little of malice there was in Snap's nature, even when he had resolved to destroy, and how much like an omnipotent will his conception of necessity was to him, when he doomed Herbert Blakely.

As soon as the mentor was departed, Herbert threw on his cloak, took his hat and followed, thinking to himself—

"Your time, Snap, has come—not mine. You die to-night.

The mentor had gone about half a mile, when he entered a narrow streeet, through which he was obliged to pass to reach his hotel. Directly afterwards, he heard a man's footsteps following boldly as though to challenge observation, not to startle by stealthy approach.

"Ha!" thought Snap, there is one on my track, or I much mistake. I am on the watch, to-night, my friend. Look well to it that your tickings offend not my nerves. I am a coward and like not footsteps behind me at ten at night. Now, if that man has a wise guardian spirit, it will whisper in his ear that the devil protects his own children, and as I am one of his elect, that man who follows is in danger of meeting the devil in his path."

The mentor was just passing a cross-street, when he heard another coming towards him from that direction; but he kept on his course without turning or without hurry, continuing his characteristic musings.

"Now, I like this. It is professional. There is method in the fellows. Two hired cut-throats or I am a blockhead; and it is only Herbert who honors we with that epithet. I am not sorry that Herbert has set these bravos on my track, for it will reconcile me to the necessity of hanging him. I like it not though, for the gallows is the fool's death-bed. Now I shall save those two worthies behind me from the gallows. They will owe me gratitude. There should be more of them, for they keep up an even distance on my track. If it is the Savinelli brothers of whom Orsini boasts, there is one more to come. Ay, there is the other from the cross street on the left. So I must prepare."

But Snap seemed not to prepare, for he simply put his right hand into his trowsers pocket and, if it was for a pistol, it could only be a small derringer, which against three men, would be as nothing. The men came now rapidly towards him, scarcely hiding that they meant an attack. Had he ran, they would have been on him in a moment, for they were as fleet grayhounds well practiced to the chase. Scarce ten paces now separated them from their intended victim, and the three were abreast. They seemed to hesitate, for they could not understand the coolness of their man. They were forced, however, to immediate action, for one of the principal streets was near. Like an arrow from a bow they sprang forward, but Snap, like a cunning cat, was ready. As a flash of lightning he turned upon them, his hand lept from his pocket, and two of the bravos staggered and fell almost at his very feet. The third also reeled, but he rushed forward and made a fierce stab with his long stiletto, but Snap warded off the blow with his cloak, for it was wildly directed; and, as he did so, he slapped the third bravo on his temple seemingly with the palm of his hand, the third of the brothers Savinelli lay dead at his feet. In the hand of Snap was a silver instrument like a derringer; it was of curious workmanship, and cunningly contrived. No ball had been in it, no report had been made, but it had been charged with a deadly power more subtle than chloriform. He had pulled the trigger, which raised a stopper at the muzzle, and discharged the deadly powder direct in the face of the bravos. The third of the Savinelli brothers he had killed with a stroke from a small poisonous bayonet, which had sprang out of his pistol-like instrument.

"There, my friends, you have escapee the gallows. You owe me much, believe me you do. Good night. And now, Herbert Blakely, your turn will come next."

And Snap walked calmly away as though nothing had happened, for he had killed his men scientifically.

CHAPTER LXVII.

THE NIGHT BEFORE THE TRIAL.

It was the night before the great trial of Farinelli. The grand jury had found an indictment of murder in the first degree. On the morrow the people of London were promised one of the greatest criminal trials at the Old Bailey known for many a year. Indeed the country, as well as the city, was in an excited suspense, for the case was a singular one. The Courtneys and the family of the bride-elect were known to be on the side of the prisoner, and their testimony of confidence was expected to weigh mightily in his favor; and what was still more emphatic, Sir Richard Brine was also in his sympathies on the prisoner's side. That severely conscientious officer, however, had been very strict in discharging his duty to the Crown. Yet, his agents had scoured the country to find, if possible, some other head to bear the crime of the charge or to discover some clue to Sir Walter Templar, dead or alive. His efforts had been all in vain, and to-morrow was the day fixed for the prisoner to be brought to trial at the Old Bailey for murder.

But while on one hand, this known sympathy of the Courtneys and Sir Richard Brine weighed in Farinelli's favor, it, on the other hand, told against him. The public were jealous that justice was not about to be given. The English people are always thus jealous on the side of the Crown; and they had now found a case that peculiarly touched their honor of law, and put them on their guard. Every effort had been made to clear the prisoner, and the country was therefore indisposed to give a point which was not proved by the evidence in the case. Moreover, the common people as usual complained against class favor, swearing that had the prisoner been one of their order, short work would be made of him. The Crown was also jealous, while the best counselors had been retained for the defense. The trial therefore bid fair to be a great event in the criminal history of England.

It was six o'clock on the night before the trial. Courtney, Lord Frederick De Lacy, Isaac Ben Ammon, Terese and Clara Garcia were spending the evening with the prisoner, by the permission of Sir Richard Brine.

We need not say that it was an anxious group gathered in Farinelli's prison, nor dwell upon the conversation which had occupied the last hour. We will take them up at the point where their anxiety for the arrival of Judah Nathans had reached its highest pitch. Letters had heralded his return, and he ought to have been in London at three o'clock. Sir Richard Brine was at Courtney House in Grosvenor Square awaiting him to learn of the success of his mission to Rome, and to bring him immediately to the prison.

"By the staff of Jacob," observed Isaac Ben Ammon in his anxiety, "something hath befallen Judah, or he would have come to the deliverance of Israel ere this."

The venerable Hebrew, through the sad history of his own life and especially during his banishment to dreaded Siberia, had been in the habit of identifying his own captivity with the captivity of Israel. Thus he continued in his succession of troubles the same habit of thought. Israel was in captivity again in the person of Farinelli, for the old man was wandering in the afflictions of those around him.

Neither one of that troubled group answered to the patriarch's observation; but for the next five minutes they all sat in silence, and it seemed to them that the very throbbings of their hearts could be heard. Isaac Ben Ammon again broke the silence:

"Yes, Judah should have been here ere this. By Jacob's staff, something must have befallen Judah, or his brother Benjamin would have been delivered from prison ere now. What if the cup was in Benjamin's sack, the boy put it not there. He must be delivered, though all his brethren have to become his hostages. Where is Judah, that he comes not to the deliverance of his younger brother?"

And thus the patriarch, in his great concern for the foster-brother of his grandchild, wandered in his mind, mixing his Hebrew reminiscences with Farinelli's case. Still none answered the old man, for all were too much oppressed with their own thoughts. Suddenly Terese exclaimed:

"My uncle Judah is come. I hear his footsteps!"

As she spoke, the door opened and Sir Richard Brine and Judah Nathans entered.

"The God of Abraham be praised," returned her grandfather, lifting his long arms, but trembling hands, high to heaven in thankfulness; and then he hurried to his nephew and laying his hand upon his arm in that dignified but imploring manner of a patriarch, appealing to the strength of his house, he said:

"The God of David hath brought thee hither, Judah, just in time to save thy brother from the Philistine. Bid the officer open the prison and let the lad go free."

"Uncle Isaac," replied Judah, seeing that the old man's mind was somewhat wandering, "Uncle Isaac, the judges of the people must set him free."

"Nay, Judah, nay; I trust them not. There is no Daniel among them. They will not judge the young man in righteousness."

"Uncle Isaac, there is justice in England."

"Alas, alas, Judah, I thought thou wouldst have come as David with the sling and the stone, and thou but tellest me of the tribunal of the gentiles. Did it not condemn my son Benjamin to the knout and myself to Siberia? Alas, there is no hope in Israel!"

The patriarch returned to his chair comfortless, and leaning upon his hands, buried his face in his long, white flowing beard. The disconsolate Hebrew was a fitting picture of the rest, for all realized by the manner of Sir Richard Brine and Judah, that the journey to Rome had been in vain. Their hearts died within them. The dreadful day of the trial, on the eve of which they stood, appalled them all. Even Judah and Sir Richard Brine were more than usually troubled, for, in one respect, these two very dissimilar men were alike: they generally felt masters of their cases; but now they were themselves mastered.

"I perceive, Mr. Nathans, that you have been unsuccessful," observed Farinelli, who was the first to speak after Isaac Ben Ammon.

"Not so, my friend," he returned.

"Ah, what sayest thou, Judah?" caught up the venerable Hebrew. "Thou hast succeeded? Thou bringest deliverance? The God of Jacob then be praised!"

"I have satisfied myself, friend Farinelli," continued Judah, "that Sir Herbert was one of the mysterious horsemen who waylaid you, and that Orsini was the other. Sir Richard Brine is of the same opinion; but Sir Herbert Blakely will confess nothing, nor accept any terms for restitution."

"Mr. Nathans," said Courtney, "it is a painful question to ask, for I fear the reply; does Herbert Blakely dare to accept our terms; do you think my nephew is living?"

For the moment, the questioner almost forgot Farinelli in his concern for Walter. "Snap" was silent, for, as we know, he had not wrung this fact from his former master.

"Uncle Courtney, let me answer," impulsively broke in Terese, coming into the foreground:

"Walter is living! Remember the prophecy of my sister Alice, on her death-bed. Did she not foretell this? Did she not exact from me a promise not to doubt that she would be near in the night that she foretold? She is near us even now. She is near Walter always. I have dreamt of her oft, and she smiles upon me and bids me hope; and when she leaves me, she whispers 'All is well.' Yet have I seen her sorrowful, because, when she has bidden, I could not follow her, though I know not whither she would lead. But even then, she has always whispered, as she vanished, 'All is well,' and I have awoke comforted. Uncle Courtney, Walter is living, and I shall stand by his side at the altar as my sister Alice appointed."

"I wish, my dear young lady, the judges and jury could hear you speak thus, and be influenced as much by your words as I am," observed Sir Richard Brine, struck by a thought which seemed to flash from him into the mind of Terese, for she continued even more impressively:

"Put me, Sir Richard Brine, into the witness-box to-morrow, and my words shall make the thousands in that court assembled feel that Walter Templar is living!"

"I will, lady!" answered Sir Richard Brine, hopefully. "At least, the voice of eloquence from a woman's heart—from a lovely maiden's inspired lips will move the jury more than the most learned counselor in the land."

"It is a happy thought, friend Brine," said Courtney.

"My grandchild shall move the stones to tears," said Isaac Ben Ammon.

"I believe my niece's words," added Judah; "but science must demonstrate. Truth is but the path to knowledge."

How fitly that subtle thinker and his inspired niece illustrated the one knowledge, the other faith.

Sir Richard Brine realized that the law, as well as science, required demonstration; but he kept to his bright thought, and it was arranged that Terese, on the morrow at the trial, should be placed in the witness-box. And then Clara Garcia drew our heroine aside and whispered:

"Save him, save him; and, if you love him, I will resign him to you; but save him, save him!"

"Sister Clara," replied Terese, reproachfully, "if I save him, it is for you."

Thus it will be seen that her morbid passion of jealousy still blinded Clara Garcia; but her deep love and Farinelli's danger had brought her to the sanctification of self-sacrifice.

NEVER SATISFIED.

A man in his carriage was riding along,
A gayly-dressed wife by his side;
In satin and lace she looked like a queen,
And he like a king in his pride.

A wood-sawyer stood on the street as he passed:
The carriage, the couple he eyed,
And said, as he worked with his saw on a log,
"I wish I was rich, and could ride."

The man in the carriage remarked to his wife,
"One thing I would do if I could,
I'd give all my wealth for the strength and the health
Of the man who is sawing the wood."

A pretty young maid with a bundle of work,
Whose face as the morning was fair,
Went tripping along with a smile of delight,
While humming a love-breathing air.

She looked in the carriage—the lady she saw,
Arrayed in apparel so fine,
And said in a whisper, "I wish in my heart
Those satins and laces were mine."

The lady looked out on the maid with her work,
So fair in her calico dress,
And said, "I'd relinquish position and wealth,
Her beauty and youth to possess."

Thus it is in this world; whatever our lot,
Our mind and our time we employ
In longing and sighing for what we have not,
Ungrateful for what we enjoy.

MUSICAL DOINGS.—Since Mr. Waters gave up publishing sheet music, he has devoted his whole capital and attention to the manufacture and sale of Pianos and Melodeons. He has just issued a catalogue of his new instruments, giving a new scale of prices, which shows a marked reduction from former rates, and his Pianos have recently been awarded the First Premium at several Fairs. Many people of the present day, who are attracted, if not confused, with the flaming advertisements of rival piano houses, probably overlook the modest manufacturer like Mr. Waters; but we happen to know that his instruments earned him a good reputation long before Expositions and "honors" connected therewith were ever thought of; indeed, we have one of Mr. Waters' Piano-fortes now in our residence, (where it has stood for years,) of which any manufacturer in the world might be proud. We have always been delighted with it as a sweet-toned and powerful instrument, and there is no doubt of its durability; more than this, some of the best amateur players in the city, and several celebrated pianists, have performed on the said piano, and all pronounce it a superior and first-class Instrument. Stronger indorsement we could not give.—Home Journal,

HORSE POWDERS.

These celebrated and renowned powders for horses and cattle have been tested by an intelligent public for sixteen years. Hundreds of the principal horsemen of the Union have pronounced them the only Condition Powders safe to use and work the horse. There is nothing in them to expose the animal, but, on the contrary, everything to improve them. The proprietors of horse railroads, omnibusses, and stage owners in all the principal cities use them; and their combined testimony stamps them one of the wonders of medical science. Letters sufficient to fill a small book are in our possession, testifying to their goodness. Merchants are requested to warrant them, and refund the purchase money should they fail to give satisfaction.

ALLCOCK'S POROUS
STRENGTHENING
PLASTERS.

ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS are the results of studies and experiments of Dr. Scheeut, of South Carolina; of Dr. Wm. Wagstaff, now Baron Wagstaff, of Horace H. Day, the distinguished manufacturer of rubber goods; and of Thomas Allcock, Chemist and member of the College of Pharmacy of New York, now General Allcock, etc., etc.

Step by step this commodity has attained its unprecedented fame. They are universally approved. They support, strengthen, and aid the growth of muscles. They appear to have a peculiar effect upon the nerves, allaying irritability, while supplying warmth. They seem to accumulate electricity, and aid the circulation of the blood through the part where applied, by which healthy actions are induced.

Even in paralysis, where articulation was suspended, the use of the Porous Plasters to the spine restored the articulation, and materially reduced the paralysis. In fact, the patient could help herself, while before the Porous plaster was applied she was as helpless as a baby. We refer to Mrs. Sally Elliot, Springfield, Mass.

Dr. Myer, of Savannah, Ga., says they are the best mechanical supporters for weak muscles ever discovered; that by their warming properties they bring power and health, until the strength of the muscles are entirely restored. That he knows a case where Allcock's Plasters cured a gentleman of a weak spine. That he daily prescribes them in his practice with the happiest results, and desires us to refer to him.

Dr. Henderson, of Farmsville, Louisiana, says: "The counter-irritant effect of Allcock's Porous Plasters is produced in such a mild and gradual way, they so invigorate the circulation around the parts to which they are applied, and exert upon all nervous diseases such a great sedative influence, that I place them confidently at the head of every plaster now in use."

Dr. Johnson, of Hartford, says: "My daily experience confirms the very superior excellence of your Porous Plasters. At this moment of writing, a man applies for one, who, by entanglement in a shaft of machinery, had both his legs broken, spine severely injured, and was for nearly a year entirely helpless. This man found relief very soon by the application of a plaster to his spine. He was soon enabled to work, and now he labors as well as ever. He would cheerfully pay five dollars for a single plaster, if they could not be had at a lower rate. Surgeons should make use of these perforated plasters, to the exclusion of all others, as their flexibility and adhesiveness are greatly in advance of all other plasters with which I am acquainted, while the perforations peculiar to them render them greatly superior to all others for ordinary surgical uses. Knowing the plasters to be so useful, I have no scruples that my sentiments should be known.

J. W. JOHNSON, M. D."

Dr. Sterling's testimony: "For two years, I have been a great sufferer from neuralgia in the head, and found only temporary relief from all the various remedies that I have tried, until I applied one of Allcock's Porous Plasters. I cut it into three strips, placing one under each shoulder blade, and the other over the small of the back; and for the past three months, I have had scarcely a twinge of the old pain.

I advise all who suffer from nervous diseases to lose no time in making a trial of the wonderful Porous Plaster.

A. F. STERLING, Sec. Singer Mfg. Co.
New York, June 8, 1868.

MEDICINAL QUALITIES
—OF THE—
POROUS PLASTERS.

The Porous Plasters possess the soothing, warming and sustaining qualities of the combined plasters of the dispensatories. An Electrician, who has great experience of their effects in Local Rheumatism, in Tic Doloreux, and deep-seated nervous and other pains, and in affections of the kidneys, etc, etc., attributes all their sedative, stimulative and pain-relieving effects to their ELECTRIC qualities. He asserts that they restore the healthy electric condition (equilibrium) of the part, and that being restored pain and morbid action cease. He was amazed at the great number of beneficial indications produced by one of these plasters. He affirms that Head-ache is cured by one worn just below the breast-bone; that one placed over the navel will cure hysterics, as well as dysentery, and affections of the bowels.

PATENT
ARION PIANOFORTE

GRANDS AND GRAND SQUARES,
7¼ OCTAVES.

The "ARION" is the very best Piano for the Great West, because it stands in tune longer than any other Piano. It requires no repairing or regulating; shipping any distance, or dampness does not affect them.

WHY?

It commences where the "First Premium" Makers stop, and upon the most improved Modern scale makes four patented improvements; which make the Arion more simple, yet stronger; increasing its volume and beauty of tone, while rendering the instrument more enduring.

WHAT THEY ARE.

First. The patent Arion Reversed Wooden Agraffe Bridge, which retains all the purity of tone only found in a wooden bridge (the rest whereon the strings lay), and obtains all the solid prolonged strength of tone of the metal Agraffe, without that acute metalic noise which the metal Agraffe develops by use.

Secondly, The Patent Arion Compound Wrest-Plank, which holds the tuning pins, is six thicknesses of hard maple, the grain of each layer runs in a different direction. The advantages are, the 20 tons strain of the strings cannot split our Arion wrest-plank, as frequently happens in other Pianos, and when people say "My Piano won't stand in tune," all other makers must use the single wrest plank with the grain running only one way.

The Arion Tuning-Pins have end wood to hold them on every side, while all other makers can have it only upon two sides of their pins.

Thirdly, The Patent Arion Diagonal Sustaining Bar, extending parellel with the steel strings under the over strung Bass strings. The Arion is the only Piano wherein the enormous strain of the large steel strings is resisted in the natural place and direction. Using this bar renders the weakest part in all other over strung Pianos the

STRONGEST IN THE ARION.

THE ARION STANDS UPON ITS OWN MERITS.

unsupported by either buncome, weak facts, or useless or complicated Patents. We append a few unbought opinions of those who

KNOW THE ARION.

The Musical Director of the New York Conservatory of Music, Edward Mollenhauer, says: "The Arion I bought of you is the best Piano I ever played on; that rolling bass and silvery treble, etc."

John H. Woods, Piano Dealer, Oswego, N. Y., says: The tone is truly immense, and surpasses anything in the shape of a Piano we ever saw or heard of, etc."

Horace Greely said: "The Arion is the best Square Piano, superior for its clearness and brilliancy of tone," &c.

Louis Wagner, Fort Leaverworth, says: "My Piano arrived here in splendid order. Its tone fills my parlor with melody—it is the wonder and admiration of all who hear it. Miss ——, who is teaching the Piano desires me to order one for her," &c.

NEW MEDICAL DISCOVERY.

Dr. CADY'S CATARRH REMEDY.

A CERTAIN CURE FOR CATARRH AND ALL Mucous Diseases of the head, nose and throat.

This is a Medicine never before used or known to the public. Dr. Cady, the discoverer, was a sufferer from this terrible disease for twenty years, and after testing all the remedies extant—without relief—in his efforts to obtain a cure he discovered this UNEQUALLED REMEDY, which cured him in the short space of eight weeks.

It has been thoroughly tested, and has not failed in a single instance. Several of the most obstinate cases have been thoroughly cured by this remedy, after every other known medicine had failed. Every one who has tried it will testify to the truth of the above statement.

Every one afflicted with Catarrh should give it a trial and find out for himself whether it is a humbug.

Price, $2 per Bottle. Sold by GODBE & Co., Salt Lake City.

Saratoga
WATER.

The Saratoga "A" Spring Water is probably the most effective mineral water found on either continent. It has ten per cent. greater mineral properties than the celebrated Congress Spring; four times that of Baden Baden of Austria; five times that of Aix La Chapelle in Prussia; twice that of Vichy in France; nearly three times greater than the renowned Seltzer of Germany; and equally over the Spas of Bath, England, and Kissengen in Bavaria.

The reputation of this water is based upon its effects in diseases of the stomach, liver, bowels, kidneys and spleen. It acts with wonderful benefit in cases of chronic dyspepsia, constipation, gravel, gout, Scrofula, cutaneous affections, general lethargy, soreness and prostration of the system.

WHITE LILIES.

Lilies, sweet lilies, brilliantly white,
Bliss to each bosom, sweet summer's delight,
Souls breathing perfume upon the still air,
Lilies, sweet lilies, meek, graceful and fair.

Lilies, sweet lilies, clear, clustering gems,
Chaste as the vestal, June's rich diadems—
The classic in form, in beauty, and birth,
Charming the heavens and cheering the earth.

Lilies, sweet lilies, fresh, fragrant, and white,
Emblems of glory, the pure and the bright;
Vainly glad Flora bedecks the parterre,
We sigh, lovely lilies, if ye are not there.

Lilies, sweet lilies, brilliantly white,
Filling our senses with grateful delight,
Crowning with lustre, slim sceptre-like stems,
Lilies, sweet lilies, June's rich diadems.

AN INCREDIBLE STORY.

"SHE IS NOT DEAD, BUT SLEEPETH."

I.

The fierce rays of an almost tropical sun at high noon slanted through the open windows of Magnolia Cottage, where Heinrich von Wetzlar stood by the bedside of his deceased wife. His little daughter Annette—a girl of five years—stood at his side; but, for all that, he was alone—alone, though a troop of men and angels had surrounded him; for what can disturb the desert solitude which Death flings about itself as a broad mantle, and about all who enter its presence? The very fullness of life on that summer noon, hints of which were borne through the windows with the stately sighings of the wind and the fragrance of Southern flowers, intensified and heightened, by contrast, the rigor and abysmal silence of that slumber upon which Von Wetzlar intently gazed.

That terrible scourge of New Orleans—the yellow-fever—had visited the city with unusual severity. Magnolia Cottage was situated in one of the least crowded quarters of the city; yet this locality had not escaped the fate of the others. Von Wetzlar's young wife had devoted herself day after day to visiting and nursing the sick in her neighborhood, until she herself was stricken down by the disease, of which she soon became a victim. Fate had in its quiver no arrow so poignant as this which suddenly pierced the heart of the fond husband.

Heinrich von Wetzlar was a German, of Hebrew lineage on his father's side. His father, Otto von Wetzlar, had resided in Louisiana for a short time, years ago, and had there married Heinrich's mother, but immediately after this event, had returned to his home in Vienna. While Heinrich was a mere boy his mother died; the frail Southern lady had pined in vain for her genial native air. Then Otto von Wetzlar married again. This second wife—step-mother to the motherless boy—proved a curse to Otto's declining years. Partly to escape her tyranny, and partly moved by the remembrance of his mother's glowing pictures of Southern life, young Heinrich fled from Vienna to Italy, where he devoted himself to art. Dreamer and poet he had always been. His temperament, inherited from his mother, induced to contemplation; his large, lustrous, hazel eyes betokened at once the passionate eagerness of inquiry and a disposition toward mysticism. His keen analysis drove him from all the ordinary positions quietly assumed by the mass of men as the great questions affecting human life and destiny; but, as if finding no rest beyond these landmarks, his soul seemed to wander ever in that shadowy border-land where the real blends so readily with the ideal, and the visible receives the mantle of the invisible.

After a residence of some years in Italy, he was seized with an irresistible desire to visit his mother's native land. He came to New Orleans, and there, encouraged by the patronage of a few friends who had known his father, he easily contrived to satisfy his material wants, which were few and simple. Here he met Louise Darvon. At this time he was over thirty, while she was only sixteen. She was a simple French maiden of Huguenot ancestry—a girl who could scarcely have attracted attention by her beauty; and her parents were plain people with moderate means. Her education had been of the simplest sort, and she had none of that distingue style which often in the world's estimate supplies the want both of wealth and beauty. But Heinrich von Wetzlar judged not after the way of the world. He had lived for the most part a solitary life. He was now in the prime of manhood, but the dreams of his youth still lingered with him, though his youthful enthusiasm had been tempered by a ripened judgment.

Heinrich and Louise seemed to be spiritual counterparts; and there was a rare completeness, therefore, in their marriage. She was simple, earnest, and pure in heart. He was noble, and inspired in her a sense of grandeur. His wonderful subtlety of thought, his wealth of emotion, and the spiritnality of his nature introduced her into a new world, where he was always her teacher. She could liken him to no one she had ever seen or heard of, until he told her of Mendelssohn, whose music they interpreted together, and some of whose literary productions he read to her—then she thought he must be like Mendelssohn. Their chief delight was in music, which became to them a sort of universal language. His very conversation seemed to echo to grand old Hebrew melodies, and as she listened it seemed as if the winds wafted fragrance and repose to her from distant Palestine. If her spirit soared to meet his, so that her love was almost adoration; it was also true that his grand sympathies found through her humble, womanly charity a way to their expression in the trodden ways of life.

This beautiful life they had lived together for six years, and now the end had come. Von Wetzlar was startled, bewildered, stunned. It was as if the repose of heaven had been broken. The dearness of this woman and his need of her had never before been so sensibly felt. He stood upon the brink of an abyss which his thoughts—subtle and deep as they were—could not compass or fathom. His soul was moved to its depths. To such men the tragedy of such infinite loss is not simply solemn. It is a great Agitator. It is not strange, therefore, that to Von Wetzlar, in the presence of this mighty sorrow, the great problem of human destiny—as it seemed to him—namely, the question of a future life, presented itself anew. But, eager as were the questionings of his soul, he seemed comforted by a sphinx that answered only in riddles. The suggestions of his intellect seemed almost cruel, intruding as they did into the sacred presence-chamber of his tenderest emotions.

"Is this the end?" he asked. "In the midst of all this life has my Louise drooped as do the flowers, to fall away into a mere heap of dust? Even the crazy old alchemists had a fancy that, by some magical process, they could restore from the dust of the rose at least its phantom—a semblance of the real flower. Is not the Divine chemistry as potent as that? It cannot be that my rose is lost to me forever!" He reviewed in thought the testimony of the race: he recalled Phædo and the sublime passages in Paul's epistle to the Corinthians. Then that movement of the glorious oratorio of the "Messiah" swept over his soul—so susceptible to the impressions of music—"I know that my Redeemer liveth." But still he was not satisfied. The calm surface of his thoughts had been disturbed by the heavy plummet of Death, and the waves still undulated in ever-widening circles toward an uncertain shore. Oh, if the master could have spoken to his heart as he did to the house of Jairus: "She is not dead, but sleepeth!"

II.—APOCALYPTIC.

The dead in this time of peril were hurriedly buried. As the sun declined, the face of Louise, after receiving the last fond kisses of the husband and daughter, was hid from their view, and they followed her to her resting-place in the French cemetery.

Two men met the sombre cortége as it returned from the cemetery whose characters must here be described. They were not together, but met the procession at different stages of its course.

One of these was Doctor Eugene Gurdon, who had just issued from his library in his mansion on Carondelet Street. Both by his dress and his walk it could be seen that he was a fastidious gentleman of easy manners and perfect self-possession. In his tastes and mental constitution he was very much of a Parisian. He was a passionate lover of the beautiful, and shrank from ugliness and deformity with almost a shudder. Yet this man, to whom disease was disgusting, made it the great study of his life. This lover of the beautiful spent no small portion of his time in anatomical dissections. The sight of pain was a torment, but he was so skilled in its alleviation that he was the most promising young surgeon in New Orleans.

As he met the procession, and could see through the windows of the leading carriage the sorrow-stricken faces of Von Wetzlar and his little girl, his heart was touched, and he said to himself, "Alas, how sad!" and the frequency of such spectacles in those death-crowded days did not diminish the profoundness of his sympathy. Looking into his naturally cheerful, but now somewhat pensive face, and into his clear gray eyes that almost changed their color under the influence of emotion, you would have said: "This man is a child of nature—open as men rarely are to all material influences, palpable or subtle. His smile answers to the faintest gleam of sunshine, and his heart is swayed by cloud and storm; and although he is so much of a philosopher, his philosophy affords no shield to cover, no mask to disguise his susceptibility."

The other man to whom we alluded was Pierre Martin. As he met the procession he also looked upon the faces of the chief mourners, and knew that Louise von Wetzlar had been buried. He gazed with stolid indifference upon the insignia of their great sorrow. He had once been a lover of Louise—if any thing could be called love which was cherished in Martin's heart: it was certainly the purest and worthiest emotion that had ever entered there. But she, with that unerring intuition which belongs to such pure, spiritual natures, had avoided him from the first, until at length his passionate love had been turned to bitter hate.

Martin was a thoroughly selfish man. He was endowed with a very fair exterior, with a strong intellect, and with consummate impudence. He loved intrigue, and delighted in playing upon other men as upon the strings of an instrument. He had acted upon the stage, had written stray articles for the press, and was now a sort of attaché to the Medical College which he had entered some years before, and where he still lingered, not as a student, but upon good terms with all.

He had been sauntering along the street, but as the procession passed him his steps were arrested as by some suddenly conceived purpose. "Ah!" he chuckled to himself—"a capital idea! Bold—but why not? Faint heart never won fair lady. Eh, let us see!" and he turned down toward the river-side, still chuckling to himself as one might over some splendid joke. Reaching the levee, his attention was directed toward a group of seamen lounging about the wharf, where lay a steamer that to-morrow was to take departure for some distant port. A conversation followed in low tones between Martin and two or three of this group whom he had drawn aside. Some bargain was completed, apparently, for as Martin left them he slipped a few gold pieces into their hands.

When we left Doctor Gurdon he was on his way to a remote and solitary cottage in the outskirts of the city, occupied by a young medical student, whose name was Spaulding, and who was a friend and protégé of the doctor's. This youth ushered the doctor into a parlor where three or four other students were evidently awaiting him. This was the "Gurdon clique," which pursued investigations on its own account: it was a kind of episode, as related to the regular operations of the College. The Doctor was to lecture to this select company this evening on the Structure of the Human Brain; and Pierre Martin had engaged to provide a suitable "subject" for additional investigations in the apartment adjoining the parlor, and which was known as the "Dissecting-Room." He had provided "subjects" in this way on previous occasions.

Doctor Gurdon entered upon his preliminary lecture, which was interesting and decidedly original. An hour passed. It was ten o'clock, and no advices had been received from Martin. But the topic of the evening was one of absorbing interest, and the Doctor continued his lecture. His mind was abundantly stored with narratives of peculiar psychological experiences illustrating his theories. After midnight a knock at the outer door was recognized as Martin's. The long-expected something was hurriedly transferred to the dissecting-room, where the mysterious parcel was opened by Spaulding and Martin. Two dark blue eyes slowly opened that should have been forever sealed, and Pierre Martin was confronted by a living face that should have belonged to the dead. He gave one look of astonishment and terror, and then, without a word, fled from the house as if pursued by a phantom.

The other students were abruptly dismissed without knowing the details, and Spaulding and Doctor Gurdon were left alone with their strange and unaccountably proceeding Subject.

III.—THE SECOND LIFE.

A transformation has been wrought—a miracle scarcely less wonderful than that of resurrection. It was not simply the awakening, as from a sleep, of one who had seemed dead, and who had been laid away for an everlasting slumber. It was a new life. The eyes so familiar to Pierre Martin had not recognized him. The world upon which they opened seemed as new as it does to a new-born child. The past to this awakened sleeper was literally a blank. This woman was mentally an infant. The words which fell upon her ears seemed meaningless, and she could utter none in reply. She was carried away in a carriage, which Spaulding had procured, to Doctor Gurdon's mansion, where she was placed in the care of the Doctor's house-keeper—the only other occupant of his house. In all mental affairs—in all respects, indeed, except as to her age—she was a child; though she learned more rapidly than a child could have done.

Doctor Gurdon's mansion was well suited to his character. It was costly and beautiful, was furnished with all the elegance that the most refined taste could suggest or that wealth made possible, and was surrounded with beautiful grounds. It was in this bright home of luxury and art that his "patient" began her new life. The doctor at first regarded her with a simply speculative interest. She was a case inviting study. He studied it. Very soon, however, science yielded to sentiment. For this woman in her new life was very attractive. She was as different from her former self as a butterfly from the chrysalis. As Louise Darvon or Louise von Wetzlar she had been a simple, earnest, spiritual being, self-sacrificing, and the very impersonation of character. The brain is the flower of the body; and it seemed that out of the dust of the flower which had matured and decayed a new and different flower had blossomed. Serious she had been; now she was gay. She had been deep-natured; now the movement of her thoughts was light and airy. Perhaps the change could not be more happily expressed than by likening it to the transformations which have affected whole races, bearing them from their rude Pelasgian life into their Hellenic or artistic era. Only these were gradual changes as compared with that sudden and almost miraculous transformation which had here been effected.

It is not wonderful that Doctor Gurdon found in this woman so much to study, not that his studies grew to have an additional interest from the beginning of love for her in his heart. But whenever he thought of her past he was puzzled. He did not even know her name. Who had she been? There was no clue to the mystery. She remembered absolutely nothing. It is true, however—and this should be mentioned here for the benefit of those interested in the purely psychological features of her case—it is true that when she happened to be in places that ought to have seemed familiar, there did come to her inner sense a vague shadow of reminiscence—something that could scarcely be called an impression, it was so faint and indistinct. Especially was she haunted by this ghost of reminiscence when she was in the French cemetery (it was there that the Darvons had all been buried), which she quite frequently visited during the summer that followed her strange resurrection. This puzzled her, and caused her to linger about the place, as one which was in some way connected with the inexplicable wonder of her life. But the idea was as faint and shadowy as the fragrance of the flowers that decorated the tombs around her.

Doctor Gurdon had never told her of even the single fact of which he was cognizant. He intimated that she had been ill, and had been placed in his charge in so accidental a manner that he did not and could not learn her name even. With this she was forced to be content. She knew that the doctor loved her, and she was perfectly happy in loving him.

But he was troubled by a horrible doubt. He feared some possible interruption of this new life—either through her return to her former mental state, or through some intrusive claim from others who had known her, and who might discover her present retreat. He therefore guarded her most jealously, and felt anxious when she was out of of his sight. After all, his great fear was Pierre Martin, who must be able, he thought, to bridge over the hiatus between the two lives of this woman.

IV.—THE TOKEN.

Heinrich von Wetzlar, since the loss of his wife, had again become a recluse. A year had passed, and still the sharpness of his grief had not been dismissed. Notwithstanding his doubts in regard to the reality of a future life, he felt that a tremendous affirmative argument now existed for him in the necessity of an unseen world to his individual soul, since his Louise belonged to that world.

The old desire to wander had returned, and he contemplated an early departure for Europe. With this in view he went, toward the close of a summer afternoon, to visit the French cemetery for the last time.

This cemetery was peculiar. The dead there were not interred underground, but laid away in vaults, one above another, on either side of a long aisle, where one might walk and look upon the outer gates of these silent chambers of the dead, with decorations of flowers and crosses resting upon their projecting marble sills. Along this aisle Von Wetzlar walked until he came before the chamber allotted to his wife. As he halted and gazed upon the portal, stooping somewhat as he leaned upon his staff, one could see that he had grown many years older since that marble entablature had sealed from his vision the dear companion of his soul. As he gazed he seemed to be transported back to that summer noon, a year ago, when the shock of death first fell upon his heart. His soul was not now agitated as it had been then. At first the marble repose of the place, though in some sort a symbol of death, soothed and invited him. Then the suggestions of life that were thrown out even here seemed to answer his old doubts and to give him hope. The clambering roses and the trailing ivy towered above the stony silence, as if hinting of ever-flowing change, as if whispering to his heart: "There is no place of rest! For see! out of the very dust life rises tremblingly but triumphantly over the mask of Death."

He remembered how this same idea of life and motion, as contrasted with deathlike stillness, had once occurred to him in reading that passage in the Twelfth Odyssey, where Homer describes the cave of the Naiads. It all came back to him now—the picture of the Naiads weaving forever at long stone looms, and of the wild bees humming and honey-making round cups and casks of stone, while evermore the waves entered and broke upon the stony floor.

CONTINUED.

Fortunately, however, for science and mankind, Collinson was more intelligent, and saw at once the value of Franklin's researches. He published the letters, and they drew the attention of Europe. Buffon read them in France, and persuaded his friend Dalibard to translate them into French; Franklin's rare and beautiful experiments were repeated in Paris; Louis XV and all his court hastened to see them, and were charmed and amazed at Franklin's genius and the wonders of the new science; public lecture-rooms were opened for their performance, and all Paris thronged to the rare exhibition. The letters were translated into many languages, and suddenly the name of the obscure printer in Philadelphia became one of the most renowned in the annals of science. His theories were assailed by Abbé Nollet and a party of the French philosophers, but they also found many defenders; and a large school of enthusiastic men of science, struck by the vigor of Franklin's genius and the novelty of his discoveries, assuming the name of Franklinists.

"Still, however, Franklin's most daring speculation as to the unity of the electricity of the earth and the air, which had awakened the derision of the whole Royal Society, remained untested by experiment, and the philosopher prepared, with doubt and dismay, to attempt its verification. He felt that his fame must rest upon his success. If he could draw down the lightning from the skies by presenting his iron points to the thunder-cloud, he must attain a renown that would live forever. If he failed, by the incompleteness of his instruments or any unlooked for accident, he would seem to merit the scorn which European philosophers were prepared to pour upon the presuming provincial. Philadelphia, too, offered no convenient tower or steeple on which to fix his iron points; while the modest inquirer was probably anxious that his first experiment should be made with no one present to witness his possible failure. His inventive mind suggested a simple expedient. He formed a common kite from a silk handkerchief stretched upon two crossed sticks; on the upper part was placed the iron point; the string was of hemp, terminating in a short silken cord, and at the end of the hempen string hung an iron key. Such was the simple apparatus with which the philosopher set forth from his home, on a cloudy day in June, 1752, to draw the lightning from the skies, to penetrate a mystery upon which ages had meditated in vain. He took his son with him as the only witness of his secret adventure. As the rain was falling, he stood under a shed and raised his kite. It was no doubt a moment of strong and unprecedented excitement, and we can well imagine that Franklin watched his kite slowly ascending with a keener interest than Etruscan augur or Roman priest had ever felt as he awaited the omen of the gods. A cloud passed over; no trace of electricity appeared; the heart of the philosopher sunk with dismay. But suddenly the falling rain made the hempen string an excellent conductor, and Franklin saw that its fibers began to be stirred by some unusual impulse. He applied his hand to the key, and at once drew sparks from the skies. He felt that he had triumphed; but the first thought of his generous nature no doubt was, how to make his discovery useful to mankind; and one can scarcely avoid lamenting that no vision reached him in the moment of his victory of that wonderful instrument with which another American philosopher has nearly girdled the earth and made electricity the guardian of civilization.

Before his own success, Franklin's theory had already been tested and proved in Europe. The French King, Louis XV, was a strong Franklinist, and urged Buffon and the other philosophers to try the experiment of the iron points, according to Franklin's directions. On the 10th of May, therefore, Dalibard, erected a bar of iron 40 feet long, at Marly, and succeeded in drawing electricity from a thunder-cloud. It should be remembered, too, that the Abbé Nollet had suggested the connection between lightning and electricity before Franklin wrote; and that the idea had arisen in the minds of other philosophers. Yet Franklin could not have been acquainted with their theories, and no one before him had ever suggested any means of forming a connection with the thunder-cloud. His theory and his method were altogether original.

Again Europe was startled by a novel thrill of wonder and excitement. The electrical sparks of the Abbé Nollet and the famous experiment of Leyden sank into insignificance before the sublimity of the new achievement. Franklin, the modest philosopher of half-savage America, snatching the thunder-bolt from the skies with his kite and key, was the wonder of the hour. Kings became his disciples; princes flew kites in summer showers and repeated his experiments; Europe was covered by a chain of iron points from Paris to St. Petersburg; and the study of the lightning became as universal as in the days of Etruscan superstition. Franklin was covered with honors. The Royal Society of London, eager to repair its former neglect, elected him a member and awarded him its highest prize. In France, Russia, Germany, he was still more highly honored; he was the most famous of philosophers. From this time, too, until near the close of the century, the science of atmospheric electricity was studied by eager observers. The thunder-cloud was the favorite subject of learned inquiry. Brilliant hopes of further discoveries were entertained that were never fulfilled; and one eminent philosopher fell a victim to the dangerous research. Professor Riehman, of St. Petersburg, had erected an iron rod in his observatory for the purpose of repeating the American experiments, and ventured too near the instrument; a sudden flash descended the conductor, struck him upon the head, and passed through his body. He fell dead against the wall. He is remembered as the martyr of the science. Professor De la Garde, of Florence, was struck down by an unexpected shock, but recovered. Yet danger seemed only to add new interest to the attractive study. Franklin invented his lightning-rod, which was at once employed to protect the homes and the public buildings of Europe and America; and his disciples were every where engaged with kites and points in an effort to disarm the thunder-bolt of its terrors.

The thunder-cloud was mapped out and described by countless observers. Its black mass, floating heavily over the land, was the favorite subject of speculation. Philosophers, from the sides of tall mountains, observed that pillars of vapor rose upward from its midst as if to draw electricity from the upper sphere, and that while the lower surface of the cloud was often smooth and even, its upper side resembled the scenery of an Alpine landscape. Franklin had supposed that no single cloud ever gave forth lightning, but other observers asserted that small white clouds sometimes rose from the sea and shot forth at pleasure sharp flashes of fire and peals of thunder, prolonged like the roar of artillery. But the most singular electric clouds were those that issued from volcanoes. Pliny had noticed the fiery lightnings that hovered over the eruption of Vesuvius, and modern observers saw with wonder that often the clouds of ashes and vapor that rose from the burning mountain would float far over sea and land, and sometimes kill men and animals by a discharge of the most destructive lightning. Sir William Hamilton relates that, in 1794, during the eruption of Vesuvius, the thunder roared around the mountain-top, the lightning flashed and that clouds of light ashes were carried by the wind nearly three hundred miles, to Tarentum, where they destroyed a building by a violent discharge. The thunder-cloud, too, was sometimes seen to shoot its lightning upward. In Styria there was a church erected on the summit of a lofty peak called Mount Saint Orsula. Here, in 1700, a medical student who happened to be in the building, saw below him a dense mass of black clouds that were evidently the seat of a violent thunder-storm. Above the student, the heavens were clear, the sun shone brilliantly, and no one in the little church looked for danger in the dark mass of struggling vapors below. Yet suddenly a tongue of fire shot upward, struck the building and killed seven persons at the side of the observer.

CLAIRVOYANTS, ORACLES, VISIONS AND SEERS.

The devout and earnest Joan was doubtless a sincere believer in her own inspiration; but she was, as we all know, burned as a witch in league with the Powers of Darkness. The fact that some nervous women could see things that were happening hundreds of miles away, perhaps, gave rise to stories of their riding great distances through the air on a broom, and returning with miraculous swiftness, by help of the Devil. Yet such stories were received as evidence on judicial trials; and many a poor woman who did not herself know what was the matter with her, was condemned to death thereon.

I have read an article, in (I forget what cyclopedia), under the head of "French Prophets," which gives a remarkable account of clairvoyant power among the Hugonots in the time of their terrible persecution. While they were hidden in forests and caves, in constant fear of being discovered and slaughtered, it is stated to have been no uncommon thing for men, women, and even children among them to be seized with strange spasms, during which they described truly at what place their pursuers were, what was their number, what sort of looking men were leading them, and in what direction they intended to move. Was this the effect of an extreme tension of the nerves, produced by prolonged anxiety and fear?

Sir William Forbes, who resided many years in India in an official capacity, published a book of "Oriental Memoirs," in which he states that he was often told of Bramins who possessed the power of seeing and hearing things far distant from them. He says an English lady, who was a friend of his was one day walking on the beach, looking out upon the sea, and thinking of a son she supposed was then about to arrive in India. Seeing a stranger coming from the opposite direction in the garb of a Bramin, she left a wide space for him to pass, being aware that devout Hindoos considered the vicinity of foreigners a contamination. To her surprise, he stopped, and said, "You are thinking your son may arrive to-day. The vessel you are expecting will not arrive till three days from this. Your son is not on board, and you will never see him again." Recalling what she had heard of Hindoo prophetic power, the anxious mother said, "Is he dead?" "No," replied the Bramin, "he is not dead; but he will never come to India." The vessel arrived at the time predicted, bringing tidings that her son had relinquished the plan of coming to India, on account of an eligible offer in America. She never saw him afterward.

It may be remarked that the climate of India tends to produce delicate, nervous organizations; and this effect is doubtless much increased by the habits of devotees, who live upon the slightest possible food, stifle all physical instincts, avoid giving any attention to outward objects, and bury themselves in profound contemplation—those being the means prescribed by their religion for attaining to complete absorption in the "Universal Soul."

The German writer, Zschokke, in his autobiography, tells of a singular clairvoyant power which he possessed for many years, and which always remained an enigma to him. It came upon him at longer or shorter intervals, without any wish or preparation on his part. Sometimes when he met a perfect stranger a series of visions would suddenly present to him the preceding events of his life. At first he ascribed this to vividness of imagination; but he was greatly puzzled when he ascertained by inquiries that his visions were invariably true. He relates some remarkable instances of this declaring that he gives them publicity because the record of such phenomena may aid future investigations concerning the complicated structure of man. He treats the subject very rationally, says that the mysterious gift appeared to come upon him quite accidently, and that he never knew it to be of any use to himself or others. He says he never knew any one endowed with a similar faculty, except an old man whom he met in Switzerland, selling oranges; who, as soon as he set eyes upon him, related many of the antecedent events of his life.

Swedenborg, it is well known, possessed this faculty in a very uncommon degree. While at Gottenberg, he described truly the progressive ravages of a great fire as it was then raging in Stockholm, fifty miles distant; and he repeated to the Queen of Sweden, word for word, a secret conversation between her and her brother, the Prince Royal of Prussia, which had occurred years before. He exactly described the place in Prussia where they had their private interview, and told the day and the hour. Many similar things are related of him and vouched for by credible witnesses.

The wife of a former orthodox minister in Medford, Mass., told me not long ago of a singular clairvoyant experience which came upon her during the crisis of a fever. The son of a neighbor, in whom she was much interested, had gone to sea, and was at that time homeward bound. Late in the night, as her husband sat watching by the bedside, she screamed aloud; and being asked what was the matter, she exclaimed: "The ship that Frederick is in, is in a terrible storm at sea. Frederick is climbing the mast. The great waves will wash him overboard. Oh, save him! Oh he has dropped into the sea, and the furious winds are driving the vessel away from him. Oh, help him! Help him!" Her husband was so much impressed by the vividness of her description and the agony of her tones that he looked at his watch, and wrote down the hour and the day of the month, with a record of her words. Before long, tidings came of the shipwreck of the vessel and the loss of nearly all on board; and, by subsequent interviews with the captain, it was ascertained that the ship had been wrecked in a furious tempest, at the very hour when she had a vision of it, and Frederick had been washed overboard in just the way she described.

THE STORY OF CREATION,

AS TOLD BY THE EARTH ITSELF.

Says the Doctrine and Covenants:—"After a Revelation of Jesus Christ, the works of creation throughout their vast forms and varieties clearly exhibit His eternal power and Godhead." Not only is it true, that these "works of creation" reveal the power and wisdom of the Creator, but they unfold in the greatest simplicity the history of creation itself.

What that story is, we shall endeavor to tell. It will be seen that it contradicts the traditional idea, which has been handed down to us, that God created everything best at first, and that all the successive generations of men, beasts and vegetation, have been gradually declining in perfection and beauty ever since they left the creative hand. We shall see that the "Golden days" never have been in the past of any period, but that every period has been better than the one it succeeded. If this view cuts away our faith in the excellence of bygone times, it will replace it with a far brighter view of the excellence of future ones,—which is far better to us, for we are moving towards the future and not the past. We shall see that the superiority of the great future, so brilliantly predicted by Prophets and Seers, will not depend upon some manifestation of miraculous power to commence at some future date, but will be the result of inevitable laws of nature which have been in operation for millions of years; thus presenting a solid basis for the thinking mind to rest upon and giving us a far deeper assurance than blind faith can ever attain.

We start, then, with the assertion that, in all things relating to this world, everything has been worse in the past, and that the further back we go, the worse it has always been. There are four grand lines of evidence up which we shall trace the proof of what we have asserted,—as seen in the history of the Earth, its plants, animals, and in respect to man. We shall see that in relation to each of these departments of Creation, the poorest specimens of each species first came upon our globe, and that, as ages rolled along, they were replaced with better of their particular kind; and that not only has each species been improving within itself, but that the species themselves, were introduced upon the earth on the same principle of sending that first which stood lowest in the scale of life and being. From this, we shall deduce the grand law of progress which runs through all being and upon which our certain hopes of an inevitably glorious future for humanity may with certainty depend.

Some weeks ago, in an article entitled "How the Earth was built," we sketched in a simple way the construction of our globe, showing that it was once somewhat smaller than at present, but that, in the processes of nature, it had taken on a number of layers or strata, like so many "peelings" of an orange, one over an other, each layer being for the time the surface of the globe, upon which its animals and plants existed until covered up by the various strata that followed. In consequence of this process, these layers are found in the same relative order all over the world; while packed between them are deposited the remains of the races of plants and animals that flourished on each succeeding surface. The lowest strata, of course, contains the remains of such specimens of life as first appeared, while each of the succeeding layers, as they rise one above the other, exhibit to us the various kinds of plants and animals of our earth in the exact order in which they were originally brought into existence. With these layers before us, we can, of course, tell from the remains embedded between them, what kind of plants and animals first appeared, what second, and so on till we have learned the order in which all the chief classes of animal and vegetable life were brought into being.

Within the leaves of this great book of Nature, we can read the history of our globe without speculation or doubt. Geologists may and do speculate as to the ages that it took to form these deposits or crusts, but there is no room for speculation as to the order or rotation in which they and the specimens of animal and vegetable life accompanying them came into existence. There they stand, to-day, with their contents for reference. No matter in what part of the globe we dig through these layers, the one same answer comes back, that, wherever the earth has been undisturbed by earthquakes or volcanic changes, the various strata of the earth—so far as they are found complete—with the specimens of animal and vegetable life belonging to each period, are found in the same invariable order.

Having such a plain and perfect record in the globe of its history, let us go back, then, to our question as to whether constant progress, or a constant decline in perfection, has marked Creation from the beginning.

As to the Earth itself, the answer is direct: it once was a barren granite ball, upon the surface of which, not an inch of tillable soil existed. It was in fact an enormous barren rock without one sign of animal or vegetable life, and upon which not a sound was heard but the roar of the waves as they washed its caves. From this condition, it became covered in time with a scanty soil, composed of the substance ground from the pulverized rock itself. As age succeeded age, it took on, layer after layer, the rocks, the minerals, and the soil necessary for the use of intelligent man. Thus it started at its worst, a desolation upon which no vegetable or animal could, by any possibility, exist. Every fresh period as it rolled along, added to the richness of its stores, and its perfection as a globe. Its history is a grand testimony that the eternal order of Creation moves from worse to better, worlds without end.

We will turn now to the same imperishable record and see the order in which the plants or vegetation of our globe were produced. They will teach us the same great truth. In the earliest ages the first plants that existed were little shapeless masses of vegetation found floating in the waves; while on the land, not a trace of vegetation was yet found. After the lapse of ages, mother earth herself began to produce in a feeble way. Her first efforts, as universally attested in the rocks, being the production of half-formed flowerless plants without proper stems or leaves. In later times, she put out greater efforts, and then came plants, still flowerless, but this time with distinct stems and leaves—such as the humble fern. Even then, puny and stunted specimens came first, the nobler kind of fern appearing only in later formations. With plants of this lowly class we find trees with imperfect substitutes for leaves as seen in our mountain firs, accompanied by a few plants with coarse palm-like leaves.

Such an earth as this was ours once, and it took vast periods and changes to reach this imperfect condition. Trees and plants existed, but, as yet, no rich leafy foliage waved in the breeze—no flowers adorned the earth with their beauty, for Nature had not arrived at that perfection in her works. But true to the principle of everlasting progress, she moved on, and in later formations, although evidently separated from the times to which we have referred, by vast periods, proper leaf-bearing plants at last appeared; they were, however, still only plants, for no leaf-bearing trees accompanied them. It was long after this before full leaved trees appeared, while the highest order of forest and orchard trees—with the flowers which deck our gardens—only arrived at, or about, the period immediately preceding man's advent on the stage. Thus we see that Nature traveled slowly but surely up the road to perfection, age after age, improving on her work, and preparing for the great day when man, the crowning glory of creation, should appear upon the earth's surface. In no case in the history of plants do we find perfect specimens of nature's workmanship followed by inferior kinds. The poorest, the least shapely, those least evidencing designing skill came first, and Nature in every case improved as she went along. Here, as we might expect in God's movements, we have order, system, and a divine fitness displayed in this grand march of creation from shapelessness and imperfection to full development and beauty.

If the invariable order of Nature's progress from good to better is plainly marked in the vegetable world, it can be still more clearly traced in the order in which God introduced animal life upon our own planet. Here, indeed, Nature began with her poorest and weakest efforts, and worked steadily upwards. In those strata formed in the earliest days of our earth's existence, we find nothing but little flabby masses of life without limbs, or bones of any kind, to support them—like the oyster or the poor jointed worm. The utmost attempt at shape for vast periods was the star fish, which consists of five spongy protuberances, spreading out from a center,—a creature almost as much like a weed as a fish or animal of any kind; yet, this was Nature's greatest triumph for the whole of such periods as it took to deposit many of the strata that cover our globe.

After these, came creatures of more developed form, and displaying more of creative skill, for fish, with internal bony structures, of a small but simple type appeared. These were succeeded by fish of a more highly organized kind. Up to this period they were the sole monarchs of the deep, and of the entire realm of animal life, for as yet, not a solitary bird or beast existed on the land. Then Nature, traveling upwards in her developments, produced more highly endowed forms, in creatures of a half fishy, half reptile order, which could exist partly on land, and sea together; as seen in such huge monsters as the Plesiosaurus, a species of lizard like marine animal, and the Ichthyosaurus, a kind of reptile-whale—animals manifesting greater mechanical skill in their structure than all that had preceded them. These were followed by reptiles as a distinct species,—creatures of a still more highly organized and perfect kind. During this period nature seems to have made her first effort at navigating the air, as illustrated in the Pterodactyle—a flying reptile or monster bat—whose remains are now embalmed in the rocks; while traveling on to still more exquisite organizations, birds, although of coarse and gigantic species, appeared upon the scene.

Then a still higher class of life was produced—land animals came into being, although of a somewhat undeveloped order—pouched animals which do not mature their young in the womb, but perfect them in a fleshy pouch prepared for the purpose. Then animals of the class mammalia, which produce their young, perfect and entire came into existence—although the chief specimens first introduced were of the coarse, unshapely, and thick-skinned class. Still traveling to higher developments of creative power, these were followed by animals of finer and more shapely kinds—Nature branching out into the thousand forms of "wild-beast" life which have more or less been perpetuated down to our day. Later still came the finer and more delicate domestic animals of our times; while last of all, to crown this pyramid of Natures efforts, man—embodying within himself all the excellencies of workmanship, the perfection of mechanism, found in all the combined orders of life which had preceded him—appeared upon the scene, a fit and glorious apex to the whole! Who that follows in his mind this line of progress, we have so briefly sketched, from the incapable—and apparently unconscious—inmate of the sea shell or the spongy star fish, up to man, in all his beauty of structure, and glory of form, but can see that Nature's course has been one invariable upward movement from the remotest times—one constant improvement upon her class of work in every succeeding period. And when we find the same line of proof in the progress of the earth, from a barren rock to a rich alluvial globe, stored with mineral and vegetable wealth, and find the same story of progress reëchoed in the history of plants, from the days of the stemless and leafless species to the foliaged trees and odorous flowers of our own times—who, we say, but must conclude with us that Nature's eternal and immutable order—from which there is no variation, is progress—eternal unfoldment of greater and yet greater riches of artistic and mechanical skill—progress in beauty and perfection in all her realms, upwards and forever?

And did we need further proof that this is God's order—that nothing ever goes backward with Him, but that, notwithstanding the blotches and disfigurements which mark human affairs, as a whole, everything is traveling an inevitable road to perfection—we have it in man's own history. We see it by looking back into "the hole from whence we have been dug." Whatever Adam may have been, we know by the relics which are found buried with them, that the earliest settlers of our globe were the most barbarous and degraded it ever saw—men who used stone axes and slew each other with spears capped with flint—a race into whose minds the idea of the uses of iron, or any other metal, had never entered. We know that ages elapsed ere men learned the commonest decencies of life, and ages more before men could communicate to each other one idea in writing or distinguish one sound of music from another. It took the accumulated wisdom of thousands of years, before men could tell in great clumsy hieroglyphics—huge enough to cover a house—that which we can write in ten minutes on a slip of paper; or before mankind even rose to the full appreciation of the sublime music of a ram's horn.

From these states of savagism, we have ascended through the slow travail of the ages, gaining every step. One after another, has come civilizing ideas and higher spiritual truths, until from the barbarism of the naked "stone men," our race has risen to the mastery of music, literature, and all the arts of the beautiful—to the age of machinery and vast projects. While in spiritual matters, we have traveled from fierce hatreds between tribes and tongues, and from a world-wide belief in the natural right of nations to destroy each other as wild beasts, to a universal recognition that all are of one flesh and blood; and from the conception of a Deity of wrath and jealousy—taking bloody vengeance on his foes—to a comprehension of the God of Love, whose boundless provisions are spread out over all nations and fill a universe—compared with whose bright image, as it now fills the developed human soul, even Moses' conceptions of Deity—far ahead as they were of former times—are comparative heathenism and blackest night.

We have then in the Earth, in its plants, its animals, and its human kind, the testimony that nothing rolls back under the Divine Hand. We are also just awaking to the conception that this great law of progress extends throughout the realms of space, and that we live in a Universe which inevitably gets more beautiful and glorious as ages pass along. By-and-bye, we may come to see that through all their sins and sufferings, their crimes and their woes, a tender but irresistible Hand is taking humanity—all humanity without exception—through to an understanding of the superiority of righteousness and the sweetness of truth. Then shall we learn that nothing fails in the Divine Plan, and gain another testimony that all life and being contain the germ of their own progress, and are created irresistibly to perfect and develop themselves. And oh! looking back over the accumulated ages through which we have reached all the manifestations of Nature's loveliness that surround us to day, with what a prophecy are we filled of that which is to come! This story of the past which we have read is one of power and developing life commencing at a point and widening as it goes. Where shall it end? If our race has journeyed up from semi-animalism till it comprehends the chemistry of the universe, measures the pathways of worlds, and intellectually and spiritually realizes a relationship to God, to what periods of light, and to what perfection of species, is Nature in her great unfoldments carrying us all? The hard facts of the past allow but one reply—there is no speculation about it, no mere imagination—the pathway of life for millions of ages past must be its pathway for millions more. In its fruits and flowers, therefore, and in all its phases of animal beauty, our earth must go on to its paradisiacal condition; while, in beauty of physical form, in strength of intelligence, in nearness to God—unless the universe reverses its eternal tides—our race must advance until the present generation, with all their attainments in intellectual power, are seen but as the poor "stone-men" of the past, alongside of the superior races that must then people our globe.

Already the instincts of mankind are preparing them for the next great step in their progress, and they stand peering in, trying to penetrate through the veil that hides from them the secrets of the invisible world. To travel further, they need the light, the order, the science, the philosophy, the accumulated wisdom—of the great spiritual and intellectual ones who have for over six thousand years been passing away and studying divine science in higher realms. Their hands will lift earth's race up that higher step—that veil will be rent and men will gaze through on the system and the advanced truths that fill the bosoms of immortals. Thus shall the great ones of the past create the future, and as ages pass along, and earth's races come nearer to a heavenward mark, the inter-communication between mortals and the purified ones of Immortal Zion so increase—the interblending be so great—the union so tender and so near, that men shall say "Zion from above has come down" and "the Tabernacle of God is with men." Then will open before mankind the celestial door which looks out on that science which, while it governs worlds and directs the course of myriads, lifts every individual up to his fullest height of manly freedom, expansiveness in heavenly love and sublime intelligence; and earth's races will reach the point so surely pointed out by the unfailing growth of the past, but more emphatically predicted in the bosoms of those who humbly, and while yet afar from this bright time, seek for intelligence from the celestial fount.

ALFRED THE GREAT AS THE ONE-MAN POWER.

No. 3.

THE WORLD'S HISTORY ILLUSTRATED IN ITS GREAT CHARACTERS.

It was Whitsuntide when Alfred returned from the Danish camp, and he immediately sent messengers to his friends in Wiltshire, Hampshire, and Somersetshire, announcing his existence. He instructed them to collect their followers and meet him in arms on the east of Selwood Forest. The Anglo-Saxons rallied at the call of their fugitive king: England lived again. The heavens were also busy. His relative, St. Neot, appeared to Alfred in vision, promising him both assistance and great success. The circumstance of this vision was communicated to the Saxons, who were by it greatly encouraged.

On the third day of the gathering of the Anglo-Saxons, Alfred marched his new raised army to Æcylea and seized an adjoining hill. Æcylea is supposed to have been near Warminster, in Wiltshire, but there are various conjectures upon the point. Here they encamped that night, near the enemy, and in the morning they advanced rapidly to a place then called Ethandune, where the Danish army overspread the plain. Here Alfred halted and addressed his soldiers, reminding them that they were about to combat for the deliverance of their country. When he had concluded, the Anglo-Saxons advanced upon their enemies with such celerity, that the Danes, who seem to have been surprised by the sudden rallying of the English, were thrown into disorder by the impetuous charge. It is said that, seeing a standard-bearer leading on one of his divisions with great valor, Alfred pointed him out to his warriors as St. Neot himself at their head; which belief made his soldiers, heroes. The Saxons won the battle, drove the Northmen to their fortress, and besieged them. The strength of Alfred daily increased, cutting off all hope from the Danish chieftains, who, subdued by famine and cold and imprisoned by the siege, humbly supplicated the mercy of their conqueror. Thus, after a doubtful struggle of twelve years, between the Sea kings of the North, and the Anglo-Saxon kings who divided England between them, Alfred, king of Wessex, conquered the most formidable invasion that ever swept over a nation. In his moment of triumph, this great prince conceived the splendid policy of incorporating the Danes as part of the English nation, making Godrun, the Danish king, his ally. The Northmen were pagans and pirate kings of the sea, but the Saxon prince converted them to agriculture, civilization, and Christianity. In a few weeks after their defeat, Godrun and his chiefs were baptized Alfred standing as godfather to the Danish king, who was baptized into Christianity by the name of Ethelstan. England was divided now between two great powers; the Danes and the Saxons both of whom must, from this incorporation, be considered natives of the land—both now Englishmen, who together formed that mighty kingdom which for centuries led the destinies of the human race.

From the restoration of Alfred to the throne, the Saxon heptarchy became absorbed in him. There has been a difference among the old historians, as to which was the proper founder of the English kingdom, Alfred or his grandson Athelstan. The former united the Saxon kingdom in himself, while his grandson united the Saxons and the Danes. It is true that Athelstan completed his grandsire's work, and was the first monarch of all the land, but Alfred, we believe, should be considered the beginning of the "one man power" of the British empire—the father of the English nation. Let us now consider this "one man power" and especially as illustrated in Alfred and the British Commonwealth.

That our national unity is an absolute necessity to the greatness of a kindred race is most certain. From that unity civilization and nationality may properly be said to begin. Previous to that is semi-barbarism, and the growth of small states and petty kingdoms, in a country made one by nature and Providence, is but the transition of a people towards their nationality and civilization. France became France in a Charlemagne, England was born in Alfred the Great, and the American Republic in a grand centralization in George Washington. Here we have three forms of the "one-man power," the one imperial, the other in constitutional monarchy, and the latter in republican sovereignty, which emanates from the people. The former is better and grander than barbarism, and more blessed than anarchy, but it is the nearest to barbarism, and it is only tolerable in modern times as a savior from anarchy after an eruptive revolution which has been fed with its volcanic force by the despotisms of ages. The monstrous tyrannies of Church and State—the brutalizing "one-man power" of priestcrafts, and kingcrafts which chain the intellect, interrupt civilization, and destroy the manhood of the people, in time produce revolutions as their very ultimate. Such a "one-man power" for a nation to build upon, must therefore be a curse not only to itself, but if sufficiently important in the world, a curse to the human race. It may begin with an immortal Charlemagne, but it will culminate a thousand years afterwards with a revolution that shall shake the world out of its old forms, into new conceptions, and redeem their France from anarchy. They give to the world no proper ultimate. After the death of the last Napoleon, shall come another revolution and another anarchy, and thus it shall ever be, until human liberties and human progress be secured to the coming age in a healthful sovereignty of the people—a proper commonwealth that cultivates God in the hearts of the millions, and acknowledges the will of that God in the intellects of those millions of immortal souls.

Alfred the Great, after his restoration, was deeply and solemnly impressed with such views as these, for they abound in all the writings, reflections and acts of his reign. He was traveling to his phase of "one-man power," if a nation's unity must be dishonored by that term, for there still be those who insist that unity and national perfection mean the one only to will, the one brain to think, the one heart to feel, the one personality to absorb a nation's commonwealth. But Alfred the Great illustrated the subject differently. He traveled to Anglo-Saxon unity, but, after ages of progress, his race and genius brought forth a grand declaration of human rights and liberties, not a French Revolution—a George Washington, not a Napoleon, as the ultimate for man. Not less even than the republican fathers of the American nation, did Alfred, the Saxon lawgiver, seek to secure to mankind their inalienable rights and liberties by a regular constitutional government. He saw his race, which until his day had been divided into small kingdoms, in a country which God had geographically marked with unity, now growing into one great nation, not only for the necessities for a governmental unity, as well as a geographical oneness, but also from the inevitable blending of a kindred people, with the same language, on a sea-girt isle, formed by Nature herself for a great national unity. The growth of civilization, the increase of the means of travel, the exchange of thought, the extension of commerce between the different cities and counties, the enlargement of men's intellects and the general humanizing and Christianizing of the Saxon people, would, in time, certainly bring about a national oneness. But the circumstances of Alfred and the circumstances of his country threw him into a more rapid development in that direction. The Danish invasion and the necessities of a common defense and a potent government throughout the land under one head produced, in his reign, what otherwise might have taken centuries to bring about, and the same necessities and causes, in his grandson's reign, united both the Danes and the Saxons into one common people. From his very restoration the intellectual Alfred saw these necessities and causes working rapidly. It was, to all intents and purposes, a new era which, before his dethronement, existed not. England, with that restoration, had a new birth. Alfred was, doubtless, the first of his age to realize this in the civilizing sense and, as we have seen, he, immediately after his victory over the Northmen, sought to incorporate them into England as Englishmen. His prompt, sagacious policy was to first Christianize the pagan Sea Kings and their warlike forces, and by settling them on land in various counties as tillers of the soil, and to imbue them with the spirit of civilization and peace, he was consolidating and augmenting a kingdom, not distracting it nor dividing with the invaders his power. The Saxons had the start in civilization and, therefore, they would absorb the Danes, not be absorbed by them; they were the teachers of Christianity, and, therefore, the pagans would become their converts and adopted brethren. It was a thousand times easier to thus incorporate them into the nation and civilize them than to drive them, as invaders, from his shores. Alfred therefore, like an enlightened statesman, sought to found a greater England than that of the past, and by a grand commonwealth, to bring forth a united kingdom.

The first step to this great design which Alfred took was, like Charlemagne before him, to create a powerful navy and to thoroughly organize the national forces on the land. With his navy and armies he defended the country against more invasions and kept his Danish allies faithful, so that he was enabled for many years to contend with the terrible Hastings and, at last, break his power and scatter him and his broken forces into France. Thus did Alfred preserve his kingdom during his reign and every year increase its martial and naval glory.

WOMAN AND PLURAL MARRIAGE.

No. 2.

Our object, in our last article on the above subject, was to condense in one chapter a rough idea of the general principles upon which, to our minds, polygamy rests. Necessarily, therefore, much remains to be further amplified and explained, both with reference to the object of polygamy, and its justice to women.

Let us now re-state the case in other words, that we may clearly convey our ideas to the mind. As we understand it, men and women are organized on a polygamic basis—in other words, they are created with the impulses and adaptations for that kind of life within them, so that when they arrive at a certain state of development it shall be natural to them, and in harmony with all the conditions of their being. It is, therefore, not necessarily adapted to them, or true to their feelings and conceptions at every stage of their career. In proportion, only, as those qualities implanted with a special eye to polygamy are brought out; will it be a source of perfect happiness and life to them. As an illustration, flying is adapted to the nature's of birds, when their feathers are perfected, and the rest of their organization is sufficiently developed; but true and natural as flying ultimately is to birds it is not true to them until these necessary conditions are fully developed within them. Although an instinct for flying is born with the bird, it is utterly unconscious of the fact till nature has developed the desire within it. So it is with plurality of wives, thousands of men are as unconscious of any fitness of their being for that form of marriage life, as the downy eaglet crouching in the nest is unaware that Nature intended it to float in the air, or soar in the face of the noonday sun. It is perfectly clear that there is no special advantage in preaching feathers to young birds, the feathers will come of themselves in due time, and they will know all about them when they come; and it is comparatively, as useless preaching the harmony of polygamy with the facts of advanced men and women's natures, to those in whom no instinct or inkling of their fitness for the institution has as yet been developed.

Still there are thousands of men in whose practical experience polygamy has proved itself true. They know, at least, that a power to purely love more than one woman exists within them, they also know that the love of the second does not touch or interfere with the love of the first—but that simply an increase of capacity to love has been awakened within them, to the injury and loss of none, but to the improvement of their own natures. These men desire to live in harmony with what they conceive to be their highest instincts, and as the facts become known the number of such persons will increase, until, like an overwhelming sea, their voice and testimony will force from their fellows a concession of their right to follow those instincts whether anyone else knows anything about such promptings or whether they do not. For the sake of such we present in these articles not a defense, for no man can prove any fact of his own nature to another person, but simply an exposition of the principles of divine polygamy from our own stand-point.

We say "divine polygamy," because, as already stated, polygamy, like the marriage of one wife, can be entered into from the lowest of motives. This, however, argues nothing. There is no impulse of our human nature but can be similarly perverted. Teaching and enlightenment can alone direct our instincts to their highest use; and hence it is open, and always will be open to those who know no higher worth in women than their sex, to attribute mere instincts of animal passion to men practicing this order of marriage. Unprincipled men could not see anything in Jesus but a man ambitious for power, hence he said nothing, knowing the uselessness of the task, but "like a lamb before her shearers was dumb," knowing that, when his love touched their hearts, the charge would expire in air. So with polygamy, one touch of nature in the soul revealing the fact of a capacity for pure and godlike plural love will—like the spirit "dividing the joints and the marrow," teach to each man and woman that which volumes of external testimony cannot prove.

Polygamy, as practised by vast nations at the present day, has one advantage: it eats out the plague spot of prostitution. But polygamy, as revealed to our minds, has many higher purposes than annihilating this monster woe of womankind. That is but a fraction of the purposes of polygamy as understood in the bosoms of angels. To them, it means greater unity between the sexes, greater love between women, and holier results in posterity than earth as yet knows anything about. But then, polygamy, with them, is viewed solely with an eye to their class of life. It is only as we put on their conditions and merge into their spirit that we can realize what they anticipate from it. What these conditions are we shall endeavor to explain, as well as the causes that prevent its harmonious action with some of us to-day, as well as wherein its advantages to men and women really consist.

Before doing so, let us say a word on the development of women. It must not be inferred, because we have spoken of plural marriage as specially intended for the growth of man, that the development of woman is of minor importance, or that we suppose that the Almighty has a desire to bring out and develop man more than He has woman, and that woman is merely brought into existence to minister to man's improvement. It is, indeed, a fact that a plurality of wives, in answering the ends and purposes of their own beings, by the demands which they make for love and care, tend to develop and educate instincts which are inherent in man; but they thereby are no more servants to his progress than to their own. And the mere fact that the love of more than one woman is necessary in certain states of a man's progress, while the love of one man will meet all a woman's needs, does not exist because women are inferior to man, but because the matrimonial side of his nature is open to more development than woman's. But, while one man can supply all a woman needs in conjugal love, there is a department in which it takes as much to meet and fill the demands of her nature as it does that of man in respect to matrimony. Each sex is as great, and needs as much development in its special sphere. Women possess an illimitable fountain of maternal yearnings. They have far more of the great divine quality of parental love than man, and here is where their excellency and superiority is manifested, here wherein their perfection is needed—a development which is of as great an importance to all intellectual life as that of man, but which is to be obtained from an entirely different source. Growth and unfoldment, for which there is a rich provision in Nature and in the principles of celestial science, but which we do not specially dwell upon because we are now treating of matrimonial and not parental love. Suffice it to say that, in our estimation, men and women divide the powers of life between them; they each manifest a different side of the Divine Nature, each, therefore, possesses attributes of which the other is destitute. Woman is not a mere machine for child-bearing. She contains within herself special attributes, qualities and powers, of the Great Fountain of all Life and Being, which are found nowhere, but within her nature.

A SONG OF FREEDOM.

BY JOHN LYON.

Liberty's the freeman's glory!
Touch it, and you touch his life;
Let the foe be young or hoary,
Keen will be the fight, and gory,
Ere he yields in slavery's strife;
Mind! his soul is great and noble,
Count the cost before you trouble,
Mark! his children and his wife.

Touch his freedom, and a hero
Darts upon you ere you know;
Soon you'll find unto your sorrow:
"Pay to-day and trust to-morrow,"
Is his motto in each blow.
While the tyrant foeman stammers
'Neath the blow of his sledge-hammers,
Till he welt'ring lays him low.

Freely bounds his unchained spirit
Heedless where he lives or dies!
Truth's reward he strives to merit,
And fair liberty inherit
Free from demagognes and spies,
Loving, shielding all around him!
This, and only this, has bound him
To this land of paradise!

Salt Lake City, September, 1869.

THE MODERN EDMUND KEAN.

We were asked the other day, somewhat sarcastically, by a brother critic, if we had ever seen Edmund Kean. No; nor were we personally acquainted with Shakspeare in his lifetime; but we have eat and drank with their ghosts. Is our brother satisfied?

"Did you ever see Edmund Kean?" Pshaw! you trifle. Kean is but a dominating name like Napoleon. It is convertible. It was once Garrick; now the imperial signature of the histrionic realm is Warner.

We needed the dominating name again, for it is long since there was one potent enough to rule the stage. There were Forrest, Macready, the younger Kean, and Brooke; but they all now belong to the past. The younger Booth is left, but he rules in the potency of his father's name, and not his own. We saw him in Philadelphia, in the play of Shylock and sat out his great act in which he refused to give something for a "wilderness of monkeys." He did not impress us as Neil Warner has done. It may be that expectation had overwrought our impatience for real greatness, and that we were challenged by the name of a Booth, while the simple modesty of Neil Warner provoked not that impatience. But what if it had? It would have been as impossible for us to have left the theater and gone home during the performance of his Richard III or Sir Giles Overreach as to have sat in ecstasy upon our seat during the performance of Booth's Shylock, impatient at the thought of what his great father might have been. Yet we went to see Neil Warner's Richard in a more unfavorable state of mind. In one eye was Edmund Kean's Richard, and in the other, Junius Brutus Booth's, and then the idealistic is generally somewhat exaggerated. Kean in one eye and Booth in the other—both magnified ghosts with whom we have eat and drank; Neil Warner, a mortal of modest assumptions, not an immortal with a blazoned name; thus it stood. Yet, at the close of Warner's Richard, we rushed to a friend, who was surrounded by a knot of critics, and exclaimed in rapture, "That is Richard!" We could not help remembering a pertinent anecdote of John Phillip Kemble and Edmund Kean. The magnificent brother of Sarah Siddons being asked if he had seen Kean's Richard, replied "No, I have seen Richard himself." From that moment Warner struck us with the fancy of THE MODERN EDMUND KEAN?

Macready, Vandenhoff, and Forrest were great as characters, and as artists. The weight of their own personality gave a dignity and force to every part which they filled, but neither of those histrionic giants possessed the endowment of genius: Edmund Kean and Booth undoubtedly did, and in that quality they rank with Garrick. We think Neil Warner is of the same type, less than either if you please, but still of the same type. He has both the physique and metaphysics of that rare class. He may not be so grand and imposing as were John Phillip Kemble, Macready, and Forrest who have held the sceptre of the Anglo-Saxon stage, but remember that Edmund Kean—a Napoleonic little man took the sceptre from the hand of the magnificent Kemble, and won the imperial name. Now, Warner has more physique than Kean possessed, with a kindred nature. He is a fiery mass thrown upon the stage—a passion in the play, not an actor. Indeed, we do not even remember during the performance that he is an artiste, nor is he trammeled with that remembrance. He is, we say a passion, and this is what the audience feel. At the close of Othello; the Daily Telegraph wanted to fly to his help, believing it absolutely impossible for him to reach Desdemona to give her his death kiss; as for Sir Giles Overreach there is a resolute understanding in the public mind that Neil had a fit in the death scene. Being asked if such was the case we replied; upon our soul we could not tell, but we knew such men as Edmund Kean, and Junius Brutus Booth did have fits and die and do all that sort of extraordinary thing in earnest upon the stage. Warner may yet do as extraordinary things as they. He may win the empire of the stage and even die upon it, for he is a passion and may expire any moment at its culmination. A fiery mass burning into the public brain: Such is Neil Warner. He may consume himself; but better that an artiste die great, than live contemptible. Edmund Kean will win the empire of the stage though it costs him his life, and if he is incarnated in Neil Warner, then will Neil also win it and die immortal —no matter whether in his bed or at the end of Sir Giles Overreach. We have said Kean is a name? It is synonymous with genius. It shall be Garrick or Booth, just as you please; and, if it is now Warner we have no longer to look for the coming man.

The ruling name was imperatively needed; for a dramatic unity, ay, and something more than a sectional name and a local unity must be created. It is the entire Saxon stage to be ruled, for the pillars are down everywhere. Edwin Booth is not the man to sway the sceptre of the stage in the three great empires of the Anglo-Saxon race—Great Britain, America, and Australia; but sooner or later the man was certain to come to regenerate his profession and make it palpitate with a new immortality. He is necessity of the age. There is just at this time scope for the most tremendous ambition as well as the rarest genius. The field is cleared of the old stock; the pillars of the mighty fabric of the past fifty years are all fallen. The field has to be stocked again, not only with new life and the impersonating genius, but also with new dramatic substance! Both actors and authors must arise the impersonators and the creators of the next dramatic series, must come to sustain and continue the apostles of the past, not rival them. There is not a sensible man in the profession who does not realize that to-morrow Boucicault and his herd will die. Who then shall build up the dramatic fabric of the future?

We believe that on the actor's part, we have found the man in Neil Warner.

But the dominating play must come, as well as the impersonating genius. That play will be "Oliver Cromwell," to be followed by others of the great historic class, for there must be new dramatic substance even to revive the giants of the past. The humbug of novelty must be vanquished on its own ground. Cromwell will begin the work and Neil Warner must incarnate him. The great Protector is the mightiest name of the Anglo-Saxon race; he is more American than English, and will cover America, England and Australia, where that race dominate. He is crowded with dramatic subject, he is, in fact, an epic. Many have attempted to create him in dramatic forms and failed, others may fail before he is produced, but come Cromwell will, to give to some actor the empire of the modern stage. Napoleon himself would be overwhelmed, were Cromwell in the field. Mr. Warner, we understand, has made arrangements for the play of the mightiest man of the Anglo-Saxon race, and if the author succeeds, Neil Warner will not fail.

The "modern Edmund Kean" was born at Bury-St. Edmund's Suffolk, England, April 5th, 1836, and was educated for the Church. At the age of 17, owing to the death of certain relatives of whose influence he was deprived, he abandoned the ecclesiastical career, and started to London, where, for three years, he studied under the ablest masters of elocution, with the design of following the stage. He made his debût in London; and the young tragedian was highly spoken of by the London critics as an actor of great promise, whose appearing was a worthy event in theatrical history. The London Post, speaking of his Othello, said:

> From a purely physical point of view it would be difficult to imagine a more perfect presentment of the noble Moor than that of Mr. Warner. Handsome and expressive features, commanding stature, a dignified and graceful deportment and, above all, a voice of such quality, power and modulation as to give full and forcible expression to every emotion of the human heart.
> In the portrayal of this arduous character Mr. Warner exhibited such force and nobility, such tenderness and wrath, such true insight into the workings of the jealous mind, and such rare power of realizing them in action, that the most hypercritical could not conscientiously quarrel with the approving verdict passed upon the impersonation by the large and high-class audience present last night.

Leaving London, the young English tragedian went to Australia, where he was universally acknowledged as being after the late lamented G. V. Brooke, the greatest tragic actor in the southern hemisphere. He returned to England in 1864, appearing first in London, then in Liverpool, Edinburgh, Dublin and nearly all the principal towns of the United Kingdom. He is just from California, being on a professional visit to the empire of the future—America which may perhaps be an event in his life. We need scarcely say that Neil Warner is a great Shakspearean student, for without this, no man could be a great Shakspearean actor. His profession is his idol; and genius, we again affirm, is his type.

It is a grand ambition of this young man to give to his profession a new immortality. Charles Kean, and Edwin Booth have attempted it. But their aim was merely the revival of the past, by scenic agencies. It must be a creation, not a revival—a creation of a dramatic future. Boucicault had a much more practical conception, and he struck for a new creation. We have seen his success; but in his low work he dethroned Shakspeare, and destroyed the opportunity of the great actors. Now, Neil Warner has struck the true conception, and the one which is also commercially sound. He will revive Shakspeare and Massenger by bringing great names to the help of Richard, Macbeth, Hamlet, and Sir Giles Overreach. Had there been a score of plays, equal to Richelieu produced in this age, with a score of the Elizabeth of England class, the kings and queens of the stage would, ere this, have regained their thrones. They will yet do it, and Neil Warner begins his fine conception of a new creation, not a mere revival, by the mighty name of Cromwell of England.

TERESE, THE HEBREW MAIDEN;

OR,

NOT ALL DROSS.

BY EDWARD W. TULLIDGE.

CHAPTER LXVIII.

GUILTY, OR NOT GUILTY.

The great court-room of the Old Bailey was crowded to hear the trial of the celebrated singer, Farinelli; and, as the thousands gathered there listening to the statement of the case by the prosecutor for the Crown followed by the testimony of the witnesses, they already in their minds pronounced sentence upon the prisoner. The testimony of both friends and foes weighed almost equally in the scale against the Farinelli. Indeed, no one could be suspected of being the foe of the prisoner excepting Orsini; and seeing that his testimony was forced from him by his arrest, he was not strongly convicted in the public mind, of malice towards the prisoner. The rest of the evidence was from Farinelli's friends. Sir Richard Courtney, in stating the case of the mysterious disappearance of his nephew, how he left London with the prisoner, how Signor Farinelli, in the morning, with his strange story, arrived alone and distracted at Courtney House, how himself, Lord Frederick De Lacy and the prisoner immediately mounted the fleetest horses and rode to the scene of the attack in the forest, how they found Walter's horse dead and its rider's pistols in their holsters undischarged, told fearfully against the victim of circumstantial evidence at the bar. Another point which told even more than the appearance of a sudden murder without resistance, was the fact that the old lodge in the forest was burned to the ground. A shudder ran through the court at this, for the general inference was that the body of the supposed murdered man had been consumed in the fire. This fact had been drawn from the reluctant Courtney by the Prosecutor.

At length, Counselor Christie arose for the defense, and made a powerful appeal to the jury, charging them to bear in mind the cases of the innocent who had been condemned and hung by circumstantial evidence as conclusive as that of the present case, but which, when other facts were known, had an entirely different appearence. The multitude, ever swayed by feeling, were by the powerful speech of Counselor Christie, greatly moved; but, when the Prosecutor bade his eloquent brother also remember of the former attempt at assassination in Rome, a reaction followed. Counselor Christie replied not; but called Judah Nathans into the witness box.

"My Lord," began Snap, "when we see a lone oak torn up by the fierce hurricane, and it falls upon a cottage close by, destroying life in the catastrophe, if blame there be, should it come against the stricken oak or the hurricane? The crime of the uprooted oak is that its strength of resistance was overmatched by the storm. There is no motive to be found against the tree. So am I proof that there is no motive to be found against Signor Farinelli, for I was in the hurricane myself that struck him; yet, though he fell, no one was hurled to the ground but himself. In this case, the motive and the malice were in the storm, for even before the prisoner at the bar was born, it had already brought desolation to the De Lacy family; and certain am I that since it struck Farinelli in Rome, hurling him against his friend, that same storm has now borne away Sir Walter Templar himself." Snap then related the entire conspiracy against the De Lacys and the design to murder Walter; and wound up by a philosophical climax so eminently characteristic of the man:

"My lord, when plotters travel to their purposes, they surround their deeds with other men's seemings—not their own. From the time that the regicide of Scotland struck the blow with the daggers of the sleeping grooms, and his wife besmeared their faces with the blood of their royal master, murderers of subtle capacity fasten their deeds upon other men as a part of their own design. Moreover, they seek to kill the person nearest to their chief victim to hide the seemings which would lead to themselves. It is a fatal error to hang the man whom you find by the side of the corpse; rather pursue the one who has fled. In nine cases out of ten, the person nearest is the most innocent of the crime and its foregone intentions."

Terese Ben Ammon was the next witness called, and her woman's impulse startled the court with new thoughts. Being sworn, she opened upon the judge with—

"My lord, Walter Templar is not dead; therefore, my foster-brother did not murder him."

A sensation ran through the court and the thousands present expected Walter suddenly to appear to confirm her statement. The Prosecutor looked around him with something like disappointment, a buzzing ran through the crowd, searching eyes were darting in every direction, even the judge expected an astonishing denouement, while Orsini turned pale and would have fled from the court, could he have done so with safety. The missing man, however, not appearing, the judge observed:

"Young lady, the court is anxious for the proof."

The court was anxious; a breathless silence reigned as Terese resumed:

"Walter Templar is not dead. By-and-by, he shall himself come to prove my words. I only ask that my foster-brother may not be condemned before that coming. But I will tell you, my lord, how I know that my affianced husband is not dead."

Terese then told his lordship of the death-bed marriage, Alice's prophecy and her own dreams since of Walter's living. The judge listened out of sympathy, and the spiritual-minded were half disposed to believe, but at length the Prosecutor impatiently reminded the court that the beautiful fancies of the witness had nothing pointed to the case. At this, Terese, carried away again by the impulses of the woman and the artiste, burst forth with impassioned speech, and an inspiration like a torrent bearing her on its course:

"Ye men of logic and of facts—slaves of logic and of facts—would you have these thousands assembled—witnesses of your wisdom and your justice—believe that only that is to the point, which you can trace by the common-place of circumstances? Dare you to be so falsely wise as to say that your hand is a circumstance in the case, but that your thought is none? Is your tabernacle the man and your spirit the fiction of the man. Is the book of your spirit-consciousness unworthy to be read, or which, if you attempt to read, the judges and the wise men of the law may interrupt by telling you that the text is not to the point in our practical experience? If you dare to say this, then I tell you, my lord and gentlemen, you had need be instructed by that grand order of visionary men—the Prophets and Seers of my Hebrew race, whose sepulchres you garnish and to whose names you build your temples, but whose wisdom you contemn. They shall tell you that that which you would have us believe the fiction is the most stupendous fact of life. But if you will maintain that their facts are too spiritual and that spiritual facts are not evidence in a case touching the living and the dead, where then stands your religion, seeing that all religions have the spiritual as their solidest groundwork? You have built not only churches, but States, upon the spiritual, and you make the very history of nations the fulfillment of prophecy. Wherefore then should you say that the prophecy of my sister Alice, as her departing spirit pierced the veil of the future, is not evidence in the case? Has not her prophecy been fulfilled? That at least is a fact. And her sight of a coming event is now a positive evidence. But what has come to pass, you will say, proves not that which shall yet come to pass revealing Walter living; yet the departed spirit of the bride foretold that he should be living, and that in the coming night of his mortal life, she would be near both him and me. Therefore is Walter Templar living, and Alice, his spirit-bride, near us!"

"It is a woman's, therefore," interrupted the judge, "all-intuition; yet no evidence for the court to decide upon."

"But, my lord—my lord, bear with me! I have direct evidence, since the death of Alice and since the disappearance of Walter. I pray you, hear me."

"Yes, yes, my dear young lady, come to that direct evidence," observed the judge, eagerly expecting something more tangible, but he was soon undeceived, for Terese resumed:

"I know that Walter is not dead, for Alice has come from heaven and told me so! You look disappointed, my lord, at this. But do you then not believe that the spirits of the departed still live?"

"Certainly!" said the indulgent judge.

"Then, my lord, wherefore should they not come to us and tell us things which most concern them and us, especially when it is to save a life, and preserve a nation from a terrible injustice? Besides, my lord, were Walter in the other world, he also would come to me. I should see him, I should hear him. He would tell me all. But he has not come, therefore is he in the body and cannot come. My lord, I am of the Hebrew race, and my forefathers were Prophets and Seers. Their sight and prophetic words you build upon to this very day. Why then will you despise the words of their daughter? They have garnered in me their own nature, and I feel its prophecies in me even now. It is that nature which made me an artiste. The soul of song which is in me, in them once burst forth in grand prophecies and divine psalms. Ay, my lord, there is a tradition in my family that David of Israel was my ancestor and now the spirits of my Hebrew race tell you through my mouth that Walter Templar is still on earth. Surely, my lord, they know."

"The child is right?" exclaimed Isaac Ben Ammon aloud in the court. "David of Israel was her ancestor, as sure as that the young man is not dead."

The Prosecutor for the Crown here interrupted again and demanded evidence to the point; but his lordship observed:

"Let the lady speak, for at least the court is refreshed by her beautiful faith; yet I confess it touches not the case."

"My lord, a moment more and I have finished," resumed the daughter of the ancient people. "My lord and gentlemen of the jury, the whole history of the Hebrews is a grand evidence that the heavens and the earth are inter-blended, and that they can hold converse one with another. When Elijah's spirit went up in the flaming chariot, the prophets in a multitude saw him. When Nebuchadnezzar sat in judgment upon the evidence of the wise men of Babylon, Daniel declared what the heavens had told him. Would not that Daniel, were he here on the judgment seat, believe what the heavens have told me, that Walter is on earth among the living; yea, my lord, would not that Daniel inquire and find him out? But Walter shall himself come and prove that he is still in the flesh."

The Hebrew Maiden left the witness-box as she said this. She had spoken like a prophetess. There had been something wonderful in her manner and speech which, though it proved nothing in a case of law, strangely impressed the thousands in the court.

The Prosecutor for the Crown then arose and, with his severe logic, swept away all that had been said in favor of the prisoner at the bar. He dwelt with a certain remorseless deliberateness upon every item of the terrible circumstantial evidence against Farinelli, especially that of the undischarged pistols of Walter in their holsters, and the burnt lodge in the forest with which he insisted the body of the murdered man had been consumed. The judge afterwards summed up the evidence and delivered the case to the jury The impartial men who had been sworn to decide on the evidence, felt that they dared not be influenced by the touching faith of Terese Ben Ammon; and, without leaving the court, they came to an agreement. At the startling words from the judge—"Guilty or not guilty?"—The foreman replied solemnly—"Guilty, my lord!"

The prisoner at the bar, with gentle firmness, refused to declare why sentence of death should not be passed upon him: and then the judge in a broken voice performed his terrible duty.

The sentence of death passed upon the innocent Farinelli, he was taken from the court to the condemned cell, while Clara Garcia was carried from the court in a swoon. Strong-minded men had shed tears that day, as well as the tender-hearted women who were present; but nothing more could be done there to save the prisoner. The only hope was in the mercy of the Crown.

Two persons, however, were superior even to that dreadful crisis. They were Terese Ben Ammon and her uncle Judah. They left the court resolved to find Walter Templar living and prove Farinelli innocent. Judah's will and intellect said—"Farinelli shall be delivered!" And the Hebrew Maiden said—"The God of my fathers shall bring it all to light!"

Clara Garcia, when she recovered from her swoon, wailed—

"Oh, Terese, save my lover;—save him whose life is more to me than my own soul!"

She was answered:

"The God of my Hebrew fathers shall bring it all to light. My brother shall be saved!"

CHAPTER LXIX.

THE FORSAKEN AND HER SON.

In a small but pretty cottage on the Edgeware Road, London, resided a charming lady, closely related to one of the chief personages of our story. She passed for a widow, but she was no widow, but a forsaken one. She was still beautiful, though the observant eye could see by her subdued sadness that there was a worm at her heart, or that some great calamity had befallen her in her life. Her name was Ida Blair.

By the side of Ida, on the morning of the 18th of May, 1824, the very morning after the sentence of Farinelli, sat a young man of about twenty-five years of age. His name was Arthur Blair, and he was the young Church of England clergyman who performed the ceremony of marriage between Walter Templar and Alice Courtney. In general terms he may be described as much such a young man as Lord Frederick De Lacy, resembling much his beautiful mother, Ida. There was, however, a gravity in him that did not become his years. This gravity was doubtless partly from the tone of mind which his sacred calling had given, but it was chiefly from the same cause which gave that subdued sadness seen in his beautiful mother. There was also the maturity of thoughtfulness in him which would have led one to rate his years at thirty, and to suppose him a younger brother of Ida Blair, rather than her son.

"Arthur,"—began his mother, in a broken voice, and something of shame in the blush that mantled her fair face—"you have often implored me to tell you my mournful history, but for your sake I have withheld it till now."

"But, oh, my mother, that very concealment has from my boyhood, been in my heart as the worm that dieth not."

"I know, my son, I know it: but I dared not tell you, nor should I now, but that one whom I must not disobey has charged me to reveal it to you to-day."

"Who is it that has thus charged you, my mother? Is it my unknown father?"

"Oh no, Arthur, it is not he; but one, whom though he is a strange man, I have cause to believe is my friend."

"Why do you speak of my father as the nameless he? why do you never call him husband? Why have you only several times in my life even referred to him at all, by any style of naming. Tell me, mother—at last, oh tell me!"

"I will, my son: but look not thus upon me. I cannot bear your searching eye."

Her son groaned in the anguish of his anticipation, and the mother opened her sad story.

"Arthur, I am the only daughter of a poor clergyman, like yourself. I had two brothers, both officers in the army of king George. Whether they are living or not I cannot say, for I have hid from all my family. My father's name was Arnold Blair."

"Oh, my God, my God!" burst from the son, for this confession told him that his mother still bore her maiden name. A tear stole down the cheek of the forsaken at her son's anguish, but after a moment she continued:

"Being the only daughter, I was the joy of my good father's heart, and in my girlhood consoled him for the loss of my mother. Ah, Arthur, had she not died, I should have perhaps found less cause to mourn for myself and you. When I was at the age of sixteen, he one day came to my father's house. My sire then was a curate in the little town of Westbury, in Wiltshire, and he was very poor. The young man brought to him news of a living which had been conferred upon him by his father, who was immensely rich. It was bestowed upon Arnold Blair because of his learning and eloquence as a minister. My poor father welcomed the young man, and at the rich gift shed upon his hand tears of gratitude. We removed from Westbury to the vicarage of which this young man's father was the lord; and often was that youth there by my side, though your grandfather thought he came in the character of his pupil to finish his education, before traveling on the continent. To be brief, Arthur, we loved, or rather I loved, for your father was at that time very handsome; and too often manly beauty of person rather than of mind win young girls' hearts. He pressed me to a secret marriage, urging with all the sophistry of a lover under such circumstances. I should not have consented, had it not been that his father designed to marry my lover to a lady of rank. The youth vowed that he would brave his sire, that he would forsake all for me, even though his parent should outcast him for it and then with tender pleadings, that I would not cast him away too; he persuaded me to believe that his sire would forgive us, if he found that the wife had come in before the curse was hurled upon his head. As too many of my sex have done before, I consented to become his wife, not dreaming that he meant to betray me. Oh, I fondly believed in his truth—believed that I should possess a loving husband, even though his ambitious father should frown upon us. I justify not my great error, my son, in consenting without our fathers' blessings, but sadly own my terrible fault. We were secretly married—I take my God to witness I so thought. I believed that the Church sanctified our mutual vows by its most holy ceremony. For nearly a year afterwards we met as husband and wife; when we could no longer conceal our secret, moved by my tears, your father told to my sire the story of our love and secret marriage. Arnold Blair in much trouble visited the ambitious sire of the youth, and revealed all. A terrible scene of wrath followed, and my father returned with reproaches and curses heaped on his head by that man of fearful purposes—I mean your other grandfather, but Arnold Blair dreamt not even then that his daughter had been betrayed. Soon however, the blow came in a letter, from the proud, ambitious sire, stating that from his son he had learned that the marriage had been a false one. Wealth was offered to be heaped upon us as a restitution for the great wrong done, but oh, what price could pay for the dishonor. Your maternal grandfather died broken-hearted, but not before he had blessed you, and received from me a promise that you should be brought up to fill his sacred calling in the church. With my own hands I supported you until you were twelve years of age, for I refused all offers of money from him and his ambitious sire. My husband—for to me he was husband, married the titled lady, but the curse of my father's broken heart, and his daughter's blighted life followed the betrayer. He was childless, and childless his titled wife died a year afterwards; and when you were twelve years old, your other grandfather died. I afterwards learned that this man of iron will, who bowed the nobles of the land to his purposes, had often seen you, often had fondled you in his arms, in your childhood; often fondly laid his hands upon your head in your youth—ay, that iron hearted man had even wept over you, for you were his only grandchild."

"Then, mother," observed Arthur, "I remember that proud, stately old man. I both feared and loved him."

"These facts, my son," resumed Ida, the forsaken "I learned from your grandfather's strange confidant. As you will remember, you always met your grandfather at school. Your master was paid well to keep the secret from me. At your grandfather's death, his confidant came and informed me that he had left you five hundred a year for life. At first I refused, as I had done for myself, but when I was told of the old man's love for his only grandchild, I relented, and moreover, I was reproached for being willing to deprive you of your grandfather's legacy. At last I accepted, and with the money you were educated for the ministry, and thus I fulfilled my own father's dying wish. Touching him, I have merely to say, that since we first parted I have not seen his face. My story is told, Arthur, to you to-day because that confidant, who is the executor for you, has charged me to do so, for he has some secret will of your grandfather concerning you, of which I myself knew not till yesterday, nor do I now know. Ha! is that the garden gate, my son? If so, it is he."

"There is a gentleman coming up the garden walk with a lady," observed the young clergyman, looking out at the window.

"No, this is not he, mother. This is Mr. Nathans and his niece."

"Then it is he, Arthur," was the reply. The door was quickly opened by Ida the Forsaken, and Judah and Terese Ben Ammon entered.

"Lady, have you told your son your story," inquired Judah after they were seated.

"Yes, sir, all.'

"No, Lady Ida Blakely, not all! A portion of it I have come to tell!" replied Judah, with his calm abruptness.

"Lady Blakely! Merciful God of the forsaken, what does this mean!"

Ida, overwhelmed by the sudden revelation and the torrent of her emotions, would have fallen from her chair, had not her son caught her in his arms.

"Trifle not with my afflicted mother, sir, but tell us what mean your strange words?" said Arthur imploringly.

"Sir Arthur Blakely—for such you will be, I never trifle," returned Snap, for he comes in fitly in his character as the confidant of General Blakely.

"Oh, Mr. Nathans, is this true? Was that marriage then holy, and no solemn farce. Am I a wife. Was it?—was it no farce?"

"Lady Blakely, I witnessed it; and I never play in farces, though I have sustained my part in tragedies."

Thus answered that fearfully intellectual man.

"Are you sure, Mr. Nathans, that my mother is a wife, and I blessed born."

"Sir Arthur, I am always sure when I assert. I never affirm till I have solved. Science says demonstrate. I am science. I have demonstrated."

"But may you not be mistaken, sir?" inquired poor Arthur, anxiously.

"I say, Sir Arthur, I witnessed your mother's marriage, and that I take no part in farces. There, young man, is your grandfather's will, in which he acknowledges your legitimacy, and which makes you, after your father, heir of all his wealth. There is the certificate of your mother's marriage also in that packet. Take it, and demonstrate for yourself."

The young man took the documents, and read to his mother aloud his grandfather's will, and her marriage certificate.

"Are you satisfied, Lady Blakely?"

"I am more than satisfied!" returned Ida the Forsaken, sobbing. "This, Mr. Nathans, is your work. Oh, you are good!"

"Nay, lady, I am evil. 'I never pray I thank thee, O God, that I am not as other men.' Indeed, I never pray at all. I dive for truth, I soar for truth. I never pray, and therefore am I evil. So was that young man's grandfather, but he could be just as you see when his ambition stood not in his way. Call me not good, lady, for it offends me. I say I am evil, and had Herbert Blakely had a son by his other marriage, you would not have called me good, for your son would have been kept out of his rights by my sanction."

"Uncle Judah," observed Terese, speaking for the first time in the case, "you are always calling yourself by bad names."

"Wherefore should I not, niece?" replied Snap sharply. "Do not men generally call themselves by good names. They lie. Would you have me lie too. I am science and science is truth. Lady Blakely, are you satisfied that my old master, General Blakely, has done you justice at last."

"Indeed I am, Mr. Nathans," the lady replied.

"And now, Sir Arthur, will you do my bidding."

"After this I cannot refuse, but why call me Sir Arthur. Is my father dead?"

"No, but never in England will he be able to again claim rank. Such a circumstance which justifies me in carrying out your grandfather's will, which was designed to be fulfilled at your father's death, or when I should determine, for your grandfather trusted me. You have heard of the case of Sir Walter Templar and Farinelli. Your father is the guilty man."

"Would you have me betray him, sir?" observed Arthur, shocked.

"No, but to help me save him and the lives of two others. Sir Walter is living I am certain. We must find him and prevent Farinelli from being hanged for your father's act. You must go to Italy and become the private secretary of your father, but unknown in your true character. You shall have a recommendation from Lawyer Wortley. He knows all. I say we must find out the truth, or I will hang your father. I have said it. You will report everything to me. If I but find the clue to Walter Templar's existence, the rest will follow. You must obtain for me that clue. Your father then must reside abroad, all shall be made known to him concerning yourself and your grandfather's will, and Sir Richard Courtney will not prosecute your sire. Have you resolved, for I have?"

"Yes, Mr. Nathans, for if Sir Walter be living or Signor Farinelli innocent, my duty as a Christian is with your will in this. On the condition that my father shall be spared, I undertake your mission."

"For your grandfather's sake his son shall be spared. You must start to-morrow, for there is no time to be lost. Lives hang upon despatch. Your mother will reside with my niece at Sir Richard Courtney's until your rights and hers are confirmed."

It was thus arranged, and the next day Lady Ida Blakely was taken by Terese Ben Ammon to Sir Richard Courtney's, and Arthur Blakely started for Rome to fulfill his mission.

CHAPTER LXX.

THE POISONED WINE.

Sir Herbert Blakely had returned to his native land after a supposed absence of five years. He was again in the De Lacy castle; but this time his movements were all unconcealed. Indeed, he seemed to court attention, and his castle was the resort of political magnates, for he had announced his intention of turning his attention to the affairs of his country. A Parliamentary election was at hand, and he was up for the county of Wiltshire. The old part to which his father belonged courted him, for his vast estates in Wiltshire, Hampshire, and Kent made him very influential with the ministry. He had grown more like his father, and politicians expected to see him play a similiar part to that which General Blakely had distinguished himself for; namely, a ruling politician. As he had marked out a public course, he sought society, and sagacious mamma's speculated upon the prospects of Sir Herbert's marrying again. He was only fifty, and still a handsome man, and he encouraged the gossip concerning his prospects of marriage. Indeed, he had really designed to take another wife, for it was a great cross to Sir Herbert that he had no son to succeed him, for he neither knew of the existence of his legitimate son nor that his marriage with Ida Blair was genuine. He himself had been deceived by Snap, who had given him a true priest instead of a false one. This fact, the mentor had communicated to the General, but never to Herbert, and though the General was very much enraged, yet the yearnings of his ambitious heart had reconciled him. So it was arranged between Snap and his old master that young Arthur was to inherit, providing Herbert had no more sons. Snap's act at first, in securing Ida Blair's marriage with Herbert, was less from principle than from his strange intellectual caprice, for doing everything for the best, and then holding the power in his own hands of turning for good or evil just as his will directed. The innocence of Ida, moreover, had gained his sympathy, for he admired that which was unlike himself, and he was subtle, not innocent. Ida, therefore, had found from her very girlhood a protector and friend in Snap, who we have seen now resolved to establish the rights of Lady Blakely and her son.

Arthur was with his father at the De Lacy castle performing the part of private secretary. He was passing under the name of Arthur Manning. The young man had obtained great influence over Sir Herbert who was strangely drawn towards his son without knowing his relations to him. But the father felt that a watchful eye was upon him, yet he often saw such a mournful tenderness in the young man's eye when bent upon him, that he suspected not that he was a spy upon his actions. Yet Arthur performed his part, not in the spirit of a spy, but more in that of a guardian, watching his father to prevent him from doing more evil. He was by this time thoroughly convinced that Snap's suspicions were founded, but he had not yet discovered the clue to Sir Herbert's secret. Orsini, who was at the castle, feared him, for he too had noticed the watchful eye upon himself, in which he saw no tenderness, but a stern justice. There was another that both feared and hated Arthur, and that was George Blakely. Neither of the young men understood their mutual antipathy—for neither knew that kindred blood was in their veins.

Sir Herbert had at length listened to Orsini's counsel to make away with Walter Templar, and poison was the agent chosen. Under the circumstances of his new inventions of a public career, and marriage, Blakely saw that it would be impossible for him to continue to play Walter's jailor any longer, and then as far as his secret was concerned, he too feared the conscientious character of his new secretary.

"Arthur, you may leave us for to-night," said Sir Herbert to the young man. "Please write as I instructed, to the Premier, and say he may count on me. To Lord Bently, write and say that his election for the county, in conjunction with mine is certain. He shall have all my influence. The other letters dictate for me, to suit yourself; but leave no stone unturned to secure my political influence in the country."

"I will, sir, do your bidding. Good night, God be with you, sir."

"Blakely, I like not that saintly scrivener of yours," said Orsini, much dissatisfied.

"Pshaw! count; let the young man be reverent if it pleases him. I think he means his God bless you, sir, which he usually bestows upon me at night, though it is misapplied in my case. I suspect the fellow had a pious mother. Orsini, you and I are villains, and shall be murderers; but when that young man is with me, I always fancy if I might not have been different if my mother had lived."

Orsini replied with a demoniac laugh.

"Ay, laugh Count; you are right, for it is laughable to hear me sermonize, though I have been crammed with moral philosopy from Snap, who being a genuine devil, preaches better theology than one half of our divines. But that young man strangely effects me, Orsini. There is something in him which reminds me of—well that is what I cannot make out, for I have forgotten whose face he wears, and whose tender anxious eyes beam upon me when I catch his glance. Pshaw! what a fool I am to be talking thus. Ha! here is George, and I am myself again."

"Well, cousin Herbert, I have come. So this is to be the last visit to our prisoner—Eh?"

"Yes, George; but why in the Fiend's name do you persist in cousining me before strangers?"

"To remind you, cousin Herbert, that when we put our heads into the hangman's noose to serve our family, our relatives ought not to forget us."

"George, you are a blockhead. You know that neither one of us dare to forget. You know you inherit all, after your father; but then he may live for another thirty years, keeping you out of the estate I gave him. Of course I shall not give up the Blakely inheritance as long as I can hold it, but the estate in question is yours at your father's death, some thirty years hence."

"Not he; father's been ailing lately."

"He must have medical advice, George. But to our business. Take those half-dozen of wine to your prisoner with three day's allowance of bread and water. Nay, take one of the bottles out and replace it with this one. It is for Sir Walter Templar's last feast. You visit him no more. If he drinks, he dies by poison; if not, let him starve."

In a moment more, Orsini and Blakely were alone again.

"So, Blakely, you have set that cousin of yours on his father's track?"

"Curse the fellow, yes. He will poison his father as well as Templar, and then I will take good care of this cousin. Had they been content with a few thousands they might have lived, but their relationship is in my path. And now, Sir Walter Templar, your time is reckoned, for you cannot escape me as Snap did."

George Blakely performed his last office for Walter Templar, who was asleep in his dungeon where he had been now over four months; but the slamming of the great outer gate, as George departed, awoke him, and he started up as from a dream.

"Methought I heard a fearful shriek," he mused, "and then the voice of Alice said assuringly, 'Walter, I am near.' Surely it was her voice again. She also said in my dream, 'Touch not the wine!' What could it mean; I have no wine. Touch not the wine! Merciful Powers! there is the voice again, 'Touch not the wine!' Ha! my lamp is nearly out. I must replenish it with oil."

Walter Templar approached the iron-grated window to take his basket of food and his supply of oil; but he started back aghast as he saw in the basket six bottles of wine.

"It was Alice herself, then," he observed, after his astonishment had subsided. "Yes, it was Alice. She is near. It was her voice that spoke to me."

"It was my voice that spoke to you, dear Walter. I am near!"

"Then God be thanked!" answered Walter fervently, speaking as though to one present.

"I have heard and seen wondrous things in this gloomy dungeon. Can it be that an overwrought mind and this terrible solitude of months—years it seems—conjures up these visions and creates these voices."

"No, dear Walter; I am near; and deliverance is also near!"

"Alice! Alice, my wife, my spirit bride, I believe it. Thou art near to me. Oh, had not this been my faith, I should have died of despair ere this. Darling, I converse with you, though I see you not, excepting in my dreams. Yet, hours together do I talk to you as though you were visible to me. That you are present I feel. But there is a mystic charm in your voice. I know not if you speak from within me or from without, for I seem to hear you in all my being. Oh, what a wondrous mystery this inner life is! How little do we know of that world, that to me here in my sentient solitude seems but as the soul of this, how little of those behind us, who speak to us as from without the veil. Ay, how much may not our very thoughts be of the spirit voices."

"Thoughts of the spirit voices!" was the answer that came.

"I believe it, Alice, even as I know that you are gone only just above me. But I must reflect upon this wine. What do they mean—these villains? They mean to poison me, that I think is clear. But they know not that I have a guardian angel in my dungeon. How many guardian angels may there not be attending mankind in this life, but we are all unconscious of them. Were men put into more dungeons, shut out from the distracting world, they might find more angels in this life. I wonder not the Saints of old found out the other world, for they were often in dungeons and chains. I have ground off my chain by these stones, and had either of those men entered my cell, he would have found a fearful weapon in this mighty iron whip. I may eat of the bread and drink of the water, but touch not the wine. Thus, I understand it. But what has become of Farinelli. Is he hanged? Father of Mercy! that thought daily harrows up my soul. I must not dwell upon that. Yet tell me, Alice, for I know you are listening from behind your curtain; when shall I be delivered?"

"Walter, my husband, I and deliverance are near!"

THE VELOCIPEDE.

I have a lingering love, I own,
For an old doctrine, held by some,
That woman s truest sphere is found
Within the hallowed walls of home;
But when the babe alarmed the house
By rolling headlong down the stair—
"Where's Mrs. Jones?" I cried to Ann
With hands upraised in blank despair.
"She's at the rink," replied the maid,
"A ridin' the velocypade!"

MUSICAL DOINGS.—Since Mr. Waters gave up publishing sheet music, he has devoted his whole capital and attention to the manufacture and sale of Pianos and Melodeons. He has just issued a catalogue of his new instruments, giving a new scale of prices, which shows a marked reduction from former rates, and his Pianos have recently been awarded the First Premium at several Fairs. Many people of the present day, who are attracted, if not confused, with the flaming advertisements of rival piano houses, probably overlook the modest manufacturer like Mr. Waters; but we happen to know that his instruments earned him a good reputation long before Expositions and "honors" connected therewith were ever thought of; indeed, we have one of Mr. Waters' Piano-fortes now in our residence, (where it has stood for years,) of which any manufacturer in the world might be proud. We have always been delighted with it as a sweet-toned and powerful instrument, and there is no doubt of its durability; more than this, some of the best amateur players in the city, and several celebrated pianists, have performed on the said piano, and all pronounce it a superior and first-class Instrument. Stronger indorsement we could not give.—Home Journal.

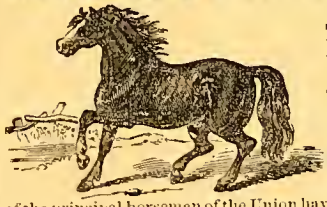
HORSE POWDERS.



These celebrated and renowned powders for horses and cattle have been tested by an intelligent public for sixteen years. Hundreds of the principal horsemen of the Union have pronounced them the only Condition Powders safe to use and work the horse. There is nothing in them to expose the animal, but, on the contrary, everything to improve them. The proprietors of horse railroads, omnibusses, and stage owners in all the principal cities use them; and their combined testimony stamps them one of the wonders of medical science. Letters sufficient to fill a small book are in our possession, testifying to their goodness. Merchants are requested to warrant them, and refund the purchase money should they fail to give satisfaction.

ALLCOCK'S POROUS
STRENGTHENING
PLASTERS.

ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS are the results of studies and experiments of Dr. Schecut, of South Carolina; of Dr. Wm. Wagstaff, now Baron Wagstaff, of Horace H. Day, the distinguished manufacturer of rubber goods; and of Thomas Allcock, Chemist and member of the College of Pharmacy of New York, now General Allcock, etc., etc.

Step by step this commodity has attained its unprecedented fame. They are universally approved. They support, strengthen, and aid the growth of muscles. They appear to have a peculiar effect upon the nerves, allaying irritability, while supplying warmth. They seem to accumulate electricity, and aid the circulation of the blood through the part where applied, by which healthy actions are induced.

Even in paralysis, where articulation was suspended, the use of the Porous Plasters to the spine restored the articulation, and materially reduced the paralysis. In fact, the patient could help herself, while before the Porous plaster was applied she was as helpless as a baby. We refer to Mrs. Sally Elliot, Springfield, Mass.

Dr. Myer, of Savannah, Ga., says they are the best mechanical supporters for weak muscles ever discovered; that by their warming properties they bring power and health, until the strength of the muscles are entirely restored. That he knows a case where Allcock's Plasters cured a gentleman of a weak spine. That he daily prescribes them in his practice with the happiest results, and desires us to refer to him.

Dr. Henderson, of Farnsville, Louisiana, says: "The counter-irritant effect of Allcock's Porous Plasters is produced in such a mild and gradual way, they so invigorate the circulation around the parts to which they are applied, and exert upon all nervous diseases such a great sedative influence, that I place them confidently at the head of every plaster now in use."

Dr. Johnson, of Hartford, says: "My daily experience confirms the very superior excellence of your Porous Plasters. At this moment of writing, a man applies for one, who, by entanglement in a shaft of machinery, had both his legs broken, spine severely injured, and was for nearly a year entirely helpless. This man found relief very soon by the application of a plaster to his spine. He was soon enabled to work, and now he labors as well as ever. He would cheerfully pay five dollars for a single plaster, if they could not be had at a lower rate. Surgeons should make use of these perforated plasters, to the exclusion of all others, as their flexibility and adhesiveness are greatly in advance of all other plasters with which I am acquainted, while the perforations peculiar to them render them greatly superior to all others for ordinary surgical uses. Knowing the plasters to be so useful, I have no scruples that my sentiments should be known.

J. W. JOHNSON, M. D."

Dr. Sterling's testimony: "For two years, I have been a great sufferer from neuralgia in the head, and found only temporary relief from all the various remedies that I have tried, until I applied one of Allcock's Porous Plasters. I cut it into three strips, placing one under each shoulder blade, and the other over the small of the back; and for the past three months, I have had scarcely a twinge of the old pain.

I advise all who suffer from nervous diseases to lose no time in making a trial of the wonderful Porous Plaster.

A. F. STERLING, Sec. Singer Mfg. Co.

New York, June 8, 1868.

MEDICINAL QUALITIES
—OF THE—
POROUS PLASTERS.

The Porous Plasters possess the soothing, warming and sustaining qualities of the combined plasters of the dispensatories. An Electrician, who has great experience of their effects in Local Rheumatism, in Tic Doloreux, and deep-seated nervous and other pains, and in affections of the kidneys, etc., etc., attributes all their sedative, stimulative and pain-relieving effects to their ELECTRIC qualities. He asserts that they restore the healthy electric condition (equilibrium) of the part, and that being restored pain and morbid action cease. He was amazed at the great number of beneficial indications produced by one of these plasters. He affirms that Head-ache is cured by one worn just below the breast-bone; that one placed over the navel will cure hysterics, as well as dysentery, and affections of the bowels.

PATENT
ARION PIANOFORTE

GRANDS AND GRAND SQUARES,

7⅓ OCTAVES.

The "ARION" is the very best Piano for the Great West, because it stands in tune longer than any other Piano. t requires no repairing or regulating; shipping any distance, or dampness does not affect them.

WHY?

It commences where the "First Premium" Makers stop, and upon the most improved Modern scale makes four patented improvements; which make the Arion more simple, yet stronger; increasing its volume and beauty of tone, while rendering the instrument more enduring.

WHAT THEY ARE.

First. The patent Arion Reversed Wooden Agraffe Bridge, which retains all the purity of tone only found in a wooden bridge (the rest whereon the strings lay), and obtains all the solid prolonged strength of tone of the metal Agraffe, without that acute metalic noise which the metal Agraffe develops by use.

Secondly. The Patent Arion Compound Wrest-Plank, which holds the tuning pins, is six thicknesses of hard maple, the grain of each layer runs in a different direction. The advantages are, the 20 tons strain of the strings cannot split our Arion wrest-plank, as frequently happens in other Pianos, and when people say "My Piano won't stand in tune," all other makers must use the single wrest plank with the grain running only one way.

The Arion Tuning-Pins have end wood to hold them on every side, while all other makers can have it only upon two sides of their pins.

Thirdly, The Patent Arion Diagonal Sustaining Bar, extending parellel with the steel strings under the over strung Bass strings. The Arion is the only Piano wherein the enormous strain of the large steel strings is resisted in the natural place and direction. Using this bar renders the weakest part in all other over strung Pianos the

STRONGEST IN THE ARION.

KNOW THE ARION.

The Musical Director of the New York Conservatory of Music, Edward Mollenhauer, says: "The Arion I bought of you is the best Piano I ever played on; that rolling bass and silvery treble, etc."

John H. Woods, Piano Dealer, Oswego, N. Y., says: The tone is truly immense, and surpasses anything in the shape of a Piano we ever saw or heard of, etc."

Horace Greely said: "The Arion is the best Square Piano, superior for its clearness and brilliancy of tone," &c.

Louis Wagner, Fort Leavenworth, says: "My Piano arrived here in splendid order. Its tone fills my parlor with melody—it is the wonder and admiration of all who hear it. Miss ——, who is teaching the Piano desires me to order one for her," &c.

NEW MEDICAL DISCOVERY.

Dr. CADY'S CATARRH REMEDY.

A CERTAIN CURE FOR CATARRH AND ALL Mucous Diseases of the head, nose and throat.

This is a Medicine never before used or known to the public. Dr. Cady, the discoverer, was a sufferer from this terrible disease for twenty years, and after testing all the remedies extant—without relief—in his efforts to obtain a cure he discovered this UNEQUALLED REMEDY, which cured him in the short space of eight weeks.

It has been thoroughly tested, and has not failed in a single instance. Several of the most obstinate cases have been thoroughly cured by this remedy, after every other known medicine had failed. Every one who has tried it will testify to the truth of the above statement.

Every one afflicted with Catarrh should give it a trial and find out for himself whether it is a humbug.

Saratoga A WATER.

The Saratoga "A" Spring Water is probably the most effective mineral water found on either continent. It has ten per cent. greater mineral properties than the celebrated Congress Spring; four times that of Baden Baden of Austria; five times that of Aix La Chapelle in Prussia; twice that of Vichy in France; nearly three times greater than the renowned Seltzer of Germany; and equally over the Spas of Bath, England, and Kissengen in Bavaria.

The reputation of this water is based upon its effects in diseases of the stomach, liver, bowels, kidneys and spleen. It acts with wonderful benefit in cases of chronic dyspepsia, constipation, gravel, gout, Scrofula, cutaneous affections, general lethargy, soreness and prostration of the system.

THE AULD SCOTCH SANGS.

Oh, sing to me the auld Scotch sangs,
I' the braid Scottish tongue,
The sangs my father wished to hear,
The sangs my mither sung,
When she sat beside my cradle,
Or crooned me on her knee,
And I wad na' sleep, she sang sae sweet
The auld Scotch sangs to me.

Sing ony o' the auld Scotch sangs,
The blithesome or the sad,
They mak' me smile when I am wae,
And greet when I am glad.
My heart gaes back to auld Scotland,
The saut tear dims my e'e,
And the Scotch blood leaps in a' my veins
As ye sing the sangs to me.

Sing on, sing mair o' thae auld sangs,
For ilka ane can tell
O' joy or sorrow i' the past,
Where mem'ry lo'es to dwell;
Tho' hair grow gray, and limbs grow auld,
Until the day I dee
I'll bless the Scottish tongue that sings
The auld Scotch sangs to me.

AN INCREDIBLE STORY.

"SHE IS NOT DEAD, BUT SLEEPETH."

CONCLUDED.

The fading sunlight flashed across the dear name of the departed, and Von Wetzlar still gazed intently as if there were something still to come, and for which he waited. Might not the veil of separation be removed but for one moment! And, as if in answer to his thought, there, in the clear light of day, almost at his side, stood the living form of Louise! There she stood, with one finger raised to her forehead as if she were trying to solve some hard riddle—stood thus for one moment, and then fled as from a haunted corridor.

As for Von Wetzlar, astonished at this heaven-sent vision, as it seemed to him, and overwhelmed with the ecstasy of that glorious moment, he sank to his knees and buried his face in his hands. When he left the cemetery a few minutes later his face beamed with the smile of assured hope.

The next day he sailed for Europe; and on the very evening of his departure, Doctor Gurdon gave his own name to the nameless woman who had fallen so strangely in his way.

V.—THE END.

Doctor Gurdon had rightly conjectured that Pierre Martin knew his wife's past history. But he had not met Martin since that memorable night at Spaulding's, though he had sought him diligently. Yet the object of his search had all the while been hovering closely about, and had kept himself well informed as to the movements both of the Doctor and of his patient. It was only now that his time had come—now, when the developments over which he had kept watch had been fully matured, and the marriage had taken place.

Martin's original scheme, conceived on that evening when he had employed the sailors to assist him in carrying out his design, had contemplated nothing beyond the satisfaction of his malice toward Von Wetzlar and his wife. He was startled—actually confounded at first—by the result of that night's work; and after his astonishment had somewhat subsided he was led by curiosity to see what would follow. We can easily imagine his surprise at the ensuing events, and especially at the marriage. Why had not Louise fled? Her movements appeared to be free from restraint. Why had she not returned to her proper husband? Was she capable of actual guilt? As a spy, watching from a distance, he could not answer these questions.

Martin's plans were soon formed. Doctor Gurdon was rich, while he, poor devil, as he called himself, was in need of money. By working upon the Doctor's fears he might put money in his purse. And as to Louise herself—but she was an impenetrable mystery! A few weeks after the wedding Martin appeared at the Doctor's house to pay his respects to the bride and bridegroom. To his astonishment (was there no end of wonders) she did not know him. She seemed to him more beautiful and fascinating than ever in the old time. She was the same, yet not the same. Her dress, her air, her whole expression had changed. It was the old flower with a new and different fragrance. While he stood entranced with wonder he was aroused by the touch of the Doctor's hand upon his shoulder, followed by the request for a private interview in the library. He readily acceded, and a few words from the Doctor explained the situation.

"You know, Martin," enquired the Doctor anxiously—"you know who this woman was?"

"Yes. I know something, not much; but the disclosure of that little is a serious affair for me."

"It may be serious for me too. And meagre as your information may be, it is invaluable to me. I would give thousands to know all, even the worst."

"Oh, it is not so very bad, Doctor. You see, she had been the inmate of an insane asylum for a number of years, took the fever, died apparently, and was buried. You know the rest."

"This invention of Martin's lulled the Doctor's fears, and his gratitude for relief made him generous. So that this brief interview satisfied Martin's cupidity as well as his curiosity, and he left the house with a valuable check in his portemonnaie, one that would go a great way, spendthrift though he was.

But he could not keep away from the larger prize. If the Doctor could win Louise, why need he despair? Had he not rescued her from the grave? Did she not belong to him? Then, he remembered, she had not shown toward him any of that repugnance which she had formely exibited. In a short time they even became friends, and the Doctor was compelled to suffer this for fear of offending one whom, in his heart, he despised. Evidently, whatever Louise had gained in her new life, she had lost those spiritual intuitions which had guided and guarded her first estate.

As Martin's power over Louise increased, so also did his hold upon her husband. He professed to be making a more careful investigation as to Louise's antecedents. Little by little the truth came out—that she had been Heinrich Von Wetzlar's wife At first the Doctor would not believe it. But one day Martin took him to the French cemetery, and showed him the empty tomb. That was done in order to obtain more money; but this time the attempt was vain. The Doctor, amazed and bewildered, hurried home. For hours he paced the floor of his library in a frenzy of agony. He loved Louise as his own soul. He could not give her up; and surely it could not conduce to her happiness to be restored to a life as alien to her as if it had never been hers. He went out into the open air. The sound of voices in the arbor, as he walked down the garden walk, attracted his attention. As he approached, unseen, he recognized the voices; they were Martin's and Louise's. He listened. It was evidently a leave taking. Were these lovers? He peered through the thick leaves of the vine-clusters, and saw Martin standing by the side of Louise with his arm about her waist, and heard him ask, as he looked pleadingly down upon her innocent, upturned face—

"Shall it be to-morrow, dearest?"

In a moment, Doctor Gurdon stood within the arbor. Before those cool, searching gray eyes Martin winced, released his hold upon Louise, and slunk away without one word.

And she—she simply cast upon the recreant one look of scorn and infinite loathing. The serpent, that, one moment ago, had seemed so bold and beautiful with its shining crest, had resumed its natural habit, and was revealed as a creeping thing. Apollo had turned a coward! and she hated him. Turning to the Doctor, she fell powerless into his arms.

And as he sat there holding her to his bosom, he knew for the first time how deeply and tenderly he loved her. And he did her justice. For he knew her as he had not known her before. She had been simply a child in allt his—free but guiltless. This second life which she had lived, before him and with him, was as pure and holy as that of childhood, but also as undisciplined. It was a life in which all that was beautiful and strong called forth a frank and fearless response but in which experience had furnished no principles for guidance and no test against disguised villainy. His own influence over her, and all the circumstances with which he had surrounded her, had tended to the development of such a life, and with just that one woeful deficiency.

While he thought thus, she lay prostrate and nerveless in his arms. Gradually she began to realize her husband's presence. Then her apathy gave way to convulsive sobbing.

"Oh! take me away, Eugene; take me anywhere; I cannot stay here!" she cried.

"Yes, darling, I will take you away," he said, kindly. "Do not be troubled. It was only a dream. It is all over now." And he carried her to her own room, where he left her in the care of his faithful old housekeeper.

Yes, he must go away—away from Martin, away from that cenotaph in the cemetery, the tablet upon which was photographed in his memory forever. It was now more than a year since his marriage, and a little daughter had been born to him; and here was another reason for flight.

In a few days Doctor Gurdon had secretly disposed of his estate; and one evening, with his wife and her infant daughter, accompanied by the housekeeper, now little Gertrude's nurse, he embarked for the North on a Mississippi steamer.

Two evenings latter, as he was sitting near the guard enjoying his cigar and congratulating himself upon his happy escape from the troubles which had lately beset him, he looked around, and at his side stood Pierre Martin! They were alone. Foiled in his last hope and driven to despair, the Doctor siezed his tormentor around the waist and tried to throw him overboard. A struggle followed, which resulted fatally for both of the combatants. They went overboard, each grappling the other in a death-struggle. A deafening shriek was heard from Louise's state-room, from the window of which she had witnessed the fatal termination of the conflict. She was found on the floor of her room apparently lifeless.

Every effort was made to recover Martin and Gurdon, but in vain. Both had evidently been drowned.

For hours Louise remained in a trance-like swoon. When she awoke she did not recognize either her child or its nurse. She did not understand where she was, but murmured, "Heinrich—oh, Heinrich! where are you?" She was evidently Louise von Wetzlar again, in her thoughts was back in Magnolia Cottage. "I have been ill," she murmured. "Who are you? and where is Heinrich?" Gradually the old nurse communicated to her the events of the past two years, so far as she knew them, but Louise comprehended not one word. There was some dreadful mistake; she knew nothing of Doctor Gurdon, of indeed, or anything that was told her Only yesterday, as it seemed to her, she was nursing the sick in New Orleans. It was not long before she could believe in a life of which her consciousness gave no testimony. She finally found in Doctor Gurdon's trunk a statement which he had prepared, based upon Martin's story and his own investigations, She learned from this that Von Wetzlar had sold Magnolia Cottage—her parents having fallen victims to the yellow fever shortly after her own supposed death—and that he had gone to Europe. Him she determined to find if the search consumed all that remained of her life. For her child's (Gertrude's) sake she retained Doctor Gurdon's property, which was already in her possession, he having converted it all into ready money before his flight; she also kept the old housekeeper as nurse for Gertrude.

We need not follow in detail her search for her husband which was continued during several years. She went to Vienna, to Rome, and almost over the entire Continent; to the East, to England; and at last when she had quite given up in despair, she one day found him almost by accident—or rather it should be said that little Annette von Wetzlar found her mother. This child had now grown into a girl of twelve years, and was staying with her father in the English Quarter of Frankfort-on-the-Main. One evening at sunset her attention was attracted by a bright little girl of about six years of age who was walking by with her old nurse, whom she was teasing by the sauciest gambols. Annette ran up to her and gave her some flowers, receiving a kiss in return, and an invitation to call and see her at her own home. Annette visited her the next day and the little girl found a step-sister. She also found her own mother. They recognized each other at the first, and Annette took her mother home with her. She spoke to her father at first, that he might not be entirely unprepared.

"Oh, papa," she cried, as she entered his studio; "I have found mamma, and she is here."

He dropped his pencil and rose to his feet, and there she was before him—his lost Louise. He had no time for astonishment, for her arms were in a moment clinging about his neck, and they were laughing and crying all in a breath.

The two step-sisters, Gertrude and Annette, still live together at Frankfort. Louise is dead; but Von Wetzlar still lives, and is preparing a grand philosophical treatise on the Individual Human Consciousness, in which, as may be easily imagined, he considers that element of life to have been very much overestimated in its importance—at least in its connection with the vaster cycles of existence.

ENCOUNTER WITH GORILLAS.

FROM A COLONEL'S NOTE-BOOK.

During my sporting travels in Africa, attended by three native "guides," we on one occasion got upon the track of two female elephants, and captured them both; and the capture came very near costing us dearly. We had killed one of them without much trouble, and had fired half a dozen balls into the second one, when she charged upon us most unexpectedly, overturning my guides, and trampling down the horses which they rode; but, by a seeming miracle, no one was injured. It was the elephant's last paroxysm; and, in less than five minutes from that time, she pitched forward upon her knees, striking her head upon the earth, and breaking one of her tusks off close up to the jaw. It so happened that the tusk was not a very valuable one; and, moreover, the break did not injure it to the amount of more than half a dozen pounds of ivory.

On the following morning we marched on to the northward. The guides said that two days, or three at the farthest, would bring us to the best hunting country in the world; and I think they were not far from right. At all events, on the fourth afternoon, we pitched our camp in one of the most beautiful forest vales I ever saw. On the east and south, the trees were of huge proportions, stretching their dark foliage away over hill and dale, and giving shade to many a level plain; while to the northward and westward, a chain of mountains lifted their craggy summits far up against the sky. Buffaloes, and zebras, and antelopes, of various kinds, roamed through the deep solitudes, and the spoor of elephants was to be found on every hand. One of the guides brought down a fat buffalo, while the rest of us were placing the wagons, and he soon gave us some of the best steak for supper that I ever eat.

The next morning, just as the sun was breaking in upon the cool mists that hung over the forest, a guide came to me with the information that a herd of elephants were making away from a fountain not half a mile off. Without stopping for breakfast, further than to eat a bit of cold bread and meat, we took the saddle and set forth. We found the elephants, and, for two or three hours, we had a merry time of it. We killed two very fair bulls, and seriously wounded two more. Towards the close of the day, the chief guide and I found ourselves separated from our companions, and we were just thinking of hunting them up, when a colossal old bull elephant broke cover close by us. He was one of those we had wounded in the early part of the day, and he was tearing away like mad. As soon as we saw him, we gave chase, loading and firing upon the fly. The old fellow did not once turn upon us, but sped away in a panic of terror, and, in about two hours, we brought him down.

It was now fairly dark, and we resolved to make our beds where we were, sheltering ourselves under the lee of the dead elephant. Somewhere about midnight, the chief guide woke me up, and informed me that some of our companions were hunting for us. He said he had seen one of them walking across the path to our right. We both got up, and went in that direction, but could find nothing of any of our folks. We had gone back, and I was just sinking into a doze again, when a footstep, close by my head, aroused me, and, upon starting to a sitting posture, I plainly saw what I took to be a man walking towards the woods. I spoke to him—I called a second time—and he quickened his step, and soon disappeared. The guide had been up and seen the disappearing object, and he agreed with me that it could not be any of our people.

"It must be," said he, "some native that belongs to this district. If there is a party of them here, we'll hunt them up in the morning."

The thought that there might be a party of savages near unto us disturbed my rest somewhat for the remainder of the night; and, so soon as the first dawn of the day broke the gloom of the forest, I was upon my feet. The guide was very soon by my side; and, having taken a careful survey of the ground around us and found all right, we sat down and eat up the last of our bread and meat; and, when the meal had been disposed of, we shouldered our double-barreled rifles and struck off into the woods in the direction which had been taken by the disappearing person of the previous night. Within a hundred yards of the place where our elephant lay, we found a rivulet of pure water, which went murmuring musically along over a bed of dark red sand. We bathed our heads and faces in the limpid stream, and then sat down upon the grassy bank to rest. The guide was telling me a long story, when we were startled by a sharp loud cry close at hand. It was a cry different from any I had ever before heard, and so strangely terrific, that I leaped to my feet as though a thunderbolt had burst upon me. An exclamation of terror from the guide, and a wave of his hand, indicated to me the direction of the author of the cry we had heard; and upon looking that way, I beheld a scene that quickened the pulsation of my heart most emphatically.

Not more than twenty yards from us, upon the opposite side of the stream, stood two monster anthropoids. I quickly determined they were a male and a female. The guide, as he started back for his rifle, called them chimpanzees; but I knew better than that. The male, as he stood was at least six feet high, and no chimpanzee ever approached that statrue. And, morover, this animal possessed a muscular development the most powerful I had ever conceived of. The head was broad and low, the brain-cavity being almost entirely behind the face, instead of above it, as it is in man; the ears were small, the nose broad and flat, with wide nostrils; the mouth exceedingly large with thin, hard lips; the chin small and receeding; with the muzzle very prominent. The whole face was wrinkled and black, and its expression the most repulsive and forbidding that can be conceived of. The chest was massive and capacious; the shoulders broad and heavy; the stomach very prominent; and the limbs a solid mass of bone, muscle and sinew. The arms were not so long as those of the orang, but longer than those of the chimpanzee. The body was mostly covered with short, coarse hair, of a dirty, blackish grey color; the female being almost black.

"It is not a chimpanzee," I said, as I moved back to the tree where my rifle stood. "There is but one family in the world to which these monsters can belong. I have, until now, doubted the existence of that colossal anthropoid tribe; but I can doubt it no longer. They must be gorillas!"

"By heavens!" cried the guide, grasping his rifle and bringing it up ready for use, "you are right, Colonel."

I knew I was right. The animals before us were surely gorillas, and more terrible-looking monsters I never saw. When the male found that he had attracted our attention, he gave utterance to a deep, gutteral cry; then he beat his broad breast tremendously with both his hands; and directly his cry arose in volume until it became a roar that made the very forest quake. I trembled—I could not help it; and I saw that the guide trembled too. The female sat down, supporting herself upon her hands and haunches, in such a position that she could leap at an instant's notice; while the male remained standing erect, continuing to roar and beat his breast.

The guide asked me if we should fire. I did not know what to answer. I knew that if we fired, and missed our mark, we were dead men. If we did not fire the gorillas might leave us. And yet I wanted the skeleton and skin of the remarkable brute. However our deliberations were very quickly and summarily brought to an end. The male suddenly gave a terrific cry—a cry like the concentrated war-whoop of a thousand savages—and made a bound towards us. The sense of mortal danger gave the tone of steel to my nerves and my rifle came to my shoulder quickly and firmly. We both fired together but the gorilla was not killed. He leaped the narrow stream with a yell more terrific than the first, and in an instant more he grasped the guide's rifle, and bent the steel barrels as though they had been of the softest lead. This moment was our last if my second barrel failed me. The gorilla had thrown down the bended rifle, and another demoniac yell was upon his lips, when I brought the muzzle of my piece close to his head and pulled the second trigger. There was a momentary faintness over my heart, and great drops of perspiration started out upon my brow, as the thought of failure flashed across my mind. But my rifle answered faithfully the touch of my finger, and the gorilla tumbled over with a bullet through his head.

The guide lay upon the ground, where he had fallen in the attempt to escape from the monster, and I saw he was for the present powerless to help me. What should I do if the female gorilla attacked us? Both barrels of my rifle were empty, and my pistols would be but poor things against such an enemy. But, most fortunately, her grim ladyship did not offer to avenge the death of her lord. I think the reports of our rifles with the flash and smoke frightened her; at all events, she uttered a succession of sharp yelping cries and made off into the forest, using her hands to assist in locomotion, and leaping forward between them with a swinging motion.

My first care, after the departure of the female gorilla, was to reload my rifle; and after this I attended to the guide. I found him weak and faint; but a few swallows of brandy soon revived him, and in a few minutes his pulses were restored to their healthy beat. Let it not be thought from this that my faithful guide was faint-hearted. If some brave man wishes to experience what the faintness of utter terror is, let him find himself disarmed, before a wounded, maddened, full-grown male gorilla. If he does not in that moment feel what it is to be striken with mortal terror, then I should most unhesitatingly decide that he had no nerves and no heart.

When we came to examine the frame of the dead monster we found it more wondrously developed in muscle and sinew than we had at first thought. The arm of the most powerful man I ever saw would have been as the arm of a nursing infant in comparison with the arm of that gorilla. There was no appearance of any wrist, the tendinous muscles continuing their knotty swellings to the ball of the thumb. The jaws were like a vice in their power, and I have no doubt of the truth of the statement that the gorilla can crush the barrel of an ordinary musket between his teeth; and from the manner in which the present monster bent up the double-barrel of the guide's rifle, I can easily believe that a tree even four inches in diameter could have been readily broken by him.

By some of the natives of Western Africa, where the animal is mostly found, the gorilla is regarded with superstitious dread. They believe the horrible body to be inhabited by the spirit of some wicked man, which is thus cursed by heaven on account of bad deeds done while in the human form. Such natives believe that the killing of a gorilla amounts to nothing in the way of exterminating the monsters, as the accursed spirit will quickly find another body of like character. And, furthermore, they think that these gorillas which have been once slain are those which do the most mischief against man. Others have a different belief; and when a gorilla is slain they make a great jubilee over the event; and some of the bones of the dead monster, particularly the skull, are used as charms.

THINGS UNACCOUNTABLE.

CLAIRVOYANTS, ORACLES, VISIONS AND SEERS.

BY MRS. L. M. CHILD.

(From the N. Y. Independent.)

CONCLUDED.

A well known family in Boston, whose names would at once command belief of anything they might say, often speak to their friends of the clairvoyant condition of their daughter during the last weeks of her life, when they were with her in Italy. She was much wasted by illness: and her nervous system being in a highly sensitive state, she often saw things which others did not see, and heard music which others did not hear. One evening she was thus present at her grandfather's house in Boston. She described the individuals of a party assembled there, even to the details of their dress and proceedings, not unfrequently expressing surprise that they appeared to take no notice of her. Subsequent inquiries proved that her description was true in the minutest particulars

The stories of second sight which are peculiarly numerous in Scotland and other mountanous regions, doubtless owe their origin to the transient possession of clairvoyant power. A Virginia newspaper, called Southern Opinion, recounts an instance of second sight, by the family of the late Mr. Pollard, its former editor. A Mrs. Pollard—I know not whether mother or aunt of the deceased editor—was walking in her garden very early in the morning, according to her usual custom. Suddenly an unaccountable and oppressive feeling of sadness came over her; and immediately afterward she saw her son John stretched upon the grass, with blood oozing from his neck and his face expressive of great physical pain. As her son was in Texas, and she in Virginia, she felt that it was a prophetic vision, and fainted. The next letters that came from Texas brought tidings that he had been killed that morning in a duel.

Miss Hosmer, the sculptor, who has sound health and strong nerves, told me, a few years ago, that something had happened in her own experience which she supposed must be what people called second sight. A girl named Rosa, who had been her dressing-maid in Rome was obliged to return to her mother, on account of increasing debility, indicating consumption. One morning Miss Hosmer called upon her in the course of her ride, and found her better. She returned to her studio, worked as usual, and retired perfectly well and in a tranquil state of mind. But, instead of enjoying her customary uninterrupted sleep till day-break, she awoke before daylight, with an entirely new and uncomfortable feeling that some one was in the room. She reasoned with herself that some bad dream had vanished from her memory and left its bad effects behind. But she could not compose herself to sleep again, and resolved to rise; thinking, however, that she would wait for the clock to strike in the room below. It was not very long before its loud tones rang in her ear, as she counted to herself one, two, three, four, five. She rose up to leave the bed, when Rosa's smiling face looked in upon her from behind the curtain. It was so real that she had no other thought than that of her bodily presence, and exclaimed "Why Rosa, how did you get here, weak as you are?" when she stepped out upon the floor, there was no Rosa there. Feeling perfectly sure that she was wide awake, when she saw the face, she remembered the stories of second sight, and immediately after breakfast sent a boy to inquire how Rosa did. He brought back word that she had died at five o'clock that morning.

An intimate friend of mine, whose name I am not authorized to mention, has repeatedly told me that, while sewing in the day time, in the midst of her family circle, she distinctly saw a relative who had been for some months pining away in consumption. She pointed him out, and was surprised that the others could not see him as distinctly as she did. The watch was consulted, and a messenger sent to his house who learned that he had died at the moment she saw him.

Similiar stories have come to us from all the ages, and are still told as occurring in all countries. The likeness they bear to each other indicates a common basis in some law of our mysterious being which is not yet understood.

The phenomena probably gave rise to the belief that there is a spiritual body; a belief which dates back to very remote ages of the world. Hindoo sacred books of extreme antiquity teach that every human being has an interior body, endowed with senses more subtile and pervasive than those of the external body. The philsophers of ancient Greece described man's spiritual body as having "all the senses in every part of it"—as being "all eye, all ear, all taste." They supposed it remained with the soul after the material body was dead, and they called it the ghost or shade. One of the New Platonists says: "In the world above we shall have no need of divided organs which we had in the mortal body: for the spiritual body has all the senses united in every part of it." This reminds one of clairvoyants reading sealed letters placed on the top of their heads, or the pit of the stomach. We are told "God made man after his own image;" and do not these phenomena give some hint—faint, indeed, but still a hint—of how the Infinite Being is omnipresent?

The Greeks chose a butterfly for their symbol of immortality—and it is the best type of resurrection which nature affords; for it not only rises out of the dead grub with new beauties and powers, but it has actually lain enfolded within it through the whole of its crawling existence. The caterpillar knows not that he carries within him a more glorious body, which will live on flowers he never tasted, and fly in an aerial element to which he was a stranger. If he could have temporary states, in which he could sail through the air like a butterfly, he would be a clairvoyant caterpillar. And we who witness this beautiful transformation, can we help reading in it a lesson concerning the spiritual body? "It is sown in dishonor, it is raised in glory; it is sown in weakness, it is raised in power."

RESULT OF A FOWL IMAGINATION.

The following awful "goaks" have been perpetrated by Jingo. Strange to say, after he had made them he was seen walking about, as though nothing had happened. He is still loose.—[Ed.

Why is raising chickens an expensive business?
Because they are continually presenting their bills.

[written in prison, 1838.]

Ignorance, bigotry and superstition are frequently in the way of the prosperity of this church; and are like the torrent of rain rushing down from the mountains, which floods the clear stream with mire and dirt; but when the storm is over and the rain has ceased, the mire and dirt are washed away, and the stream again is pure and clear as the fountain. So shall the church appear when ignorance, superstition and bigotry are washed away!

NOTICE TO OUR PATRONS.

As, owing to certain Church requirements lately made on us, some of our subscribers may fear the suspension of the Utah Magazine, we beg to inform them that, under any circumstances, we intend to see that our issue does not stop for a single number. We have obligations to our subscribers which we intend to fulfill. They may rely on our continuing the publication of the Magazine in the same energetic spirit as heretofore, until it is in every way a perfect success.

WOMAN AND PLURAL MARRIAGE.

No. 3.

As we have shown in our former chapters, polygamy, so far as producing divine results is concerned, is entirely dependent upon the spirit and conditions in which it is practised. It is absurd to talk of polygamy as being calculated to bless, simply because it is a command of God. Polygamy, as enunciated by Divine Beings, is calculated for its success entirely on the fact that higher laws, appealing to the highest instincts of our being, will produce higher results in exact proportion to the extent to which they are obeyed.

While this is true concerning plural marriage in this life, it will be seen that the scheme necessarily looks to a future life for its most perfect results, because it will take immortality to produce perfect men and women. There are certain conditions of the next life which are absolutely essential for its perfect working. It will be asked, why, then, is it commenced in this life, where so much imperfection attends our natures? If polygamy is true, why could it not be postponed altogether to that higher state where our faculties will be so much better attuned to love and concord? The answer is—That with the light the Heavens can impart and the improvement possible to us in this state, it can be made to produce comparatively blessed result seven here. So high and holy are the principles that properly belong to this order of marriage, that when practised in their fullness, they lead of necessity to heavenly marriages;—while heavenly marriages will produce heavenly children, and lay the foundation for the elevation of our race. There is another reason why such unions should be entered upon in this life. It is amidst sorrow and death that we best learn the worth of each other's spirits and lay the deepest and surest foundation for eternal affection. It is also here where the great lessons, growing out of paternal love, can be best learned together. It is on these points, if on no others—notwithstanding the difficulties attending polygamy in this life, as compared with the conditions of a future state—that we see the wisdom of the provision that all those ultimately designed for each other should, where possible, enter the institution of polygamy even amidst the darkness of our mortal career. There is more than this to it, however, for the discipline and conditions which attend it bring a greater development and greater fitness for the highest states of the next life than can be gained in any other way.

And this brings us to what we understand to be a grand foundation of plural marriage, and with reference to which, it will be clear that it directly planned; and that is, that every marriage union be Heaven-directed and based upon perfect congeniality of spirit. By "Heaven-directed," we mean that there be no mechanical marrying, because of principle on the one hand, nor marrying because of passion on the other, but that the inspiration, light, and providences of the "Upper World" be earnestly sought, and its assurances firmly given in the soul, that the marriage in question is one of their planning, and based upon all those mutual qualities of spirit calculated in their very nature to bring the individuals closer together as eternal ages roll. It is useless to suppose that any good man will suit any good woman, or that by some magical power of Deity, at some future period, qualities unallied in their natures can be welded in sweet fellowship forever. Goodness is a very essential point indeed; but far from being all that is necessary to be studied in our marriage relations, and God works in harmony only with Nature's laws, and could not—if He would—make that blend which is by force of Nature dissimiliar. There is a certain distinct speciality of qualities, loves and tastes, needed by every spirit in the character of its soul—companion or companions, arising out of unalterable qualities from being, without which there can never be perfect oneness—such oneness as thrills the soul with joy, and yields it its fullest gratification. Where such perfect unions do not exist to-day, it is, of course, our business to observe our marriage vows and leave it to a Father's hand to right such matters in His own due time; but this makes it no less a fact—speaking with reference to eternal unions—that only those should come together whom the Master of life has fitted for each other, and decreed. Upon the observance of these points, plural marriage—more than any other kind—most particularly depends for its harmony and pleasure, because it alone lays the foundation for perfect confidence and love between such women as are united to the same man. If a man marries a woman who is thus in perfect harmony with himself, and then marries another, equally allied to his nature, necessarily those two must be as much in harmony with each other, as with him—and the electric circle of love is uninterrupted and complete. And so will it be in all future additions. We "need no ghost to come from the grave"—we need no special Revelation to affirm that, in families formed on such a basis as this, there will be sources of love and pleasure furnished to women, which no one-wife family can know anything about;—and that, unless in this or some other state our unions are arranged in harmony with these great truths, the divine object of polygamy never can be gained.

Supposing this broad foundation laid for love and union, there are other points to be studied before plural marriage can realize its object. "Thousands of men are not sufficiently advanced in the spirit of love, to enter happily into the practice of it; and it is the same with many women. Mere intellect is not enough, there must be growth of heart or a development of that heavenly nature which delights in the blessing of others. In stages of selfishness and narrow-mindedness, plural marriage can never be anything but a cross and a burden to women. But as they put on a portion of the divine nature, they will overcome this difficulty, for—strange as it may seem—under the influence of the heavenly spirit, they will find as much pleasure in another woman's happiness as in their own. This fact of our nature has been neglected, both in and out of polygamy, by men and women to-day, who have experienced that rich fullness of pleasure which fills the bosom from living in the spirit of self-abnegation and living for others. To the extent that any of us have entered upon this phase of our being, it has been accompanied by such a witness of the greater holiness, fullness, and growth of soul to which it is carrying us that self-pleasures are littleness, darkness, and "dross and dung" compared with it. Now plural marriage is predicated on the fact that all women are destined to pass into this condition sooner or later and find their most exalted pleasures therein. Their natures are full of this quality only awaiting development. But no growth in angelic nature alone could reconcile them to giving up a portion of their husbands' affections or satisfy them with having less than their whole yearnings for love gratified; the more angelic the less capable would they be of anything of the kind, and must have it or find no joy in life. Then intellect has to be appealed to, and they have to learn enough of man's true nature to be assured that they give up nothing, and until they realize this fact, they never will be fairly satisfied, nor have they any right to be.

We, therefore, do not believe in saying to women that,because plural marriage is true, gracious or ingracious, it is for them to believe and accept. There is no such proposition in our faith on that subject. If plural marriage is true,it is not because of any arbitrary command of God, but because when its conditions are fulfilled,it is capable of making both men and women happier than they can be out of it. If it will not do this,it is false and will perish and pass away, and the quicker the better. If it stands, it will be because it is demanded for the happiness of mankind, and it can exist on no other principle. Nothing that is against the fullest happiness of men and women can stand forever. The myriads of intelligences filling the universe in their onward march to life, liberty and joy, will consign to oblivion all usages not in harmony with their true natures. Nothing stands eternally but that which universal intelligences, in their unfolded condition, desire to have stand, for God is in humanity declaring His own will, and upon this point plural marriage will stand or fall. Not that this point can be fully tested by men or women in any condition of their experience. It may be adapted for the development and happiness of more advanced men and women, while it is not for them at the present time. Children in years cannot judge whether married life is an ordinance of Nature, notwithstanding a preparation for marriage exists in every child even in its mother's lap; so manhood's children cannot judge of the affinity of their nature with the highest form of plural marriage, although a preparation for it is latent within them, as yet it has uttered no voice. If women, therefore, do not realize this point—and we do not perceive how many of them can in their present condition—it is simply because they have not grown up to it; they do not require commands but information and culture. It does not matter to a woman how many Deities, Thrones and Powers, visible or invisible, have declared such a doctrine to be true, she will disbelieve it in her heart until she realizes the justice of it to her own nature and its harmony with the instincts implanted within her by God. What women need, is to learn the facts concerning the love-nature of man and the principle by which their influence over their husbands' affections,is regulated. When they understand these truths, grow up to them, and inwardly sense their reality as well as learn them theoretically, their jealousy will die, having no ground for life.

It must not be inferred from anything that we have said in our former articles that the necessity for polygamy rests on the fact that man increases beyond his wife in capacity of soul, or that he will so grow as to need a higher class of companionship than that of the earlier object of his love, and will therefore need to take other wives to supply the backwardness of the first. This idea is utterly opposed to the true spirit of plural marriage. In all true matings,the wife—when true to herself—will infallably march up the ladder of life shoulder to shoulder with her husband, growing with his growth and increasing with all the increase of his nature. He cannot "increase in heart and brain" beyond her in point of capacity of soul, neither can he grow "beyond" the power and influence of her love. He can increase "beyond" her in one sense alone, and that is,—he can increase in a power to love and care for other objects "beyond" or in addition to herself. Women may rest their souls in full assurance of the fact that all the hold which their virtues or wifely qualities have upon their husbands' nature can never be interfered with by another woman. The justice of plural marriage depends essentially on this fact, that if any other woman is loved, she must create a new fount of affection for herself. All the love she can have is that which she brings into existence, and which no one would have if she did not. This is an eternal truth, and no man could make it otherwise even if he would.

As to growth of nature, richness of soul, and power of approaching intellectually and spiritually to the Divine nature in all its perfections, men and women are equally illimitable. They differ but in their tendencies. Man is endowed with polygamic qualities and woman with monogamic ones. This is no question of equality in intelligence or excellence, it turns on uncreated qualities of man's being that enables him to be perfectly one with more than one woman. Woman is not so endowed. She can love many men in degree, but she can be truly one with one only. There is no more reason why this should be so than there is why the diamond is not a pearl or the pearl a diamond. They are simply different properties of nature specially belonging to the different elements of which men and women are composed and which have to be accepted as they are.

WHAT THE AMERICAN PRESS SAY OF US.

The new series of the UTAH MAGAZINE is already attracting the attention of the most respectable publishers of America. Harper Brothers among the rest have personally paid their respects to the Magazine, and now the American Phrenological Journal, which is the most select and conscientious monthly published on this continent, has given to our specimen of Mormon literature a flattering notice with a clear intimation that the Editor's estimate of it is higher than the public, as yet, are prepared to accept. It has been, and will ever be, our ambition to help create a literature for Zion not unworthy of the age. Our esteemed friend S. R. Wells, in his famous Journal, gives the following:

THE UTAH MAGAZINE.

This is the most creditable piece of serial printing yet produced by the Salt Lake Saints. Its typography, paper, and press-work are every way worthy its high pretensions. But what of its literary merits? Here is a table of contents of a single number:

Memory dear, (poetry); Janet's Experience, (complete story) A Bunch of Daisies; The Streamlet (poetry by T. H. Dee); Necessity of an Intelligible View of a Future Life; A Utah Woman's Thoughts; Utility of Opposition; Charles Martel and the World's Crisis; Perpetual Motion, by Jingo; How the World has Grown, by Eli B. Kelsey; Singing Priests of Ancient Israel; To our St. George Friends; Oh, Snatched away in Beauty's Bloom, (poetry); Terese, by E. W. Tullidge; It's the Early Bird that Catches the Worm, (poetry); Who Should Fret and Pine in Sorrow? (Music).

So far we have seen nothing of polygamy, nothing, indeed, to shock the sensibilities of the most orthodox. But in the eyes of some, the fact that it is a Mormon magazine will be enough to condemn it. Still everybody will want to see it. "Let in the light." If Mormonism can't stand the best Literature, the best science, the best art, and the best religion, it must give way to a better. We say, and they say, "Let in the light."

PROGRESS OF ELECTRICITY.

CONTINUED.

Lightning appears either in the form of sharp and vivid streaks of white, purple, or blue, called by Arago the zigzag; in sheets or floods of red, white, or violet light, the sheet-lightning; or in brilliant globes of fire called ball-lightning. The first kind shoots with incredible rapidity from the thunder-cloud to strike some object upon the earth; and sometimes the end of the fiery tongue is seen to divide into two or three forks before it reaches its aim. The terrible force of the electric discharge has been felt in every age. The sharp line of light, with almost instantaneous swiftness, destroys life, breaks rocks and walls of stone in pieces, fuses metals, penetrates the earth with deep cavities, and seems to yield to no human power except the scientific ingenuity of Franklin's rod. Sheet-lightning, on the contrary, is never dangerous, but plays in summer evening's over the banks of cloud, and sometimes covers the whole sky with intense radiance. Yet the most remarkable and least explicable of the three forms is the ball-lighning. It seems to spring like a globe of fire, sometimes several feet in diameter, from on high, and is often accompanied with a hissing noise and a thick sulphureous smoke. In one instance a vast ball of lightning fell in the midst of a number of persons assembled in the porch of a church in Devonshire, England, and at the same time four smaller balls entered the church and burst, filling it with the fumes and odor of sulphur. The tower of the church was shattered. A ball of fire entered the vestry-room, surrounded by a thick black smoke, burst, and dangerously wounded one of the attending clergymen. In another example the electric globe descended a chimney, entered a room where several persons were collected, stood for a time immovable in the midst of the room, and then burst with a loud explosion. It has been supposed that the ball-lightning is a combination of the gaseous elements of the air by the electric discharge, of which nitre, sulphur, and carbon, the elements of gunpowder, may form an important part; and that these globes are masses of explosive matter formed in the upper atmosphere. The air is converted into a solid substance.

Franklin and his innumerable disciples began now to extend their researches over the whole domain of nature, and were rewarded by an infinite number of novel discoveries. Every where electricity was found to be capable of explaining mysteries that had long seemed supernatural and almost divine, and of offering attractive theories that served to delight and inspire the fancy, even if they did not wholly satisfy the reason. The auroral lights that danced in lovely variety over the icy fields of the north were believed to be electrical; Castor and Pollux, or the baleful Helen, that had wreathed their spectral forms around the masts of Roman ships, now ceased to be supernatural; the luminous rains, where every drop seemed a ball of fire, or the strange flames that sometimes hovered over armies as they went to battle, were found to be no more mysterious than the Leyden-jar; the fearful roar of the thunder was known to be only the echo of the first discharge among the piles of clouds; the electric fire was traced to the water-spout, the whirlwind, or the crater of the volcano; and the triumphant inquirers at length discovered that the round world itself was only a huge electrical machine, and that all its tenants were constantly influenced by the subtle changes of the electric atmosphere.

It was soon observed, too, that the human body was strongly influenced by the electric discharge: the blood ran quicker, the limbs were stirred, the spirits were excited, the intellect aroused; and enthusiastic physicians recorded wonderful cures performed by the aid of electricity. Had not a panacea been discovered? Was not this strange spiritual substance nearly allied to the source of life? The idea, in the last century, excited a new thrill of expectation and awe.

Electricity was applied to various forms of disease, and was often found successful in effecting a cure. It augmented the circulation of the blood, increased the pulsations, and improved digestion. The paralytic were healed and made to walk again; the feeble and depressed seemed inspired with new hope. The dumb were made to speak, and the blind to see. Bertholon, who wrote a treatise on medical electricity toward the close of the last century, relates numerous instances of cures performed by its aid, and the scientific world was full of hope in the efficacy of their new medicament. The electrical machine, for a time, seemed ready to alleviate the worst forms of human woe—so sanguine are men of coming good! so eager to escape from present pain! Yet the pleasing medical dream soon passed away, and it was found that even the Leyden-jar was incapable of repairing the ravages of disease, or of amending those evils which men, by their own excesses, so often bring upon themselves. The dissolute noble still fell down in a paralytic fit from which even the skillful electrician, Abbe Nollet, could never awaken him; the uncleanly city was still full of pestilence; the poor hovel communicated its fevers to the palace.

One of the most astonishing of discoveries, to the intellect of this age, was the explanation now given of the wonderful properties of the torpedo and the electric ell. They were soon shown to be natural Leyden-jars. The torpedo had been noticed by Aristotle and Pliny, and had long been an object of wonder and superstitious dread to the fishermen of the Mediterrenean. But its electric power was feeble compared to the startling shocks conveyed by the gymnotus of the lagoons of Cayenne and South America. Humboldt has given a striking description of the vigor of this most famous of the electric fish. He had been anxious to obtain living specimens of the gymnotus, and employed a number of the natives of the country to engage in the singular fishery. The gymnotus lives in the hot bayous of Cayenne, covered by the thick shade of tropical vegetation, and hidden in the muddy waters. It is often more than five feet in length, and its electric shocks are so powerful that no living thing ventures to invade its retreat. Even the Indians are afraid to strike it with harpoons or to catch it with a line, since its powerful discharges benumb their arms and drive them away in terror, while the serpent-like agility of the great eel enables it to elude or destroy their nets. Humboldt, together with a party of natives, approached a lagoon filled with the electric monsters. He could not conceive how the Indians could succeed in taking their prey alive; they told him, to his great surprise, that they were about to fish for them with horses. A number of mules and horses were collected on the banks of the lagoon, and the Indians drove them, with blows and loud out-cries, into the dangerous waters. A strange battle at once began. The electric eels, roused from their torpor, attacked the unfortunate invaders, fastening upon the lower parts of their bodies, and giving them a succession of almost fatal shocks. Benumbed, terrified, fainting, they strove to fly from the dangerous pool, but the Indians drove them back again with wild cries and sharp blows, and the combat was renewed. The huge eels were seen rushing to assail their foes with fresh vigor; the savages clinging to the overhanging trees and bushes, forced the horses into the midst of the waters; and at length, in a few minutes, the battle was decided, and several of the horses sank and were drowned. The contest, says Humboldt, between animals so different in organization, in so strange a place, presented a most picturesque spectacle; it must certainly have been a most painful one. And now the victorious eels, having exhausted all their electricity, crept languidly toward the shore, where they were taken with small harpoons fastened to dry lines. So completely was their power lost that the Indians did not perceive a shock. Humboldt obtained several eels, but little injured, more than five feet long, and he was told that they were often much larger. It is a peculiar trait of electric animals that they are produced in water, an excellent conductor, and that by some natural provision they can discharge or retain their electricity at pleasure. Philosophers now began to examine them with attention, and to form theories as to the source of their action. But the production of animal electricity seems capable of being explained only by those later discoveries which were soon to enlarge and adorn the science.

Thus the eighteenth century had elevated electricity into one of the most important and attractive branches of knowledge; it was reserved for the nineteenth to apply it practically to the benefit of mankind. In all his brilliant and thoughtful experiments Franklin had often sighed over their apparent uselessness: he would have been amply satisfied could he have foreseen how powerful an agent his favorite science was destined to become in advancing manufactures and the arts, and in binding nations together by an almost instantaneous exchange of thought. Galvanism, the next great step in electrical progress, was discovered by Galvani, Professor of Anatomy at Bologna, about the year 1790. A circumstance so accidental as the slight illness of Madame Galvani gave rise to this important event. Her physician had recommended a diet of frogs' broth, and several of the animals, prepared for the cook, chanced to lie on a table near an electrical machine. One of Galvani's assistants drew sparks from the conductor, and Madame Galvani was surprised to observe that when he did so the muscles of the frogs were distorted and assumed the appearance of life. She called Galvani to notice the strange circumstance. The experiment was repeated with success, and the philosopher, who knew little of electricity, but was a careful anatomist, believed he was on the brink of discovering the principle of life. He entered with strange ardor upon the new research. He experimented incessantly upon muscles and nerves. At length he found that muscles and nerves were thrown into singular convulsions by the mere presence of two different metals, and had discovered by accident the principle of galvanism—the source of the magnetic telegraph or the calcium light.

Still, however, Galvani persisted in his scientific delusion that he had unfolded the origin of being. He insisted that the muscles and the nerves created the electrical action. He overlooked the effect of the two metals. His disciples were soon numerous, and all Europe was again roused into excitement by the unparalelled disclosures that philosophy seemed about to make. Electricity had but lately been drawn down from the clouds; the whole earth was shown to be electric; with one stride more the daring science might unfold the whole mystery of being. But, fortunately for its success, galvanism was taken from the control of its speculative discoverer and fell into more practical hands. Volta, Professor of Natural Philosophy at Como, an excellent electrician, assailed the theory of his fellow-Italian, and showed that the galvanic action came from the two metals, and not from the nerves. A violent controversy raged between the Bolognese school of Galvani and the followers of Volta, and the important question of the origin of life was discussed by the philosophers and the people while Napoleon was preparing to cover Europe with carnage, and while the horrors of the Parisian masacres were yet fresh in every mind. The Reign of Terror which had been commenced in France was about to extend over all European civilization when the two Italian philosophers were marshaling their disciples in a vigorous intellectual combat. Volta was victorious, and his peaceful triumph will outweigh a thousandfold, in its beneficial consequences, the disastrous successes of Napoleon.

In the year 1800, a memorable epoch in the history of electricity, Volta announced to the world, in a letter to Sir Joseph Banks, his invention of a wonderful machine. It was composed of alternate sheets of zinc and copper, separated from each other by discs of wet cloth. Two streams of electricity, one negative, the other positive, were found to flow from either pole of the instrument, and its intensity could be increased apparently without limit by enlarging the number of layers. He had invented the voltaic pile. Its form was afterwards changed by substituting cups of zinc instead of layers, and Volta formed a beautiful apparatus called La Couronne de Tasses, the model of all those powerful instruments by which the electric current is dispatched on its useful mission from New York to San Francisco, or taught to fathom the once impassible Atlantic. The wonderful vigor of the new agent became at once apparent. The sharp sparks of Franklin's electrical machine, and even the condensed shock of the Leyden jar, so long the terror of philosophers, were found to be faint and inefficient compared with the mighty electric current that flowed with silent strength from one wire to the other of the voltaic pile. Its effect on the human frame revived Galvani's notion of the principle of life. When the hands of the operator were applied to the opposite poles, instead of a sudden shock, he found himself held in the grasp of an invisible power. A series of strong convulsions ran through his arms and shoulders. Scarcely could he withdraw his hands and free himself from his captor. If the instrument was applied to the forehead, a brilliant light flashed over the sight, even though the eyes were closed. The glow-worm touched by the current shone with increased splendor, the grasshopper chirped as it excited by a stimulant. But when the pile was applied to the trunk of a decapitated body, a most horrible and unheard of phenomenon occurred. Never had such a spectacle been witnessed before since the age of miracles. The dead body rose from its recumbent position; its arms moved as if to strike in its rage objects in its vicinity; its breast heaved; its legs recovered their strength; and life was imitated or renewed in its fearful actions. Such were some of the tales told over Europe of the powers of the voltaic pile.

ALFRED AND THE SAXON CIVILIZATION.

NO. 4.

THE WORLD'S HISTORY ILLUSTRATED IN ITS GREAT CHARACTERS.

His next work, which was wrought conjointly with the defense of his country, was to create a just commonwealth which has not only been brought down to the present day, but which absorbed, tempered and held in check the imperial Normans after the Conquest—which, in fact, became their commonwealth as much as the Saxons'. And in this work of our English lawgiver, religion and civilization were laid down as the proper basis of the national superstructure. In this part we will let Alfred himself describe. He says in his correspondence to one of his bishops, speaking of the times when the Saxon Bede and Alcuin flourished:—

I wish thee to know that it comes very often into my mind what wise men there were in England, both laymen and ecclesiastics, and how happy those times were to England! how the kings, who then had the government of the people, obeyed God and his messengers! how they both preserved their peace, their customs, and their power at home, and increased their territory abroad, and how they prospered both in wisdom and in war! The sacred profession was diligent both to teach and to learn, and in all the offices which they should do to God. Men from abroad sought wisdom and learning hither in this country, though we now must go out of it to obtain knowledge, if we should wish to have it.

The king contrasts with this account the condition of England in his time:

So clean was it fallen out of England, that there are very few on this side of the Humber who understand to say their prayers in English, or to translate any letter from Latin into English; and I know that there were not many beyond the Humber; so few were they that I indeed cannot think of a single instance south of the Thames, when I took the kingdom.

Recollecting here the success of his own exertions, he exclaims:

Thanks be to Almighty God, that we have now some teachers in our stalls.

The father of his people, and the benevolent man appear strikingly in the expressions which he continues to use:

Therefore I direct that you do, as I believe that you will, that you who have leisure for the things of this world, as often as you can, impart that wisdom which God has given you, wherever you can. Think what punishments will come upon us from this world, if we shall neither have loved it ourselves, nor left it to others: we shall have had only the names of Christians, and very few of their proper habits.

When I recollect all this, I also remember how I saw, before that everything was ravaged and burnt, that the churches through all the English nation stood full of vessels and books, and also of a great many of the servants of God.

They knew very little of the use of their books, because they could not understand anything in them, as these were not written in their own language, which they spoke. Our ancestors that held these places before, loved wisdom, and through this they obtained abundance of it, and left it to us. Here we may yet see their treasures, though we are unable to explore them; therefore we have lost both their wealth and their wisdom, because we have not been willing with our minds to tread in their steps.

When I remember all this, then I wonder greatly that of those good wise men who were formerly in our nation, and who had all learnt fully these books, none would translate any part into their own language; but I soon answered myself and said, they never thought that men would be so reckless, and that learning would be so fallen. They intentionally omitted it, and wished that there should be more wisdom in the land, by many languages being known.

In the other portion of the correspondence, we have the simple narrative of the great lawgiver how he himself learned the languages to begin the work of translating books into English for the use of his people.

It is worthy of special mark just here that all truly great characters are the very apostles of civilization. They are not merely the friends of learning, but its promoters,—not merely the patrons of men of genius, but their very brothers. How well, for instance, Shakspeare and Elizabeth rank together, how well Milton and Cromwell. These seemingly different classes have a common work, and they enhance each other's glory. Their work is their special civilizations and the grandeur of their respective nations. These imperial characters and men of genius are not rivals, but more than any others they live to a mutual glory. And hence, when we find an Elizabeth, we are certain to find her Shakspeares, Cecils, Bacons, and Walter Raleighs; when a Cromwell, you have a Milton and the grand apostles of the Commonwealth; when a Napoleon, his marshals and men of mind. We thus see that every truly great person brings forth a galaxy of genius, even though the imperial person be a grand despot. This has been true from Charlemagne to Nicholas of Russia; while on the side of constitutional governments, an Alfred the Great has ever begun to lay the foundation of nationality, by working out the lines of the special civilization of his people. It is therefore an infallable sign of true greatness in the imperial name when it is associated with men of talent and the center of a civilization. So we find that Alfred, directly after his restoration, commenced his grand work of carving out a distinct Saxon civilization. England had taken the lead in this, in the days of the learned Bede. Charlemagne had himself and France tutored by Englishmen, among whom was Alcium, the famous master of the founder of the French empire. Alfred recollecting this and seeing that, when he came to the throne, France had outstripped his native land, while England had gone back, he conceived the wise design of commiting civilization into the hands of the people. Therefore, instead of confining learning to the priestly few, he sought to disseminate it through the entire nation. As soon as he had provided for the military and naval defenses of his country, he devoted himself to those nobler objects of civilization which were more congenial to his nature than war and bloodshed; and rapidly the Saxon Commonwealth, in its first phases, became evolved. Indeed it was a Commonwealth that Alfred sought to establish in England, as much as that which Cromwell and the Puritans affirmed. They, in fact, but copied Alfred for his grand work was nation-building and civilization, and not the petty work of founding mere monarchy and establishing a race of kings. Give the Commonwealth robust liberties and a high civilization, and it is but very little practical difference whether you call the executive chief, prime minister, king or president. England and America, to-day, are proof of this, for in a true republican genius and the purity of a Commonwealth, England is above America; and so, though Alfred the Great founded a kingly coustitution for the realm, he based it upon a Commonwealth with, in effect, a republican or popular genius, and the Saxon civilization which he began was essentially one of general enlightenment, and the people's progress. The notion of despots and some exclusive classes even in our age, to keep the people ignorant and deny them the right to think, belong to ages upon ages more barbaric than that of noble Alfred of England.

To communicate the knowledge which we possess, Alfred goes so far as to state it to be a religious duty. What a noble thought? How harmonious it is with the present views of all truly enlightened men. He lamented, as we have seen in his correspondence, the ignorance which had overspread his native land; but to remedy it, he desired all the youth who possessed the pecuniary means, to learn to read English, and gave a gentle, but very practical, censure to former students, who had not put their knowledge into a popular form, by translating it into the vernacular tongue. To this end he devoted his own leisure, and called upon his literary clergy to devote theirs to the translating into English the books which they possessed. He set an example himself worthy of a firstclass author and teacher in his historical, philosophical and theological writings, for he seemed to place his glory in the intellectual advancement of his rude countrymen. The clergy were, by the force of his noble example, to follow in his track to educate the nation and thenceforth make the educated man the Saxon type. He established schools and provided masters for high and low who were educated with his son Æthelweard; to his court he invited learned foreigners and skillful artisans; he searched around his dominion for men of literary attainments and was a munificent patron of all men of talent. In this we have the special example of all truly great men.

Next to his efforts for the civilization and Christianization of his people, Alfred evolved civil institutions and framed wise laws. With the concurrence of his witena-gemot or parliament, he introduced into the Anglo-Saxon legislature not only the decalogue, but also the principal provisions of the Mosaic legislation with such modifications as were necessary to adapt them to the Anglo-Saxon manners. And in the laws which he attached to them, he tells us that with the concurrence of his parliament, he had collected together and committed to writing the regulations which his ancestors had established, selecting such of them as he approved, and rejecting the rest. All these, he tells us, passed his witenagemot or parliament, and thus we see he started not with a good absolute or despotic legislation, but with a good parliamentary. Will this be an answer to those who even now would have us believe that good despotism is the perfect form of government. Alfred, a thousand years ago, was further advanced in civilization than they are to day.

After the restoration of the great Saxon lawgiver, he found that the Danish invasion had destroyed the ancient order of the kingdom, and that the Anglo-Saxons were committing depredations one upon the other. To remedy this evil and to provide sufficient force to oppose future invasions, he made some modification of the ancient provincial divisions of England into shires and put the country under a complete organization of hundreds and tens,—in fact, too complete for the advanced state of modern society, but very fitted to bring a social chaos into order.

In legislation, Alfred's times were somewhat patriarchal, and much of the administration of justice in the courts and government in the witena-gemot, or parliament, devolved upon the king. The judicial affairs of the people before Alfred's day were so crude, that the nobles and the people were accustomed to dispute with each other pertinaciously, even in the very tribunal of justice. The earls and legal officers were disregarded, and the people came to the great Saxon lawgiver for judgment. Alfred never refused to sacrifice his own comfort, and even health, for the welfare of his people, and his minute investigations were chiefly in behalf of the poor whom he served day and night. He examined every dispute, reviewed the adjudications made by others in his absence, mildly rebuked erring judges, discharged those who were not qualified for office, and punished severely corrupt and wicked judges. He instituted trial by jury, which is still the boast of the descendants of the Anglo-Saxon fathers in America, Canada, Australia, and Great Britain, and so strict was the great king upon this wise institution that he punished capitally some judges for deciding criminal cases by an arbitrary violation of the right of jury.

MOZART'S OVERTURE TO FIGARO, AND LOCKE'S MACBETH MUSIC.

The passing of Mozart's overture to Figaro and Locke's celebrated Macbeth music, without special notice, would lead many to suppose that our critics were incompetent to the task of reviewing the inspirations of these two immortal composers, therefore, we cannot allow the present opportunity to go by without paying our tribute to the merits of the above works.

It is now nearly two years since we have had the pleasure of hearing the weird compositions of Locke in Shakspear's great play of Macbeth.

Locke's treatment of the poetry in this immortal tragedy has, in fact, almost converted it to a semi opera; and indeed the play could not be so faithfully interpreted without the aid of the musical weird inspirations of Locke.

It has not only added scenic variety to the tragedy, but it has portrayed with much vividity Shakspear's ideas of the weird incantations of the witches so prevalent in the minds of the superstitious in Macbeth's time.

Before analyzing this great composition, we will make a few brief remarks on the subject of Mozart's splendid overture to Figaro, and of its rendition by our band on Monday evening, Sept. 20th, 1869.

The overture to Figaro, not only abounds in brilliant prestissimo executional unisonic passages, but its contrapuntic harmonical beauties, are predominating throughout the composition.

Not only is Mozart unique in his melodial linking of sections and periods, but his varied development of subjects shines forth in beauteous unity with his versatile harmonic combinations.

He is strong; he is majestic; he is impressive and inspiring, at the same time his graceful progressions are the same in effect, and the varied culminating creations brought out in his grand finale movement displays wonderful genius. In fact such combinations as we have above named cannot be surpassed by any ancient or modern writer in the overture school of composition.

To render the difficulties of a work of this class with full effect requires not only the brilliant execution of the artiste, but it also requires great study and practice before an effective interpretation of the ideas of this celebrated composer can be produced. Notwithstanding the many requirements necessary to conquer these difficulties, our orchestral band did justice to this noble composition.

The principal leading violin was up to the mark. The ripieno violin added weight to the principal instrument. The second violin was not behind with effect, and the contrabasso also did its work.

The violoncello brought out n any beauties with its pizzicatos, and we were much pleased to see the introduction of this beautiful quartetto instrument in the orchestra. The flute also rendered good service, and we cannot omit to repeat our compliment of praise to Mr. Mark Croxall for his purity and volume of tone and graceful executions produced by him on the cornet in this fine composition. In speaking of the pianoforte we can truly assert that this instrument is capable of producing great effects in a small band like ours; and to say that Professor Pratt brought out much brilliancy of execution and strength of expression in this overture is only saying what is due to this gentleman.

The applause which was tendered to the band by the audience for their faithful interpretation of Figaro was well deserved, and we were much pleased by the discovery that we had thrown aside our usual lethargy in showing our approval of what is good, and that we intended in future to render an honest stimulation to the orchestra for their endeavors to entertain us. We also feel confident that with proper applause that Professor Careless and the whole of the members of his band will study and practice, in order to produce a variety of first-class compositions to render the band entertainment worthy of approval.

The remainder of the review of Locke's Macbeth music will appear in our next.

MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

In answer to Professor Thomas' note we will observe that the omission of the title of Professor to his name was an oversight of the printer, and ourselves also, in inspecting the proof copy, and for this we tender our apology. We must, however, say that our attention was more directed to the correction of errors than to musical etiquette.

We will also beg the Professor to bear in mind that to remove the errors of consecutive fifths—a very great fault—was the cause of the necessity of changing the two notes in his choral melody, in order to render the resolution perfect.

We will also remind him that perfect resolutions, as well as preparations in harmonic combinations, are required for correct progression; and we will also observe that in choral renderings the harmonies are of more importance than the melody. In fact the song compositions of the great Schubert will prove that in his songs he has bestowed more pains and produced more effect by his varied and beautiful harmonies than he has by his melodies. We will observe, that notwithstanding the Professor's objection to our altering his melody to remove errors, that the correct and pointed resolution of the passage more than compensates for the changing of two passing notes in his subject, and more especially as the linking character of the second period is not altered.

We are always much pleased with the Professor's compositions, and shall always be glad to receive any favor from him; and we will also say that if he would send his pieces correct we should deem it sacrilege to alter them; but if they are grammatically incorrect, we must make a change. This observation will apply to all our contributors.

UNIVERSALITY OF INSPIRATION.

"Did God a special creed require,
Would He not with that creed each soul inspire?"

By this question, I do not mean to infer that a special creed is non-essential to perfect knowledge, but that the seeking spirit can obtain light and inspiration whether possessed of the advantages of a God's special creed or otherwise.

God does inspire the earnest soul that humbly seeks for knowledge. The "still, small voice" speaks of inspiration that comes with healing on its wings to the soul faint with waiting, and sick with hope deferred.

The bustle of life, the multiplicity of earthly cares, too often drown the spiritual life within; the "little voice" is unheeded, and inspiration uncultivated, hence its growth is dwarfed, its spirit quenched.

Did earth's children give the time and thought to the cultivation of a spiritual life that they do to that of a temporal one, they would be both richer and wiser. Knowledge pertaining to a spiritual life is the essence of happiness, and is imperishable; it clings to the spirit, and immortality reaps the harvest planted by mortality.

Shortsighted mortals, who live only for to-day, and care mostly to gather the fleeting riches of earth, may find in the eternal world their greatest punishment in regret—regret at time misspent, at golden opportunities slighted, for binding with deeds of love and kindness, generosity and sympathy, the hearts of their relatives, for love is Heaven, and in Heaven this power alone will reign, no bonds so strong as those of love, no lasting bonds without it. WOMANHOOD.

BY EMILY E. TEASDALE.

Woman is seldom seen or appreciated in her true position. By some she is treated as a mere toy, or a spoiled child; by coarser minds, she is considered as man's inferior, and should she aspire to aught that is calculated to elevate and ennoble the mind, is censured as aspiring to things which belong to man alone. Hence it is impressed upon her that woman's only ambition should be attending with punctilious care, the orders of him who has substituted her for a menial. We see her too in a position little better, where the law of man dare not interfere. Where her heart's first affections are crushed by the coldness and neglect of him, who has sworn to "love and cherish her." True, he feeds, and clothes her, and when he has an hour to spare, not better engaged, he honors her with his presence, and thinks he acquits himself like a man. He knows not the desolation that reigns within her breast, the many long and weary hours she sits at home, brooding over the happy days of girlhood, when he won her heart's rich wealth of love, and she lavished it freely upon him. She knew her life would not pass unclouded, for sickness, or adversity might steal in and mar its tranquility; but she felt she could bear up with fortitude against the stern realities of life, could she retain her position in his affections, and know that her own were appreciated. But to feel that she had given him all her being, like a flower that casts it perfume on the desert air—a breeze that wanders and needs it not—gnaws like a canker worm within her heart, and the confidence that should have twined itself around the oak, gradually returns to her own breast; and sometimes springs up in the form of self-reliance. Perhaps nothing lays a greater foundation for misery than the uniting in marriage of persons who are not qualified to render each other happy. True happiness can never be found until, both matrimonially and socially, spirits are classified, then all will move on in harmony for the spirit of love will dictate and regenerate all.

ADDRESSED TO THE PORTRAIT OF A BELOVED CHILD.

Phantom of beauty! of love, and of pride!
Long did I mourn thy bright form from my side;
But days, months, and years have sped rapidly by,
And now I can gaze with first only a sigh!——

Phantom of beauty? thou truly on earth
Wast an Angel bestowed, from the days of thy birth
Thou did'st call out my love, my ambition and pride,
And thy love and devotion were worth all beside!

Phantom of beauty! thou wert young when thy breath
Was seized, and arrested by arrogant death!
'Twas God made me live thro' that harrowing hour,
'Twas God drew the sting from his venomous power.

Phantom of beauty! thy soul is away,
With thy Father and God, in the lights of his day,
I see thee, my child, sitting meek at his feet,
And when thine eye seeks Him, His smile is so sweet,
That I see thee bound up in thine own loving way,
And the glorified being at once you display;
You feel low before Him; it seems that you plead,
And my heart, the petition, has power to read;
Which a sweet intuition reveals to my mind;
And he looks on thee sweetly, and loving, and kind;
His ineffable smile bids thy spirit be free,
And the sceptre of Love, He extends unto thee.

Thy hands on thy bosom in meekness are crossed,
And I see thy lips move, but the words I have lost,
But I feel in my heart that the lov'd ones away
Are the theme and the subject for which you now pray.

I know thee, my loved one! I know we are part
Of the glorified spirit, thy glorified heart!—
I know thou art waiting and watching in love
Till we're all reünited in mansions above.

When we wait for the one we love truly on earth,
And we know in that meeting there will be no dearth,
How we bask in the anticipation of love!
Thus—thus art thou waiting my lov'd one, above!

Yet, to mansions of bliss do not summon us yet,
Till we've ended our mission, and drained the mix'd cup,
Then like the worn soldier, our arms we'll lay down,
Rejoicing, in view your glorious crown.

Phantom of beauty! thou only hast gone
A short time before to our Heavenly home;
Phantom of beauty! of love and of pride,
The picture transcribed, draws the sting from my side.

HANNAH T. KING, S. L. City.

TERESE, THE HEBREW MAIDEN;

OR,

NOT ALL DROSS.

BY EDWARD W. TULLIDGE.

CHAPTER LXXI.

THE BRIDE AND THE CONDEMNED.

Clara Garcia was now the bride of Farinelli. In their terrible afflictions, the lovers had resolved to devote the remainder of life to each other. Clara had beseeched Farinelli to let her fate be linked with his, and to be with him in the condemned cell to the last. She revealed to him her fixed resolve to die with him, and told him of her oath in Rome that he should be hers in "life or in death." She even showed him the subtle poison which she carried about with her for that purpose. Farinelli tried to dissuade her from her dreadful purpose, but she was heroic in her calm resolution to die with him. Moreover, the strong passion of Clara and her tragic fervor filled him with a kindred spirit, so that they grew to look calmly on the prospect of dying together. Farinelli was strengthened by this woman's love and purpose, and her presence became an absolute necessity to him. So they communicated to Sir Richard Courtney their wish for their union, before the terrible day of execution made it too late in this life. Courtney sought Sir Richard Brine, who readily sanctioned the tender romance; for, indeed, it would have been cruel to have denied to a man on the brink of the grave, the consolation of love and a wife's supporting presence. So the marriage was solemnized in the chapel of the prison; and the bride, through the kind permission and influence of Sir Richard Brine, had, from the morning of their marriage, been with the prisoner day and night in his condemned cell. This was by the connivance of Sir Richaad Brine.

Theirs was a honeymoon of saddened bliss. Their terrible situation deepened their love towards each other, and chastened their hearts from all the dross of their nature. They had been married now about three months.

The execution of Farinelli had been postponed to give time for the appearance of Sir Walter Templar, if living. Terese Ben Ammon had filled the daily papers with her inspirative letters upon the innocence of her foster-brother, and her conviction that Walter, her affianced husband, would come to light. Her letters were published in almost every paper in the country, provincial as well as metropolitan. Her grandfather's wealth she lavished freely and bought the press everywhere, to give her pleas publicity. Her uncle managed it all. And when some reply happened to come from influential editors who prided themselves in being impartial, but severely critical, Snap then came to her aid with his fearful intellectuality. The Prosecutor for the Crown had written a series of letters upon the subject, for the responsibility of condemning and the designed execution of hanging an innocent man was thrown upon the Crown. Terese assumed two important facts—first, that Walter was living; the second, that her foster-brother was innocent; and with this persistent assumption as the premises, the Crown stood in a very questionable position; and it was boldly charged that, in case George IV did not interfere and reprieve the prisoner, the country would be guilty of a judicial murder. Some of the influential papers who chose to take the side of the Crown, and also the Prosecutor cut Terese Ben Ammon's letters into shreds. Her beautiful faith was applauded at the same time that their logic of facts and the circumstantial evidence swept away all that her faith sought to establish. Of course they had the advantage the same as the talented infidel has generally upon the subjects of immortality and God: for, like her evidence, religion is of faith and spiritual sight. For a week, the Crown held the case against our hero; and other editors, finding another reaction setting in, threw themselves against the condemned man and his champion foster-sister. It was then that Snap came to his niece's aid. He was the very opposite to her in his treatment —all facts, all logic, all philosophy, all scepticism—no faith. He met them upon their own ground. His daring infidelity, his subtle thinking and his terrible justice cut his opponents to the very bone at every dash of his pen. He swept away all faith, all assumptions. Where, then, was any judgment given upon circumstantial evidence. He gave more logic on the prisoner's side, than they could supply against it; and by his supreme subtlety revealed fallacies in nearly everything his opponents said. As every special argument is more or less sophistry, he overwhelmed his opponents by being a superior sophist to them all. The Prosecutor retired "used up," the venerable judge trembled for fear he had condemned an innocent man, the jury felt themselves more guilty than the prisoner, the Secretary of State was in great perplexity which had caused him to postpone the execution, while George IV was savage to find the Crown itself placed at the bar. It is well know that old George III hung everybody he could, from the hoary-bearded ruffian to the tender maiden, and his son in this case was disposed from very pique to follow his father's example. Thus had Terese and her uncle moved the country to save Farinelli, and obtained the postponement of the execution; but it was generally expected that George IV would hang the condemned man, guilty or not guilty. It lacked now but three days to the execution, and there were no prospects of a second postponement.

We will now take our readers to the condemned cell where the prisoner and his bride are. Three months they have spent together in their saddened bliss: and now they are both hopeless. Death is before them, and they have resolved to die together.

"Clara, my darling," said the condemned to his wife, "let us resign all false hope and prepare for the last great act of our tragedy."

"Beppo, my husband, I am prepared. I will myself set you the example, but not to-night; I cannot resign your life till the last moment. Three days are left us for love in this world. If the reprieve come not, the last night shall give to us a second marriage. Together without the eye of mortal to witness, we will perform the ceremony of death."

"Yes, Clara dear, it shall be so. No gallows shall have me. We will die by the same agency in the same hour, and in each others arms."

"Our spirits, dear Beppo, shall fly away together. I look calmly upon the prospect. Do you know, my husband, I have been more at peace in your little cell than ever before in my life. All jealousy and passion have been purged from my heart. This prison has been our purgatory. Here with you, I have felt myself a true Catholic, and God and the holy religion of our mother church have, for the first time in my life, sanctified my thoughts: I think I am nearer heaven with you in this condemned cell than I ever have have been, had it not been for our terrible afflictions. And then, Beppo darling, we love each other more deeply, more unreservedly and purely than we otherwise should. I fear that I should have been very jealous, self-willed and exacting; but now there is a new spirit created in me. We do love each other with an unspeakable affection, do we not, my husband?"

"Yes, Clara, my devoted one, I love you now beyond the love which I bare to my foster-sister. All has been for the best, for we both were too much children of passion, and the fierce jealousies of our Italian nature daily gave to our lips a cup of poison more deadly than that which I hope will give us passport into heaven. Surely, Clara, the Great Judge of my innocence and the motives of our sacrifice will pardon us."

"I believe He will, Beppo. The Church tells us of the merciful Christ. The priest shall come on that night and absolve us of our sins, and the rest we must leave in the hands of the Merciful One."

"Right, my wife; I am resolved that the murderer's death shall not be mine. We will die as the old Roman heroes would have died —by our own hands. Oh! the gallows, Clara, the gallows; that would have been terrible. I thank God that you are with me, and that we have the means to prevent the horrid tragedy of the gallows."

And thus these two afflicted ones conversed upon the sacrificial ceremony which they had arranged to take place the night before the intended execution.

CHAPTER LXXII.

ON THE PLANE ABOVE US.

"There is more in heaven and on earth
Than is dreamt of in your philosophy, Horatio."

Two days and nights have passed in the dungeon of Walter Templar since George Blakely had visited the dungeon of the De Lacy castle for the last time. Walter fully realized now, that death or his deliverance was near. It was on the same night on which we have taken our readers to the condemned cell of Farinelli.

Walter Templar is lying upon his heap of straw. His lamp is gone out never more to be fed again with oil, for as the jailor came not, it was exhausted. That profound darkness which can almost in fancy be felt, reigned in the dungeon. It was midnight again, and again that same mystic influence pervaded Walter Templar, which pervaded him when Alice appeared to him on the first occasion. He felt that she was coming again. Nearer and nearer her presence seemed to be approaching. Within him, and around him the spirit life was gathering. From within him and without there was a meeting. An interblending of being seemed to be taking place between the souls of the mortal and the immortal. A fire burned in Walter's earthly nature, as though a live coal from another furnace was kindling him into a rapturous flame, and around the region of his heart there was a spirit glowing. This has numerous striking examples. Doubtless it was that supernatural flame which the two disciples experienced when their arisen Master was journeying with them: "Did not our hearts burn within us as he talked to us by the way." Thus it was with Walter Templar, now in his dungeon, wherein he was peculiarly susceptible to supernatural solicitude. He had lain perhaps for an hour with the heavenly presence growing upon him and wooing him out of his positive mood into a state of passive reception. He was as upon the threshold of another world waiting for his guardian to lead him into the chamber of the invisible to—the mortal eye. Whether he at last fell asleep, and saw in dreams his second visitation of Alice, our readers must determine. We simply relate what in this ecstatic state appeared to him as a reality.

His spirit-bride came to him as before gradually appearing, and increasing in the brightness of her soul-essence.

"Walter, my husband, I am here!" said the vision.

"Alice, I hear you and see you again. I felt you coming, but you have been long, very long."

"That, Walter, is because I brought another with me. She could not come so soon as I alone. Terese is here."

"Terese with you, and dead?"

"No, Walter, not dead—in the body: yet out of the body. She is entranced, and here."

"I see her not, Alice."

"Wait, she is coming in. I have toiled much to bring her to you. Do you see her now?"

"No; yet stay. There is something, a shadow arising. Ah! I see it more distinctly now. It is a female form. It wears a mantle which seems like a soft blue cloud in a summer sky."

"She has not thrown off the garment of mortality, and you behold its shadows. Wait, Walter, she will come nearer."

"Ah! I see her face. It is Terese. Can she speak to me?"

"No, she cannot speak, but you shall see her thoughts and understand her signs. What see you now?"

"She recognizes me, Alice. I see the joy in her thought. She understands what I say. Now she seems pained as she looks around my dungeon. She is thinking now of delivering me. She would hasten away, as though to bring me aid. Alice, she is going. Bid her stay. It is too late; she is gone."

"She could stay but for a moment, Walter. Even I cannot stay long. She is returning to herself. I have told her all, and she has seen also. She will send deliverance to you—for that I brought her. I have labored with her for months to bring her, but have not been able, yet to-night in the intensity of her anxiety for you and her foster-brother, she came out of herself."

"Ha! Farinelli, tell me of Farinelli, Alice."

"He is yet living, but I cannot reach him as I can you. He is somewhat hid from me. I know not his fate. I am going, Walter. Follow me."

Walter sprang to his feet and followed till his hands touched the iron grating of the dungeon door, the touch of which brought him to consciousness, and the vision vanished.

"I suppose Alice bid me follow her," mused Walter, "as a sign that I should soon be delivered from this dungeon."

He returned and laid himself down again, and reflecting upon his vision he fell asleep. Let us now go to Terese and relate the strange circumstance that had occurred to her in coincidence with that which we have related of Walter.

She was sleeping in her bed in Courtney House, Grosvenor Square. She seemed to be in a dream, for she murmured as though in reply to some one. Suddenly she raised up in the bed and sat awhile. Then she nodded assent and got out of bed and dressed. She was evidently in a somnambulistic state. Being dressed, she left her chamber and cautiously moved through the house, as though desirous not to awaken any person. She had taken her mantle and bonnet. The front door was reached which she gently opened, and taking a latch key from the stand at the door, she passed out into the street. Direct towards a certain point she seemed to be making, and she moved along as though she was following some one. Several times as watchmen approached she evaded them, sometimes turning into another street. Having gone about half a mile, she turned back by the same route, entered the house she had left, returned to her chamber, undressed and got into her bed again and slept until morning, when the family were surprised by finding all the doors open even to Terese's chamber.

CHAPTER LXXIII.

SOLVED AT LAST.

In the morning when Terese came to breakfast, she found the family excited and perplexed concerning the condition which they had found the house in, with open doors. Their first conjecture had been that the house had been robbed, and already Sir Richard Brine was on the spot making observations to discover the cause of the singular circumstances. Nothing was missing; evidently no robbery had been committed, but also evidently something uncommon had taken place. For a moment it had been thought that Terese had been kidnapped or murdered, or that some extraordinary circumstance related to her; for it was the line of doors leading to her chamber that was found open, and the housekeeper had rushed with alarm to Judah Nathans with the intelligence that his niece's chamber was also open. The housekeeper had been too much terrified to enter to see if the young lady was safe or not; and for an instant Judah shook as with an ague, in very sympathy with the servant's alarm. It was wonderful how that passionless man loved his sister's orphan. All the affections of his life were garnered in her. He had made science his wife, but now, father, mother, sister, child were all crowded into one—that one, Terese. Judah's love for her was like his intellect and character terribly concentrative and entire; and so when the housekeeper rushed in to him with the news that his niece had been murdured or kidnapped, he shook as we have said as with an ague. But that was only for an instant. The next instant he was scientific again, and with a fearful intensity and presence of mind, he was direct for his niece's chamber to demonstrate what dreadful thing had happened; for appearances went to show that something extraordinary had occurred. As he entered the opened door of Terese's chamber he shuddered again, for in spite of his effort at calmness he could not help it, but as he approached the bed and saw her in peaceful sleep, like an angel in heavenly dreams, he drew a heavy sigh of relief, and left the chamber softly, closing the door after him. Her grandfather would doubtles have awakened her by fond caresses and exclamations, which would have alarmed, not enraptured her. But not so the uncle. Snap was too philosophic to break her peaceful sleep with exclamations of gratitude that she was thus peaceful in her bed, ven unconecious of any harm.

"Sleep, child, sleep!" murmured this strange man, in intense relief, as he returned to inform the Courtney family that all was right touching his niece.

Nevertheless, something uncommon had happened in the house of Sir Richard Courtney, and when Terese went down to breakfast she found the family, with Sir Richard Brine speculating upon the circumstance of the opened doors.

"I think, Uncle Courtney," began Terese, for he always treated her as though she had been Walter's wife—"I think, Uncle Courtney, that I have the other half of the story to tell."

"Indeed, my dear?" replied the baronet, interested, and all the family in a moment were eager with attention, and even Brine was eager to hear the other half."

"I went to my bed, sir, last night in great trouble about Walter and my poor foster-brother, who in two days more will die that dreadful death."

"Do not think of it, my dear niece," said Courtney, with a shudder.

"But I could not help it, Uncle. Oh, how I prayed last night to the God of my Hebrew fathers to save my foster-brother, and restore Walter."

"Alas, alas!" interrupted Isaac Ben Ammon. He must be angry with Jacob, or he would have come to his help ere now. Dost thou not remember, Judah, when our great ancestor wrestled with the angel at Peniel and would not let the Lord depart until he had blessed him. Rememberest thou not, Judah, that Jacob then received his name, Israel: he had prevailed. Alas, alas, Judah, our father's God must be angry with us, or he would have come to the help of the lads, ere this. Joseph in Egypt, Benjamin in prison, condemned to die, and Joseph not the lord of Pharoah's house. Alas, Judah, there must be something wrong."

"The God of our fathers have come to our help, grandfather Isaac, and told me where Walter is, I have seen him. He is living!"

"Ay, sayest thou so, my child. The Lord hath not forsaken Israel, didst thou say? Then is Isaac in the strength of a David again. But why didst thou not bring thy Joseph, if he be not devoured in the wilderness. Why doth he tarry so long in Egypt."

"I saw him in a dungeon, grandfather, and he could not follow me."

"Alas, alas, my child, then hath the Lord forsaken us again!"

The family had too much respect for the venerable Patriarch to interrupt his reminiscences of his race, which after all the fanciful mixed up in his mind by the troubles of those he loved had much of practical shaping to Farinelli and Walter's case. Her grandfather having thrown himself back in his chair, despondingly, Terese began her strange story.

"Uncle Courtney, in my great grief I prayed to my father's God as Miriam herself might have done; and He has answered me. I went to my bed and was soon asleep, when methought your daughter Alice came into my chamber and bid me arise and follow her. I fancied in my dream that I did arise and dress, and followed her into the street."

"Which you certainly did, Terese," broke in her uncle, Judah. "I understand now the open doors. You, in your great trouble, became somnambulistic."

"But that does not explain uncle Judah, what followed. Methought Alice guided me onward swift as my thought. I seemed to rise a little above the earth, gliding, not walking, through the air. I know not how long I journeyed nor how far, but from the speed with which I flew it must have been a great distance from London, yet I know that we were, throughout the journey, within the limits of England, for I recognized English scenery at my journey's end. At length we came to a dense forest, and I saw before me a curious labyrinth of fir trees."

"A labyrinth of fir trees! Go on child. 'Tis very strange; but I shall solve it. Go on, child, I follow."

"Snap's metaphysical mind was uncommonly taken by the strange story of his niece, and he had recognized the labyrinth of fir trees through which he had entered to the De Lacy Castle a thousand times. His niece continued:

"Into this curious labyrinth of nature's forming, Alice bid me follow her. I did, and now I seemed to move nearer the earth, and as I approached its surface we glided slower, and I felt above my head the pressure of the foliage of the interblended trees. At length we reached the wing of a noble castle, and stopped at a narrow oaken door. Alice touched a spring, and the door flew open, revealing a narrow flight of steps up which we passed. We entered apartments which seemed to be unused for general purposes, yet persons must have been there of late, for the appearance of the rooms indicated it. Moreover, wine and cigars were still upon the table, showing that the persons were midnight revelers. Alice next pointed out to me a secret pannel, and bid me mark everything I saw, that I might know each object, for she said I was to come this way again. She then touched another spring, and the hidden pannel flew open, revealing a tunnel-like passage, into which we passed. At the end of the passage we saw a handle like that with which water is drawn from a well, connected with concealed machinery in the wall. She bade me help her turn it, which I did, and gradually the wall moved, and soon a passage was made sufficient to let us through. Still, Alice guided me onward, and we entered a fine picture gallery, and around me I saw the noble forms of an ancient race. They smiled upon me. One portrait especially beamed upon me a smile of unspeakable tenderness and concern, as if I were his daughter. Oh, uncle Judah, you will be surprised when I tell you that it was the very portrait now in Sir Richard Courtney's chamber. It was Lord De Lacy—Frederick's father!"

"My father, Terese?" inquired young De Lacy.

"Go on, child!" urged her uncle, with impatient interest.

"Out of this gallery of the pictured dead, Alice led me into a narrow corridor, at the end of which was a large iron door, which we opened the same as we had the stone door of the tunneled passage. Then down several flights of steps my angel guide led me, until we came to the gate of a dungeon, dark as midnight, yet I could see. This gate she opened not, but passed through it as though it had been the shadow and she the substance. She bade me do the same, and to my surprise, I found the iron gate no impediment. For a moment I looked around in the dark dungeon, but saw nothing. But then, O Lady Templar—mother!—whom think you I saw?"

"Whom saw you, my daughter?" asked Walter's mother, in great agitation, for she divined the answer.

"Dear mother I saw your son,—my lost one! I saw that he recognized me, and methought he spoke to Alice of me, and I attempted to go to him, when it seemed that he and Alice vanished away. I returned home to my bed, though I remember nothing of that return, as I do distinctly of everything going, from the time we entered the labyrinth of fir-trees."

"Enough, child," exclaimed Snap, rising to his feet. "Frederick, haste, bid two fleet horses be saddled for you and me. Sir Richard Brine, will you be kind enough to grant four of your most resolute men, for an expedition—men who can ride ninety miles before they sleep, for we must also fly over the path which my niece glided last night."

"I can supply you with those officers, Mr. Nathans, but you are surely not going to lead them on a "wild goose chase," to follow the track of a beautiful dream?"

"Brine, I demonstrate. I never dream, myself, asleep or awake. I solve, as I have now, a problem which you and your officers have failed to solve. Walter Templar is in the dungeon of the De Lacy Castle!"

"He is," responded Sir Richard Courtney, starting up in extraordinary agitation. "How is it that we have not thought of that before? Terese, my darling niece, the spirit of my daughter Alice did come to you last night."

"Yes, the ladder of Jacob came down from heaven last night to my grandchild, I do believe for a surety, and thy daughter, Sir Richard, descended and led her to deliver her beloved. The God of Jacob be praised."

"Sir Richard Brine, not a moment must be lost if we would save Farinelli. I have demonstrated that Sir Walter Templar is living, though I have not quite solved the mysterious vision."

Young De Lacy and Sir Richard Brine hastened to prepare, Brine himself having resolved to lead his officers, but Terese Ben Ammon insisted on going also as the guide, for such Alice had chosen her.

Before Sir Richard Brine left London he informed the governor of the nature of the expedition. He said if Templar was living he would send him intelligence to prevent the execution of Farinelli. In case the return was not in time, he charged him to suspend the execution under some extraordinary pretext for a few hours; "Say the the prisoner is dead or dying—anything to give time," were Brine's parting words.

CHAPTER LXIV.

DELIVERED FROM THE DUNGEON.

All that afternoon and night, Terese Ben Ammon, her uncle, Frederick De Lacy, and the officers rode to the rescue of Walter Templar. The maiden bore up wonderfully, for the intensity of her feelings and the lives of those at stake made her oblivious to all fatigue. They changed horses several times, yet Terese was ready as soon as they stood saddled at the door. Indeed, her impulse led them on their journey; ever the first to start and the last ready to stop: it was only the necessity of changing horses that induced her to stop at all. Her uncle Judah, in his solicitude for her, once persuaded her to tarry on the road till their return with Walter, but her distress at the thought convinced him that under her anxious and excited state of feelings it would wear upon her body and mind more to tarry than to continue. So on they sped again to the next point where their horses could be relieved, and Terese punished them all, both man and beast by her fleet riding, for the persuasion of her uncle to tarry on the road.

At eight in the morning, Terese Ben Ammon and the horsemen arrived at the De Lacy Castle. Snap, himself now conducted them, and he struck for the labyrinth of fir trees which led to the secret entrance to the castle. As soon as they had entered the winding path, Terese exclaimed with delight:

"Uncle, uncle, Walter is yonder. This is the way to his dungeon. I remember every object now I meet. This is the labyrinth through which Alice led me."

The men answered not. To confess the truth, they were now too much worn out by the hard riding to be interested. Even Sir Richard Brine felt unconcerned from fatigue. He would rather have thrown himself from his horse and lain down on the ground, and slept for an hour than have taken the direction as a chief in the coming scene. Of the men, Judah and Lord Frederick were alone full of spirit. Young De Lacy was borne up, much as the maiden was, by the intensity of his feelings, and the dear prospect of soon beholding Walter, alive and free, for he no more doubted now the issue than did the maiden herself. As for Judah, he had been as scientific on this journey as in the whole course of his life. He had taken it from the start with dispassionate ease; he was a good rider, having been in his boyhood a kind of groom to Sir Herbert, he strained not a nerve, wore his horse rather than himself, and was more sluggish at the beginning of the journey than at the end. Indeed, Snap had calculated philosophically as he did everything. He knew there was a tremendous ride before them, and he managed it much as a skillful jockey does on a race course Sir Richard Brine thought him a very dull riding companion and several times thought he was sleeping upon his horse, and feared he would not hold out. But when Brine himself began to be drowsy in reality, Snap was as fresh as a lark, and sought to spur on his companion with keen remarks. In fact, Snap had a constitution of wiry toughness, and was tall and lean like the hungry intellectual Cassius. He was not the "fat" man to "sleep o'nights" and so when the party of rescue reached the De Lacy Castle, Judah and his niece were the only ones equal to the task of grappling with the circumstances. Lord Frederick, as we have said, was comparatively fresh, from his youth and eager hope, but he could not do less than resign to love what otherwise friendship would have claimed. Hence, Terese still led them on, and her uncle Judah gathered all his mental and physical energies to master the situation.

The narrow oaken door of the secret entrance of the castle was reached. Terese sprang from her horse first, exclaiming:——

"Uncle Judah, let me open the door. Let me discover the concealed spring. Be this the first proof that Alice did conduct me here. Uncle Judah, behold! Not in the door, but in the wall is the spring. Behold, uncle! The door is open now. There is the flight of stairs to the secret apartment of the castle. Gentlemen, are you satisfied?"

"Child, I was satisfied before I started. At least I had solved the problem that you had discovered the secrets of the De Lacy Castle, but the mystery of the agency that revealed it to you, I have not yet quite demonstrated. Sir Richard Brine, are you satisfied that we have not come on a wild-goose chase?"

"It is very wonderful, Mr. Nathans, I must confess, and if the part concerning Sir Walter but holds good, then are we most richly rewarded."

"Come, gentlemen, I will lead," said the maiden, who had waited till the weary men had all dismounted, and tied their horses to the trees.

Up they went to the secret apartment of the castle, and Snap, who for the purpose had brought a very ingenious tinderbox, and a small taper next obtained a light to proceed to the dungeon, but still he let his niece lead from her inspirations rather than his knowledge, for he was now taking scientific observations to see how near her vision held good.

"See, Uncle Judah, here is the spring in the secret pannel. There now, it is open. Behold the tunnel-like passage."

"It is very wonderful!" again repeated Sir Richard Brine.

They passed into the passage, Terese still leading.

"Uncle, turn that windlass in the wall by that iron handle. Not that way, uncle; the reverse way."

"Child, you are right. I turned it the wrong way to test your mystery. There, Sir Richard Brine, you see this seeming solid masonry is moving. I have opened this stone door a thousand times. 'Tis done. Lead on, child."

"Follow, gentlemen," said our heroine in an excitement of delight, for she felt that her lover was near.

In a moment more, they were in the portrait gallery of the De Lacy castle, and then like the unerring hound following a scent, Terese led them into the narrow corridor connecting with the dungeon.

There, Uncle Judah, is the large iron door. But turn that handle moving the concealed machinery the opposite way of the first. Am I not right?"

"Child, you are right. There, Sir Richard, is the door open and there the flight of steps leading to the dungeon."

"Give me the taper, Frederick," said the maiden; "I will be the first to Walter's dungeon;" and she bounded down the steps much at the risk of putting out the light.

The gate of the dungeon was reached, and the musical voice of the Hebrew Maiden rang through the vaulted passage.

"Walter, I am here! Walter, I am here! 'Tis I—Terese. Oh answer me, answer me!"

There was no reply. Everything in that sepulchral place was as still as death. The men were very anxious, and young De Lacy, in the moment's suspense, staggered with his revulsion of feeling, and would have fallen but for the wall against which he leaned for support. Even passionless Snap trembled with the intensity of his feelings, fearing that after all the last great test which made all the rest valuable or worthless, would not hold good. Walter there and living, or all was as nothing.

"Walter, Walter! I am here. Oh answer me. It is I—Terese. Answer me: oh answer me! God of my fathers, thou hast forsaken me. The vision was delusive!"

But a faint moan from within called the maiden to herself again or she would have swooned.

"He is living: he is living. I thank thee, O God of Jacob. Walter, Walter, answer me!"

"Who speaks? I thought I heard the voice of Terese," said the prisoner still faintly from within.

"It is Terese, Walter, I am here!"

"Terese, my love? Then Alice has kept her promise: and you did appear to me two nights ago."

"Uncle Judah, do you hear what Walter says."

"I hear, child."

Young De Lacy, now no longer able to hold his peace, gave a great shout—"Hurrah!" which was answered by Sir Richard Brine and the officers, in true English fashion. It was the first shout which the last of the De Lacys had ever given in the castle of his ancestors, and it was now at finding his beloved friend Walter in its dungeon.

A difficulty now presented itself how to open the great iron gate, for that was locked with an ordinary key, which, as our readers know, was in the possession of George Blakely.

"Sir Richard Brine, with your four officers, we are seven strong men. These hinges I know must be rusted nearly off for they are a hundred years old. Come with our might and wrench them off."

"Altogether, then, my men," replied Brine in much delight to find that they had not come on a "wild-goose chase," as he had at first feared. The men, now thoroughly revived from the fatigue of their journey by the excitement, gave a few sudden jerks with all their might, and the dungeon door stood open.

"Walter, dear Walter, I am here!" and the Hebrew Maiden, bounded into his arms.

The faith which had sustained her, expired in the realization of Walter living, the reaction came: Nature claimed her due: the maiden had swooned.

Sir Walter Templar presented a very sad picture: his clothes were all soiled and stained with blood, his hair and beard very long, his skin very dirty, and his person gaunt from partial starvation and long captivity. But all were overjoyed to find him living, and not a little astonished to hear him reveal the other half of Terese's vision. In a few minutes, they left the dungeon, Judah bearing in his arms his insensible niece. Instead of returning by the secret entrance, Snap led the way to the main part of the castle where they found Sir Herbert and George Blakely in the charge of the officers who had been dispatched before them by Sir Richard Brine. Young Arthur was also present, and he plead with Snap apart to save his father. Walter being informed of all including the fact that Farinelli was to be hung the next morning at eight o'clock, consented to be merciful. But said he:—

"If Farinelli be hung before deliverance can reach him, I will have vengeance upon Sir Herbert Blakely's life."

Sir Walter Templar was next furnished wine and food by young Arthur. Then he bathed, and dressed himself in a suit of Arthur's clothes. This done with his usual impulse and resolution, he declared that he would ride to London to the rescue of Farinelli. Snap and young De Lacy resolved to accompany him and Sir Richard Brine, and two of the officers were to follow after they had slept. Judah and Lord Frederick had already taken a short sleep and by twelve o'clock the party started to the rescue of Farinelli who was to die at ten o'clock the next morning. Walter Templar, mounted on a fleet steed of Sir Herbert Blakely's, led them on to save a life.

"Templar to the rescue!" he cried as they bounded from De Lacy castle.

KNOW YOU?

Know you the hour when Phœbus steals
From where Aurora blushing lies,
And mounts the heaven on glowing wheels,
And gilds the grey of dawning skies?

Know you the time when birds begin
To carol to the rising sun,
When from the woods their jocund din
Proclaims the reign of night is done?

Know you the moment when the dew
Exhales in silvery sighs from blooms,
Whereon it slept the whole night through,
Till Phœbus the rapt earth illumes?

Know you the moment, time and hour
Of daybreak? Well, you do, mayhap.
Well, that's the time I feel a power
Of pleasure in "that other nap."

MUSICAL DOINGS.—Since Mr. Waters gave up publishing sheet music, he has devoted his whole capital and attention to the manufacture and sale of Pianos and Melodeons. He has just issued a catalogue of his new instruments, giving a new scale of prices, which shows a marked reduction from former rates, and his Pianos have recently been awarded the First Premium at several Fairs. Many people of the present day, who are attracted, if not confused, with the flaming advertisements of rival piano houses, probably overlook the modest manufacturer like Mr. Waters; but we happen to know that his instruments earned him a good reputation long before [illegible] positions and "honors" connected therewith were ever thought of; indeed, we have one of Mr. Waters' Piano-fortes now in our residence, (where it has stood for years,) of which any manufacturer in the world might be proud. We have always been delighted with it as a sweet-toned and powerful instrument, and there is no doubt of its durability; more than this, some of the best amateur players in the city, and several celebrated pianists, have performed on the said piano, and all pronounce it a superior and first-class Instrument. Stronger indorsement we could not give.—Home Journal,

ALLCOCK'S POROUS

STRENGTHENING

PLASTERS.

ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS are the results of studies and experiments of Dr. Schecut, of South Carolina; of Dr. Wm. Wagstaff, now Baron Wagstaff, of Horace H. Day, the distinguished manufacturer of rubber goods; and of Thomas Allcock, Chemist and member of the College of Pharmacy of New York, now General Allcock, etc., etc.

Step by step this commodity has attained its unprecedented fame. They are universally approved. They support, strengthen, and aid the growth of muscles. They appear to have a peculiar effect upon the nerves, allaying irritability, while supplying warmth. They seem to accumulate electricity, and aid the circulation of the blood through the part where applied, by which healthy actions are induced.

Even in paralysis, where articulation was suspended, the use of the Porous Plasters to the spine restored the articulation, and materially reduced the paralysis. In fact, the patient could help herself, while before the Porous plaster was applied she was as helpless as a baby. We refer to Mrs. Sally Elliot, Springfield, Mass.

Dr. Myer, of Savannah, Ga., says they are the best mechanical supporters for weak muscles ever discovered; that by their warming properties they bring power and health, until the strength of the muscles are entirely restored. That he knows a case where Allcock's Plasters cured a gentleman of a weak spine. That he daily prescribes them in his practice with the happiest results, and desires us to refer to him.

Dr. Henderson, of Farnsville, Louisiana, says: "The counter-irritant effect of Allcock's Porous Plasters is produced in such a mild and gradual way, they so invigorate the circulation around the parts to which they are applied, and exert upon all nervous diseases such a great sedative influence, that I place them confidently at the head of every plaster now in use."

Dr. Johnson, of Hartford, says: "My daily experience confirms the very superior excellence of your Porous Plasters. At this moment of writing, a man applies for one, who, by entanglement in a shaft of machinery, had both his legs broken, spine severely injured, and was for nearly a year entirely helpless. This man found relief very soon by the application of a plaster to his spine. He was soon enabled to work, and now he labors as well as ever. He would cheerfully pay five dollars for a single plaster, if they could not be had at a lower rate. Surgeons should make use of these perforated plasters, to the exclusion of all others, as their flexibility and adhesiveness are greatly in advance of all other plasters with which I am acquainted, while the perforations peculiar to them render them greatly superior to all others for ordinary surgical uses. Knowing the plasters to be so useful, I have no scruples that my sentiments should be known.

J. W. JOHNSON, M. D."

Dr. Sterling's testimony: "For two years, I have been a great sufferer from neuralgia in the head, and found only temporary relief from all the various remedies that I have tried, until I applied one of Allcock's Porous Plasters. I cut it into three strips, placing one under each shoulder blade, and the other over the small of the back: and for the past three months, I have had scarcely a twinge of the old pain.

I advise all who suffer from nervous diseases to lose no time in making a trial of the wonderful Porous Plaster.

MEDICINAL QUALITIES

—OF THE—

POROUS PLASTERS.

The Porous Plasters possess the soothing, warming and sustaining qualities of the combined plasters of the dispensatories. An Electrician, who has great experience of their effects in Local Rheumatism, in Tic Doloreux, and deep-seated nervous and other pains, and in affections of the kidneys, etc., etc., attributes all their sedative, stimulative and pain-relieving effects to their ELECTRIC qualities. He asserts that they restore the healthy electric condition (equilibrium) of the part, and that being restored pain and morbid action cease. He was amazed at the great number of beneficial indications produced by one of these plasters. He affirms that Head-ache is cured by one worn just below the breast-bone; that one placed over the navel will cure hysterics, as well as dysentery, and affections of the bowels.

PATENT
ARION PIANOFORTE

GRANDS AND GRAND SQUARES,
7⅓ OCTAVES.

The "ARION" is the very best Piano for the Great West, because it stands in tune longer than any other Piano. It requires no repairing or regulating; shipping any distance, or dampness does not affect them.

WHY?

It commences where the "First Premium" Makers stop, and upon the most improved Modern scale makes four patented improvements; which make the Arion more simple, yet stronger; increasing its volume and beauty of tone, while rendering the instrument more enduring.

WHAT THEY ARE.

First. The patent Arion Bridge, which retains all the purity of tone only found in a wooden bridge (the rest upon the strings lay), and obtains all the solid prolonged strength of tone of the metal Agraffe, without that acute metallic noise which the metal Agraffe develops by use.

Secondly. The Patent Arion Compound Wrest-Plank, which lasts the tuning pins—six thicknesses of hard maple, the grain of each layer runs in a different direction. The advantages are, the 20 tons strain of the strings cannot split the Arion wrest-plank, as frequently happens with other Pianos, and when people say "My Piano won't stand in tune," all other makers must use the single wrest plank with the grain running only one way.

The Arion Tuning-Pins have the wood to hold them on every side, while all other makers can have it only upon two sides of their pins.

Thirdly. The patent Arion Diagonal Sustaining Bar, extending parallel with the steel strings under the over-strung Bass strings. This is the only Piano where the entire scale of the large steel strings is resisted in the direction and direction. [illegible] part in all other over-strung Pianos.

STRONGEST IN THE ARION.

Fourthly. The Patent [illegible] centre-frame all [illegible] tone, and its frame is [illegible] of the wooden wrest plank, thereby preventing the great strain of the strings upon the [illegible] annoying it one [illegible] "Arion Frames" cover the entire wrest plank, even when split it cannot be seen, the wrest plank of the Arion wrest plank is seen.

THE ARION STANDS UPON ITS OWN MERITS.

unsupported by [illegible] Patents. We append a few unbought opinions of those who

KNOW THE ARION.

The Musical Director of the New York Conservatory of Music, Edward Mollenhauer, says: "The Arion I bought of you is the best Piano I ever played on; that rolling bass and silvery treble, etc."

John H. Woods, Piano Dealer, Oswego, N. Y., says: The tone is truly immense, and surpasses anything in the shape of a Piano we ever saw or heard of, etc."

Horace Greely says: "The Arion is the best Square Piano, superior for its clearness and brilliancy of tone," &c.

Louis Wagner, Fort Leavenworth, says: "My Piano arrived here in splendid order. Its tone fills my parlor with melody—it is the wonder and admiration of all who hear it. Miss ——, who is teaching the Piano desires me to order one for her," &c.

We desire agents in every city where we have not appointed them.

Dr. CADY'S CATARRH REMEDY.

A CERTAIN CURE FOR CATARRH AND ALL Mucous Diseases of the head, nose and throat.
This is a Medicine never before used or known to the public. Dr. Cady, the discoverer, was a sufferer from this terrible disease for twenty years, and after testing all the remedies extant—without relief—in his efforts to obtain a cure he discovered this UNEQUALLED REMEDY, which cured him in the short space of eight weeks.
It has been thoroughly tested, and has not failed in a single instance. Several of the most obstinate cases have been thoroughly cured by this remedy, after every other known medicine had failed. Every one who has tried it will testify to the truth of the above statement.
Every one afflicted with Catarrh should give it a trial and find out for himself whether it is a humbug.

Saratoga A WATER.

The Saratoga "A" Spring Water is probably the most effective mineral water found on either continent. It has ten per cent. greater mineral properties than the celebrated Congress Spring; four times that of Baden Baden of Austria; five times that of Aix La Chapelle in Prussia; twice that of Vichy in France; nearly three times greater than the renowned Seltzer of Germany; and equally over the Spas of Bath, England, and Kissengen in Bavaria.
The reputation of this water is based upon its effects in diseases of the stomach, liver, bowels, kidneys and spleen. It acts with wonderful benefit in cases of chronic dyspepsia, constipation, gravel, gout, Scrofula, cutaneous affections, general lethargy, soreness and prostration of the system.

CLING TO THOSE WHO CLING TO YOU.

BY DEXTER SMITH.

There are many friends of summer,
Who are kind while flowers bloom,
But when winter chills the blossoms,
They depart with the perfume.
On the broad highway of action,
Friends of worth are far and few;
So when one has proved his friendship,
Cling to him who clings to you.

Do not harshly judge your brother,
Do not deem his life untrue,
If he makes no great pretensions,
Deeds are great though words are few;
Those who stand amid the tempest
Firm as when the skies are blue,
Will be friends while life endureth,
Cling to those who cling to you.

When you see a worthy brother,
Buffeting the stormy main,
Lend a helping hand fraternal,
Till he reach the shore again;
Don't desert the old and tried friend
When misfortune comes in view,
For he then needs friendship's comforts—
Cling to those who cling to you.

TOMMY RAEBURN, THE AYRSHIRE HERMIT.

SCRAPS FROM THE NOTE-BOOK OF AN OLD REPORTER.

BY JOHN LYON.

Tommy Raeburn, the Scotch hermit, with whom the writer was personally acquainted, was the son of a respectable farmer of land, on a beautiful bend or curve of the river Irvine, three miles from Galston, and near the same distance from Kilmarnock, a populous town in Ayrshire.

His father was a quiet, honest, frugal man, and lived on his small farm in comfortable circumstances. He had a family of three daughters and one son. At his decease, Tommy took possession of the farm, being heir-at-law, and his three sisters were thrown portionless on the world to shift for themselves.

At the time of his father's death, he might be thirty years old, and was of a morose, solitary turn. He was a bachelor and employed an old servant of his father's to keep his house and dairy, who was known by the name of Margaret—Meg, the abbreviation of which answered all the purposes of less polite society. She had been in the family from the dawning of her girlhood, and was, in the estimation of her new master, a hard-working, saving lass. The surrounding farmers looked upon her as the fair choice of his affections, and found an argument for the discharge of his sisters as being a preliminary for Meg becoming the wife of the new laird.

The fairy dell of the Holm farm, three years after the death of Tommy's father, was well tilled, and was as productive as any other mailing in Crooked Holm Parish. But "it is a long road that has no turn," says the old Proverb, and so it was in Tommy's experience. His next neighbor, who was a freeholder like himself, and a cousin of his own, lived near to the highway leading to Kilmarnock; but the only way to the main road from his farm was a distance of nearly a mile round by the riverside from his house, which was not ten rods distant through a corner of Tommy's field. He, therefore, proposed to give him as much land in exchange for the privilege of making a new road to the highway, to which both parties agreed. Sometime after, however, they quarreled about the exchange, and Tommy would have the new thoroughfare shut up; but as the barter had been legally executed before two witnesses, Farmer Thornton held to the new road in defiance of the threats of Tommy, which led to much bad feeling on both sides, the one pulling down what the other put up, until they came to blows. Ultimately they went to law, where the case was decided that Farmer Thornton, by right of agrement, was the lawful proprietor of the new road.

Vexed with disappointment, and being naturally sour and dogmatical, Tommy swore a solemn oath before Meg and high heaven that he would never shave his beard, cut his hair, change his clothing, nor till his land until his ground was lawfully restored to him again.

A number of years had passed away from the time he had taken the oath before I saw this then wonderfully transformed man. His appearance was beyond any description I could give. He was covered with what had been home-made blue cloth, but so patched with all sorts of colored rags that no one could distinguish, at a short distance, the original groundwork. His hat was without a brim; his coat, vest, and pants were hanging in tatters like a sheep's fleece ready for shearing. His shoes had been worn out and made into clogs; his legs were naked, and the uncombed hair of his head and beard hung down over his back and breast more than two feet, matted together like a batch of cow's hair disgustingly besmeared. Tommy was a strong built person, over six feet in height, broad shouldered and well formed; but such a figure of rags and filth I have never seen before nor since. A crowd followed him through the street keeping at a respectful distance as if he had been a bear let loose for their amusement.

I had but recently come to Kilmarnock at that time, and had not heard of such an outlandish being, although I had a residence near the town. I was led by curiosity to inquire into the cause of his miserable appearance, the particulars of which I learned afterwards from himself in his own dwelling. My father-in-law being acquainted with him, took me to his place along with some other persons on a holiday frolic, as Tommy's land or hermitage had by this time become a special rendezvous for all persons who had any relish for the grotesque in human nature, or the beauty of rural scenery. It was enchanting to walk along the banks of the river with your mind filled to overflowing with the ideas of seeing a real hermit! The banks were beautifully shaded with large fir, oak and elm trees, casting their dark figures on the water. As you passed by the foliage of the green coppice, the large hawthorne hedges, with here and there a solitary crow cawing to a distant rookery, or a magpie chattering across the path, as inquisitive of your wanderings,till up a dark lane of shade trees your eye caught the lonely low thatched roof of the hermit. There his uncultivated garden lay in ruins overgrown with nettles, and young trees sprung from the fallen seeds of other years. Currant, gooseberry and rose bushes, with verdure of wild flowers, in their glory as fantastic as the proprietor himself.

In the fields around, six or eight cows were grazing knee deep in grass, where Meg with her milking pail might be seen bawling for Brawkie, Motherlike, Goodo'kin and other names belonging to her herd that came like children,beneath the great beech shade to wait their turn in milking. Tommy, with a crowd of visitors following him, would walk into his orchard, whistle, and a robin redbreast would hop on hisgreat red beard and pick crumbs of bread from his tongue. His green-houses, built for the pleasure of his visitors, were made of moss and seated where the birds above head had built their nests; everything was in keeping with Tommy's transformation. He had left human affairs to the poor despicable world, and cultivated friendship with the less intellectual of creation—the birds, the cats, and the dogs. His fame spread far and wide, and few travelers of any note left Ayrshire without paying a visit to the Scotch hermit.

Tommy grew big in the character of recluse and also in his own importance, and as every year added to his transformation and the natural growth of wildness around his dwelling, he gathered visitors from all parts of the compass. Edinburgh, London, Dublin and the continent each furnished their quota, who were seen occasionally driving their conveyances along the romantic turns of Whirlford and Crooked Holm, inquiring for the hermit's abode.

These visitors were a source of untold revenue to Tommy, and made the most of their visitations to gain their favor and acquaintance, as he had formed an opinion that a visit to London might add considerable to his fortune as well as further a secret desire he had to see the Queen, who might grant a reversion of the law-suit in Kilmarnock, an idea which had been fostered in his mind by some of his antiquaring friends through mere sport and a desire to satisfy his whimsical notions; but in the mind of the hermit it was a wise and lucrative suggestion through which he saw the dawning of a hope that he might thereby get rid of his oath and live like other men.

So to it he went. A light covered cart and horse well harnessed were soon provided, and Tommy, leaving Meg in full possession of the premises, dairy, etc., with strict injunctions to keep everything as he left them, drove off for London one fine summer morning in May, 1837, leaving Meg with, perhaps, the distant hope in her mind that when the plea was gained she might become Mrs. Raeburn!

By the time Tommy reached Edinburgh the provincial newspapers were filled with a description of his person and the design of his travel; and the fopish pleasure-seeking aristocracy of the city got up a mock public dinner to the man of rags, where speeches were made and every honor paid as if he had been another Garibaldi, seeking for sympathy and aid for the freedom of his country. In fact, he was led to believe that the honor of being made a free burgher of the city, would be presented to him before he left. So ignorant was he of civilized humbug, that Sancho Panza never entertained greater views of his personal greatness, than did our deluded victim of covetousness.

In Dumfrees and Carlisle, he was entertained by some of his former visitors, through mere complaceney; but beyond this, his journey was everything but pleasant, as he was often taken to the police stations to be examined for bringing crowds of people together on the public thoroughfares, in consequence of his strange appearance; and although not chargeable with their conduct, he was often severely censured, and let off, attended by a guard to see him safely out of the county.

Tommy swore many an oath, and raised his great mason-mell of a fist at his protectors, saying—"Lord, had I a grip 'o your wizens, ye eaten and spewed looking imps, I wud soon let ye see, yer ain thraples out o' whilk, ye make soe muckle braging." The Scotch dialect saved him, and he went on swearing, and driving, being arrested and liberated again, until his patience was fairly worn out. When at last he reached the acme of all his hopes safely in the city of London. In many of the towns and cities through which he had passed, no public houses of entertainment would receive him, neither could he obtain a seat on any of the mail coaches,—all of which facts greatly mortified our proud, independent, yet mean aspirant to notoriety, especially as he had often to sleep in his covered cart, and drive rapidly through large towns as his only security from mobs and the police.

In London, however, he managed to find some of his professed friends, who, ashamed of their former protestations of friendship made at his hermitage, could not but receive him with some signs of respect; but to procure him an interview with Queen Victoria, who had then but recently ascended the British throne, was rather beyond their power.

Doctor Bowring and Dunlop of Dunlop, who were both aspirants as representatives for the boroughs of Kilmarnock and Renfrew, were applied to as persons likely to obtain for him the desired interview, but they rejected the humble petition of the Scotch hermit, as they had done those of hundreds of similar applications made by other needy expectant constituents who, through poverty or desire of patronage, were daily on the hunt.

Tommy, I was told, had the audacity to apply to the Home Secretary, but all his endeavors were as futile here as elsewhere.

It was now wearing far into Autumn, and Tommy's heart was growing as bare of hope as the trees were of leaves. When, one morning, he was interrupted while in deep meditation respecting his return home to Ayrshire, by a genteelly dressed person who called at his residence informing him that Lord M———k wished to see him at Portman Square, at three o'clock p. m. of that day.

Tommy had seen this noble personage at his hermitage in Scotland, two years before while on his circuit as Supreme Judge of the Criminal Court, and therefore accepted with heartfelt thanks the invitation, with which he duly complied. I may just mention, by way of explanation, that shortly after Tommy arrived in London, a relation of the late Sir James Shaw, who was a native of Kilmarnock, took him to his house, and through his influence, protected him from many difficulties he otherwise might have been subjected to. He also had persuaded Tommy to wear an overcoat when he went out, which covered the rags and hair of twenty years growth with which he was adorned. Tommy, in his great coat, was duly conducted to Portman Square and there left to find his way, among a crowd of footmen, to the great saloon where he was introduced to a large assembly of ladies and gentlemen, with all of whom he was unacquainted, except one whom he instantly recognized as a visitor at his hermitage.

On entering the spacious apartment into which he was so unceremoniously ushered, he threw off his great coat and made his best bow to the company. The amazement and disgust of the party may be better conceived than described.

One lady, however, seemed much interested, and questioned him as to the cause of his appearance in London in such a guise. He told her of the road-fraud, of his solemn oath never to shave, cut his hair, change his clothing, nor cultivate his land until he had justice done to him, also of his desire to see the Queen, and to throw off his rags and be a man as he once was. He told her of the farm, and of Meg, and how he had repented taking the oath, and how he traveled for weeks among strangers who left him to suffer every kind of bad usage by the way, from his first entering England to his arrival in the city. A great many questions were asked by others of the party, and were answered by him in great simplicity, intermixed with a species of wit, to the diversion of the company.

On his retiring, a purse was put into his hand by this lady; and Tommy returned home that evening much gratified with his visit. Mr. McFee, the gentleman with whom he resided was not long in learning that the interested lady was no less a personage than the Queen herself, who had taken this private way of seeing the far-famed Scotch hermit.

She had read a paragraph in the London Times newspaper respecting him, with a short sketch of his life, and a statement of his desire to throw himself at the foot of the throne to gain redress.

This newspaper report was a mere farcical description, but it turned out a prize for a blank in Tommy's behalf. No words could paint the joy, exultation, and gratitude which he expressed when he was told that Queen Victoria was the person interested in his favor. It would have made the most morose laugh to see him open his great hairy mouth and shake his mass of uncombed red hair, behind and before, swinging it from one side to another, as if it had become animated, and had a design to fly off; while with a voice like far-off thunder, he roared and laughed, and kept jumping and skipping about like a wagon load of rags blown with the wind.

After this unexpected interview he remained in London two months, and was invited to several places of distinction. The newspaper reporters were not idle in following his track, and gained for him a notoriety far beyond anything recorded in the history of Daniel Dancer, or Mother Bunch.

Christmas was near at hand, and Tommy, like a child, was longing to get home. Old St. Pauls, the Tower, the Parliament House, Drury Lane Theatre, the Palace, and Newgate Prison; all of which places of note he had visited soon after his arrival, and which had been objects of much thought and speculation in his great cranium; dwindled into mere dots on the mirror of his reflection when compared with his old house at home; the tangled orchard, the great elm trees, the rookery, the crows nests, the rapid river sweeping round the Holm farm; and above all, his cows, his cheese cellar, and Meg! and that cursed road which was never out of his mind.

His friends tried to persuade him to stay until after spring, but Tommy's obstinacy in this, as in every other thing, could be moved by no kind of reasoning. He had seen an advertisement of a vessel bound for Leith, a place sixty miles from his home, which led him at once to conclude on going by sea rather than travel, and suffer the treatment he had had to endure in coming.

He had never seen the ocean but once at a great distance, from the top of London hill, a few miles from his own place, and then it looked like a broad mirror, glittering with varigated hues, changing with the clouds as they passed over its bosom, bounded by the misty mountains of the highland isles, with the crag of Elsia standing like a giant in its midst. It was to him, a scene of beauty; and he longed to behold its sublimity and to have it to relate to his visitors, his Sindbad adventures—as a part of the wonders he had seen.

He sold his horse and cart, and providing a good outfit, embarked for Scotland, having the good wishes of his friends. And above all a letter to the provost of Ayr, from an unmistakable authority in London, recommending another examination of the road-case settled against him in Kilmarnock.

Nothing extraordinary happened during the voyage, except rough weather, which in that season of the year on the German Ocean was no strange matter to the ship's crew; but Tommy, who had anticipated to see great whales and porpoises, and flying fish, was sick and confined to his berth till they landed at Leith.

In four days more he came in sight of "the Holm" farm, where he found Meg at work in the dairy, and every other thing just as he had left it eight months before, except a light covering of snow on the ground.

It would be folly to attempt a description of the meeting of Tommy and Meg. Neither would it be prudent to tell how she clasped his unwieldy body in her arms, and pressed his rough hairy face to her mouth; and how she did everything she could think of and a great deal more in the exuberance of her love and gladness,—she laughed, and wept, and kissed him and then laughed again. Then she showed him the cheese she had made, and the pork she had salted and dried, and two fine heifer calves added to his stock, and a great hole in the roof she had thatched, and everything that had transpired since he left. She also told him of the strange encounter she had had with visitors, who had carried off all his nick nacks as relics of their visit. While Tommy, the great traveler, stood before her as actionless as an Egyptian pyramid in the vast desert, enjoying the kind reception of his old housekeeper, who bustled about and made him a big cog full of whey brose and cut him a great whang o' cheese for his supper.

Let philosophers talk as they will of persons in this world being friendless, 'tis all gammon. There are no persons, no matter how prodigal, rough, cruel, or ruthless, but there are some kind hearts to yearn after them, to speak kind words to them, to cheer them in their misfortunes and sooth their despairing souls in the worst of difficulties. No matter how clumsy, how awkward, how slovenly, how deformed, still there is found some one to be a light foot, a ready hand, and a bright eye and quick tongue to love, cheer, and help them forward in, this, said-to-be ungrateful world. And where could be found such a bathsome, disagreeable being as Tommy? Not to mention his miserly propensities or the whimsical oddities of his eccentric nature, and the filth he had gathered around him; which were enough to disgust the most slovenly. Yet Meg could feed and caress him on his return, as a sister—ay, more, if we could have seen the mainspring that moved the machinery of her affection.

The solitude and wild rural grandeur of the Holm Farm so engrossed Tommy's attention, compared with the bustle and glare of London, that he seemed more content and happy after his return. His budget of strange mishaps on his way up through England, the sights he had seen, and the nobility he had conversed with, were themes of endless relation to the visitors who were daily at his place, now grown more numerous and more curious to see and hear a man who had traveled so far. The name of recluse was lost in his new character, and he assumed a familiar importance, compared with his former secluded habits. He had high hopes of his release from the bondage of his oath which he anticipated would be removed at an early date. And Meg was no less happy in her expectations, she was sure that Queen Victoria's request would meet and quash all other opposition that stood in the way of her master's right, when she would see him shaved and made clean again as he was once in her young days, when few could compare with his manly form as he walked with her to fastens 'een races, and bought her gingerbread and sugar-plums and when everybody said they would be married, Oh! those were happy days, but that road had been in the way until now, now she could see it in her silent contemplations, shut up, and Tommy happy.

During the ensuing summer the road question settled formerly in favor of Mr. Thornton was brought before the authorities in Ayr, and after a careful examination of the case, was again decided against Tommy, regardless of all his patronage and high hopes.

This blow of fate was not looked for even by his most considerate friends, who, through sympathy, would have willed it otherwise, and Tommy returned to his solitary domicile, broken down in spirit, to mourn over a life-penance and an irrevocable oath never to be canceled till death set him free. The value of the road was nothing. It was that dreadful oath he could never break, without perjuring himself, that haunted him through so many years of punishment. He became more gloomy, secluded and miserable. No one could cheer his disconsolate soul. He would sit for days together looking like a stone statue through the window at the desolation of his weedy orchard. No robin-redbreast came nigh him, and Meg, with all her kindness and attention, could not move him out of his lethargy. His friends flocked around him, and even Thornton offered to shut up the road, but all offers proved fruitless, to restore that obstinate but now broken heart; and thus he lingered on for weeks, sitting in his chair, with all his filth around him, and died,—died without making a will, and left all his miserly-gathered wealth, to be inherited by his poor sisters, who had lived in poverty, and whom he had never inquired after or owned as relations.

He had in the national bank of Scotland upwards of three thousand pounds sterling. His oldest sister's son took to the farm as entailed; and Meg, his faithful housekeeper, retired to the whirlferd, with a broken heart, to live on her penny-fee, which she had saved as a nest-egg, for a rainy day. The furniture was sold by auction and bought at a high rate. The dung-pit was also put up in lots and sold to the florists of Kilmarnock at a high price, as it had not been touched or removed for more than twenty years.

Thus ends an authentic tale of an inconsiderate man, who, but for his obstinacy, miserly propensities, and rash oath, might have lived in happiness, and died in peace, surrounded with kind relations and friends. But the fate and circumstance of his life, and the notoriety of his unnatural career, stamped him a singular being, led by a nightmare of fancy to become an odd figure, standing out from the ranks of all other deformities as a prodigy made by itself, to be wondered at, despised, flattered, and followed, as a gazing stock in the great drama of life.

PROGRESS OF ELECTRICITY.

CONTINUED.

It was an age of excitement. Napoleon, the young conqueror of Austria and Italy, now ruled as First Consul at Paris. The revolution had died to give place to a reign of war and violent convulsion; and Napoleon, the centre and source of the impending disturbance, yet always eager for scientific novelty, invited Volta to Paris to explain his new instrument. In 1801, crowned with his peaceful victory, the Italian philosopher visited the republican court. At three meetings of the Academy of Sciences, in the presence of Napoleon and the most famous philosophers of France, Volta lectured upon his incomparable discovery. He was crowned with the highest honors of the Institute; Napoleon loaded him with gifts and attentions; selected galvanism as his favorite branch of science; and offered a reward of sixty thousand francs to him who should produce in electricity or magnetism an impulse equal to that which had followed the invention of voltaic pile, or the startling experiment of Franklin. Of all the excitement of the age, none stirred the intellect more strongly than Volta's theories. The voltaic pile was believed to be the framework of the living organization. Napoleon and his philosophers were struck and impressed by the wonderful ideas. "It is the image of life!" said the imperious young conqueror, as he once watched some remarkable experiments. The brain was supposed to an electric pile, the nerves and muscles conductors of opposing currents, and the slow beating of the heart the effect of their united action. In moments of fierce excitement positive electricity flashed from the eyes and stirred the nerves; in periods of repose the negative controlled the system. Rage, valor, achievement were positive; submission and cowardice the current from the oppositive pole. On the battle-field the fierce conqueror, a terrible voltaic battery, flashed forth his electric currents in fatal profusion; his opponent yielded because his galvanic vigor had declined. The world dreamed wildly over the new machine, and men with their usual vainglorious presumption believed themselves gods.

These dreams were swiftly dispelled; but a series of valuable discoveries followed rapidly the invention of the voltaic pile. The first twenty years of the present century were made illustrious by the achevements of the new machine. A splendid throng of eminent chemists and electricians sprang up under its influence, and pursued with intense labor and wonderful discoveries the path pointed out by Volta and Galvani. France, England, Germany, Europe, and America united in advancing the science; and the names of Oersted and Ampére, Davy and Wollastone, Berzelius and a great company of men of genius, scarcely inferior to their leaders, won a renown in their peaceful pursuit that shines with a softened glory amidst the fierce military excitements of that troubled age. Of these men Humphery Davy was perhaps the most conspicuous. Poet, thinker, philosopher, Davy finally concentrated all the great powers of his intellect upon the study of the voltaic pile. He used it to unfold the deepest mysteries of nature. He discovered its wonderful strength and developed all its resources. Suddenly the most solid and the least fusible substances began to melt away into gases before the steady flow of the galvanic current. Water resolved itself into its gaseous elements. The alkalies liquified and left behind them their metallic bases. New metals were discovered whose existence had never been suspected. A tremendous heat was produced that burned gold and silver as easily as paper, and that even fused the firm platinum. A magnificent light was produced by burning potash such as man had never created before. The diamond was melted; the various earths dissolved; the composition of the air investigated; and it was believed that all the geologic changes of the surface of the globe were to be attributed to galvanic action. In fact chemistry became almost a new science under the reforming influence of the voltaic pile; and the brilliant researches of Sir Humphery Davy and his associates astonished their age by their singular novelty and their rare value to the artist and the mechanic.

Thus the dawn of the nineteenth century might seem to have been almost consecrated to the study of the electric forces. Yet it was also a period of intellectual excitement, and while Davy, Oersted, Ampére and their associates were startling the world by a succession of wonderful discoveries, the literary atmosphere resounded with a new school of poetry. Byron and Moore, Coleridge, Wordsworth, Keats, poured forth the language of passion or of reflection to countless readers, and literature united with science in aiding the progress of thought. At length, in 1820, Oersted, by a remarkable experiment, formed the indissoluble union between magnetism and electricity. The magnet as well as the electron had long been one of the mysteries of nature. Thales had observed its attractive properties, and had supposed that it was endowed with a soul. The Chinese and the Arabs knew that the magnetized needle invariably pointed to the north, and had employed it to guide their journeys by land or sea. Its variations were observed by Columbus, and studied with attention by the early Dutch and English navigators; its connection with electricity had for some time been been suspected, and Franklin had magnetized a needle by an electrical discharge. But it is to Oersted that we owe the grand experiment by which it was shown that the motion of the magnet depended upon galvanic currents. He showed that a magnetized needle was deflected or controlled by the passage of the electric fluid along a wire. The discovery produced a new ardor in every scientific mind; Ampére, Arago, Davy, Faraday, Henry, enlarged upon the thought; powerful magnets were formed by passing the voltaic fluid through a wire bound in spiral folds around an iron bar; and the principle was at last discovered upon which rests the crowning achievement of electricity—the Magnetic Telegraph!

Without denying the just merits of various ingenious inventors who labored earnestly, though unsuccessfully, to convey thought from land to land by electric currents, we may safely claim that an accomplished American was the first to combine the various discoveries of the science in a practical system and to produce the desired result. Professor Morse conceived the design of his telegraph as early as the year 1832. But to perfect so complicated an invention required long years of patient toil. He was to prepare and insulate his wires; to test the power of his voltaic battery; to adjust and invent his method of writing; to provide a telegraphic alphabet; to unite in one simple machine the countless improvements of the science; and to encounter a thousand difficulties that might well have appalled a less resolute and vigorous mind. None know the solitary trials and discouragements of each inventor but himself; no one can estimate too highly the mental heroism of these benefactors of their race. It was not, therefore, until 1837 that Professor Morse had even devised a tolerable plan, and had entered his claim as the inventor of the "American Electro-Magnetic Telegraph." His invention was received with wonder, doubt, or ridicule. The notion of conveying thought by lightning seemed the scheme of an idle dreamer, and many who saw the perfect instrument in the rooms of the inventor in its modest beginning had little hope that it would ever prove practically useful. But the telegraph was slowly and patiently amended. Each new discovery of the science was seized upon by the acute inventor to make it more valuable. Congress was at length induced to aid him with $30,000 in laying a telegraph between Baltimore and Washington, and in 1843 ten miles of the first American telegraphic wires were laid.

The experiment was unsuccessful. The wire had been passed through leaden tubes underground, and the electric current was dissipated in its passage. The inventor, not discouraged, at once raised his wires upon poles, and in 1844 the first line of electric telegraph was completed from Washington to Baltimore. Early in 1846 it was extended to New York. In the same year a line was opened from New York to Boston, and in 1847 one was completed from Buffalo to New York. And from that moment the iron avenues of thought were swiftly extended until they reached from ocean to ocean, and have bound the nation together almost as a single mind. Yet various difficulties, in the commencement of telegraphy, beset the adventurous inventor. Often thunder-storms interrupted the circuit and disturbed the whole process of communication. Sometimes trees, torn down by the wind, fell upon the wires, or the auroral electricity checked the free passage of the voltaic current. It was some time after the line was opened to Washington before any reliance could be placed on its communications, and often the messages would come in so unintelligible a form as to puzzle the most experienced operators. The art had yet to be learned, and it was only by long and constant use that it approached perfection.

One of the chief difficulties of the early telegrapher was how to pass rivers. The Hudson was then a barrier almost as insuperable as the Atlantic. It is true that, in 1842, Morse, with his usual foresight and inventive skill, had thrown an insulated wire under the water from the Battery to Governor's Island, and had even suggested an ocean telegraph; but the experiment was not renewed; and for some time after the opening of the first line it was usual for messengers to stand upon the shores of the Hudson and convey the news by waving flags. In 1848 a curious error was committed. The Convention at Philadelphia was in session to nominate a Presidential candidate; there was no line across the Hudson, and it was arranged that a white flag should be raised at Jersey City if General Taylor was nominated. It happened that a company of stock-brokers had formed a private system of telegraphing by means of flags, from Philadelphia, the price of stocks; and just at this eventful moment their agent raised a white flag on the Jersey shore. It was supposed to indicate the nomination of Taylor. The news was flashed over the wires from New York to the East; a wild excitement spread from town to town; one hundred guns were fired in Portland in honor of the candidate. The telegraphic wires were soon after broken, and the error could not be corrected; but, fortunately, General Taylor was really nominated the next day, and it was never necessary to explain the prophetic power of the telegraph. An ingenious American at length devised the plan of covering the wire with gutta-percha, and thus prepared the system of ocean telegraphs. Like a huge gymnotus, the electric current was soon to penetrate the deepest seas.

LIVE UPRIGHTLY.—The poor pittance of seventy years is not worth being a villain for. What matter is it if your neighbor Les in a splendid tomb? Sleep you with innocence. Look behind through the track of time; a vast desert lies open in retrospect; through this desert your fathers have journeyed; wearied with tears and sorrows, they sink from the walks of man. You must leave them where they fall, and you are to go a little farther, where you will find eternal rest.

A REAL REPRESENTATIVE OF THE MOST HIGH.

WRITTEN BY THE EDITOR, AND RE-PRINTED FROM THE MILLENNIAL STAR.

Concerning Jesus Christ, who may be termed his Father's disciple, it is said that through him was the Father manifested to the world. In other language, the virtues, the disposition, and the character of the unseen Father were manifested in the life and conduct of the Son, who had studied him, practised him, and was then acting him out; so that all who wanted to see what kind of a person the Father was, could behold him in the words and actions of the Son.

One thing is certain—Divine authority alone is not sufficient to make us representatives of God. Some men possess that, but nothing else. There is scarcely an attribute of Almighty God about them. They walk in the authority of their appointment, but not in the virtue, the grace, or the righteousness of it. Strip such men of their authority, and there is nothing of God left to be counted. They may be successful managers, wise economists, and excellent teachers of the things of God, because the faith of their associates and the Saints draw the Spirit down upon them; and yet, otherwise, they have scarcely an enduring quality of righteousness in their possession.

Why, then, are they called to fill certain positions in the Priesthood? For a very good reason: God requires a certain kind of business done, and they are able to do it. They are taken on trial; but it is not thereby proved or affirmed because they have certain gifts and powers, which it suits the Lord to use, that therefore they are really representing the Almighty, or advancing themselves towards celestial life. It may suit a gentleman to employ a man to preside over his workmen who are building him a house; but it is not thereby shown that that man, as a necessary consequence, is getting sufficiently refined or educated to live and associate with that gentleman in the house, after it is finished.

Neither does faithfulness or energy in carrying out the external duties of our calling prove we are getting much nearer the Almighty, or progressing towards celestial perfection. Fidelity in carrying out any Church business that may be entrusted to us is an indispensable requisite; and a man would be damned who did not possess it; but, indispensable as it is, it is not a very wonderful acquirement. It is so little an affair, that, viewed in the light of celestial principles, a man would be scouted who did not possess such a very, very first principle of Gospel life, and many other good qualities into the bargain. Any sectarian—any member of a mere party in politics would consider himself a poor tool, if fidelity to his party and energy in the business belonging thereto formed his greatest acquirement. Anybody and everybody worth mentioning in any little system is supposed to be capable of that. Shall, then, the Priesthood, whose aim is endless life—whose ambition is the perfection of the Godhead and its glories,—shall they consider that they meet the demands of God upon them, simply because they are faithful to truth, obedient to orders, or willing to support by their means the religion of their choice? As God lives, we may do all this, and have it done apparently well, too, and then be no better than any sectarian who sincerely believes his faith and earnestly upholds it. The highest principles of righteousness, that give grace, beauty and dignity to the character, and that live and burn in our exalted Father, may have to be begun in us after this is done, or, if begun, the foundation only may be laid. If we came into the Church aright, with a reformed character, of course we laid a foundation, but what is the use of that, except as a foundation? We are called to be exemplifiers of the very virtues of the eternal God. Jehovah's principles should shine in us so that seeing us, He may be seen. If we are content to be less than this, we are shams, instead of a royal and holy Priesthood. He who only represents God's authority, bare of His goodness and His truth, is but a poor apology for a Priest of the Most High God.

When a man is called to the Priesthood, he is then and there ordained to put down evil. He is not merely called to form part of a splendid organization. That organization is principally valuable because it is so well adapted to enable the Almighty and his servants to spread and keep alive the influences of the Holy Ghost, communicate their will to men, and carry out their purposes.

We are not called simply that God may have a number of men called Priests upon the earth. No. The holy Priesthood has been conferred on us for the express purpose that the Father and the Son may have representatives of their Spirit and their actions upon earth. We are ordained and appointed to act them out. The world is to comprehend God through us. As God was said to be "written in the face of Jesus Christ," so He is to be told out and made plain in our words and ways.

Godliness is not going to be loved, understood, or appreciated by the world, by the preaching of a cold theory of its nature. We have got to make them feel God by the force of His very nature diffused in us. "Holy Father," said Jesus, "the world hath known thee;" but, says John, "the Son who hath dwelt in the bosom of the Father he hath declared him." Such is our position in regard to God, if we really possess the Spirit as well as the authority of the Priesthood: we also are declarers of the Most High.

The heavenly authorities of the upper worlds, whose glorious characters shine white and pure, and free, and innocent, and whose virtues have lifted them up to their high estate, have stooped to attach us to their ranks. They have delegated us to stand and speak for them, to impersonate them, and to establish their order of society among men. Shall we not, then, be true and pure? Since heaven is made by the working of heavenly laws—by the practice of principles that work peace and goodwill within the bosom, they have called us not merely to preach principles, but to let their principles live in us.

To carry out these views, Eternal Wisdom has devised a glorious Church organization to exist among men. Some men actually seem to think that to get working this grand system of powers and authorities on the earth is the principal thing aimed at by God, and the principal thing worth rejoicing about. Hence they glorify themselves immensely over the wondrous power and increasing influence of the organization. They are very proud of it, and are anxious to roll it on. But they do not seem to care a straw about the internal principles of their religion, and scarcely appear to know that they exist. They do not appear to see that this glorious order of Priesthood, with the authority accompanying it, is but so much machinery created to bring forth, cherish, and establish on earth the virtues and characteristics of the upper worlds, and that the Priesthood is established solely, wholly, and entirely that it may work to that end.

And as, in the establishment of the latter-day dispensation, the great thing aimed at was not merely the erection of a gigantic, almighty organization, that should awe the world and rule it with an iron rod, so, as far as we are individually concerned, the great thing, the ruling desire with us should not be merely the getting distinction in that Priesthood, either by ordination or appointment, only so far as we make that a means towards the same great purpose that exists in the Almighty—namely, the celestialization of the world by the introduction of celestial practices in ourselves and others. We cannot think that our ordinations or appointments have necessarily advanced us one particle towards celestial life, only so far as we have made them do it, by taking advantage of the rich opportunities they have put within our hands to learn and get an insight into the real sources of celestial life. Ordinations do not celestialize; appointments do not elevate: they only authorize us to be channels of light to others and to ourselves, if we will. Our present standing in the Priesthood, therefore, does not necessarily represent our progress in salvation, although there will come a day when it will; for eternal authority will, finally, only be vested where the eternal attributes of God exist. But under the present state of things, if the whole world were ordained Apostles, that in itself would not make it a whit more heavenly; that alone would not bring it forward towards celestial life; it would only put the means within its reach. It takes intelligence, ruled by meekness, benevolence, justice, mercy, and uprightness in spirit and in deed, to celestialize. They will refine; and refinement of this class is celestialization The Priesthood, with its authority and order, is a glorious framework, destined to guard and nourish these principles, and to bring them to maturity and perfection.

The Almighty, then, has only given to us the naked Priesthood. The virtues, the graces—in a word, the power of it, we have to get ourselves. We have to clothe it and make it beautiful. A plentiful store, however, through the intelligence revealed, lies close to our hands to do it with. Let us arise and shine, and let old sterile priestcraft and those that live under its influence see our light. And let us live so in the purity of our religion, in the immaculate integrity of all its principles, till our very presence is as poison to the wicked, and misery to the corrupt in heart. No testimony against evil can be given with power by any man who is under the influence of that evil. A heart that is pure from selfishness or greed can roll out thunders against those particular sins; and so with all the rest. Appointments and ordinations cannot confer ability to testify properly against the popular sins of this generation. To be a real disciple and representative of Jesus Christ, bearing witness against the sins of the age, we must be clean every whit. Then from the depths of a pure soul will come a testimony that will burn where it goes, and condemn where it is rejected.

This, then, is true Priesthood—to be images of the living God, exhibiting in our characteristics His brightness and His strength; to be girt and endowed with the purity of His nature; to be unsullied in heart and mind; to stand by the strength of redeeming, saving qualities; to bless, and bless, and bless again, notwithstanding ingratitude in some,—building, sustaining, and protecting all the time; to fight all spirits of division and all principles of death; to help the weak, the down-trodden, and the helpless, till helping becomes our natural food,—working on all principles that yield nourishment, support and strength,—till our very presence is as the sun, cheering and blessing all. So shall God increase within us, refreshing our own spirits, and watering all around. And the characteristics of the holy Priesthood will grow out from us like the branches of a fruitful tree that yields shelter, shield and fruit.

Let a man do this, and he shall be a Priest indeed. His authority shall be like a two-edged sword. It shall be confirmed on him for all eternity; for God shall love him and shall bless him. His heart shall increase in richness and his mind shall grow in strength. No good thing shall be withheld from him. He shall save and gain influence over the hearts of men. He shall be as God among his own; and they shall feel the attributes that live within him, till their hearts are stolen from them and linked to him for ever. So shall he gain dominion, and increase in strength, and be really, truly, and eternally a representative of the Most High.

WOMAN AND PLURAL MARRIAGE.

No. 4.

The great difficulty with women is to understand why it is, if they grow equally with their husbands in capacity and intelligence, that they cannot so increase in influence with him as to leave no room for any love in addition to their own. The answer to this is, that the growth of their love is not a question of room or space, but of intensity. The weakest love fills all there is of a man, as much as the most powerful—although it is not equally influential. Each wife, therefore, fills, and must always fill, the whole of her husband's nature. But love takes up no room. Another love, be it weaker or stronger, can fill his being, and then another, and so on, each and all possessing him at one and the same time. No progress, therefore, that any woman can make can shut out any other love, although it can, certainly, increase the influence and potency of her own. Women can understand this in their own way. A Rose or a Lily can fill their whole souls with admiration of its beauty and fragrance, but while they are absorbed by its loveliness, they are no less filled with the love of other flowers at the same time. And to carry out the parallel, was any one species—be it Rose or Lily—cultivated up to its height of perfection, till it bloomed equal to a flower of paradise, it would leave as much room, power and capacity, for the love of other specimens as at the first.

And women are the flowers of creation to man, and, as it is with flowers or any objects of regard, each has her own special qualities and perfections, and each makes her own peculiar impression. There are no two women who impress a man alike, or that affect the same side of his nature, or touch it in the same way. They are distinct images in his brain and heart—hence the love of one never interferes with the love of the other in the slightest degree. One is as the Rose to him, with its peculiar graces and odor, and another as the Primrose with a beauty of another order and a fragrance of an entirely different kind In mind and person—in every manifestation of the soul within, they are distinct. There can be no rivalry, no comparison, no competition between such different impressions, and therefore no room for jealousy. If all a man's wives are truly mated and in perfect union with him—save and except, as one may travel faster in the virtues of Christ and in divine intelligence than another, there can be no preference or comparison.

And as it is with any objects of delight—no matter how numerous—love is not divided by the number upon which it rests. The intellectual man or woman knows that any one object of beauty in Sculpture prepares and intensifies his or her appreciation of one or a hundred objects in Painting, Poetry or Song. And so it is with men the more truly they love each wife, the more their love—nature is developed by the process and the greater the power and intensity with which they can love and appreciate the rest. And it must also be understood that each wife is loved with ALL his nature, not with a part, but with the collective power which all put together have cultivated within him.

If women will study men and themselves intellectually, they will see that it is true. They will discover that love is indivisible. They will also learn that man is a growing creature in his capacity for love as well as everything else. At one period of his career the love of one wife, one child, or one pursuit is all he is capable of. By-and-bye he enlarges his nature and finds himself possessed of a capacity for taking more within the circle of his affections. He does not love the first less, simply, there is more capacity within his nature than there was before. While ignorant of these truths, most women would, of course, value the possession of such a man's love far more when he could love but one, than when his powers of affection stretched beyond and included other objects within its domain. But the intellectual and developed woman, who values love according to its quality, and according to the character of the being who bestows it, sees that the love of the first kind—although she had in that case all there was of it—was as the love of a child compared to that of a man. She perceives that at the later period new powers of thought and appreciation are in his brain—new powers of sensation in his heart, and, consequently, that he is a greater man. Hence she would far prefer to be loved by him in his later condition than to be the sole object of his regard in his first.

Growing out of these facts is an important truth which all women will learn sooner or later, and that is, that if it were possible that another object of affection engaging their husband's soul could be obliterated, equally as though it had never existed, it would leave no more love for them, The only effect would be that their husband would be so much the poorer, while they would be none the richer. Thousands of men, not in polygamy, but who have a dead wife, know, that could it be proved to them that the departed dear one, absolutely, never existed at all, and her image eternally wiped from their hearts, that fact would leave untouched in extent and quality the love for the wife living there. That operation would make it no more nor less, although some women in their ignorance think it would. The truth is, every woman engraves her own image in her husbands soul; she carves her own niche; and, whether anyone else ever carves another or not, it is just of the size she makes it, and of the enrichment with which she, herself, endows it. Her virtues, her love, her wifely graces, her motherly soul, determines its own impression and influence upon her husband's heart Even he has nothing to do with its power It is what it is—as we may say—in spite of the husband himself, much less can it be aided by the absence, or weakened by the presence of any woman that lives.

In this respect, if in no other, man is a type of Deity. If all the blazing constellations of the universe, with their myriad intelligences, were swept out of existence, till but one soul remained to share its Maker's love, that one soul would be no richer in his regard. That one soul would still possess only its fixed unalterable and eternal value; beyond which it would be heir to no greater blessing by the change, than the impoverishment and desolation by which it was surrounded. And so with women who imagine what a heaven of love they would share, could every other such affection be banished for ever from their husband's hearts. Compared to the magnitude of affectional nature destined for woman's source of blessedness and love, the heaven they would gain would simply be a withered nature in the husband and a bankrupt life for ever.

It must be distinctly understood, all the time, that our assertions with regard to the results of divine plural marriage, are based entirely on the supposition of heaven-directed unions, and heaven-regulated marriage lives. The scheme in the mind of God is planned solely with an eye to an eternally progressive future. Polygamy is, therefore, in our opinion, a principle of progress, unsuited to the mass, by whose experience it never can be judged, except as they rise from the general condition to one of nobler life and holier aspiration.

The fears of women to day arise from their viewing men solely as they are, apart from the influences of truth upon their minds. They fail to realize their own divinity and native powers of progress, as well as those of men. In an undeveloped condition, women cannot sense what there is in men's natures for their, own, awaiting unfoldment. In their progress women will realize a divinity within humanity in its higher conditions, upon which they can rely. Growing in divine nature themselves—sensing the power of truth within themselves—in enlarging their own natures and directing their own esteem, they will realize the expansiveness of the human soul in man—and realize, more than all, the power of eternal truth in controling his judgment and his affections. They will know that man must inevitably arrive at a power of uninfluenced, righteous love. They will discover that, in the ladder of his progress, it is a round that he cannot slip. He may, like themselves, go backward for a time, or he may temporarily remain where he is; but he cannot yield to the pressure of his developing nature without weaknesses and petty partialities passing away before the light of a clearer intellect—and the quality to be attracted only by the highest, the purest, and the eternally lovliest, becoming fixed and unalterable qualities of his being. God is within man, and man cannot unfold himself without reflecting His qualities of judgment and righteous appreciation. But all this is no less true of women's natures. And upon this broad and solid truth, both men and women will rely for their influence and hold in each other's hearts. Women will know that all that true beauties of life or character can demand of God, Angels or men in esteem—or from a husband in the tender emotion of love—must be yielded to them; and beyond that they never can obtain.

Where will be the power of jealousy then? It will disappear in the sunlight of a greater knowledge. Women will fall back upon the advancement of their own perfections for their influence and love—not in rivalry, for what they gain will not weaken another's excellency, nor what they lose advance another's worth. Women will fear none but themselves. As they put on God, as they become adorned with the beauties of a Christ-like life, in its setting aside of self, in tenderness for other's pleasures, in its earnestness that all that is good in others should be known, appreciated and admired—so will they, by the great law of superiority of quality, make and take their own; and—firm as the influence of Deity—enthrone themselves in universal regard, but, more than all, in the deeper recesses of a husband's soul. And in proportion as women realize their husband's purity of purpose and his inevitable progress towards the divine quality of true judgment, so rivalry will die, having no food for life. Instead of fearing future additions to their husband's love—inasmuch as it can take nothing from them, but will add to him in whom their all centers; and by reflection on themselves—they will glory in every increase of that extending circle of affection, in the midst of which they and he are to be eternally embossomed and find their undying sources of variety, life, concord, and joy.

Thus, in the experience of plural marriage, where its true relations are sustained, women will find solid ground for all their hopes of enduring love—a foundation secure to them as the immortality of their own being, based on their own imperishable beauties of character. Qualities potent with all righteous and progressed beings, but sealed with a diviner seal, consolidated and assured by the ties of eternal affinity, in his bosom with whom the providences of the Great Manager of life has made them one.

Security of love, with such full return as all the dearest and deepest affections of her soul can in their very nature require for happiness, is all a woman needs. This she must have; and this her husband's progressed nature, constitutionally averse to others being loved, even by the same object as themselves, could they but be satisfied that all their love was returned, and assured to them forever. Their jealousies are not nature's voice protesting against the extension of their husband's love, but nature within them fearing for its own. It is not nature crying for a monopoly of love, but nature asserting the necessity of full and unbounded return. Women's jealousies are their fears, based on a consciousness of their own and men's present weaknesses, and the influences of external gifts and fascinations upon them. Their fears are a legitimate result of a state of things for which plural marriage was never intended. Divine plurality is adapted for only a higher plane of things, in which men must pass beyond such conditions of weakness; and a greater knowledge dissipate women's fears. If man perfects his character, until the love-like, qualities of Christ are developed in him—as all men must, or demonstrate their unfitness for plural marriage—they will fill the woman's being with that love; and being filled she will need no more. Her own happiness being assured, she will not care how many others join with her in loving qualities so precious in her eyes. The more others love him, the more she will rejoice that her heart's idol is lifted up; and the deeper and closer their love for him—seeing it cannot push her out—the deeper hers for for them, and the stronger unity with them.

The benefits of plural marriage to woman, like the benefits attending the pains and cares of maternity, lie not in its gratifications, but in its compensations. The difficulty of exhibiting these compensations to women at large, lies in the fact that they are of a kind which can only appeal to a noble, generous and improved nature. So the selfish and narrow woman, who lives for herself alone, who feels that every happiness or attention bestowed upon another is so much taken from herself, there is little promise, indeed. It is with the principles of celestial marriage as it is with the high and exalted sentiments of Jesus; they never can be realized by the mass as such. They must be lived up to, ere they can be sensed in their beauty and potency. There are, however, women, as there are men, whose hearts are sufficiently open to heavenly influence, to have felt that plural marriage—entered into in the true spirit, with a soul looking upward for every angelic influence—leads faster to development in man than any other condition. To such we say, one of the benefits of plural marriage to woman lies in the fact that it brings more of God and more of wisdom to them in their husband's life. They share a richer nature; they obtain a more God-like and a greater man. But their husband, a man entering into plural marriage, not from the promptings of passion or ambition, but from the demands of his nature for love as germinated by the unfoldings of Deity within him—and in no other plurality do we believe—then will that plurality develop in him a deeper and diviner nature; and his wives will experience an intensity of love as far superior to that obtained by women out of this order, as is the full grown love of man to the puerile affections of infancy and youth.

Another truth, to which we have referred, when realized, will give a woman peace. As divinely purposed in this system, none can come together for eternal unions, but such as the Almighty has decreed. None, therefore, can come to her husband from vanity, rivalry or passion. None can—while he seeks for heavenly guidance and waits on its providing—be led to unite with him, but the pure. Such only as are irresistibly drawn to him from the fitness and necessity of their natures. What can a woman have against such unions? All nature within her will rejoice that that which is harmonious and eternally suited should come together.

And now let us close this brief inquiry into so vast a subject. Let us review woman's condition in the perfect working of this order. Women, we say, will gain a nobler and more God-like consort for an eternal companion. They will have—and know they have—a deeper, purer, and more overshadowing love, because, coming from a heart more perfected in love. They will gain in the abolishment of rivalries and meannesses from their bosoms. And in opening their hearts to the angelic desire of seeing others happy, they will gain a purity and elevation of feeling which no lower life can give. They will learn that the tendency of women to converge the interest of their whole natures in their husband's joys and sorrows has a far more blessed meaning and a far grander result than they have ever supposed. For all the streams of pleasure flowing into his soul will by that union of spirit pass to theirs. In every love that takes his bosom they will share, loving and being loved by him—for they are one. No heart can be added to the family compact (when the union of husband and wife is perfected) that comes to his alone. And here, after all, is the greatest solution of the whole problem of plural marriage, and the most effectual cause of its freedom from pain and jealousies. It turns on the complete and perfect absorption of the wife in her husband. So complete will be the wedding of their natures, that he cannot love nor be blessed alone. Their lives will be bound up together; and he will find his happiness in their joys, while they will drink their deepest draughts of delight in the satisfactions of his being. And he will take them and their whole united love on to new sources of affection, honor and exaltation, worlds without end. Women will understand the mystery and import of the magical entwinement of their natures in all the pulsations of their husbands' being in that day.

SAXON LITERATURE.

POETRY OF ALFRED THE GREAT.

We will conclude our articles on Alfred the Great by specimens of Saxon literature from the pen of that illustrious founder of the English civilization and nation.

ON TYRANTS.

Hear now one discourse
Of those proud,
Unrighteous
Kings of the earth,
That now here with many
And various garments,
Bright in beauty,
Wonderously shine
On high seats;
Clothed in gold
And jewels.
Without these stand around Innumerable
Thegns and earls
That are adorned
With warlike decoration;
Illustrious in battle;
With swords and belts
Very glittering;
And who attend him
With great glory.
They threaten every where
The surrounding
Other nations;
And the lord careth not,
That governs this army,
For either friends' or enemies'
Life or possessions;
But he, a fierce mind,
Rests on every one,
Likest of any thing
To a fierce hound.
He is exalted
Within in his mind
For that power
That to him every one
Of his dear princes
Gives and supports.

HIS ADDRESS TO THE DEITY.

O thou Creator
Of the shining stars;
Of heaven and the earth;
Thou on high throne
Eternal governest,
And thou swiftly all
The heaven turnest round,
And through thy Holy might
Compellest the stars
That they should obey thee.
Thus the sun
Of the black night
The darkness extinguishes
Through Thy might.
With pale light
The bright planets
The moon tempers
Through the effect
Of thy power.
A while also the sun
Bereaveth that of its Bright light
When it may happen
That near enough
It necessarily comes.
So the greater
Morning star
That we with another name
The evening star
Here named:
Thou compellest this
That he the sun's
Path should precede,
Every year
He shall go on
Before him to advance.
Thou, O Father,
Makest of summer
The long days
Very hot.
To the winter days,
Wondrously short
Times hast thou appointed.
Thou, to the trees
Givest the south and west,
Which before, black storms
From the north and east
Had deprived
Of every leaf
By the more hostile wind.
Oh! how on earth
All creatures
Obey thy command,
As in the heavens
Some do
In mind and power.
But men only Against thy will Oftenest struggle.

Hail! Oh thou Eternal,
And thou Almighty,
Of all creatures
Creator and ruler.
Pardon thy wretched
Children of the earth,
Mankind,
In the course of thy might.
Why, O eternal God!
Wouldst thou ever
That fortune
At her will Should go
To evil men?
That in every way so strongly
She full oft
Should hurt the guiltless.
Evil men sit
Over the earth's kingdoms
On high seats.
They tread down the holy
Under their feet
Who know no crimes.
Why should fortune
Move so perversely?
Thus are hidden
Here on the world
Over many cities
The bright arts.
The unrighteous always
Have in contempt
Those that are, than them,
Wiser in right:
Worthier of power.
The false lot is A long while Covered by frauds.
Now, in the world here,
Impious oaths
Hurt not man.
If thou now, O Ruler,
Wilt not steer fortune
But at her self-will
Lettest her triumph,
Then I know
That thee will Worldly men doubt
Over the parts of the globe,
Except a few only.
Oh, my Lord!
Thou that overseest all
Of the world's creatures,
Look now on mankind
With mild eyes.
Now they here in many
Of the world's waves
Struggle and labor,
Miserable earth citizens!
Forgive them now.

ON THE NATURAL EQUALITY OF MAN.

The citizens of earth,
Inhabitants of the ground,
All had
One like beginning.
They of two only
All came;
Men and women,
Within the world.
And they also now yet
All alike
Come into the world
The splendid and the lowly.
This is no wonder,
Because all know
That there is one God
Of all creatures:
Lord of mankind:
The Father and the Creator.

He the sun's light
Giveth from the heavens,
The moon and this
Of the greater stars.
He made
Men on the earth;
And united
The soul to the body.
At the first beginning
The folks under the skies
He made equally noble;
Every sort of men.
Why then do ye ever
Over other men
Thus arrogate
Without cause?
Now you do not find
Any not noble.

Why do ye from nobility
Now exalt yourselves?
In his mind let Every one of men
Be rightly noble,
As I have mentioned to thee,
The inhabitants of the earth
Not only in the flesh;
But yet every man
That is by all
His vices subdued
First abandons

His origin of life,
And his own
Nobility from himself;
And also which the Father
At the beginning made for him.
For this, will
The Almighty God
Unnoble him;
That he noble no more
Thenceforth might he,
In the world;
Nor come to glory.

THE EXCURSIVENESS OF THE MIND.

I have wings
Swifter than the birds:
With them I can fly
Far from the earth,
Over the high roof
Of this heaven.
And there I now must Wing thy mind,
With my feathers,
To look forth
Till that thou mayest
This world
And every earthly thing
Entirely overlook:
This is the Wise King,
This is he that governs
Over the nations of men,
And all the other
Kings of the earth.
He with his bridle
Hath restrained around
All the revolutions
Of earth and heaven.

Thou mayest over the skies
Extensively
Sport with thy wings,
Far up over
The heavens to wind
Afterwards to view
Above over all.
Thou mayest also go
Above the fire
That many years ascends far
Betwixt the air and the firmament
So as to it at the beginning
The Father appointed.
He his governing reins
Well coerces.
He governs ever
Through his strong might
All the swift ears
Of heaven and earth.
He the only judge is steadfast,
Unchangeable,
Beauteous and great.

HIS PICTURE OF FUTURITY.

O children of men
Over the world!
Every one of the free!
Try for that eternal good
That we have spoken of,
And for those riches
That we have mentioned.
He that then now is Narrowly bound

With the useless love
Of this large world,
Let him seek speedily
Full freedom,
That he may advance
To the riches
Of the soul's wisdom.

LOCKE'S MACBETH MUSIC.

We will now return to our principal subject, Locke's Macbeth music.

The instrumental introduction to this singular, but great composition, opens in Scene second, Act second.

Locke must have fallen into a dreamy supernatural reverie to have portrayed so faithfully in his interlude the weird instrumental summoning of the witches, to hear announced by their messenger, the deed of blood.

The rhythmical construction and harmonical forms in this instrumental introduction, so visibly portrays the witchcraft method of assembling, that we fancy the hearing of their quiet, fantastic step before they appear, although—when they become visible—they seem to walk on air, and this proves the attention paid by the choral body to stage business as well as the music.

The witches having assembled, Hecate—Mr. Hardie—breaks forth in recitativo form, "Speak, sister, speak, is the deed done?" This declamatory section, of two bars, was delivered by Mr. Hardie with powerful energy and weird-like expression.

The question of Hecate is answered, in the same division of subject, by the first singing witch—Mrs. Careless—with the words, "Long ago." This remaining portion of the division takes more of the aria than the recitativo form, and its well constructed variations in skips and passings, and also in melodial inquieyo inspirations, are most expressive. This semi-aria portion was rendered by Mrs. Careless with fine singing effect, although we fancied her general pure and silver-like tone soprano voce was somewhat injured by cold, which detracted from some of her notes a portion of that clearness and perfect intonation which she is in the habit of producing.

The next division, "Many more murders must this one ensue," may be considered an accompanied recitativo, as much of the effect is produced by the accompaniment. However, it is full of powerful and expressive vocal declamations, and its harmonious exulting interpretations of the "spilling of much more blood" adds considerable effect to the recitativo. Indeed, Locke has portrayed in such vivid character the prophetic weird inspirations of the witches, that in fancy we behold the future spilling of much more blood by Macbeth.

Hecate—Mr. Hardie—in his rendering of this singular piece, not only gave its true expressive rendition, but his acting much aided the interpretation.

At the conclusion of the recitativo, the same words, "He must, he shall spill much more blood," was taken by the chorus in classical canonical imitation, and this splendid harmonic division was rendered by the choral body with great energy; great precision in time, and would have been finely intoned, but for two or three of the soprano voices who had not attended the rehearsal, and who, by their inattention, were a leetle out of tune.

A symphony of eight bars, taken from the canonical imitations, closes the first capital movement.

The first division of the second part opens with the recitativo, "Now let us dance," by fourth witch. The remaining three principal witches declaim alternately, "Agreed! agreed! agreed!" This was rendered with effect; but the culminating power was produced by the chorus on the harmony of the second inversion of the dominant seventh, modulating to C, the dominant of primitive key. The immensity of effect, brought out with the percussion and resolution of that chord, by the choral body, deserves honorable mention.

We cannot allow this opportunity to pass without saying what astonishing hits are produced by great authors, when employing compound harmonies, by their preparing to make grand points, and how full of meaning are their resolutions. Authors, with little genius and knowledge of combined sounds, will employ harmonies which, notwsthstanding their correctness in unity, will produce a horrid grating noise by the percussion, and a non-meaning progression will result in passing from the chords.

Following the burst of telling harmonies, we hear the full chorus, "We should rejoice when good kings bleed." The first four bars of this division contains only the major harmonic triads, and their inversions. These harmonies are employed for the reason of its being constructed in the first specie of counterpoint; note against note. Notwithstanding its simple harmonic combinations, it is characteristic of the opening period.

On the word "rejoice," a legitimate canon is invented, and the ascending seconds and descending thirds remind us of Handel's treatment of rejoicing passages; but although the interpretation is similiar to the method adopted by the above great composer, the passage is nevertheless original, as it was written before Handel's day. At the finish of the seven-bar canon an adjunctive period—in simple counterpoint—is added to strengthen the termination.

This is a fine classical chorus, and was rendered by the whole choral body with much energy, precision in time and correct intervalic intonation.

The semi-aria "When cattle die about,"—which followed the chorus—is a beautiful gem of modulation: it is full of effective harmonies selected from the various minor model forms of the ancients; and closes in G, minor.

This fine solo was rendered by Mr. Hardie with artistic skill, and espressivo appassionato declamation.

The following chorus "rejoice," being nearly of same character in harmonies and construction of subject as the last, we will pass on by saying it was a creditable rendering by the full choral body.

The solo "When wind and waves are warring," is a fine descriptive subject, and was delivered by Mr. Hardie with emphasis and effect.

The chorus "Rejoice," is again repeated, and we fancied that, notwithstanding its being pretty well done before by the choruses this time the vocal body put in more spirit—vim, in this finale chorus of the second capital division than they did in the former choruses of the same character.

The next division opens with a symphony of four bars, and introduces an aria gem, "Let's have a dance." This fantastic aria—which is constructed in six-four time,—is a splendid description in words, and in music, of the anticipated pleasure of the witches by the death of Duncan, king of Scotland.

Notwithstanding the vividity of the fantastic, descriptive passages contained in this melodial gem, it also abounds in graceful gliding progressions with intervalic variations. It also contains many fine telling harmonic modulations, which aid the descriptive melody in bringing out more vividly by the exulting anticipations of the weird assembly.

We have always admired the truthful rendition of this aria, by Mrs. Careless, and notwithstanding the tremolo of the vocal chords in her throat—produced by cold—in the rendering of her first solo, it was evident by her delivery of this fine fantastic composition that she had recovered the command of her voice, and was then not only enabled to produce perfect intonation, but playful expression, and graceful execution also. In fact, it was an artistic interpretation of Locke's ideas.

After the close of a five-bar interlude, a loud peal of thunder is heard, denoting an incantation; the whole body of witches kneel and burst forth in largo and weirdlike grandeur, "At the night-raven's voice." This is a grand incantation period of five bars; full of expressive harmonies, describing in vivid colors the witchcraft devilry and crime.

This slow, solemn, weird incantation was well interpreted by the whole choral body.

This chorus was followed by an allegro, spiritoso division in two-four time, with the words, "And nimbly, nimbly dance we still. The extreme change from the largo to the allegro produced an immense effect; and it was much heightened by the echo of the Soprano, alto, and basso voices behind the scenes, on the words, "To the echo," and "hollow hill." By some accident the Tenore voce was non-est and the quartetto was not complete: however, both the tutti voices on the stage, and the trio imitating the echo, brought down the house at the end of the scene, by their fine rendition of this piece. We have more to say on this subject in our next.

Not only are there hinges and joints in the bones, but there are also valves in the veins, a force-pump in the heart, and curiosities in other parts of the body equally striking. One of the muscles of the eye forms an actual pulley. The bones which support the body are made precisely in that form which has been calculated by mathematicians to be the strongest for pillars and supporting columns—that of hollow cylinders.

TERESE, THE HEBREW MAIDEN;

OR,

NOT ALL DROSS.

BY EDWARD W. TULLIDGE.

CHAPTER LXXV.

AT THE FOOT OF THE SCAFFOLD.

To Newgate and the condemned cell on the last night of Farinelli's life: so thought all London. To-morrow morn at ten o'clock the people promised themselves a great treat; that treat was to see a man hanged who had caused a tremendous excitement in the country. There is no circumstance that will create such a horrible interest in the public mind as an execution. The people are more than eager,—they are mad to witness the hanging of a man. The worst instincts of human nature are excited. A mob of twenty thousand will virtually crowd a poor wretch's life out of him before the hangman's fingers touch him to adjust the fatal rope.

All that a sensitive imagination could realize of this and similar circumstances connected with a public execution of fifty years ago, poor Farinelli and his bride realized to the fullness on the night before the dreadful day of his doom. They both felt themselves at the foot of the scaffold.

Of course, the circumstance of Clara Garcia being with Farinelli in his prison, and of her private marriage with him, was altogether unknown to the public. Indeed, Sir Richard Brine and the Governor of Newgate had far exceeded their prerogatives in permitting such an uncommon case; but, as the secret was in the hands of themselves and Sir Richard Courtney, they never assumed even a knowledge of the fact that Clara was with her husband. The only man guilty of knowing anything of the matter was the sympathetic jailor, who, besides his sympathy, had been handsomely rewarded by Sir Richard Courtney. Brine and the Governor adopted the singularly conscientious way of performing their duty as did Nelson when he put his spyglass to his blind eye, not to see his admiral's signal; and England afterwards put the glass to her blind eye not to see his breach of naval law, and to honor a great man for his sin of disobedience. So to make an innocent man happy in his last moments, all were blind to the fact that Clara Garcia was in Farinelli's cell on the night before the intended execution.

"Hark, Beppo—dear Beppo, what noise is that?" exclaimed Clara, as she threw her arms around her husband and clung to him in terror.

"Clara, my faithful one, we are standing at the foot of my scaffold."

"No, no, Beppo, they cannot be so merciless as to hang an innocent man."

"They are erecting my scaffold, Clara. Hear you not the strokes of the hammer at every fall?"

"Then, Beppo—husband, it shall be 'one in death.' We must prepare for the sacrifice. I will be the priestess. Never shall you mount that dreadful scaffold Prepare! for I am ready."

Clara Garcia had been an actress all her lifetime. She had been trained to the tragic ecstasies, and now she felt one in reality. She was sublime in her tragic spirit then, for she had resolved that none else than his devoted wife should be her husband's executioner. She had arranged that a Catholic priest should be there at twelve o'clock that night, to receive their mutual confession, and to give them absolution from all their sins of mortality. She looked at her watch: it lacked but five minutes of twelve. A moment or two later the good priest was with them.

The confession of the follies of human nature was freely made to the representative of the holy church and absolution of their sins pronounced by the lips of one who conscientiously believed that God—not himself—absolved by the mouth of the church the sins of two penitents. This solemn service through, the good priest, spent the hours with the condemned man till four in the morning, sustaining him and his wife with spiritual comfort. They then urged him to leave them alone for a few hours to prepare themselves for the dreadful tragedy so near at hand. But they told not the good priest that they had resolved to arrange one between themselves which should prevent the hideous execution on a public scaffold. That part of their sins, if sin it was, they confessed not.

Again they are alone, and the sound of the hammers which they had heard through the night had ceased. They understood the import of this. The scaffold was finished; the scaffold awaited its victim in the imagination of the working men of London who already began to be astir. Signor Farinelli was at the foot of that scaffold. It was five o'clock, and the hangman also waited to perform his hideous work.

The eyes of the victims of circumstantial evidence looked into each other for several minutes with unspeakable agony mixed with supremest love. Farinelli then took the hand of his wife, and they both knelt. The poor singer then, in his rich voice—richer from emotion and tragic fervor, confessed to God what he had not dared to confess to his servant. There is in man, whose soul is itself a deity, this sublime faith in heaven which enables us to approach the tribunal of the Great Judge with less of fear than we approach one of ourselves sitting in the judgment seat. So the innocent Farinelli now knelt with his wife and told to heaven the appalling circumstances which surrounded them, and of the terrible responsibility which they were about to take upon themselves of ending their lives together rather than permit the scaffold to receive its victim. Farinelli closed with a humble appeal for forgiveness, and then he arose and said calmly to his wife—

"Clara dear, I am ready now."

The wife replied not, but from her bosom took a small bottle and uncorked it. She then held it before her eyes for an instant as though measuring its deadly contents, after which she deliberately put the bottle to her lips and drank half of it. To her husband's lips she next carried the deadly vial and he received its contents from her hand with a satisfied smile.

"It is finished!" she said; "I have played the high priestess in this sacrifice."

"And nobly, Clara dear, have you played your character. Let us, my wife, confirm our act with a kiss of everlasting love, and then in each other's arms await our deliverance of death.'

At this moment, hurried footsteps of men were heard.

"Clara, we are just in time. They come; yet I thought it not so late."

Scarcely had these words fell from the lips of the foster-brother of Terese Ben Ammon, when the door of the condemned cell opened and Walter Templar flew in and caught Farinelli in his arms. Upon each other's necks they wept: Farinelli wept to realize that the world would now know that he was innocent, and Walter Templar wept in the belief that he had arrived in time to save the life of his friend. These tears were pardonable in our hero, for he had himself just been delivered from a dungeon and death; and they were pardonable in the condemned man, for he had been just delivered from worse than death—the apparent guilt of murder and the felon's fate. Clara Garcia looked on with an indescribable air of triumph; Snap, with a feeling of supreme satisfaction, Frederick De Lacy felt his soul gush into his eyes in its rapturous delight.

"Walter, I thank my God that my eyes have seen you before I die."

"My dear Farinelli, you are not to die," observed Snap with a smile.

"Yet, I wish, Walter, that you had arrived ten minutes before; it would have saved us from a terrible act."

"What mean you, brother," inquired Walter anxiously.

"Your wife swoons," said Snap, as he caught Clara Garcia in his arms. "Ha! what is this? a small vial in her hand. Poison!" he exclaimed, putting it to his tongue. This must be seen to. Take the lady, De Lacy. Now, this all comes of being in a hurry. Impatience is a vice, I have told Sir Herbert Blakely that a thousand times. Open her teeth, Frederick. There, now, my dear madam, is a little more poison for you; and you, my dear Farinelli, drink the other portion. Now, to poison people is just to my taste—it is scientific. So, so, my good Farinelli, I have sent you to join your wife."

Snap, in the meantime, had been busy. He never talked without acting also. He had taken a similar bottle from a small pocket in his waisteoat where he always carried this particular vial. The effect of its contents was more subtle than the poison, for no sooner had Farinelli taken it than he fell into Walter's arms apparently dead. Just at that moment, Sir Richard Brine entered in great glee with the governor of the prison, but their pleasure was turned to sadness when Snap informed them that the victims had poisoned themselves.

"What a terrible misfortune!" observed the governor of Newgate.

"A misfortune, sir," replied Snap, "I think it a blessing."

"A blessing, Mr. Nathans, now Sir Walter is living?" said Sir Richard Brine, in much surprise.

"Yes, Brine. Would you have my friend pardoned by the Crown because he is innocent? I say, if he is innocent as you now know he is, then is he more worthy of death than of pardon. Upon my soul!—and I very seldom condescend to swear—I am proud of the noble fellow who waited not for mercy, when he did no wrong, and had courage enough to execute himself. Thus would I. And the lady, too; I do believe I am in love with her."

"I grant, Mr. Nathans, the fallability of our law to pardon the innocent, but I cannot understand your levity."

"I never indulge in levity, Sir Richard Brine. Your ear."

Snap then whispered a few words into the ear of Brine who nodded and appeared wonderfully satisfied.

"You are right, Mr. Nathans, I ought not to have doubted you: I have learned that you are a strange and terrible man in your intellectuality, but I have also learned to trust you."

"So did General Blakely, Sir Richard; and I will make many trust me yet. It is my only price!"

"Shall I tell our secret to the governor, Mr. Nathans?"

"Yes, Brine; and let him bring the prison doctor to prove that these innocent friends of ours are dead and need no pardon from the Crown for being innocent."

Brine whispered to the governor, who appeared equally satisfied with himself, and who then was about to hurry off, but was prevented by Snap continuing:

"Governor, you need not hurry: our friends are dead. They'll keep for twenty-four hours. First send for the prison doctor. If he is as wise as doctors mostly are, let him live wise till the end of his days. I have a wondrous respect for wise men. Next publish to the citizens of London that Sir Walter is living and therefore Farinelli ought to be hanged, but that he has killed himself to save the hangman so much trouble and the mob so much woe at witnessing his execution."

The governor left to do the strange man's bidding. Walter Templar and Lord Frederick De Lacy seemed also to trust Snap and to understand him, for they also were satisfied. As soon as the governor of Newgate was departed, Snap seated himself and began one of his sermons:

"Perhaps, Sir Richard Brine, a little philosophy to suit the occasion will interest you till the governor's return."

"Go on, Mr. Nathans; though I expect you will shock my orthodoxy."

"Orthodoxy! Yes, it is orthodox to pardon an innocent man, when you have proved him so. It is orthodox to hold the law infallable. Now, 'tis truth to hold it fallable. Infallability is a humbug, sir. The Church has claimed it; the State has claimed it; the Law affirms it by hanging men; Divinity presumes upon it by sending men to hell because human nature hath its flaws and spots. Have not the very heavens their clouds and night. Would you punish Nature because she is not all day? I say the heavens themselves are fallable. Why blaspheme the truth with lies, because lies are orthodox. There is no such truth as infallability, no perfection that has not some degree still more perfect beyond it, no truth that leaves not something yet untold. God sends us angels, so they say, to tell his truth, but yet how poorly do they tell it. They but reveal ourselves a little above ourselves. How can the Infinite One reach our finite minds? Is not all experience proof that everything which has entered into that experience is very fallable. Is not God and Nature, as high as we can reach, at fault sometimes? Beyond our reach, I grant, all may be perfect light and truth, but that perfection has not yet come. Own then that the law is fallable; and when both Church and State humbly confess as much, they will not hang innocent men, nor damn weak ones because they are not strong. But here come the governor and the doctor."

Those officers of the prison entered, and Farinelli and Clara Garcia were pronounced dead. The statement was circulated among the public, and that day, by due permission from the authorities, the corpses of the victims were delivered up to their friends. Snap had them borne in coffins to his own room in the house of his uncle Isaac Ben Ammon. If Snap possessed any secret, he kept it, for he had resolved the innocent Farinelli should not receive a pardon from the Crown. We shall learn his secret. The victims are in safe hands for Snap always made a point to hold the winning card.

CHAPTER LXXVI.

REDEMPTION OF THE DE LACY ESTATES.

Sir Herbert Blakely was in prison. Newgate, where his victim had spent four months of agony, was now his home. His entire estates and wealth were now in the possession of his son Arthur, though the man of an evil life knew nought of this son, for Snap was not prepared to communicate the intelligence to him as yet, and as he was in prison under such capital charges, it was easy to keep the knowledge from him. The exact motive of his old Mentor Snap was not clearly seen in thus withholding the knowledge from Sir Herbert, though we shall find that he had resolved to close the last act of his former master's career without a prolonged agony to those concerned. It was expected that Blakely would be transported for life, and not hanged, for his designs of murder and other crimes, for the Crown was now forced to accept the burden of its condemnation of the innocent Farinelli, whom it had duly pardoned, yet supposing him dead. The Crown was therefore only too anxious to cover over its own sins, and so the entire case was not pressed against Blakely, but the fate still more terrible than death for him, so thought the public, and that fate was transportation from his wealth and rank to the convict's land, to drag out the future of his days in their brutal society. Hence, though Snap designed a meeting between him and his forsaken wife and child, it was shaped not to take place until the last act of Blakely's career in England—perhaps Snap had resolved more, for he was as we know a terrible man, when necessity prompted him. He even shuddered with disgust when the convict's fate, for his old master presented itself to him, and would hurry away with supreme dissatisfaction, muttering:—

"That is worse than butchering a man to give him his quietus. Ugh! A convict. I must solve that for my dead master, for he trusted me. Shall his son be a convict or ——?"

We have already informed our readers that General Blakely by a solemn declaration of a dying man had acknowledged his grandson Arthur, and left him by his last will and testament his estates and wealth. These testaments had been duly witnessed by a leading noble of the realm, who had figured largely in the affairs of the county. They were also drawn up by Wortley, the eminent lawyer who directed the management of the Blakely affairs. Sir Herbert had in reality, though without knowing it, possessed the inheritance by permission and in trust for Arthur, seeing that the General had bequeathed all by will to his grandson. So fully had the old man trusted Snap, that all discretionary power was reserved in his hands, so that on all important occasions, he might act for the General as he would have done himself, were he living. The old man was so abundantly confident of the capacity of the subtle Mentor whom he left his son, and so thoroughly had he trained him from his boyhood into his own purposes and thoughts that in Snap he felt satisfied he had transmitted himself in the direction of the affairs of his family. And as all these views of the General were stated in his testaments and fully known to lawyer Wortley and the nobleman already referred to as the other witness, now the prospect of a felon's fate lay before Sir Herbert the executors and lawyer fully agreed and acted in concert in placing everything in the hands of young Arthur according to the will of his grandfather. The circumstances of the De Lacy estates, therefore, now also lay between young Arthur and the Courtney side, and the settlement was made with mutual good will.

The noble-minded young man—the son of the forsaken wife—insisted upon repairing the wrongs done to the De Lacys; and in the redemption of the mortgage, refused to receive more than his grandfather had advanced to Lord Reginald De Lacy. This also the executors and lawyer Wortley agreed with, for they had before them an example in Sir Herbert that the end of the wicked man is hard—binging its own retribution. It was moreover wise policy to allow young Arthur to act nobly, for in thus doing, he was wiping from the public mind the wrongs and crimes of his father. Sir Richard Courtney frankly accepted the designs of the young man for a restitution, and so the De Lacy estates were to be redeemed by the payment of the original hundred thousand pounds advanced by General Blakely.

Lady Ida Blakely, the forsaken wife, was now acknowledged in society in her proper rank and character; and the influential Courtney family had already introduced her and her son to the most select circles of England's aristocracy. Generous people, out of sympathy for the afflicted and noble youth and his mother, seemed to hide their knowledge of Sir Herbert's crimes, and the fact that he was lying now in a felon's jail. All circumstances considered, Snap and the representatives of General Blakely in the matter, believed that they were acting as the General himself would have desired them, to perpetuate a more honorable name in his grandson, even though at the sacrifice of some of his former evil purposes. Thus was the betrayal of the De Lacy family wiped out by the noble youth—Arthur Blakely.

The De Lacy estates were redeemed by Terese Ben Ammon by the wealth, and according to a cherished design of her uncle Judah. She presented her affianced husband, Sir Walter Templar, with the redeemed mortgage, insisting upon the consummation of the dearest purpose of the Courtney family prior to the great marriage day, which should unite in the bonds of the holy church Frederick De Lacy with Eleanor Courtney, and Walter Templar and Terese Ben Ammon. There now remained the solemn fulfillment of the promise of Sir Richard Courtney made to the dying De Lacy to remove his remains at the redemption of his house to the sepulchre of his ancestors.

CHAPTER LXXVII.

THE DEAD REMOVED TO ITS OWN SEPULCHRE.

It was a great but solemn day to the Courtneys and the last of the De Lacy race.

Lord Frederick was taken with solemn pomp from the Courtney sepulchre. Eight gentlemen, friends of the two honored families, bore the coffin of the nobleman from the Courtney burial place and through the little village near by. First came behind the dead, Frederick De Lacy and Walter Templar as the chief mourners, next Sir Richard Courtney and Lady Templar, then Eleanor Courtney and Terese Ben Ammon, afterwards Judah Nathans, who had redeemed, by his wealth, the estates, out of love for his sister's orphan. That strange man walked alone! It was the emblem of his life and character. Alone in infinite space would have suited Judah better than being in a crowd in any part of the universe. Milton made his Satan proudly feel "Better to reign in hell than serve in heaven." Judah Nathans would have made his impiously say "Better to be above all heavens or hells" in his own great individuality. So Judah walked alone in that procession of the dead as he walked alone in his life and thought.

Next to Snap came Lady Ida Blakeley and her son, Arthur, and behind these a long train of noble friends to honor the De Lacy in his removal to the tomb of his ancestors: preceeding the train of mourners was a cavalcade of chariots and carriages, with the hearse behind. As soon as the procession had passed the village, the coffined remains were placed in the hearse by the noble bearers, and the members of the funeral procession entered their chariots and carriages. The cavalcade then moved slowly away towards the De Lacy Castle, and when it had proceeded three miles from the village the horses were put upon a slow solemn trot. At ten o'clock at night the procession reached the De Lacy Castle and as it passed through the villages adjoining, the ancient tenantry of the old family gathered with torches, and followed on foot. There was a grand midnight burial. Sir Richard Courtney had fulfilled the promise to his dead friend, who was now entombed with his race.

The tone of mind of all the mourners, friends, and tenantry of the De Lacys was one of a satisfied solemnity as they laid the remains of Lord Frederick in its last resting place: all partook of it but Snap. He was cynical as usual, and as he left the sepulchre, he muttered to himself:

"Now, I would prefer, like the old Romans and Greeks to be burned after death. To mingle infinitely with the elements of the universe would please me better than this rotting. Ugh! I am disgusted with this rot of mortality. I would be a life and a spirit in the elements. 'Twould be a scientific consummation of me even if there be no hereafter, immortal at least in the immortality of the universe."

This, also was like Snap whose dross he would consume by fire. The baptism of fire was according to his mind, for it was spiritual. But there is the blessed immortality which this man of science had not fully found out through faith, but from the sphere of which the spirit of Lord Frederick De Lacy looked down and smiled when the hand of his beloved friend, Courtney, helped to lay his mortal remains in the sepulchre of his own family, after the redemption of their estates.

CHAPTER LXXVIII.

SUNSHINE AT LAST.

Sunshine, and almost home. The great day of the marriage of Walter Templar with Terese Ben Ammon, and of the union between Eleanor Courtney and Frederick De Lacy had come. All was upon the very brink of consummation, which was anticipated in the compact at the death-bed of Lord De Lacy in our opening chapter. Many events have crowded themselves upon us since then, and the lives of some of the characters of our story have appeared with sunshine and with storm. Such is life and such to some extent we may expect it was afterwards with those whose sun of happiness is resplendent now, and which never sat again for many a year, for Walter and Terese, and Frederick and Eleanor lived to the "good old age" of the righteous.

It was the marriage day. In the great mansion of the Courtneys in Somersetshire a brilliant assembly was gathered for the joyful celebration. Sir Richard Courtney and Lady Templar were overwhelmed by a great joy, almost as much as were the young folks themselves; for in this marriage there was so much fulfilled for which they had lived almost exclusively, for well nigh a quarter of a century. The De Lacy estates were redeemed by Terese Ben Ammon, the Hebrew bride of Walter. Eleanor and Frederick De Lacy fondly loved and were mated, and thus was the prospect which comforted Courtney's lamented friend in death about to be realized—that their race would become one in their grandchildren. Moreover, he who had been as dead was now alive again—the lost was found, and in that finding was fulfilled all the happiness which could come to the Courtneys, the Templars and the De Lacys in this life. There was one beautiful shadow—not cloud—however in the view; it was Alice, the bride of heaven. They could not help remembering that she was no more of earth, but Oh, how could she be dead who had in her dying, and by her angel presence brought about so much good to all. They felt that she was with them on that great marriage-day, and that none rejoiced more than she. The shadow of her spirit-light fell on their path on that blissful day, but no cloud of hers was there.

She was not dead!

It was the marriage day, and Isaac Ben Ammon was present, supremely happy but somewhat doubtful. There was such a mixture of perplexity and joy in the venerable patriarch's manner and countenance this morning, as to be almost ludicrous to the eye of his observant nephew, Judah, who in spite of his Mephistophelean character could not repress a smile of genuine delight, such as children feel when they meet with anything really funny. There was that grand old man—a very type of his Hebrew race of the fervent age when Jews were enthusiastic believers in the redemption of the house of Israel—there he was as he appeared on that marriage morn of his beloved grandchild, amid that crowd of Christian aristocracy, dressed in full Jewish costume. Never before had the old man mingled as a member of a Christian circle of nobility, who treated him with reverence as much as though he had been an Archbishop of the Church of England. He had sustained in times past, business relations with nobles, princes, and even emperors, but he had done this in his character as a wealthy Jew, and in the peculiar calling of his race. But now as the grandfather of Terese, the bride of a Christain nobleman; he was received by that brilliant marriage circle that morning as one of its own patriarchs. The aged Hebrew could not comprehend it quite. He would have understood it well had they spat with scorn on his Jewish gabardine. He would have borne it meekly, but with that grand pride of meekness which so well becomes that race which for well nigh two thousand years has borne such grievous wrongs. Just before the bridal party set out for the village church, Isaac Ben Ammon sought his nephew, full of that mixture of perplexity and joy which we have noticed.

"Hither, Judah!" said the old man, beckoning his nephew to follow him aside.

"Well, uncle Isaac, what is it?"

"Thinkest thou, Judah, that the Lord has rejected Israel? Seest thou not how these Christians treat me? Verily they think me one of them. Didst notice they did not spit upon me when I entered with my Jewish gabardine? Nay, sawest thou not how they bowed with reverence? Has our father's God rejected me because I have given the child to the Christian noble? I cannot understand it, Judah; yet 'tis very pleasing not to have the Gentile spit upon us, but very sinful to rejoice at it."

"Be satisfied, uncle Isaac; the Lord has not forsaken Israel, but the Gentiles are coming to the brightness of his rising," said Judah, diplomatically, knowning the best way to satisfy his uncle, was to humor his Jewish sentiments.

"Right, Judah! It must be even as thou sayest. Arise and shine; thy light is come. The glory of the Lord is risen upon thee. Ay, Jerusalem shall be rebuilt and Zion become the glory of the earth, Messiah must be near at hand, Judah. How will the Gentiles bow to him when even now they spat not on my Jewish gabardine, but paid me reverence. Yet art sure, quite sure, nephew, the Lord is not offended that I give my child to the Christian noble?"

"Did not the God of our fathers, uncle Isaac, send the angel to Terese to bring about these blessed results?"

"Right, Judah; so He did."

"And was she not the Christian, Alice Courtney, which signifies, uncle Isaac, in our case, that He designs the Christian and the Jewess to mate."

"The wisdom of Solomon is in thee, Judah."

Snap knew that he had left the subject in as much mystification as before, but he also knew His sophistry would satisfy his venerable uncle, who had now all the simplicity of the child. He did but what men of intellect ever do, mystify the world, because they cannot teach it wisdom.

Soon after Isaac Ben Ammon's conversation with his nephew, Sir Richard Courtney came to him, and taking him by the hand, led him to his own carriage, and gently seated himself by his side. The rest of the company took Sir Richard's cue, and in five minutes, the long line of carriages was filled with the happy throng and the bridal cavalcade started for the village church. At that moment, as if by preconcerted signal, the bells of the church struck up a merry peal, as though the country everywhere rejoiced. Why linger on that bridal day? suffice, in another hour Walter Templar with Terese, the Hebrew Maiden, and Frederick De Lacy with Eleanor Courtney, were united by the holy ceremony of the church. Alice Courtney looked down from her sphere above and smiled.

CHAPTER LXXIX.

HOME FOR THE HONEYMOON.

On the same day as the marriage, the bridal party started on their "wedding tour." The blissful pairs were unaccompanied, except by servants. Sir Richard, Lady Templar, Isaac Ben Ammon, and Judah Nathans were to follow in a few days. The home chosen for the honeymoon was the De Lacy Castle. That castellated inheritance of an ancient race had formed such a center of interest in the lives of all the principal characters of our story that no hallowed spot in all the world was so fitted as that, to witness the first rich days of love and peace of Walter Templar and Terese, and Frederick De Lacy and Eleanor, his bride.

At midday the bridal party started from Courtney House, and at ten at night they reached the castle of the De Lacys. Again the tenantry from the country around gathered with a procession of lighted torches, as they had done a few weeks previous, but not now did they come to welcome with solemn pomp the remains of their long lamented lord, to sepulchre him with his race: now they gathered to welcome the reinstatement of the living—the last of the old family—yet how bright the prospect that in him and the stately Eleanor Courtney, the beloved race would be revived for generations in the future, as numerous and noble as those of the past.

Young Lord Frederick replied in a neat little speech full of emotion, to the acclamations of his tenantry, and then Sir Walter Templar, who had lain in the dungeons of the castle and redeemed the fallen house, was forced by similar acclamations to appear and speak for a few moments on behalf of himself and his beautiful bride—the Hebrew Maiden. The happy couples were then left to themselves and their great bliss, saluted at parting with loud huzzahs from five hundred lusty voices.

The next day Lord Frederick De Lacy, Sir Walter Templar and their brides went over the castle of the noble De Lacys. For hours they roamed through that stately building and it was with a feeling of intense pride that young Frederick and Eleanor viewed the evidence of the ancient grandeur of his family, while with eyes beaming with grateful speech, they looked ever and anon at Terese, who had brought so much joy and deliverance to them and Sir Walter Templar, the grand and the faithful, whom they worshipped as much as ever the French worshipped Napoleon in all his splendor of genius.

The last place they visited on the day after their marriage, was the sombre dungeon where Walter for the De Lacy cause had been a prisoner for so many months. The brides in their tender but painful recollections wept in that dungeon upon each other's necks, the bridegrooms wrung each other's hands in silence, and in such fervor until the rich blood from their faithful hearts almost spirted from their fingers with the intensity of their love-grasp.

During the day, the steward of the De Lacy estates regaled the tenants with a feast of beef and bread and fine old English beer. At night, fireworks and a hundred torches illuminated the noble park. And then the dance, and then the merry-making till midnight. Now, Eleanor and Terese gracefully took by the hands some bashful country swains and then in sportive revenge to their brides, Walter and Frederick led off their country lasses in the dance. All was happiness and innocence, all was bright in the prospect for many a year. And thus happy, the party at midnight broke up, and away each blissful couple to their homes.

A week later, Sir Richard Courtney, Lady Templar, Isaac Ben Ammon and Judah Nathans arrived at De Lacy castle; and then their joy was complete: no not quite complete, for Farinelli and his bride were not among them. After their great trials, the devotion of the foster-brother throughout the life of our heroine, the Hebrew Maiden, entitled him and his love to a blissful, not a tragic, close. Thus they all expressed themselves, especially the venerable Isaac, who declared that the cup, though found in young Benjamin's sack, was not of his putting, and, therefore, the brother of his grandchild ought not to have died.

Judah smiled at his good uncle's logic; and Isaac seeing it, went about the castle dreaming about Benjamin and deliverance, though he could not fathom how Judah was going to bring him to life again; yet, in his childlike simplicity, he had unbounded confidence in the power of his strange nephew.

HOW THEY HAD HIM.

When I was young and tender, too,
I had to mind and had to do
Whatever mother bade me;
She used to have a walnut stick
Which kept me on the double-quick,
And that was where she had me.

When older grown, and quite a beau
Among the girls, I used to know
A Miss Priscilla Cadmy;
And with the help of smiles and nods
I fell in love at forty rods,
And there is where she had me.

When I was older, say sixteen,
I thought it time to have a queen,
And asked her if she'd wed me;
She said she didn't much object,
Or words to something that effect,
And there was where she had me.

But when, to make the matter straight,
I went up to negociate
Affairs with Colonel Cadmy,
He said he "didn't care to sell,"
He told me I might go to—well,
And that was where he had me.

I drowned my sorrow in the cup
Until I got my dander up,
(I couldn't have been madder);
When she proposed that we be one
In spite of pa—the thing was done,
And that was where I had her.

Two lovely urchins on my knee
I'm proud to say belong to me,
(That is, to me and madam);
For when we left our native sod,
We spent a year or two abroad—
And there was where we had 'em.

THE COQUETTE'S ANSWER.

You ask me to love you:
How can I, pray,
When I've just told another
I love him—this day.

Last week, I told three;
The week before, two;
And now you ask me
To say I love you!

I'll say it; but mind,
I'll do nothing but say:
Now, don't be offended,
And reproach me that way.

I know that you love me—
The others do too;
And my heart is so large
I can't love only you.

MUSICAL BOXES.—Since Mr. Waters gave up publishing sheet music, he has devoted his whole capital and attention to the manufacture and sale of Pianos and Melodeons. He has just issued a catalogue of his new instruments, giving a new scale of prices, which shows a marked reduction from former rates, and his Pianos have recently been awarded the First Premium at several Fairs. Many people of the present day, who are attracted, if not confused, with the flaming advertisements of rival piano houses, probably overlook the modest manufacturer like Mr. Waters: but we happen to know that his instruments earned him a good reputation long before his positions and "honors" connected therewith were ever thought of; indeed, we have one of Mr. Waters' Piano-fortes now in our residence, (where it has stood for years,) of which any manufacturer in the world might be proud. We have always been delighted with it as a sweet-toned and powerful instrument, and there is no doubt of its durability; more than this, some of the best amateur players in the city, and several celebrated pianists, have performed on the said piano, and all pronounce it a superior and first-class Instrument. Stronger indorsement we could not give.—Home Journal,

ALLCOCK'S POROUS

STRENGTHENING

PLASTERS.

ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS are the results of studies and experiments of Dr. Scheent, of South Carolina; of Dr. Wm. Wagstaff, now Baron Wagstaff, of Horace H. Day, the distinguished manufacturer of rubber goods; and of Thomas Allcock, Chemist and member of the College of Pharmacy of New York, now General Allcock, etc., etc.

Step by step this commodity has attained its unprecedented fame. They are universally approved. They support, strengthen, and aid the growth of muscles. They appear to have a peculiar effect upon the nerves, allaying irritability, while supplying warmth. They seem to accumulate electricity, and aid the circulation of the blood through the part where applied, by which healthy actions are induced.

Even in paralysis, where articulation was suspended, the use of the Porous Plasters to the spine restored the articulation, and materially reduced the paralysis. In fact, the patient could help herself, while before the Porous plaster was applied she was as helpless as a baby. We refer to Mrs. Sally Elliot, Springfield, Mass.

Dr. Myer, of Savannah, Ga., says they are the best mechanical supporters for weak muscles ever discovered; that by their warming properties they bring power and health, until the strength of the muscles are entirely restored. That he knows a case where Allcock's Plasters cured a gentleman of a weak spine. That he daily prescribes them in his practice with the happiest results, and desires us to refer to him.

Dr. Henderson, of Farnsville, Louisiana, says: "The counter-irritant effect of Allcock's Porous Plasters is produced in such a mild and gradual way, they so invigorate the circulation around the parts to which they are applied, and exert upon all nervous diseases such a great sedative influence, that I place them confidently at the head of every plaster now in use."

Dr. Johnson, of Hartford, says: "My daily experience confirms the very superior excellence of your Porous Plasters. At this moment of writing, a man applies for one, who, by entanglement in a shaft of machinery, had both his legs broken, spine severely injured, and was for nearly a year entirely helpless. This man found relief very soon by the application of a plaster to his spine. He was soon enabled to work, and now he labors as well as ever. He would cheerfully pay five dollars for a single plaster, if they could not be had at a lower rate. Surgeons should make use of these perforated plasters, to the exclusion of all others as their flexibility and adhesiveness are greatly in advance of all other plasters with which I am acquainted, while the perforations peculiar to them render them greatly superior to all others for ordinary surgical uses. Knowing the plasters to be so useful, I have no scruples that my sentiments should be known.

J. W. JOHNSON, M. D."

Dr. Sterling's testimony: "For two years, I have been a great sufferer from neuralgia in the head, and found only temporary relief from all the various remedies that I have tried, until I applied one of Allcock's Porous Plasters. I cut it into three strips, placing one under each shoulder blade, and the other over the small of the back; and for the past three months, I have had scarcely a twinge of the old pain.

I advise all who suffer from nervous diseases to lose no time in making a trial of the wonderful Porous Plaster.

MEDICINAL QUALITIES

—OF THE—

POROUS PLASTERS.

The Porous Plasters possess the soothing, warming and sustaining qualities of the combined plasters of the dispensatories. An Electrician, who has great experience of their effects in Local Rheumatism, in Tic Doloreux, and deep-seated nervous and other pains, and in affections of the kidneys, etc., etc., attributes all their sedative, stimulative and pain-relieving effects to their ELECTRIC qualities. He asserts that they restore the healthy electric condition (equilibrium) of the part, and that being restored pain and morbid action cease. He was amazed at the great number of beneficial indications produced by one of these plasters. He affirms that Head-ache is cured by one worn just below the breast-bone; that one placed over the navel will cure hysterics, as well as dysentery, and affections of the bowels.

PATENT
ARION PIANOFORTE

GRANDS AND GRAND SQUARES,

7⅓ OCTAVES.

The "ARION" is the very best Piano for the Great West because it stands in tune longer than any other Piano. It requires no repairing or regulating; shipping any distance, or dampness does not affect them.

WHY?

It commences where the "First Premium" Makers stop, and upon the most improved Modern scale makes four patented improvements: which make the Arion more simple, yet stronger; increasing its volume and beauty of tone, while rendering the instrument more enduring.

WHAT THEY ARE.

First. The patent Arion Reversed Wooden Agraffe Bridge, which retains all the purity of tone only found on a wooden bridge (the rest whereon the strings lay), and obtains all the solid prolonged strength of tone of the metal Agraffe, without that acute metalic noise which the metal Agraffe develops by use.

Secondly. The Patent Arion Compound Wrest-Plank, which holds the tuning pins, is six thicknesses of hard maple, the grain of each layer runs in a different direction. The advantages are, the 20 tons strain of the strings cannot split our Arion wrest-plank, as frequently happens in other Pianos, and when people say "My Piano won't stand in tune," all other makers must use the single wrest plank with the grain running only one way.

The Arion Tuning-Pins have end wood to hold them on every side, while all other makers can have it only upon two sides of their pins.

Thirdly. The Patent Arion Diagonal Sustaining Bar, extending parellel with the steel strings under the over strung Bass strings. The Arion is the only Piano wherein the enormous strain of the large steel strings is resisted in the natural place and direction. Using this bar renders the weakest part in all other over strung Pianos the

STRONGEST IN THE ARION.

Fourthly. The Patent Arion Iron Frame concentrates all the metal in front of the tuning pin line, and its frame is let into (cutted) the front edge of the wooden wrest plank, thereby preventing the great strain of the strings upon it from splitting or moving it one particle. All other "Full Iron Frames" cover the entire wrest plank, and when it is split it cannot be seen, the wood of the Arion wrest plank is seen.

THE ARION STANDS UPON ITS OWN MERITS.

unsupported by either humbuggery, weak facts, or useless or complicated Patents. We append a few unbought opinions of those who

KNOW THE ARION.

The [illegible]cal Director of the New York Conservatory of Music, Edward Mollenhauer, says: "The Arion I bought of you is the best Piano I ever played on; that rolling bass and silvery treble, etc."

John H. Woods, Piano Dealer, Oswego, N. Y., says: The tone is truly immense, and surpasses anything in the shape of a Piano we ever saw or heard of, etc."

Horace Greely said: "The Arion is the best Square Piano, superior for its clearness and brilliancy of tone," &c.

Louis Wagner, Fort Leavenworth, says: "My Piano arrived here in splendid order. Its tone fills my parlor with melody—it is the wonder and admiration of all who hear it. Miss ——, who is teaching the Piano desires me to order one for her," &c.

We desire agents in every city where we have not appointed them.

NEW MEDICAL DISCOVERY.

Dr. CADY'S CATARRH REMEDY.

A CERTAIN CURE FOR CATARRH AND ALL Mucous Diseases of the head, nose and throat.

This is a Medicine never before used or known to the public. Dr. Cady, the discoverer, was a sufferer from this terrible disease for twenty years, and after testing all the remedies extant—without relief—in his efforts to obtain a cure he discovered this UNEQUALLED REMEDY, which cured him in the short space of eight weeks.

It has been thoroughly tested, and has not failed in a single instance. Several of the most obstinate cases have been thoroughly cured by this remedy, after every other known medicine had failed. Every one who has tried it will testify to the truth of the above statement.

Every one afflicted with Catarrh should give it a trial and find out for himself whether it is a humbug.

Price, $2 per Bottle. Sold by GODBE & Co., Salt Lake City.

WHAT IS FAME

It amounts to much in many cases, and if there be any deserving of credit in this respect, it is the inventor of Dr. Farr's Invigorating Cordial and Purifier of the Blood. Saratoga A WATER.

The Saratoga "A" Spring Water is probably the most effective mineral water found on either continent. It has ten per cent. greater mineral properties than the celebrated Congress Spring; four times that of Baden Baden of Austria; five times that of Aix La Chapelle in Prussia; twice that of Vichy in France; nearly three times greater than the renowned Seltzer of Germany; and equally over the Spas of Bath, England, and Kissengen in Bavaria.

The reputation of this water is based upon its effects in diseases of the stomach, liver, bowels, kidneys and spleen. It acts with wonderful benefit in cases of chronic dyspepsia, constipation, gravel, gout, scrofula, cutaneous affections, general lethargy, soreness and prostration of the system.

BY THE FOUNTAIN.

Citron-shaded by the fountain,
Weeping, weeping, sits Lili;
For Yacoob is on the mountain
Which o'erhangs the purple sea;
And there's war upon the mountain,
All above the purple sea.

Every sound suggests the battle
As the land-wind sinks and swells,
Though 'tis but an infant's rattle,
And the tinkling of the bells;
'Hush! O nurse, oh hush the rattle,
And the tinkling of the bells.'

Yet the silence is depressing—
'Tis the silence of the dead;
And she clasps her babe, caressing
Glowing cheek and golden head.
'Ah! that I were caressing
His dear cheek and golden head!

'Yet, though my dear love be missing,
Here I hold his counterpart!'
'Mid her weeping and her kissing,
A swift footstep makes her start;
Oh, the weeping and the kissing,
As he clasps her to his heart!"

THE ENGINEER.

His name, sir, was Matthew Price; mine is Benjamin Hardy. We were born within a few days of each other; bred up in the same village; taught at the same school. I cannot remember the time when we were not close friends Even as boys, we never knew what it was to quarrel. We had not a thought, we had not a possession, that was not in common. We would have stood by each other, fearlessly, to the death. It was such a friendship as one reads about sometimes in books: fast and firm as the great Tors upon our native moorlands, true as the sun in the heavens.

The name of our village was Chadleigh. Lifted high above the pasture flats which stretched away at our feet like a measureless green lake and melted into mist on the furthest horizon, it nestled, a tiny stone-built hamlet, in a sheltered hollow about midway between the plain and the plateau. Above us, rising ridge beyond ridge, slope beyond slope, spread the mountainous moor-country, bare and bleak for the most part, with here and there a patch of cultivated field or hardy plantation, and crowned highest of all with masses of huge grey crag, abrupt, isolated, hoary, and older than the deluge. These were the Tors—Druids' Tor, King's Tor, Castle Tor, and the like; sacred places, as I have heard, in the ancient time, where crownings, burnings, human sacrifices; and all kinds of bloody heathen rites were performed. Bones, too, had been found there, and arrow-heads, and ornaments of gold and glass. I had a vague awe of the Tors in those boyish days, and would not have gone near them after dark for the heaviest bribe.

I have said that we were born in the same village. He was the son of a small farmer, named William Price, and the oldest of a family of seven; I was the only child of Ephriam Hardy, the Chadleigh blacksmith—a well-known man in those parts, whose memory is not forgotten to this day. Just so far as a farmer is supposed to be a bigger man than a blacksmith, Mat's father might be said to have a better standing than mine; but William Price, with his small holding and his seven boys, was, in fact, as poor as many a day-laborer; whilst, the blacksmith, well-to-do, bustling, popular, and open-handed, was a person of some importance in the place. All this, however, had nothing to do with Mat and myself. It never occurred to either of us that his jacket was out at elbows, or that our mutual funds came altogether from my pocket. It was enough for us that we sat on the same school-bench, conned our tasks from the same primer, fought each other's battles, screened each other's faults, fished, nutted, played truant, robbed orchards and birds' nests together, and spent every half-hour, authorized or stolen, in each other's society. It was a happy time; but it could not go on for ever. My father, being prosperous, resolved to put me forward in the world. I must know more, and do better than himself. The forge was not good enough, the little world of Chadleigh not wide enough, for me. Thus it happened that I was still swinging the satchel when Mat was whistling at the plough, and then at last, when my future course was shaped out, we were separated, as it then seemed to us, for life. For, blacksmith's son as I was, furnace and forge, in some form or other, pleased me best, and I chose to be a working engineer. So my father by-and-by apprenticed me to a Birmingham iron-master; and, having bidden farewell to Mat, and Chadleigh, and the grey old Tors in the shadow of which I had spent all the days of my life, I turned my face northwards and went over into "the Black country."

I am not going to dwell on this part of my story. How I worked out the term of my apprenticeship; how, when I had served my full time and become a skilled workman, I took Mat from the plough and brought him over to the Black Country, sharing with him lodging, wages, experience—all, in short, that I had to give; how he, naturally quick to learn and brimful of quiet energy, worked his way up a step at a time, and came by-and-by to be a "first hand" in his own department: how, during all these years of change, and trial, and effort, the old boyish affection never wavered or weakened, but went on, growing with our growth and strengthening with our strength—are facts which I need do no more than outline in this place.

About this time—it will be remembered that I speak of the days when Mat and I were on the bright side of thirty—it happened that our firm contracted to supply six first-class locomotives to run on the new line, then in process of construction, between Turin and Genoa. It was the first Italian order we had taken. We had had dealings with France, Holland, Belgium, Germany; but never with Italy. The connection, therefore, was new and valuable—all the more valuable because our Transalpine neighbors had but lately begun to lay down the iron roads, and would be safe to need more of our good English work as they went on. So the Birmingham firm set themselves to the contract with a will, lengthened our working hours, increased our wages, took on fresh hands, and determined, if energy and promptitude could do it, to place themselves at the head of the Italian labor-market, and stay there. They deserved and achieved success. The six locomotives were not only turned out to time, but were shipped, despatched, and delivered with a promptitude that fairly amazed our Piedmontese consignee. I was not a little proud, you may be sure, when I found myself appointed to superintend the transport of the engines. Being allowed a couple of assistants, I contrived that Mat should be one of them; and thus we enjoyed together the first great holiday of our lives.

It was a wonderful change for two Birmingham operatives fresh from the Black Country. The fairy city, with its crescent background of Alps; the port crowded with strange shipping; the marvelous blue sky and bluer sea; the painted houses on the quays; the quaint cathedral, faced with black and white marble; the street of jewellers, like an Arabian Nights' bazar; the street of palaces, with its Moorish courtyards, its fountains and orange trees; the women veiled like brides; the galley-slaves chained two and two; the procession of priests and friars; the everlasting clangor of bells; the babble of a strange tongue; the singular lightness and brightness of the climate—made, altogether, such a combination of wonders that we wandered about, the first day, in a kind of bewildered dream, like children at a fair. Before that week ended, being tempted by the beauty of the place and the liberality of the pay, we had agreed to take service with the Turin and Genoa Railway Company, and to turn our backs upon Birmingham for ever.

Then began a new life—a life so active and healthy, so steeped in fresh air and sunshine, that we sometimes marveled how we could have endured the gloom of the Black Country. We were constantly up and down the line: now at Genoa, now at Turin, taking trial trips with the locomotives, and placing our old experiences at the service of our new employers.

In the mean while we made Genoa our headquarters, and hired a couple of rooms over a small shop in a by-street sloping down to the quays. Such a busy little street—so steep and winding that no vehicles could pass through it, and so narrow that the sky looked like a mere strip of deep-blue ribbon overhead! Every house in it, however, was a shop, where the goods encroached on the footway, or were piled about the door, or hung like tapestry from the balconies; and all day long, from dawn to dusk, an incessant stream of passers-by poured up and down between the port and the upper quarter of the city.

Our landlady was the widow of a silver-worker, and lived by the sale of filigree ornaments, cheap jewelry, combs, fans, and toys in ivory and jet. She had an only daughter named Gianetta who served in the shop, and was simply the most beautiful woman I ever beheld. Looking back across this weary chasm of years, and bringing her image before me (as I can and do) with all the vividness of life, I am unable, even now, to detect a flaw in her beauty. I do not attempt to describe her. I do not believe there is a poet living who could find the words to do it; but I once saw a picture that was somewhat like her (not half so lovely, but still like her), and, for aught I know, that picture is still hanging where I last looked at it—upon the walls of the Louvre. It represented a woman with brown eyes and golden hair, looking over her shoulder into a circular mirror held by a bearded man in the background. In this man, as I then understood, the artist had painted his own portrait; in her, the portrait of the woman he loved. No picture that I ever saw was half so beautiful, and yet it was not worthy to be name in the same breath with Gianetta Coneglia.

You may be certain the widow's shop did not want for customers. All Genoa knew how fair a face was to be seen behind that dingy little counter; and Gianette, flirt as she was, had more lovers than she cared to remember, even by name. Gentle and simple, rich and poor, from the red-capped sailor buying his earrings or his amulet, to the nobleman carelessly purchasing half the filigrees in the window, she treated them all alike—encouraged them, laughed at them, led them on and turned them off at her pleasure. She had no more heart than a marble statue; as Mat and I discovered by-and-by, to our bitter cost.

I cannot tell to this day how it came about, or what first led me to suspect how things were going on with us both; but long before the waning of that autumn a coldness had sprung up between my friend and myself. It was nothing that could have been put into words. It was nothing that either of us could have explained or justified, to save his life. We lodged together, ate together, worked together, exactly as before; we even took our long evening's walk together, when the day's labor was ended; and except, perhaps, that we were more silent than of old, no mere looker-on could have detected a shadow of change. Yet there it was, silent and subtle, widening the gulf between us every day.

It was not his fault. He was too true and gentle-hearted to have willingly brought about such a state of things between us. Neither do I believe—fiery as my nature is—that it was mine. It was all hers—hers from first to last—the sin, and the shame, and the sorrow.

If she had shown a fair and open preference for either of us, no real harm could have come of it. I would have put any constraint upon myself, and, Heaven knows! have borne any suffering, to see Mat really happy. I know that he would have done the same, and more if he could, for me. But Gianette cared not one sou for either. She never meant to choose between us. It gratified her vanity to divide us; it amused her to play with us. It would pass my power to tell how, by a thousand imperceptible shades of coquetry—by the lingering of a glance, the substitution of a word, the flitting of a smile—she contrived to turn our heads, and torture our hearts, and lead us on to love her. She deceived us both. She buoyed us both up with hope; she maddened us with jealousy; she crushed us with despair. For my part, when I seemed to wake to a sudden sense of the ruin that was about our path and I saw how the truest friendship that ever bound two lives together was drifting on to wreck and ruin, I asked myself whether any woman in the world was worth what Mat had been to me and I to him. But this was not often. I was readier to shut my eyes upon the truth than to face it; and so lived on, willfully, in a dream.

Thus the autumn passed away, and winter came—the strange, treacherous Genoese winter, green with olive and ilex, brilliant with sunshine, and bitter with storm. Still, rivals at heart and friends on the surface, Mat and I lingered on in our lodging in the Vicolo Balba. Still Gianetta held us with her fatal wiles and her still more fatal beauty. At length there came a day when I felt I could bear the horrible misery and suspense of it no longer. The sun, I vowed, should not go down before I knew my sentence. She must choose between us. She must either take me or let me go. I was reckless. I was desperate. I was determined to know the worst, or the best. If the worst, I would at once turn my back upon Genoa, upon her, upon all the pursuits and purposes of my past life, and begin the world anew. This I told her, passionately and sternly, standing before her in the little parlor at the back of the shop, one bleak December morning.

"If it's Mat whom you care for most," I said, "tell me so in one word, and I will never trouble you again. He is better worth your love. I am jealous and exacting; he is as trusting and unselfish as a woman. Speak, Gianetta; am I to bid you good-bye for ever and ever, or am I to write home to my mother in England, bidding her pray to God to bless the woman who has promised to be my wife?"

"You plead your friend's cause well," she replied, haughtily. "Matteo ought to be grateful. This is more than he ever did for you."

"Give me my answer, for pity's sake," I exclaimed, "and let me go!"

"You are free to go or stay, Signor Inglese," she replied, "I am not your jailor."

"Do you bid me leave you?"

"Beata Madre! not I."

"Will you marry me, if I stay?"

She laughed aloud—such a merry, mocking, musical laugh, like a chime of silver bells!

"You ask too much," she said.

"Only what you have led me to hope these five or six months past!"

"That is just what Matteo says. How tiresome you both are!"

"Oh, Gianetta," I said, passionately, "be serious for one moment! I am a rough fellow, it is true—not half good enough or clever enough for you; but I love you with my whole heart, and an Emperor could do no more."

"I am glad of it," she replied; "I do not want you to love me less."

"Then you cannot wish to make me wretched! Will you promise me?"

"I promise nothing," said she, with another burst of laughter; "except that I will not marry Matteo!"

Except that she would not marry Matteo! Only that. Not a word of hope for myself. Nothing but my friend's condemnation. I might get comfort, and selfish triumph, and some sort of base assurance out of that, if I could. And to my shame, I did. I grasped at the vain encouragement, and; fool that I was! let her put me off again unanswered. From that day, I gave up all effort at self-control, and let myself drift blindly on—to destruction.

At length things became so bad between Mat and myself that it seemed as if an open rupture must be at hand. We avoided each other, scarcely exchanged a dozen sentences in a day, and fell away from all our old familiar habits. At this time—I shudder to remember it!—there were moments when I felt that I hated him.

Thus, with the trouble deepening and widening between us day by day, another month or five weeks went by; and February came; and, with February, the Carnival. They said in Genoa that it was a particularly dull carnival; and so it must have been; for, save a flag or two hung out in some of the principal streets, and a sort of festa look about the women, there were no special indications of the season. It was, I think, the second day when, having been on the line all the morning, I returned to Genoa at dusk, and to my surprise, found Mat Price on the platform. He came up to me, and laid his hand on my arm.

"You are in late," he said. "I have been waiting for you three-quarters of an hour. Shall we dine together to day?"

Impulsive as I am, this evidence of returning good will, at once called up my better feelings.

"With all my heart, Mat," I replied; "shall we go to Gozzoli's?"

"No, no," he said, hurriedly. "Some quieter place—some place where we can talk. I have something to say to you."

I noticed now that he looked pale and agitated, and an uneasy sense of apprehension stole upon me. We decided on the "Pescatore," a little out-of-the-way trattoria, down near the Molo Vecchio. There, in a dingy salon, frequented chiefly by seamen, and redolent of tobacco, we ordered our simple dinner. Mat scarcely swallowed a morsel; but, calling presently for a bottle of Sicilian wine, drank eagerly.

"Well, Mat," I said, as the last dish was placed on the table, what news have you?"

"Bad."

"I guessed that from your face."

"Bad for you—bad for me. Gianetta."

"What of Gianetta?"

He passed his hand nervously across his lips.

"Gianetta is false—worse than false," he said, in a hoarse voice. "She values an honest man's heart just as she values a flower for her hair—wears it for a day, then throws it aside for ever. She has cruelly wronged us both."

"In what way? Good Heaven speak out!"

"In the worst way that a woman can wrong those who love her. She has sold herself to the Marchese Loredano."

The blood rushed to my head and face in a burning torrent. I could scarcely see, and dared not trust myself to speak.

"I saw her going towards the Cathedral," he went on, hurriedly. "It was about three hours ago. I thought she might be going to confession, so I hung back and followed her at a distance. When she got inside, however, she went straight to the back of the pulpit, where this man was waiting for her. You remember him—an old man who used to haunt the shop a month or two back. Well, seeing how deep in conversation they were, and how they stood close under the pulpit with their backs towards the church, I fell into a passion of anger and went straight up the aisle, intending to say or do something: I scarcely knew what; but at all events, to draw her arm through mine, and take her home. When I came within a few feet, however, and found only a big pillar between myself and them, I paused. They could not see me, nor I them; but I could hear their voices distinctly, and—and I listened."

"Well, and you heard——"

"The terms of a shameful bargain—beauty on the one side, gold on the other; so many thousand francs a year; a villa near Naples——Pah! it makes me sick to repeat it."

And, with a shudder, he poured out another glass of wine and drank it at a draught.

"After that," he said, presently, "I made an effort to bring her away. The whole thing was so cold-blooded, so deliberate, so shameful, that I felt I had only to wipe her out of my memory, and leave her to her fate. I stole out of the cathedral, and walked about here by the sea for ever so long, trying to get my thoughts straight. Then I remembered you, Ben; and the recollection of how this wanton had come between us and broken up our lives drove me wild. So I went up to the station and waited for you. I felt you ought to know it all; and—and I thought, perhaps, that we might go back to England together."

"The Marchese Loredano!"

It was all that I could say; all that I could think. As Mat had just said of himself, I felt "like one stunned."

"There is one other thing I may as well tell you," he added, reluctantly, "if only to show you how false a woman can be. We—we were to have been married next month."

"We? Who? What do you mean?"

"I mean that we were to have been married—Gianetta and I."

A sudden storm of rage, of scorn, of incredulity, swept over me at this, and seemed to carry my senses away.

"You!" I cried. "Gianetta marry you! I don't believe it."

"I wish I had not believed it," he replied, looking up as if puzzled by my vehemence. "But she promised me; and I thought, when she promised it, she meant it."

"She told me, weeks ago, that she would never be your wife!"

His color rose, his brow darkened; but when his answer came, it was as calm as the last.

"Indeed!" he said. "Then it is only one baseness more. She told me that she had refused you; and that was why we kept our engagement secret."

"Tell the truth, Mat Price," I said, well nigh beside myself with suspicion. "Confess that every word of this is false! Confess that Gianetta will not listen to you, and that you are afraid I may succeed where you have failed. As perhaps I shall—as perhaps I shall, after all!"

"Are you mad?" he exclaimed. "What do you mean?"

"That I believe it's just a trick to get me away to England—that I don't credit a syllable of your story. You're a liar, and I hate you!"

He rose, and, laying one hand on the back of his chair, looked me sternly in the face.

"If you were not Benjamin Hardy," he said, deliberately, "I would thrash you within an inch of your life."

The words had no sooner passed his lips than I sprang at him. I have never been able distinctly to remember what followed. A curse—a blow—a struggle—a moment of blind fury—a cry—a confusion of tongues—a circle of strange faces. Then I see Mat lying back in the arms of a bystander; myself trembling and bewildered—the knife dropping from my grasp; blood upon the floor; blood upon my hands; blood upon his shirt. And then I hear those dreadful words:

"Oh, Ben, you have murdered me!"

He did not die—at least, not there and then. He was carried to the nearest hospital, and lay for some weeks between life and death. His case, they said, was difficult and dangerous. The knife had gone in just below the collar-bone, and pierced down into the lungs. He was not allowed to speak or turn—scarcely to breathe with freedom. He might not even lift his head to drink. I sat by him day and night all through that sorrowful time. I gave up my situation on the railway; I quitted my lodging in the Vicolo Balbi; I tried to forget that such a woman as Gianetta Coneglia had ever drawn breath. I lived only for Mat; and he tried to live more, I believe, for my sake than his own. Thus, in the bitter silent hours of pain and penitence, when no hand but mine approached his lips or smoothed his pillow, the old friendship came back with even more than its old trust and faithfulness. He forgave me, fully and freely; and I would thankfully have given my life for him.

At length there came one bright spring morning, when, dismissed as convalescent, he tottered out through the hospital gates, leaning on my arm, and feeble as an infant. He was not cured; neither, as I then learned to my horror and anguish, was it possible that he ever could be cured. He might live, with care, for some years; but the lungs were injured beyond hope of remedy, and a strong or healthy man he could never be again. These, spoken aside to me, were the parting words of the chief physician, who advised me to take him further south without delay.

I took him to a little coast-town called Rocca, some thirty miles beyond Genoa—a sheltered lonely place along the Riviera, where the sea was even bluer than the sky, and the cliffs were green with strange tropical plants, cacti, and aloes, and Egyptian palms. Here we lodged in the house of a small tradesman; and Mat, to use his own words, "set to work at getting well in good earnest." But, alas! it was a work which no earnestness could forward. Day after day he went down to the beach, and sat for hours drinking the sea air and watching the sails that came and went in the offing. By-and-by he could go no further than the garden of the house in which we lived. A little later, and he spent his days on a couch beside the open window, waiting patiently for the end. Ay, for the end! It had come to that. He was fading fast, waning with the waning summer, and conscious that the Reaper was at hand. His whole aim now was to soften the agony of my remorse, and prepare me for what must shortly come.

"I would not live longer, if I could," he said, lying on his couch one summer evening, and looking up to the stars. "If I had my choice at this moment, I would ask to go. I should like Gianetta to know that I forgave her."

"She shall know it," I said, trembling suddenly from head to foot.

He pressed my hand.

"And you'll write to father?"

"I will."

I had drawn a little back, that he might not see the tears raining down my cheeks; but he raised himself on his elbow; and looked round.

"Don't fret, Ben," he whispered; laid his head back wearily upon the pillow—and so died.

And this was the end of it. This was the end of all that made life life to me. I buried him there, in hearing of the wash of a strange sea on a strange shore. I stayed by the grave till the priest and the bystanders were gone. I saw the earth filled in to the last sod, and the gravedigger stamp it down with his feet. Then, and not till then I felt that I had lost him for ever—the friend I had loved, and hated, and slain. Then, and not till then, I knew that all rest, and joy, and hope were over for me. From that moment my heart hardened within me, and my life was filled with loathing. Day and night, land and sea, labor and rest, food and sleep, were alike hateful to me. It was the curse of Cain, and that my brother had pardoned me made it lie none the lighter. Peace on earth was for me no more, and goodwill towards men was dead in my heart forever. Remorse softens some natures; but it poisoned mine. I hated all mankind but above all mankind I hated the woman who had come between us two and ruined both our lives.

He had bidden me seek her out, and be the messenger of his forgiveness. I had sooner have gone down to the port of Genoa and taken upon me the serge cap and shotted chain of any galley-slave at his toil in the public works; but for all that I did my best to obey him. I went back alone and on foot. I went back intending to say to her; "Gianetta Coneglia, he forgave you; but God never will." But she was gone. The little shop was let to a fresh occupant; and the neighbors only knew that mother and daughter had left the place quite suddenly, and that Gianetta was supposed to be under the "protection" of the Marchese Loredano. How I made inquiries here and there—how I heard that they had gone to Naples—and how, being restless and reckless of my time, I worked my passage in a French steamer, and followed her—how, having found the sumptuous villa that was now hers, I learned that she had left there some ten days and gone to Paris, where the Marchese was ambassador for the Two Sicilies—how, working my passage back again to Marseilles, and thence, in part by the river and part by rail, I made my way to Paris—how, day after day, I paced the streets and the parks, watched at the ambassador's gates, followed his carriage, and at last, after weeks of waiting, discovered her address—how, having written to request an interview, her servants spurned me from her door, and flung my letter in my face—how, looking up at her windows, I then, instead of forgiving, solemnly cursed her with the bitterest curses my tongue could devise—and how, this done, I shook the dust of Paris from my feet, and became a wanderer upon the face of the earth, are facts which I have now no space to tell.

The next six or eight years of my life were shifting and unsettled enough. A morose and restless man, I took employment here and there as opportunity offered, turning my hand to many things and caring little what I earned, so long as the work was hard and the change incessant. First of all I engaged myself as chief engineer on one of the French steamers plying between Marseilles and Constantinople. At Constantinople I changed to one of the Austrian Lloyd's boats, and worked for some time to and from Alexandria, Jaffa, and those parts. After that, I fell in with a party of Mr. Layard's men at Cairo, and so went up the Nile and took a turn at the excavations of the mound of Nimroud. Then I became a working engineer on the new desert line between Alexandria and Suez; and by-and-by I worked my passage out to Bombay, and took service as an engine fitter on one of the great Indian railways. I stayed a long time in India; that is to say, I stayed nearly two years, which was a long time for me; and I might not even have left so soon, but for the war that was declared just then with Russia. That tempted me. For I loved danger and hardship as other men love safety and ease; and as for my life, I had sooner have parted with it than have kept it, any day. So I came straight back to England; betook myself to Portsmouth, where my testimonials at once procured me the sort of berth I wanted. I went out to the Crimea in the engine room of one of her Majesty's war steamers.

I served with the fleet, of course, while the war lasted; and when it was over, went wandering off again, rejoicing in my liberty. This time I went to Canada, and after working on a railway then in progress near the American frontier, I presently passed over into the States; journeyed from north to south; crossed the Rocky Mountains; tried a month or two of life in the gold country; and then, being seized with a sudden aching, unaccountable longing to re visit that solitary grave so far away on the Italian coast, I turned my face once more towards Europe.

Poor little grave! I found it rank with weeds, the cross half shattered, the inscription half effaced. It was as if no one had loved him, or remembered him. I went back to the house in which we had lodged together. The same people were still living there, and made me kindly welcome. I stayed with them for some weeks. I weeded, and planted, and trimmed the grave with my own hands, and set up a fresh cross in pure white marble. It was the first season of rest that I had known since I laid him there; and when at last I shouldered my knapsack and set forth again to battle with the world, I promised myself that, God willing, I would creep back to Rocca, when my days drew near to ending, and be buried by his side.

From hence, being, perhaps, a little less inclined than formerly for very distant parts, and willing to keep within reach of the grave, I went no further than Mantua, where I engaged as an engine-driver on the line, then not long completed, between that city and Venice. Somehow, although I had been trained to the working engineering, I preferred in these days to earn my bread by driving. I liked the excitement of it, the sense of power, the rush of the air, the roar of the fire, the flitting of the landscape. Above all, I enjoyed to drive a night express. The worse the weather, the better it suited with my sullen temper. For I was as hard, and harder than ever. The years had done nothing to soften me. They had only confirmed all that was blackest and bitterest in my heart.

I continued pretty faithful to the Mantua line, and had been working on it steadily for more than seven months when that which I am now about to relate took place.

It was in the month of March. The weather had been unsettled for some days past, and the nights stormy; and at one point along the line, near Ponte di Brenta, the waters had risen and swept away some seventy yards of embankment. Since this accident, the trains had all been obliged to stop at a certain spot between Padua and Ponte di Brenta, and the passengers, with their luggage, had thence to be transported in all kinds of vehicles, by a circuitous country road, to the nearest station on the other side of the gap, where another train and engine awaited them. This, of course, caused great confusion and annoyance, put all our time-tables wrong, and subjected the public to a large amount of inconvenience. In the meanwhile an army of navvies was drifted to the spot, and worked day and night to repair the damage. At this time I was driving two through trains each day, namely, one from Mantua to Venice in the early morning, and a return train from Venice to Mantua in the afternoon—a tolerably full day's work, covering about one hundred and ninety miles of ground, and occupying between ten an eleven hours. I was, therefore, not best pleased, when on the third or fourth day after the accident, I was informed that, in addition to my regular allowance of work, I should that evening be required to drive a special train to Venice. This special train, consisting of an engine, a single carriage and a break-van, was to leave the Mantua platform at eleven; at Padua the passengers were to alight and find post chaises waiting to convey them to Ponte di Brenta; at Ponte di Brenta another engine, carriage, and break-van were to be in readiness. I was charged to accompany them throughout.

"Corpo di Bacco," said the clerk who gave me my orders, "you need not look so black, man. You are certain of a handsome gratuity. Do you know who goes with you?"

"Not I."

"Not you, indeed! Why it's the Duca Loredano, the Neapolitan ambassador."

"Loredano!" I stammered. "What Loredano? There was a Marchese——"

"Certo. He was the Marchese Loredano some years ago; but he has come into his dukedom since then."

"He must be a very old man by this time."

"Yes, he is old; but what of that? He is as hale, and bright, and stately as ever. You have seen him before?"

"Yes," I said, turning away; "I have seen him—years ago."

"You have heard of his marriage?"

I shook my head.

The clerk chuckled, rubbed his hands, and shrugged his shoulders.

"An extraordinary affair," he said. "Made a tremendous esclandre at the time. He married his mistress—quite a common, vulgar girl—a Genoaese—very handsome; but not received, of course. Nobody visits her."

"Married her!" I exclaimed. "Impossible."

"True, I assure you."

I put my hand to my head. I felt as if I had had a fall or a blow.

"Does she—does she go to-night?" I faltered.

"O dear, yes—goes everywhere with him—never lets him out of her sight. You'll see her—la belle Duchessa!"

With this my informant laughed, and rubbed his hands again, and went back to his office.

The day went by, I scarcely know how, except that my whole soul was in a tumult of rage and bitterness. I returned from my afternoon's work about 7.25, and at 10.30 I was once again at the station. I had examined the engine; given instructions to the Fochista, or stoker, about the fire; seen to the supply of oil; and got all in readiness, when, just as I was about to compare my watch with the clock in the ticket-office, a hand was laid upon my arm, and a voice in my ear said:

"Are you the engine driver who is going on with this special train?"

"I had never seen the speaker before. He was a small, dark man, muffled up about the throat, with blue glasses, a large black beard, and his hat drawn low upon his eyes.

"You are a poor man, I suppose," he said, in a quick, eager whisper, "and, like other poor men, would not object to be better off. Would you like to earn a couple of thousand florins?"

"In what way?"

"Hush!" You are to stop at Padua, are you not, and to go on again at Ponte di Brenta?"

I nodded.

"Suppose you did nothing of the kind. Suppose, instead of turning off the steam, you jump off the engine, and let the train run on?"

"Impossible. There are seventy yards of embankment gone, and——"

"Basta! I know that. Save yourself, and let the train run on. It would be nothing but an accident."

I turned hot and cold; I trembled; my heart beat fast, and my breath failed.

"Why do you tempt me?" I faltered.

"For Italy's sake," he whispered; "for liberty's sake. I know you are no Italian; but, for all that, you may be a friend. This Loredano is one of his country's bitterest enemies. Stay, here are the two thousand florins."

I thrust his hand back fiercely.

"No—no," I said. "No blood-money. If I do it, I do it neither for Italy nor for money; but for vengeance."

"For vengeance!" he repeated.

At this moment the signal was given for backing up to the platform. I sprang to my place upon the engine without a word. When I again looked towards the spot where he had been standing, the stranger was gone.

I saw them take their places—Duke and Duchess, secretary and priest, valet and maid. I saw the station-master bow them into the carriage, and stand, bareheaded, beside the door. I could not distinguish their faces; the platform was too dusk, and the glare from the engine fire was too strong; but I recognized her stately figure, and the poise of her head. Had I not been told who she was, I should have known her by those traits alone. Then the guard's whistle shrilled out, and the station-master made his last bow; I turned the steam on; and we started.

My blood was on fire. I no longer trembled or hesitated. I felt as if every nerve was iron, and every pulse instinct with deadly purpose. She was in my power, and I would be revenged. She should die—she, for whom I had stained my soul with my friend's blood! She should die, in the plenitude of her wealth and her beauty, and no power upon earth should save her!

The stations flew past. I put on more steam; I bade the fireman heap in the coke, and stir the blazing mass. I would have outstripped the wind, had it been possible. Faster and faster—hedges and trees, bridges and stations, flashed past—villages no sooner seen than gone—telegraph wires twisting, and dipping, and twining themselves in one, with the awful swiftness of our pace! Faster and faster, till the fireman at my side looks white and scarred, and refuses to add more fuel to the furnace. Faster and faster, till the wind rushes in our faces and drives the breath back upon our line.

I would have scorned to save myself. I meant to die with the rest. Mad as I was—and I believe from my very soul that I was utterly mad for the time—I felt a passing pang of pity for the old man and his suite. I would have saved the poor fellow at my side, too, if I could; but the pace at which we were going made escape impossible.

Vincenza was passed—a mere confused vision of lights. Pojana flew by. At Padua, but nine miles distant, our passengers were to alight. I saw the fireman's face turned upon me in remonstrance; I saw his lips move, though I could not hear a word; I saw his expression change suddenly from remonstrance to a deadly terror, and then—merciful Heaven! then, for the first time, I saw that he and I were no longer alone upon the engine.

There was a third man—a third man standing on my right hand, as the fireman was standing on my left—a tall, stalwart man, with short curling hair, and a flat Scotch cap upon his head. As I fell back in the first shock of surprise, he stepped nearer; took my place at the engine, and turned the steam off. I opened my lips to speak to him; he turned his head slowly, and looked me in the face.

Matthew Price!

I uttered one long wild cry, flung my arms wildly up above my head, and fell as if I had been smitten with an ax.

I am prepared for the objections that may be made to my story. I expect as a matter of course, to be told that this was an optical illusion, or that I was suffering from a pressure on the brain, or even that I labored under an attack of temporary insanity. I have heard all these arguments before, and, if I may be forgiven for saying so, I have no desire to hear them again. My own mind has been made up upon this subject for many a year. All that I can say—all that I know is—that Matthew Price came back from the dead to save my soul and the lives of those whom I, in my guilty rage, would have hurried to destruction. I believe this as I believe in the mercy of Heaven and the forgiveness of repentant sinners.

Music.

LOCKE'S MACBETH MUSIC.

No. 2.

The third movement opens with a recitativo chanted by a weird spirit on the words "Hecate, Hecate, Hecate come away." This call is answered by Hecate in recitativo with "Hark; I'm coming." Both of these recitativos were rendered with effect.

The aria "My little airy spirit, see, see, see," sung in three-four time, is a singular and descriptive melody; and was delivered by Mr. Hardie in excellent style.

This solo is followed by another spirit recitativo, again calling "Hecate, Hecate." The call is answered by Hecate, with the words, "Thy chriping voice I hear, so pleasing to mine ear."

This solo was sung by Mr. Hardie in good style and effect. Hecate then declaims, "Where's Puckle?" Third witch steps forward and answers "Here." Hecate again "Where's Straddling?" Second witch answers "Here." First witch—Mrs. Careless—declaims "And Hopper, too; and Hellway, too, we want but you." The whole of these supernatural witch recitativos were rendered with singular and fantastic effect. The chorus "Come away,"—which followed—is an exulting spiritoso and eccelerando division, and was delivered by the choral body in fine jubilantic style.

After a short interlude, Hecate commences the semi-recitativo "With new fall'n dew from church-yard yew, I will but 'noint, and then I'll mount." A short symphony, and Hecate follows with "Now I'm furnished for my flight." These semi-recitativos are the preparation for Hecate's arial flight, and during the preparation, we have a most singular but well interpreted interlude, which introduces the aria "Now I go, now I fly, Malkin, my sweet spirit and I." All these recitativos were faithfully interpreted by Mr. Hardie.

The following is a magnificent canonical chorus "We fly by night," which rendition, by the choral body, was both spirited and precise in time; and they were rewarded by a burst of applause from the audience.

The movement finale opens with a descriptive symphonical introduction; at the end, Hecate declaims, "Black spirits and white, red spirits and gray, mingle, ye that mingle may." The chorus follows with the same words, which was effectively rendered by Mr. Hardie and the choral body. The next choral composition, "Around, around," is a difficult canonical imitation, and requires much care and attention in its performance, as the dancing must be in time with the imitation. At the end of the imitation, there is a long accented note. This is held while the other parts are proceeding with the subject, and, if this accent is not kept, confusion is the result. We have heard it rendered in excellent style at our Theatre, but on this occasion, through the absence of some of the choral members at the rehearsal, it did not go so smooth as we would have wished. We shall here remark that the whole of our choral body should take much pride in attending the rehearsals of such music as Locke's, so that every part and portion should have its proper rendition, as it will give them great fame. We certainly do consider that they ought to second the exertions of their choral conductor, Professor Careless, who is always ready to give them his time for the preparation of classical music. We will return to our subject.

An incantation follows what we have described above. At the opening of the incantation, the first witch steps forward and, in recitativo, declaims, "Here's the blood of a bat." Hecate answers, "Oh! put in th t, put in that." Second witch, "There's lizard's brain." Hecate, "Put in a grain." First witch, "Here's juice of toad." The last incantation recitativo is followed by the chorus, "Put in all these," which rendition of this chorus heightened the effect of the weird charming devilry. At the end, Hecate steps forward and declaims, "Hold, here's three ounces of a red hair'd wench." This is followed by a loud scream from the witches, and the incantation is finished, and the chorus "Around, around" is again repeated; and this time, more attention was given to the accent, which rendered the singing and dancing in much better style.

We have heard Locke's Macbeth music in England, and in first class theatres, and we can say in all truth that, when our choristers are up to the mark by practice—as we have heard them—they are hard to beat; and we believe they would stand in a favorable position by the side of choral bodies in England or the States; And we care not who contradicts us.

We had almost forgotten to mention that the effect of the whole of this splendid music was much aided by the orchestral accompaniment.

On Thursday evening, October 7th, Shakspeare's great tragedy of Macbeth was again put upon the boards with Locke's original music.

As we have said so much in this and our last number, on this immortal composition and its fine interpretation on Monday evening, September 20th, by the principal singers, choral body, and the band—with the few exceptions named—we will conclude our review by saying that we have never heard it rendered (in this city or in England) with more expression, correct intonation, and precision in time, than we did on Thursday evening, October 7th. All praise is due to Mrs. Careless, Mr. Hardie, the choral body, Professor Careless and his orchestra for the fine rendition they gave us of Locke's music on the above evening.

THOUGHTS ON THE AGE.

BY T. B. H. STENHOUSE.

WRITTEN EXPRESSLY FOR THE UTAH MAGAZINE.

One of the great benefits derivable from the development of the science of telegraphy has been the facility of international communication. In the "days of old," when couriers were the only means of intercourse between governments, there was incessant misunderstanding, and war was more often the general condition of the nations than peace; but now that the electric wire flashes instant thoughts from court to court, the chances of war from misunderstanding are scarcely possible.

In the daily uses of this discovery alone, the world we live in has positively advanced further in the facilities of social civilization and development than all the progress in that direction of any previous dozen centuries.

The gratification of being in instant communication with the most remote nations is both wonderful and enchanting for the mind to experience—it is the sweetness of passing thought; but the actual fact is innumerable and inexpressible benefits. So multifarious are its blessings that the mind is lost in admiration in seeking to grasp its applications in the every-day phases of life. In its possible use, space is annihilated and distance is unknown. On the antipodes of the globe, brother is as near to brother as in adjoining apartments in "the dear old house at home." There are now no wanderers on the earth—there need not be. The lightning's dart traverses plains, mountains and seas, and at the end of the wire, true and sympathetic hearts can beat harmoniously as one, as warmly at the tick, tick of the key, as if the dear tongue's sweetest sound vibrated on the listening ear.

INTELLECTUAL CULTURE.—A cultivated mind may be said to have infinite stores of innocent gratification. Everything may be made interesting to it, by becoming a subject of thought or inquiry. Books, regarded merely as a gratification, are worth more than all the luxuries on earth. A taste for literature secures cheerful occupation for the unemployed and languid hours of life; and how many persons in these hours, for want of innocent resources, are now impelled to coarse pleasure.

THE TRUE DEVELOPMENT OF THE TERRITORY.

It is a necessary truth, well understood by the commercial world, that any country or district that would have sufficient cash or currency in its midst, should, first and foremost, devote its labors in developing those resources which will command the largest outside market, and thus establish a basis for obtaining the money that it needs; and it is further understood, that all home manufactures or products in which such country is not likely to be able to compete to advantage, with other places, and which must, therefore, be confined mainly to internal exchange, are matters of secondary importance, as they must draw their sustenance from those products which have a sale in the outside world.

Every country needs a certain amount of money to keep it going, and there are only two ways of obtaining it. It must either be dug out of its mines, and coined, or obtained from other places by the sale of such articles, of which it has a special surplus—which product or products it should, of course, develop before all others, because upon that the life blood of the rest depend. Internal exchanges are nothing but accessories to prosperity, and not the principle causes thereof, as they flourish on the use of the money drawn into the country by the sale of those specialties, which go abroad. It is, therefore, clear that all localities which do not develop something in large quantities, which will command an outside market, must fall back to a greater or less extent upon the miserable and cumbrous system of "trade," as money will be out of the question.

All countries before they can be rich, must, therefore, develop some specialty or product of which they have a great surplus for sale, or remain poor. The reason why we have had so little cash in Utah for so long a period, and have had to do so much upon the hateful "trade" system, is, simply, because we have, as yet, developed no specialty. We have, therefore, had nothing in any great amount to sell, and consequently no money in exchange; and we must always remain equally poor until we can develop some product of which we have a great surplus. We repeat, the development of "Home-Manufactures" cannot help us in this respect, unless they are of such magnitude as to create us a grand depôt of supply to other places, and, as we have shown in our late article on "Our Workmen's Wages," this is not likely to be the case with any of the home manufactures at present engaging our attention. Our Territory is of such a nature that our manufactures must necessarily be extremely limited in material, and consequently in their sale. What we need, is to produce something which we are fitted by nature to supply in large proportions, and by competing with the world, command a constant supply of the money requisite to keep the Territory going. When we have developments of this kind in operation which will put this money in the hands of the community, we can then start all the Factories we please, and keep them going easily enough by internal sale. To start them before we have, is to begin at the wrong end. Home-manufactures are proper things to have amongst us, and should by all means be encouraged, but they will fail to produce the results we desire unless we can insure the cash in the Territory necessary to pay their workmen and keep them alive. They are miserable and unprofitable affairs—as many persons have experienced—when the expenses of repairing and replacing machinery, and payment of capitalist and workmen has mainly to be met by exchanging with other home products.

The question then arises—Have we a specialty of the kind in this Territory that will bring us the money we need, and in what does it consist? In other words, wherein are we specially fitted by Nature to compete with other places. California, Illinois, and Missouri, have their distinct facilities over the rest of the continent. Wherein has Providence fitted us to excel and surpass other localities, as that must be the direction in which our energies should be mainly expended. One glance at our barren mountains and hard benches will answer the question.

Evidently we have not preëminency as a farming country. That is, we are not a farming country of the order formed by Nature to be like Illinois and Missouri, a great grain reservoir to others. We can produce enough for home consumption and a small surplus to sell, but not half enough to get us the money we need. Had we some other product which would bring money into the country so that our farmers could sell for cash within ourselves, farming could, without a doubt, be made a tolerably profitable business in this Territory. But as a special grain-raising country, we dwindle into insignificance alongside even of California with its surplus millions of bushels, to say nothing of Eastern States.

Nor are we preëminently fitted for a grazing country, as all can see—especially those who have once looked on the rich pastures of England and other countries. Still, if carefully managed we have abundant grazing facilities for home supplies; but that is not the point; the idea is, we are not superlatively a grazing country, although, when scientifically gone into as a business (which it is not at present,) many persons will doubtless get rich at stock-raising, providing we can get money from some other source to buy their cattle with.

Neither is our country remarkably adapted for the raising of sheep for their wool, that we should look to that for the wealth that is to keep our internal industries going. Sheep, of course, can be raised here as they can in many other countries where they do not excel in the business, but Nature does not point our people to sheep raising, as she does to the inhabitants of some countries, as that department of enterprise for which they are specially prepared and fitted. There are no self-evident facilities for raising cheaply vast quantities of wool in Utah, so that we can compete with the world at large on that point, any more than we have facilities for raising as cheap as in the south of America large quantities of cotton—an article which we can, doubtless, yet supply sufficiently for home use. We repeat that all of these branches may be profitably followed by individuals in the supply of home consumption, but home consumption brings no money into the Territory, and we imperatively need something that will. And we ask wherein is that something? And the answer comes back from all parts of the Territory, that it is in MINERALS! We are one of Nature's vast mineral store-houses—a mineral Territory in fact. From one end to the other we walk over worlds of mineral wealth awaiting development. We have mountains of coal, iron, and lead, and enough copper and silver to supply the world—to say nothing of more precious metals. Here, then, is our specialty written on the face of the country—a department in which we can compete with almost any part of the world, and keep alive all our other industries as well. Here is the opening for our enterprise Here nature needs no forcing to produce us what we need, she groans with profusion. To strain our souls out in fruitless endeavors to bend the climate and soil of the Territory in matching other countries in departments where we were evidently never intended to equal them, much more to excel, while our grand specialty lies almost untouched, is to turn our backs on the open hand of God, and shut our eyes to that providential finger and voice, saying, "this is the way walk ye in it."

While we say this much for our mineral development, we heartily endorse the wise policy of our ecclesiastical leaders which has always been opposed to such mineral developments as gold placer diggings and the like, calculated, as they are, to flood the Territory with the refuse of society. Gold fevers doubtless, have their use in the settling of the continent, but we do not need them to settle our Territory. We can do it on a much more peaceable and profitable principle. The mineral development we recommend, is of the more solid and useful kind, which can be worked in a manner to engage only the industrious and the honest.

All that we need for development of these sources of wealth is capital and experience—but experience more particularly. As to experience, or labor skilled in the development of iron, silver or any other of our metals, we should, of course, get what we can from the members of our own community, but where they have not sufficient, it will pay to buy it of Jew or Gentile. As President Young said a few Sundays ago: "Let us accept a truth even if it comes from hell." this is a true principle, and will apply equally to a mining truth as much as any other. It will pay to purchase the necessary skill for so important a purpose at almost any price. We can afford to pay experienced men ten times what they can get elsewhere, and then be monstrous gainers. There are hundreds of men—decent men too—in the United States, who would be glad to sell their knowledge for so long a period as was required, and then go on their way rejoicing if necessary. By so doing, we need not identify our movements as a community with any others unless we choose. There need be no more harm or admixture in buying for a few months the judgment and skill of an outsider, than there is in buying Gentile dry-goods in New York.

Outside of this great natural source of wealth, almost ready to our hands, we have no means of getting money into the Territory. Working our proposed factories within ourselves—as we necessarily must, for we can command no large outside market—we must reduce wages very low in price, if we are determined to carry them through. In the development of our mineral riches, therefore, lies the only hope for our mechanics to get decent wages and deliverance from the miserable "trade" system. With the Great Railway at hand, we can ship them to the East and West, get our pay in cash, and the men working them can get the same kind of pay. This will present an opening to our mechanics, and our stock and produce raisers of all kinds, to obtain cash when selling the results of their labors to those engaged in developing our minerals.

Mineral development, of the honest, hard-working kind, is then our true starting point because it is in that and that alone of which as a Territory we have promise of a vast surplus.

We have nothing else that can enrich us except in a petty way. It stands before all other kind of developments in importance because it will alone furnish the capital for their establishment and without which they must be failures in a monetary point of view.

Without something of this kind to bring us money, we must always be a bartering community, and what that is we all know too well. "Barter" sounds very fair to the ear in words, but it is a nest of uncleanliness in practice. Every influence of the "trade" system tends to dishonesty. When men have to pay five or a hundred dollars in cash, any complete five or hundred dollar note is as valuable as another, and there is no motive for their selecting one before the other, but with payment in any particular product or article of manufacture it is not so. When an agreement has been made to pay in such articles, five out of every ten men stop to select the most worthless of the kind agreed upon, or if they have promised to pay in home products without any particular specification as to which kind, they bend the whole force of their minds to discover which of all of such articles that they possess is the most useless to them; and if they have nothing worthless enough to-day, they will stop and wait until they have. Half the debts now due on "trade" bargains are not unpaid, because the debtor is dishonest—certainly not—but simply because he has not yet discovered something he does not want. For keeping alive all the inventive faculties of a man for cheating, the "trade" system is the best in the world. Its evils are numberless. It professes to pay for labor or products at certain prices which are never realized, as from one quarter to two-thirds is lost in the trouble and delays of collection. It deprives the workman of the privilege of going to the cheapest market for his goods, because it compels him to buy only of the man who engages his labor, and at just such prices as he chooses to charge. It lays the poor man always at the mercy of the rich. It puts a bar in the way of the enjoyment of one half the conveniences of civilized life, because the trouble of effecting an exchange, especially in cumbrous articles, is worth more than the luxury. The rich man, perhaps, does not feel this because he can buy all he needs in large quantities and save two-thirds of the trouble. It effectually stops the growth of all businesses and trades which deal in small amounts. It is also the greatest bar in the way of literature the world ever felt. At this moment, twice as many people in Utah would take newspapers and magazines, but for the trouble and expense of forwarding this kind of pay. In our agricultural districts we are constantly met with the declaration that the people wish to take this magazine, but they cannot do so because the cost of hauling their pay to our office would eat up the subscription before it got here. Not only does the "trade" system operate in an injurious manner commercially and socially, but ecclesiastically. Hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of dollars, toiled for so laboriously, and paid so freely by our community in tithing, are wasted—utterly thrown to the winds—not because any body can help it, but because we have no currency, and the cost of hauling eats up a large proportion of the labors and sweat of the people without the cause we love being benefitted one particle thereby.

In a word, the "trade" system is one of the greatest curses that can rest on the progress and comfort of a community, and any free people that can protect themselves from it by any development which will command them the use of a currency, should expel it from their midst.

Our only hope of redemption from these evils lies in our mineral development. We have tried the establishment of almost everything else and have failed to obtain money, for the simple reason that the exchange of home-manufactures never can create money—money must come from the outside world. There must be something to bring it, and at present we have nothing that will. The little dribblets of grain and other products we have to spare are not worth a moments consideration, in view of the necessities of a great Territory. We have tried with laudable energy for years to develop factories and home industries, but having no money it has been toil and loss upon loss. Where is the factory or home development that really pays? Common sense would seem to say, develop that first which will bring money from other Territories and States, and then these factories and home industries which supply ourselves will have something to lean upon. We believe in home-manufactures Where we have one now we need a dozen, but we must have money before we can have factories. Factories will not create themselves and support themselves out of nothing. We are in a barren desolate country very thinly settled, with equally meagre and sparely settled Territories around us and the great world of commerce beyond has a thousand opportunities to our one. Factories in our midst as competitors with the giant establishments of the East is a useless proposition, but the idea of factories for internal supply is reasonable enough provided we develop something that will get us money sufficient to build them in the first place, and furnish them a money market afterwards. Till then it will only be as it has been in the past labor upon labor and outlay upon outlay without end, and result as to-day in comparative bankruptcy. Summed up in a few words we live in a country destitute of the rich advantages of other lands—a country with few natural facilities beyond the great mass of minerals in its bowels. These are its main financial hopes. To this our future factories must look for their life, our farmers, our stock, wool, and cotton raisers for their sale, and our mechanics for suitable wages. Let these resources be developed, and we have a future before us as bright as any country beneath the sun, because we shall be working in harmony with the indications of Nature around us.

PROGRESS OF ELECTRICITY.

CONTINUED.

The invention of Professor Morse once more recalled the attention of mankind to the wonderful properties of electricity. His name was associated with those of Franklin and Volta. Wheatstone in England, and Steinheil in Germany, contested with him the honor of the invention; but their instruments were complicated and their principle imperfect compared with the simplicity and accuracy of the American telegraph. Both the European inventors had at first employed a current of electricity to deflect the needle; while Morse pointed out and made use of the more certain method of electro-magnetism. Wheatstone did not patent his magnetic telegraph until 1840; Morse exhibited his at the Earl of Lincoln's house, in England, March 19, 1839. The idea of an electric telegraph had no doubt been long familiar to electricians, to have made the conception of practical value is one of the lasting triumphs of American genius. "It is the most admirable discovery of modern times," says Baron Gros. To the ancients, he thinks, it would have seemed a miracle from on high; and, after half a century of familiarity with the wonderful wires, we can even now scarcely avoid investing them with a mysterious attribute, and watch them with something of awe as they murmur over our heads, bearing from land to land their tidings of joy or sorrow; summoning friends to festive meetings or to the final separation, or watching, like guardian spirits, over the welfare of those long separated from us. In fact, one of the first feats of the early telegraph was to bring the glad news of the safety of one of its members to a family that were mourning over his loss; and the electric wires have often served to bind together hearts that might otherwise have been forever parted. They have sometimes realized the pleasant fancy of Strada, who painted two lovers conversing with each other, when separated, by a mysterious chain of communication; they promote the intercourse of nations, and carry into the wilderness the earliest footprints of civilized life.

The ocean telegraph forms the last important triumph of electrical science. In 1842, Morse suggested that seas and rivers might be crossed by insulating electrical wires; but the earliest ocean telegraph was that laid by the Messrs. Brett, of England, across the British Channel. These gentlemen obtained a charter for a general ocean telegraph in 1845, and applied for aid to the British Government. Their application was refused by the dull officials, and the Bretts now turned to France, where they met with encouragement from Louis Philippe, and finally an effective support from his successor, Napoleon. In August, 1850, they laid a single copper wire, covered with gutta percha, from Dover to the coast of France; a message was transmitted; and the London Times exclaimed, "The jest of yesterday thus became the fact of to-day." The undertaking which had met only ridicule and a feeble support in England succeeded; but the single wire was soon broken by the waves, and a new one was invented composed of four strands, insulated and tightly bound with iron cords, which was successfully laid in 1851. Messages passed with ease and rapidity, and the Dover telegraph was soon imitated in the narrow and comparatively shallow seas of Europe. But to cross the Atlantic with a telegraphic wire was looked upon twenty years ago as an impossible exploit, and few in that early era of telegraphy could believe that its mighty waves and its fathomless depths could ever be constrained to admit the passage of electric thought.

The Atlantic had always been supposed unfathomable. No line had ever been able to penetrate its mysterious depths, and its hidden currents had invariably swept away the heaviest weights long before they reached its shifting bed. What mountains, plains, or valleys made up the floor of the great ocean; what caverns and ravines drew in the treasures of sunken armadas; what swift tides and rivers rolled over the submarine world, was scarcely better known to modern navigators than to the gifted Arab Edrisi or the scientific Ptolemy. But about twenty years ago, American genius and industry gave birth to a new science, called by Humboldt the Geography of the Sea. Franklin, indeed, in the close of the last century, with his usual inventive foresight, had described or discovered the Gulf-stream, and had directed the attention of scientific explorers to the study of the seas. He suggested the science that was to lend effectual aid to the electric telegraph. But it was not until the year 1853 that Lieutenant Berryman—an accomplished Southerner, who nobly remained true to the Union in the late rebellion—examined and sounded the bed of the ocean between Newfoundland and the coast of Ireland. His labors were rewarded by a wonderful discovery. He found that, instead of being fathomless, the Atlantic presented to the explorer a vast plain, not more than two miles in depth, reaching from one continent to the other. He had discovered a new world hidden beneath the waters. It was about four hundred miles in width and sixteen hundred long; no currents disturbed the dense mass of shells that covered its oozy bottom; it seemed prepared by the hand of nature for the electric wires, and was named at once the Telegraphic Plateau. At either extremity of the great pathway huge mountains, four or seven thousand feet high, bounded the plain, and formed precipices as tall as Mount Blanc, down which the electric wire was to hang in the bed of the sea. Below or above the plateau, the Atlantic reaches its greatest depth. The Azores and Bermuda are mountains higher than the Himalayas, and rise precipitous from an unknown base. The Gulf-stream, a river of hot water, swifter and larger than the Amazon or the Mis-issippi, rolls its blue tide along the coast of America, and, reaching the Banks of Newfoundland and the Telegraphic Plain, melts the icebergs that comes in its path, and deposits their shells and sand in the bottom of the sea. But its hot currents disperse themselves far above the electric wires, softening the temperature of the European coast, and leaving undisturbed the bed of the ocean below. No sooner was this wonderful submarine pathway discovered than every difficulty in the way of an Atlantic telegraph seemed removed, and its eager advocates began to press on the accomplishment of a work destined, they believed, to bring peace and good-will on earth.

In 1854, a company was chartered in Newfoundland to lay the Atlantic cable; it was afterward enlarged and made general, embracing the most eminent friends of the enterprise in England and America. New York gave her Morse, Field, Cooper; England her Wheatstone, Canning, and the Bretts; and a small band of hopeful men, in the face of general doubt and derision, urged on the wonderful enterprise. Of these the most active was Mr. Cyrus W. Field. He was the Fulton of the Atlantic Telegraph—the Franklin of ocean electricity. But for his ardor, vigor, and inventive genius the world might have remained passive, and no animated electron have spanned the bed of the Telegraphic Plain. But in November, 1856, Mr. Field had succeeded in forming the Atlantic Telegraph Company; the whole capital, amounting to £350,000, was at once subscribed; the governments of England and the United States promised a subsidy to the stockholders; the cable was prepared in England; the Niagara and the Agamemnon, with a number of smaller vessels, were assigned to the enterprise by the friendly nations; and on the evening of the 7th August, 1857, the Niagara left the coast of Ireland, slowly dropping her end of the cable into the sea.

JUSTIFIABLE OBEDIENCE.

Obedience, considered abstractly, is neither a virtue nor a vice. It may be either; there are abundance of instances, in different individuals, where it is both. It is a characteristic of the most exalted and the most debased intelligences. It is powerful for good or evil; a blessing or a curse; an instrument of order and happiness or an engine of oppression and misery, according to the motive which prompts it and the power to which it is subject. Obedience is just as possible to Satan as to God, to the leader of a band of highwaymen as to a servant of the Most High; but no one would contend that it is praiseworthy in the former cases. Obedience, to be virtuous upon earth and acceptable to heaven, must be the result of the thorough conviction of the soul, that the individual or the principles, or both, asking our obedience, are in accordance with the laws of heaven and of nature, having for their object the highest good of humanity, and, as such, worthy of our implicit confidence.

Blind obedience, like blind unbelief, "is sure to err," and lead its votaries into a thousand errors, inconsistencies and difficulties. God has never required it of His creatures, though men often seek to enforce it from their fellows. God invites, nay, urges, men to reflect, to consider, to seek wisdom by study, by faith, by prayer and by every means in their power; that they may not be slothful servants, waiting (as the blindly or unthinkingly obedient must,) to be commanded in everything, but always ready to give an answer of the hope that inspires them on the courses they pursue. There must of necessity be, with all subordinate intelligences, many truths and requirements received and obeyed, for the reasons and results of which may not at the time be fully plain to their understandings. But we are assured that "There is a spirit in man and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth it understanding," and though there may be cases in which it is neither necessary nor wise for superior intelligences to fully explain all their designs to those whom they require to act, yet the latter have the right, according to revealed heavenly laws, to obtain the light of the Spirit of Truth to bear testimony to their spirits that the requirement is right and just, and if, after seeking for this in the appointed way, they fail to obtain it, they are under no obligation to obey until they do. This may appear to some to be put too strongly, but the apostle Paul affirmed the same when he said "Whatsoever is not of faith is sin."

God has endowed men with certain faculties and powers of mind and body for the use of which they are held responsible. This responsibility could not exist were they required to yield obedience without exercising their own judgment and without testing the requisition by the light of their own souls. All that God has ever required of men and women is to be true to themselves, to the convictions of their own souls, to the light that is within them; and none ever pursued this course without receiving all the additional light that, under the circumstances, would be conducive to their happiness and progress. The principles presented or the requirement made may be, in itself, perfectly correct; but it is not true to the individual unless it be in harmony with the innate perceptions of his own nature. It may be true to higher and better informed intelligences but it is not to him. He may lose certain blessings through not being prepared to comprehend and act upon such advanced ideas, but he would lose far more in doing violence to his nature by acting contrary to his convictions. Such obedience, if worthy of the name, would make him a worse instead of a better man. A manly, conscientious refusal to act in such a case, is not disobedience,—it is the truest, noblest obedience to every instinct which God has placed within him, which is, in fact, obedience to God Himself. It is quite time mankind understood this distinction,—that they should learn wherein righteous obedience consists, and be free from the self-imposed mental tyranny—far worse than African slavery—which compels to a blind unintelligent obedience at the sacrifice of conscience and self-respect, through an unfounded fear of incurring the Divine displeasure.

JUSTITIA.

HOLDING THE MIRROR UP TO NATURE.

EDITOR UTAH MAGAZINE:—

As an admirer of the drama, and especially of the "holding the mirror up to Nature," in accessories as well as in the Star characters, I take pleasure in noticing that the architecture, dresses, furniture and other details are true to the time and locality in which the events portrayed are supposed to have occurred.

In the play of "Virginius," I was much struck with the republican simplicity manifested in the furniture of his humble apartment.

Admiringly I saw him seat his noble form on a chair of precisely the same pattern and finish as that which friend Dinwoodey used to supply to the Utah public before the days of oil paint and varnish; and recline his elbow on a deal table of the same class.

In my lack of historical knowledge, I had previously had no idea that this pattern of furniture boasted of such a venerable antiquity; and I now think that if the gentlemen referred to had exhibited some of that pattern of chairs, etc., at our late Fair, with the announcement, that it was of precisely the same make as that used by the ancient citizens of the Mistress of the World, he would have caused even more of a sensation than did his magnificent suit of bed-room furniture, with silver medal awarded.

I afterwards had the pleasure of witnessing a most matchless impersonation of the Fell Tyrant, Richard; and was certainly unprepared to find that he had the advantage of a coal-oil lamp with glass chimney in his tent, as I had been laboring under the delusion that such articles were of recent introduction.

I have to thank the Managers of our deservedly popular institution for the above items of information, as I had not been able to find them in any books to which I have had access; and hope that in future I may be able, by close attention, to learn still more from what they may present to our consideration.

WM. J. S.

EMANUEL SWEDENBORG.

Nothing which Swedenborg wrote—and he is the author of eighty-nine volumes—has so much interested mankind as what he tells us concerning the condition of human beings after death. Whether what he advances on this subject is to be believed or rejected, is a question which every reader will decide for himself; but we can all agree that it is very curious and interesting.

"After death," he says, "a man is so little changed that he even does not know but that he is living in the present world. He eats and drinks, and enjoys all pleasures, as he does in this world; and the resemblance between the two worlds is so great that in the spiritual world there are cities, with palaces and houses, and also writings and books, employments and merchandise, gold, silver, and precious stones. In a word, there is in the spiritual world all and everything that there is in the natural world, but in heaven such things are in an infinitely more perfect shape." And again: "They who are in heaven are continually advancing to the spring-time of life; and the more thousands of years they live, the more delightful and happy is the spring to which they attain. Good women, worn with age, come after a while more and more into the flower of youth, and into a loveliness which exceeds any conception of beauty that can be formed from what the eye has ever seen. Goodness moulds their form into its own image, and makes the countenance beam with grace and sweetness. In fine, to grow old in heaven is to grow young." This is a delightful prospect for the much enduring sons and daughters of earth.

Who was Swedenborg, then, that he should have taught such strange things? And is there any reason for believing that he knew more any of the unseen world than the rest of us?

He was born at Stockholm, in Sweden, January the 29th, 1688, just one hundred and eighty-one years ago. His father was a bishop of the Swedish National Church, which is Lutheran, and in one particular he strongly resembled his son. While, on the one hand, he was a remarkably energetic, practical, and every way efficient person, he at the same time was strongly given to a kind of spiritual dreaminess, and believed, among other things, that mortals sometimes held intercourse with angels. Emanuel, the second of seven children, was a very serious child, whose greatest delight was to converse upon points of faith with the clergymen who visited his father's house.

"I often remarked to them," he says, "that charity is the life of faith, and that the charity which gives us faith is nothing other than the love of our neighbor."

He tells us, also, that he was a precocious child, and much given to prayer from an early period of his life. While engaged in prayer or in meditation, he says he was able to breathe inwardly without inhaling the external air, and this he thought was one of his qualifications for holding communion with spirits. At college, however, he pursued the usual course, and showed no more particular inclination to religion than any other youth similiarly brought up. He was an excellent scholar, and was noted for the purity of his life and conversation. After leaving college, he visited France, Holland, and England, and upon his return, after four years absence, he was appointed to a post in the royal college of Mines.

He was never married, and had but one love affair in his life. One of his colleagues in the College of Mines, who had also been his tutor in mathematics, had a daughter aged fourteen, whom he offered to Swedenborg in marriage, and induced the girl to give him a written promise of her hand. But, upon reflection, the young lady bitterly repented her hasty promise, which, when Swedenborg discovered, he freely released her.

Charles the Twelfth, the rash, infuriate warrior, was King of Sweden then, and had just returned from his Turkish prison. Swedenborg, who was an accomplished engineer, contrived for the King some huge vehicles on which large boats, cannons and galleys were carried over fourteen miles overland; for which he and his brothers were raised to the rank of nobles.

Meanwhile he had begun to publish the long series of his works. After his four year's tour in England, Holland and France, he gave the public two volumes of light, humorous poetry; and from this time forward his scientific publications appeared with unusual rapidity. He wrote upon minerals, natural history, chemistry, algebra, navigation, arithmetic, coinage, docks, ditches, the manufacture of salt, and the cure of smoky chimneys. These works gave him some reputation and displayed an intimate knowledge of the subjects treated; but they attracted no particular attention, and none of them were much known beyond the borders of Sweden.

Until he was past fifty-five years of age he lived the life of a scholar and a man of science, differing from others of his class only in his superior diligence, and in the singular modesty and quiet kindliness of his habits. Then came over him a change; after which he conceived himself to be commissioned by heaven as a teacher of religion. His chief employment, during the last twenty-five years of his life, was the production and publication of that wonderful series of theological works which his followers prize so highly and study so constantly, and which are indeed pregnant with valuable hints and suggestions, even for those who do not accept Swedenborg's supernatural claims. He made not the slightest attempt to gain proselytes. All his works were written in Latin—all were published at his own expense, and most of the copies were given away himself.

His habits were exceedingly strange. Visitors to Stockholm may still see the large summer-house in which he studied and received his guests. His friends had to wait sometimes, because the master of the house was conversing with spirits. They would hear conversation in the next room, and when he came in, he would tell them, perhaps, that he had been talking with Virgil on the ruins at Rome, or with Aristotle upon some questions of science. Sometimes he would remain in bed for several days without food, conversing, as he said, with spirits.

He rarely tasted meat or wine, but drank profusely of coffee; and his dinner usually consisted of bread and milk. His biographer tells us that some of his unpublished manuscripts smell of snuff. He is said never to have laughed outright, yet always seemed serenely cheerful; and he used to keep gingerbread in his pocket to give to the children that played in the square near his residence. Sometimes, when a bill was presented to him for settlement, he would point the bearer of it to the drawer where he kept his money, and tell him to pay himself. In short, he was an absolutely guileless, innocent man, who has fully believed in the reality of his mission and in the truth of his doctrine, as he did in his bodily existence.

He spent much of his time in London, as it was here that he published most of his works. It was in London, too, that he died, at the house of a wigmaker, at 26, Great Bath Street. He died, after a fit of apoplexy, in March, 1772, aged eighty-four. Before his death, the communion was administered to him by an orthodox Lutheran clergyman, and his remains were deposited in the Swedish church near the tower of London.

TERESE, THE HEBREW MAIDEN;

OR,

NOT ALL DROSS

BY EDWARD W. TULLIDGE.

CHAPTER LXXX.

FARINELLI AND HIS BRIDE IN THEIR COFFINS.

We must now go back a little to bury Farinelli and his bride. As we know already the victims of judicial fallability were given up to Snap, for this had been the request which the prisoner had made himself when lying in the condemned cell under sentence of death. He had moreover made the uncle of Terese promise him, because of the love and care which his mother and himself had from her birth lavished on Terese, that he, her uncle Judah should cause his coffined remains to be borne to his dear native Italy, and buried in the little village where Terese and himself were born. Judah Nathans had promised and these wishes and pledge were known to the authorities; and so the giving up of the bodies of the victims was taken as a thing in course, fulfilling the wishes of the dead. Now he was known to be innocent by the appearance of Sir Walter Templar alive, there was not one in authority in Newgate prison or in London itself, who would not, out of pity and profound respect for the victim of the law's injustice, have done much to have fulfilled his slightest wish: Farinelli and his bride were therefore now in the hands of Snap to dispose of as he pleased.

First came two very handsome coffins to Newgate, which Snap purchased from a famous city undertaker, giving him an order to make immediately two lead coffins, to place these in for the purpose of bearing the dead to Italy. The inside tenements of the victims were draped in black cloth, bearing on them silver breast-plates, on which two expert artizans had quickly engraved the names and ages of Farinelli and his wife. At eight o'clock that night, they were put into a hearse and borne to the house in which Isaac Ben Ammon had resided during the first part of his time in London. The house belonged to his nephew, left to him by his great uncle Reuben Nathans. Arriving at this particular house Judah caused the coffined victims to be carried into the room which his uncle Reuben had consecrated with his money-bags. It was as much a retreat as a scientific man's den, into which Snap had converted it. The house had been of late unoccupied for Terese and her grandfather were residing for the time being at Sir Richard Courtney's.

As soon as the hearse had left the door and the friends of the victims had departed, Snap went into his "den," locked the door and closed the iron shutters of the windows from the inside. He then removed the lids of the coffins which had only been slightly fastened with screws, and looked upon the peaceful faces of Farinelli and his bride. It was now ten o'clock at night.

It was summer, but Snap lighted in the grate a gentle fire. Perhaps he wanted a cheerful blaze in the grate, for people in England like to see the fire at night even in summer time. He next took from a closet, where he kept all sorts of scientific varieties, a bottle. It was wine. He uncorked it and drank and then he threw himself into an arm chair very elegant, very easy, for Snap loved ease. He was as we have often noted, epicurian and if he designed to spend a night of mourning with the dead he was about to do it in his own peculiar style. He sat for about a quarter of an hour with a comical smile upon his face and then no longer able to restrain himself, he vented himself in a genuine laugh. Snap very seldom laughed.

"Solomon, my friend you, certainly did err. There is something new under the sun. I did think it impossible for me to ever play in a farce. I have my farce at last. My good Farinelli I have befooled all London to-day. Thanks to that little poisoning affair of yours in the morning."

Snap drank another glass of wine, and then he looked again at the faces of the dead. He then put his warm lips to their cold ones—no not quite cold now. He rubbed their hands in his long bony ones whose palms were moist, not dry, proving that, in spite of all his philosophic training of mind, there were the fires of deep feeling in his nature. His hand then sought the region of the heart as though his intention was to impart new life with a gentle friction. This he continued for a few minutes. There was a bed in the room upon which he often slept when pursuing his scientific practices. Lifting Farinelli from his coffin, he now placed him into this bed; and then he did the same with the bride. The coffins were next removed and put out of sight and then Snap went to the fire, poked it up to make it burn more briskly and drank another glass of wine.

"I wish I was as certain of the resurrection of all the world as I am that Farinelli and his wife will rise again. I have not quite solved this problem of a resurrection but I am trying an experiment upon it to-night. Bah! 'tis no experiment, for I have not let my dead quite die. Now, this flesh turned to rottenness and I would not undertake to raise it. It is bad policy for the Gods to let their creatures quite die. Now those old mummied Egyptians have been in their catacombs thousands of years and are not resurrected. Yet which is, I insist, a proof that it is very bad policy to let people die altogether just for the satisfaction of preserving them for some last day. Out upon the nonsense, there is no last day; and I am of an opinion that the mummied Egyptians have been preserved long enough for a scientific demonstration that their mortal dung would not rise again. Now, there may be a life—a spirit in man that does rise from the dead mortality and ascends into a higher life. Against this I say nothing, for it is scientific. All the universe becomes rarified into a higher, subtiler life by change. The black coal becomes a bright flame and mixes with the elements; but the dung—the ashes remain and are never again made up into the same identity. No being that is destined to live in the higher form dies even for a moment or it could never live again, it must arise from its earthliness at the period called death, and it can never return to take upon itself the mortal rot—its mass of filthiness that has disgusted the very grave which has swarmed with loathsome life. So, my good Farinelli, we did very wisely in not letting you and your tragic queen quite die."

And thus Snap went on for an hour or two philosophizing aloud and working all the time in rubbing his patients with the warm, moist palm of his hand. As we have noticed throughout our story, Snap always talked when he performed most, the habit was an evidence how completely he was absorbed in his work, but his thoughts were always in keeping with his act. So now he was engaged in raising Farinelli and his wife as from the dead, his subject very naturally became the resurrection. But then his views are so deistical that we cannot altogether indorse them. Snap has created himself and must be responsible for his own intellectual image.

There is now a warmth in the bodies of Farinelli and his wife and Snap in much satisfaction rests from his labor, throws himself into his chair pretty well exhausted, pokes the fire to make it burn bright again and then drinks another glass of wine. He then put on the kettle to make breakfast, at the same time telling the kettle to make haste or his patients would be awake before breakfast was ready."

"Four o'clock!" he continued, taking out his watch. "In half an hour, they will be alive again. The antidote has not failed, the Hindoo physician who gave it to me did not overrate its potency. I have carried that antidote about my person for ten years actually hunting for some opportunity to test its virtue, and my good friends there gave me that opportunity. I am certainly much obliged to them. Yes, it is a wonderful antidote. It is so subtile that it runs before the poison quick as lightning and suspends life for twenty-four hours to preserve it. In other words, it is a more terrible agency than the one taken to destroy, but it spends its force upon its rival. It throws the patient in a moment into a sleep as profound as death, and during that sleep, it thoroughly neutralizes the poison taken into the system. Ha! that was the first sigh of returning life. I think, Madam Clara, will be resurrected first. That was another sigh, this time deeper and from Farinelli. They are feeling the warmth of the room and of each other's embraces, for I have laid the wife in her husband's arms. Now I will wager they were going to romantically die in that kind of a romantic way, so I will let them be resurrected in each other's arms, which I think is as poetic as dying in that very interesting situation. Now, I think we have slightly improved upon Genesis, for it was certainly bad taste to make the man first, seeing that they twain were intended to be one. Man has been a conceited puppy ever since, because he was created first, and lent his rib to make his wife. Moses, Moses, I wish you could revise your book of Genesis to-day. They are breathing in regular intervals. Their hearts beat finely too. In ten minutes more they will return to consciousness."

Snap now commenced to make tea, toast bread, and prepare for breakfast with a quiet humor which suggested that he had this time really found his farce. He had revenged the condemnation of his innocent friend by throwing upon the government the burden of its own sin, kept Farinelli and his wife under the sanctity of a popular sympathy instead of subjecting them to a disagreable sensation in society, which would have met them wherever they appeared, he had humored his tastes by spending his money liberally on the farce of a burial, and now he was arranging the sequel by preparing breakfast for the dead.

Clara Garcia came to a state of consciousness first, but so peaceful did all seem, that she was in no wise startled. Indeed she slept again for a few minutes, slept in her husband's arms, for the last feelings which she had experienced before her loss of consciousness, were those of security and triumph. She awoke therefore not with the terrors upon her of her husband's doom. Soon Farinelli was also restored and then the voice of Snap recalled them to some realization of strange circumstances.

"Well, my good Farinelli, you have been a long journey; are you not ready for your breakfast? Now, my dear madam, will you please not to alarm the neighborhood by any tragic shrieks: this is our farce—not a tragedy. Will you please to compose yourself with this delicious cup of coffee."

"Why, Mr. Nathans, what can this all mean. I thought we were dead."

"So you are, my dear madam: but don't distress yourself. It is simply a change of lodgings. I pray you be careful and not scald your husband with that coffee. Now, my good Farinelli, will you be so considerate as to set your wife the sensible example of drinking the coffee. It is not a time for tragic speeches."

The happy couple, who now began to realize the circumstances and their escape from death, obeyed their strange friend and took their breakfast while listening to the detail of Snap's farce. They were not exactly in the humor to laugh; but certainly not to cry. Their gratitude, however, to Judah for saving their lives and their satisfaction at the deliverance of Sir Walter Templar from his dungeon, and the victim of circumstantial evidence from the charge of murder, was not of a mixed nature: it was entire and deep.

Judah Nathans then told the happy pair of his future arrangements, which we will briefly note. Farinelli and his wife were to go to Italy, and under assumed names spend the future of their days in peace. The village where Terese and her foster-brother were born was the place chosen—the spot where Farinelli had willed to be buried with his wife—Judah selected for their home. He was immensely rich, as we know, by the death of his uncle, Reuben Nathans; and as a reward to Farinelli for the kindness and care which his niece Terese had received, he settled upon the foster-brother one thousand pounds a year for life. Thus did this man of evil carry out his principles of justice.

In a month afterwards, Farinelli and his wife were ready to start for Italy. They stayed only for a meeting with Terese and Walter Templar. The day came, it was after the grand marriage. Judah took Sir Richard Courtney and his family to the house where Farinelli and his wife were in seclusion. It was a joyful meeting, but they were all somewhat prepared for the happy sequel. They all acknowledged the hand of Heaven in the event which had brought deliverance—all acknowledged the hand of Heaven, except Snap, who observed that he had not yet quite solved the problem upon that point.

"Science says, demonstrate," he added, "and though we have certainly demonstrated that my niece by a remarkable vision, found out her lover, yet that does not explain everything, nor can we reach the light of the sun at anytime until we are suns ourselves, and darkness has altogether gone out of us: still I think the hand of Heaven was in it."

"And I know, uncle Judah, the hand of Heaven has been stretched out to bring about this happy issue."

Thus spoke Terese, the Hebrew Maiden, who represented a divine faith, her uncle, science—Truth, which also divine, though sometimes seeming impious, while Faith—bright Faith always comes like Love, with the angels form.

CHAPTER LXXXI.

HERBERT AND IDA, THE FORSAKEN

"A lady has requested admission to your cell, sir," said his jailor, to Sir Herbert Blakely the day before the time appointed for his trial.

"A lady! I know no lady uncommonly devoted to me. I dare say 'tis some victim come to reproach me. Well, never mind: let the lady in, her visit will vary the monotony."

In a few minutes, a lady, deeply veiled, entered Sir Herbert Blakely's cell.

"To whom may I have the pleasure of speaking, Madam," inquired the prisoner, assuming the style of gallantry to hide his humiliation.

The lady answered not, but the great sob which she could not suppress, revealed her emotion, and convinced the prisoner that, whoever she might be, she came to weep over him and not to heap upon his head reproaches.

"Will it please you, Madam, to unveil, that I might see the face of her who thus weeps for me," he said with some expression of genuine feeling.

The lady did as the prisoner requested her, but Herbert knew not his forsaken wife, whom he had not seen for more than twenty-five years.

"The face is beautiful, though there is the lines of care upon it. Madam, have we ever met before?"

"Herbert, do you not find some traces in me of the girl——"

"My God, it is Ida!" exclaimed the prisoner, interrupting her.

He staggered to a seat, overcome by the sudden memory of the love days of his youth and the base betrayal of the girl who now stood before him. Ida readily saw that his emotions were genuine; in an instant, all her wrongs were forgotten and she was on her knees by his side, weeping in sympathy and kissing his hand. Such is the true woman: she is an angel to a man when most he needs one at his side—an angel, even to her betrayer. Sir Herbert Blakely felt this now and he groaned in the bitterness of remorse.

"Ida, your coming to me thus has made me human, your tears has brought me to repentance: I would that I could wipe out my past for your sake."

"I thank God, Herbert, for those words."

"Ida, I thought you dead years ago. Often has the memory of you haunted me, but I have driven it away. Ida, I did love you, but I betrayed you because I feared my father's iron will and knew his purposes to force me if necessary to marry a titled wife to raise my family among the old nobility of England. Ida, I betrayed you, yet I loved you and have never loved another."

"Herbert, tell me truly," here observed Ida, anxiously. "Do you wish now that the marriage which I believed genuine had been so?"

"As God, whom I have so much offended, will judge me, Ida, I do."

"Then, Herbert, my husband, the marriage was not a false one."

"You deceive yourself, my poor betrayed one," replied the prisoner sorrowfully.

"Judah Nathans will tell you that I am right, Herbert."

"Has Snap said that you are my lawful wife?"

"He has, Herbert."

"Then, Ida, you are my wife, for Snap never lies and never betrays. It was he, then, who secured you. That I can readily understand, for he, it was, who brought to us the priest whom I believed was a false one. Does any know this but ourselves?"

"Yes, Herbert, all England. Judah Nathans has established my right and title and the country knows me now as Lady Ida Blakely, and your son as——"

"My son, Ida? Yes, there was a son, but I had supposed both you and him long since dead."

"He is living, Herbert. You have seen him, Arthur your secretary, is your own son."

"This, then, explains the yearning which I have felt for him and the likeness which I saw in him of a face and gentle eye of her who haunted me: it was yourself, Ida."

"Herbert, your father knew all the truth, oft met and fondled his grandson in his arms, left him at his death five hundred pounds a year, with which I educated him for the ministry."

"My father was a strange man, in his contradictions of good and evil, in some respects much like Snap, whom he trusted more than he did me, his only son. Well, I must confess he acted wisely in that."

"Herbert, he trusted him even more than you know. He left both you and Arthur altogether in his hands. He placed in his charge his dying testament, acknowledging his grandson and leaving him all his wealth and estates to come into his possession when he reached manhood or at your death, according to the will of Judah Nathans whom he left to act in every particular as though he himself was in your father's stead."

"This is very singular, but I doubt it not, for I see my father and Snap both in this thing. Is this will also established, Ida?"

"It is, Herbert. The will was drawn up by Lawyer Wortley and witnessed by old Lord Rivers, both of whom have confirmed the case, at once establishing my right and that of our son."

"Ida, I am glad of this, for, if I am condemned, my estates would have been confiscated to the Crown. Had I known that Arthur was my son, I should have transferred all to him before my trial."

"There is one thing, Herbert, that I fear you will not pardon us for doing," here observed his wife with much trouble in her face. "Yet our son dared not act otherwise, and for this reason not to have your resistance and perhaps cursing for it, we have not visited you until all was accomplished. Indeed, for the same reason, Arthur waits without until you learn that which he has in justice done."

"Why, Ida, what can you mean? Arthur without, and not come to his father. Yet have I not deserved the boy's love. Well, well, its no use to whine; I am no saint for him to venerate, yet he might have come to me in my trouble."

"Oh, Herbert, Arthur's heart bleeds for you. It is the fear of your curse that keeps him away."

"What has he done, Ida, that I should curse him."

"Made restitution to the De Lacys."

"Damnation!" burst from Sir Herbert Blakely, who paced his cell for a few moments in great rage, which, however, gradually subsided, and then he returned to his anxious wife, and taking her gently by the hand, observed—

"Yes, Ida, I should have cursed him a few months ago, but not now, though your revelation a moment ago went through me like a sword. Under the circumstances, it is all for the best. It is fit that he should redeem his father's name. Ida, call in our son that he may receive a bad man's blessing, but not his father's curse."

In a few minutes more, Arthur Blakely was folded to his father's heart. We must pass over the hours that the noble young clergyman and his mother spent that day with the guilty father. Suffice to say that this discovery of his wife and son, with all the peculiar circumstances of the case wrought in Sir Herbert Blakely a great change. Even he was not all dross.

CHAPTER LXXXII.

THE LAST MEETING OF SNAP AND HIS MASTER.

Snap entered the cell of Sir Herbert Blakely ten minutes after the departure of his wife and son.

"Herbert!"

"Snap."

Thus they met again and grasped each other's hands with a certain love from their associations of forty years, commencing in their early boyhood.

"Are you satisfied, Herbert?" inquired his mentor.

"I am, Snap. Your fidelity to my wife and son has reconciled me to the rest. Snap, I love that noble boy, and you well know how passionately I loved Ida. The old affection has returned, but purer now than in my youth."

"I have not betrayed my trust, Herbert, have I? Do you not think your father would justify what I have done?"

"You have not betrayed your trust, Snap; and I think my father would justify you."

"'Tis well. But one act more remains. I still stand in your father's shoes. Your trial comes off to-morrow."

"It does. You have some deep purpose, Snap: that I can see."

"You will be hanged or transported for life, Herbert. Which shall it be?

"Damnation! neither hanged nor transported."

"Right, Herbert. Thus have I resolved."

"Snap, you have some deep purpose. Tell me at once."

"Sit down, Herbert, and listen. I must speak low. The judge will condemn you to be hanged or transported for life; nothing can save you. Even if a pardon was obtained, which is almost impossible, you would have to fly from society and your native land as a pardoned felon: all would shun you."

"I know it, Snap; I know it!" groaned the guilty man.

"I said, to obtain a pardon is almost impossible, for the Crown considers that you betrayed it in sentencing Farinelli to death, and it is revengeful because it erred."

"I wish the fellow had lived, Snap, yet he died like a man."

"Herbert, you have one virtue that you always possessed. It is courage."

"You do me justice there, old friend, for such I acknowledge you."

"Look, Herbert, at this curious ring on my left hand. You see it has the serpent's head. There is a spring which, if touched by a firm pressure, starts the serpent's tongue. That tongue will sting. I always, as you have often noticed, wear that jewel on my left hand. Should I need its service, it would give me my own quietus, which it certainly would, were I in such a state as you are now. Or did I need its service for an enemy, it would do its work, if for a friend, then it would serve in the death grip of friendship. Will you take my hand, Herbert."

Snap, I will!"

"I thought so Herbert. You have the virtue of daring to die like a man."

"At least, old friend, I will do that. You have come to grant what I would myself have asked. The means to die."

"Herbert, that serpent's sting will infuse into your blood a subtle poison. It will give no pain. You will sleep, and in the morning be found dead in your bed. You will die, so the doctor's will say, of apoplexy. Have you aught to desire of me as your last charge, I will fulfill it."

"Nothing have I to charge you with to fulfill for me, old friend, excepting to stand as true to my son as you have been to me and my father, and to soften as much as possible the stroke of my death to poor Ida. Snap, give me your hand and let us part. You shall not despise me. Our lives have not been good, but the interview with my poor forsaken wife and that noble boy who mourns for his father's errors has made a repentant man of me. I have done enough wrong in my life, and am now like a rat driven to the wall. To reform is impossible. I should have listened to you; and then this discovery of Ida and Arthur might have purified me. Yet it might not, for when we are on the road to the gallows, we seldom stop until the hangman's hands are at our throat. Snap, give me this last grasp of friendship. Give it me, I say. Why hesitate? At least I have, as you have allowed, the courage of a man. Come, hesitate not,"

"I do not hesitate, Herbert; yet I do not hurry to sting. Were there any other escape, this should not be done to-night. Herbert, there is my hand. I never loved you so much as now I give to you the grip of death. 'Tis done."

"Snap—Snap, my old counselor and friend, I thank you with all my heart."

"Herbert, I will now leave you. In half an hour, you will fall into a peaceful sleep; you know the rest. The poison is already in your blood, coursing through your veins. It is best I leave you at once. You may wish to collect your thoughts perhaps for prayer during the short time of consciousness allotted to you. I know in belief you are a Christian,—I am a sceptic and yet would not deprive you of the hopes which cling to us at such a time. Herbert, if there be a hereafter, we shall meet again."

"But where, Snap, shall we meet?"

"In a world at least as good as this. My own intellect can give you at least this assurance. If there be a God, then that God is not worse than myself. I have no hells to send you to, but in mercy and consideration, I have given you the doom of relief from a bad state and the unpleasant circumstances of the gallows or the convict's life. I say surely God is not worse than I. Herbert, good-by for this life; if there be another, we shall meet again."

"Snap—old companion, good-by."

And thus these men parted. In the morning, Sir Herbert Blakely was found dead in his bed. It was thought that the interview with his wife and son, his remorse and the terrors of the coming trial on the morrow had overwhelmed him, and that he had died in a fit of apoplexy.

Snap fulfilled the dying wishes of his master in regard to Sir Herbert's son and wife. Arthur took his father's title and estates, and redeemed his name by a life of honor and benevolence and his dear mother was in all his works of usefulness as a servant of Christ—a ministering angel.

Here before dismissing Sir Herbert Blakely's special connections, we must note an item concerning his friend Orsini. The Count was upon the point of flying from England to his own land to escape justice when the Marquis Baglioni met him and offered him the alternative of fighting a duel with him or being denounced at once to the officers of the law. The gallant Marquis preferred to chastise the villain himself rather than to hand a countryman over to the law. He felt to call him to an account for his actions against Farinelli and Sir Walter Templar. The challenge was accepted, and Orsini fell mortally wounded.

"Infinite Evil!" mused the philosopher upon these events. "Bah! there is none such in the universe. There is a germ of goodness in all things. Even Herbert possessed redeeming qualities. Now, if we were all brought under circumstances in this world to develop those qualities which would redeem us, but which are very often not brought into our lives, then should we be redeemed from our errors here. Well, then, why not hereafter? I say humanity is not dross, but gold. Purify it then and when 'tis purified by fire enough it will be all gold. Hell! Yes, send us all to hell; for light and truth and goodness are eternal blazings. So if the Satan is in his lake of fire, he shall be God, for he is light and truth and that is goodness and justice. The universe will purge itself in time and even Herbert Blakely come from his furnace, gold."

CHAPTER LXXXIII.

COMING EVENTS CAST THEIR SHADOWS BEFORE.

There was again a grand gathering at the Courtney House of all the branches of the family, whose members have been so happily united after all the storms of thirty years. It is ten years after the marriage of Terese and Walter Templar, ten years since the redemption of the De Lacy estates and the tragic close of an evil man's life who nevertheless was found in his last moments "not all dross."

There were gathered at this time at Courtney House on the tenth anniversary of the great marriage, first Sir Walter Templar and Lady Terese, his beautiful Hebrew wife now more beautiful than ever. Ten years of a blissful life unclouded by a single sorrow, supremely blissful in Walter's undying love, supremely blissful in heaven's greatest blessing to well mated wives—a little flock of lambs to gambol around their mother's knee and leap with laughing shouts into their father's arms—ten years of such a life had made Terese, the Jewess, divinely beautiful.

First, there was young Walter Templar, the eldest child now nine years old. The boy was very like his father and the pride of his fond mother's heart. Next came the gentle Alice Templar named after Alice Courtney, Walter's spirit-bride. The third was a boy, and they named him Judah, out of gratitude to his great uncle, but much to the disgust of that despiser of antique reverences. Indeed, Judah Nathans insisted that his namesake should be called Frederick, that being his second name. The fourth was also a son, and they named him Richard Courtney: and to him his uncle Sir Richard designed to leave the Courtney inheritance, and it was thought the government would confer the title also, and thus keep up the honored name. This Sir Richard Courtney considered just for it would be a return to Terese, in the person of her son for her redeeming the De Lacy estates. There were two more children, the infant Terese, and Eleanor two years of age. Thus it will be seen that our heroine was the mother of a blooming family, and Sir Walter Templar a proud and happy father.

Lord Frederick De Lacy and Eleanor, his noble wife, who resigned in her great generosity her cousin Walter, but found the consummation of love in her union with Frederick; they were also gathered to Courtney House on the anniversary of their marriage day. They brought with them their four bright children, three sons and a daughter.

There was one more family who had come all the way from Italy for the visit, Farinelli and Clara Garcia, his wife, were there; and they had brought with them their son the offspring of days when the father laid under the sentence of death. He was nearly ten years of age and had already appeared in public as a singer and bid fair to rival even his father. Farinelli was on his visit under an assumed name, for to that day, he was very sensitive upon the point of a public sensation over the past. He preferred to let the nation, which had so grossly erred in its assumption of infallability, believe it had condemned an innocent man to an ignominious death. Snap also preferred to let the country believe Farinelli dead, that it might bear the weight of his supposed tragic end to escape the gallows. Sir Richard Brine, however, knew all; but as he had done much in friendship in Farinelli's case and believing him innocent, would even have righteously betrayed his country by letting Snap carry out his design to save the prisoner, had not Sir Walter Templar been found in time. Sir Richard Brine, kept to himself the entire secret. He also had come to Courtney House, and was on his visit, particularly to see Farinelli.

Sir Richard Courtney and his sister Lady Templar were on this auspicious day almost as joyful as when Walter was found, and their great family engagements fulfilled ten years before. They had now their grandchildren around them to increase their joy which was not always the case, for Sir Richard and his sister, Walter's mother, lived together at Courtney House as of old, though they occasionally visited their children and received visits from them in return. Sir Walter and Lady Terese his wife resided with their interesting family at their castle in Cornwall, while Lord Frederick De Lacy and Lady Eleanor his wife with their interesting children, inhabited the castle which Walter and his wife had redeemed from the hands of their supplanter. Hence the re-gathering from various parts of the country on this anniversary of the wedding day was a great event in the history of the family. Sir Richard was now about sixty years of age and Lady Templar was two years younger than her brother. They were still noble-looking and hale, but they were very proud when they heard the flock of lambs born unto their children shout after them the dear names of grandpapa and grandmamma.

There was another at Courtney House that day who gloried in that name. It was Isaac Ben Ammon. He was now eighty years of age, but the peace of the last ten years had preserved his naturally iron constitution not worn it out. He was simply now more the child than when last we parted from him. He lived always with his grandchild Terese, at Sir Walter Templar's castle in Cornwall, near which Judah Nathans had built a fine residence. At the castle, old Isaac was always surrounded with his great grandchildren. The venerable Hebrew had continued to dream about his race, and the restoration; and he had found in the children what he had not in his nephew Judah, namely enthusiasm and credulity. They knew all the history of Joseph and his brethren, Joseph and Benjamin in particular, and a similar amount about Samuel and David. As for young Walter, he was duly elected by his dreaming grandfather to rebuild Jerusalem and the Temple again, for the old man had so confounded that fine intellectual eldest son of Sir Walter with a Messiahlike mission that it puzzled the dear old soul where to separate them. Snap was very intellectually disgusted with the fancies of his uncle being instilled into young Walter's mind, for he would have much preferred his mind gradually illuminated with the light of truth, to being filled with the superstitions and antiquated dreams of his race concerning the return to Jerusalem, and the coming of another Messiah which will never be fulfilled. Snap was not a Christian but he was not altogether a Jew.

There was venerable Isaac Ben Ammon on this eventful aniversary in the garden of Courtney House surrounded by his great-grandchildren and also now Frederick and Eleanor's children. Young Walter and his great-grandsire were engaged in building the walls of Jerusalem around a beautiful flower plot, much to the delight of all the rest of the children, who were gathering for the builders, stones from all parts of the garden. It was at this work that Snap found them when the wall was nearly completed.

"Judah, thou art wise as Solomon, our sire. I wish thou wouldst teach Walter how to build the Temple."

"Uncle Isaac," returned the philosopher, "wait till Walter is a few years older, and I will instruct him how to build the Temple of Science and give to him the endowment of truth and not superstition."

Snap turned away leaving the children, including the grandfather, at their work.

It was thought by the happy parents that there would be quite an extensive mating between the families of the Templars and the De Lacys, for during the past week spent at Courtney House, young Walter Templar and Terese De Lacy have done considerable "sparking," as they say in America, which simply means that the boys and the girls are always mating from the time they leave their mothers' arms. With these shadows of coming events, we must bid farewell to Terese, the Hebrew Maiden, and Judah Nathans, whom we have found, the Not All Dross.

THE END.

MOTHER.

Of all the words in language, there's no other
Equal in gentle influence to "Mother,"
It is the first name that we learn to love—
It is the first star shining from above;
It is a light that has a softer ray
Than aught we find in life's most dazzling day.
Mother! it back to childhood brings the man,
And forth to womanhood it leads the maiden.
Mother! 'tis with the name all things began,
That are with love and sympathy full-laden.
Oh, 'tis the fairest thing in nature's plan,
That all life's cares may not affection smother,
While lives within the yearning heart of man
Melting remembrance of a gentle mother.

Our friends will find at Mr. Waters' store the very best assortment of Pianos, Melodeons and Organs to be found in the United States.—Graham's Magazine

MUSICAL DOINGS.—Since Mr. Waters gave up publishing sheet music, he has devoted his whole capital and attention to the manufacture and sale of Pianos and Melodeons. He has just issued a catalogue of his new instruments, giving a new scale of prices, which shows a marked reduction from former rates, and his Pianos have recently been awarded the First Premium at several Fairs. Many people of the present day, who are attracted, if not confused, with the flaming advertisements of rival piano houses, probably overlook the modest manufacturer like Mr. Waters; but we happen to know that his instruments earned him a good reputation long before 2 positions and "honors" connected therewith were ever thought of; indeed, we have one of Mr. Waters' Piano-fortes now in our residence, (where it has stood for years,) of which any manufacturer in the world might be proud. We have always been delighted with it as a sweet-toned and powerful instrument, and there is no doubt of its durability; more than this, some of the best amateur players in the city, and several celebrated pianists, have performed on the said piano, and all pronounce it a superior and first-class Instrument. Stronger indorsement we could not give.—Home Journal,

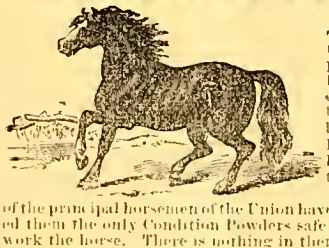
HARVELL'S
HORSE POWDERS.



These celebrated and renowned powders for horses and cattle have been tested by an intelligent public for sixteen years. Hundreds of the principal horsemen of the Union have pronounced them the only Condition Powders safe to use and work the horse. There is nothing in them to expose the animal, but, on the contrary, everything to improve them. The proprietors of horse railroads, omnibusses, and stage owners in all the principal cities use them: and their combined testimony stamps them one of the wonders of medical science. Letters sufficient to fill a small book are in our possession, testifying to their goodness. Merchants are requested to warrant them, and refund the purchase money should they fail to give satisfaction.

ALLCOCK'S POROUS
STRENGTHENING
PLASTERS.

ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS are the results of studies and experiments of Dr. Schecut, of South Carolina; of Dr. Wm. Wagstaff, now Baron Wagstaff, of Horace H. Day, the distinguished manufacturer of rubber goods; and of Thomas Allcock, Chemist and member of the College of Pharmacy of New York, now General Allcock, etc., etc.

Step by step this commodity has attained its unprecedented fame. They are universally approved. They support, strengthen, and aid the growth of muscles. They appear to have a peculiar effect upon the nerves, allaying irritability, while supplying warmth. They seem to accumulate electricity, and aid the circulation of the blood through the part where applied, by which healthy actions are induced.

Even in paralysis, where articulation was suspended, the use of the Porous Plasters to the spine restored the articulation, and materially reduced the paralysis. In fact, the patient could help herself, while before the Porous plaster was applied she was as helpless as a baby. We refer to Mrs. Sally Elliot, Springfield, Mass.

Dr. Myer, of Savannah, Ga., says they are the best mechanical supporters for weak muscles ever discovered; that by their warming properties they bring power and health, until the strength of the muscles are entirely restored That he knows a case where Allcock's Plasters cured a gentleman of a weak spine. That he daily prescribes them in his practice with the happiest results, and desires us to refer to him.

Dr. Henderson, of Farmsville, Louisiana, says:

"The counter-irritant effect of Allcock's Porous Plasters is produced in such a mild and gradual way, they so invigorate the circulation around the parts to which they are applied, and exert upon all nervons diseases such a great sedative influence, that I place them confidently at the head of every plaster now in use."

Dr. Johnson, of Hartford, says:

"My daily experience confirms the very superior excellence of your Porous Plasters. At this moment of writing, a man applies for one, who, by entanglement in a shaft of machinery, had both his legs broken, spine severely injured, and was for nearly a year entirely helpless. This man found relief very soon by the application of a plaster to his spine. He was soon enabled to work, and now he labors as well as ever. He would cheerfully pay five dollars for a single plaster, if they could not be had at a lower rate. Surgeons should make use of these perforated plasters, to the exclusion of all others, as their flexibility and adhesiveness are greatly in advance of all other plasters with which I am acquainted, while the perforations peculiar to them render them greatly superior to all others for ordinary surgical uses. Knowing the plasters to be so useful, I have no scruples that my sentiments should be known.

J. W. JOHNSON, M. D."

Dr. Sterling's testimony:

"For two years, I have been a great sufferer from neuralgia in the head, and found only temporary relief from all the various remedies that I have tried, until I applied one of Allcock's Porous Plasters. I cut it into three strips, placing one under each shoulder blade, and the other over the small of the back; and for the past three months, I have had scarcely a twinge of the old pain.

I advise all who suffer from nervous diseases to lose no time in making a trial of the wonderful Porous Plaster.

A. F. STERLING, Sec. Singer Mfg. Co.
New York, June 8, 1868.

MEDICINAL QUALITIES
—OF THE—
POROUS PLASTERS.

The Porous Plasters possess the soothing, warming and sustaining qualities of the combined plasters of the dispensatories. An Electrician, who has great experience of their effects in Local Rheumatism, in Tic Douloreux, and deep-seated nervous and other pains, and in affections of the kidneys, etc., etc., attributes all their sedative, stimulative and pain-relieving effects to their ELECTRIC qualities. He asserts that they restore the healthy electric condition (equilibrium) of the part, and that being restored pain and morbid action cease. He was amazed at the great number of beneficial indications produced by one of these plasters. He affirms that Head-ache is cured by one worn just below the breast-bone; that one placed over the navel will cure hysterics, as well as dysentery, and affections of the bowels.

PATENT ARION PIANOFORTE

GRANDS AND GRAND SQUARES,

7⅓ OCTAVES

The "ARION" is the very best Piano for the Great West because it stands in tune longer than any other Piano. It requires no repairing or regulating; shipping any distance, or dampness does not affect them.

WHY?

It commences where the "First Premium" Makers stop, and upon the most improved Modern scale makes four patented improvements; which make the Arion more simple, yet stronger; increasing its volume and beauty of tone, while rendering the instrument more enduring.

WHAT THEY ARE.

First. The patent Arion Reversed Wooden Agraffe Bridge, which retains all the purity of tone only found in a wooden bridge the rest wherein the strings lay, and obtains all the solid prolonged strength of tone of the metal Agraffe, without that acute metallic noise which the metal Agraffe develops by use.

Secondly. The Patent Arion Compound Wrest-Plank, which holds the tuning pins, is six thicknesses of hard maple, the grain of each layer runs in a different direction. The advantages are, the go tons strain of the strings cannot split our Arion wrest-plank, as frequently happens in other Pianos, and when people say "My Piano won't stand in tune," all other makers must use the single wrest plank with the grain running only one way.

The Arion Tuning-Pins have end wood to hold them on every side, while all other makers can have it only upon two sides of their pins.

Thirdly. The Patent Arion Diagonal Sustaining Bar, extending parellel with the steel strings under the over strung Bass strings. The Arion is the only Piano wherein the enormous strain of the large steel strings is resisted in the natural place and direction. Using this bar renders the weakest part in all other over strung Pianos the

STRONGEST IN THE ARION.

Fourthly. The Patent Arion Iron Frame concentrates all the metal in front of the tuning pin line, and its frame is let into (butted) the front edge of the wooden wrest plank, thereby preventing the great strain of the strings upon it from splitting or moving it one particle. All other "Full Iron Frames" cover the entire wrest plank, and when it is split it cannot be seen, the wood of the Arion wrest plank is seen.

THE ARION STANDS UPON ITS OWN MERITS.

unsupported by either buncome, weak facts, or useless or complicated Patents. We append a few unbought opinions of those who

KNOW THE ARION.

The [illegible] Director of the New York Conservatory of Music, Edward Mollenhauer, says: "The Arion I bought of you is the best Piano I ever played on: that rolling bass and silvery treble, etc."

John H. Woods, Piano Dealer, Oswego, N. Y., says: "The tone is truly immense, and surpasses anything in the shape of a Piano we ever saw or heard of, etc."

Horace Greely said: "The Arion is the best Square Piano, superior for its clearness and brilliancy of tone," &c.

Louis Wagner, Fort Leavenworth, says: "My Piano arrived here in splendid order. Its tone fills my parlor with melody—it is the wonder and admiration of all who hear it. Miss ——, who is teaching the Piano desires me to order one for her." &c.

NEW MEDICAL DISCOVERY.
Dr. CADY'S CATARRH REMEDY.

A CERTAIN CURE FOR CATARRH AND ALL Mucous Diseases of the head, nose and throat.

This is a Medicine never before used or known to the public. Dr. Cady, the discoverer, was a sufferer from this terrible disease for twenty years, and after testing all the remedies extant—without relief—in his efforts to obtain a cure he discovered this UNEQUALLED REMEDY, which cured him in the short space of eight weeks.

It has been thoroughly tested, and has not failed in a single instance. Several of the most obstinate cases have been thoroughly cured by this remedy, after every other known medicine had failed. Every one who has tried it will testify to the truth of the above statement.

Every one afflicted with Catarrh should give it a trial and find out for himself whether it is a humbug.

Saratoga A WATER.

The Saratoga "A" Spring Water is probably the most effective mineral water found on either continent. It has ten per cent. greater mineral properties than the celebrated Congress Spring; four times that of Baden Baden of Austria; five times that of Aix La Chapelle in Prussia; twice that of Vichy in France; nearly three times greater than the renowned Seltzer of Germany; and equally over the Spas of Bath, England, and Kissengen in Bavaria.

The reputation of this water is based upon its effects in diseases of the stomach, liver, bowels, kidneys and spleen. It acts with wonderful benefit in cases of chronic dyspepsia, constipation, gravel, gout, Scrofula, cutaneous affections, general lethargy, soreness and prostration of the system.

GERTRUDE VON DER WERT.

A lady seeing her husband broken on the wheel.

Her hands were clasped, her dark eyes raised.
The breeze blew back her hair,
Up to the fearful wheel she gazed,
All that she loved was there.

The night was round her, clear and cold,
The Holy Heaven above,
And pale stars watching to behold
The might of earthly love.

"And bid me not depart," she cried,
"My Rudolph, say not so;
"This is no time to quit thy side.
"Peace! Peace! I cannot go.

"I have been with thee in thine hour
"Of glory and of bliss,
"Trust you its memory's living power
"To strengthen me through this."

And were not these high words to flow
From woman's breaking heart?
Through all that night of bitterest woe,
She bore her lofty part.

But Oh! with such a glazing eye,
With such a curdling cheek,
Love, love, of mortal agony,
Thou, only thou, shouldst speak.

The wind rose high, but with it rose
Her voice that he might hear;
Perchance that moment brought repose
To happy bosoms near.

While she sat struggling with despair
Beside his tortured form,
And pouring her deep soul in prayer
Forth on the raging storm.

She spread her mantle o'er his breast,
She bathed his lips in dew;
And on his cheeks such kisses pressed,
As hope and joy ne'er knew.

Oh lovely are ye, hope and faith:
Enduring to the last,
She had her meed—one smile in death,
And his worn spirit passed.

And while, o'er a martyr's grave,
She knelt on that sad spot,
She weeping blessed the God who gave Strength to forsake it not.

THE GHOST OF THE AGUE.

We had both, Tilly—by which affectionate diminutive, I mean my adored Matilda—and your humble servant, agreed that it was not only inexpedient, but in the highest degree contrary to the duty we owed to the community at large, to wait any longer. I had a hundred arguments to bring forward against the baleful effects of long engagements; and Tilly began to quote poetry of a morbid tendency. Our parents and guardians entertained different opinions. My uncle Bonsor wanted us to wait till the shares in the Caerlyon-upon-Usk Something-Or-Other Company, in which undertaking I was vicariously interested, were at a premium—they have been at a hopeless discount for years. Tilly's papa and mamma called Tilly a girl and self a boy, when we were nothing whatsoever of the kind, and only the most ardent and faithful pair of young lovers that had existed since the time of Abelard and Heloise, or Florio and Biancafiore As, however, our parents and guardians were not made of adamant or Roman cement, we were not permitted to add another couple to the catalogue of historically unfortunate lovers. Uncle Bonsor and Mr. and Mrs. Captain Standfast (my Tilly's papa and mamma) at last relented. Much was effected towards this desirable consummation by my arguments against celibacy, contained in eight pages foolscap, and of which I made copies in triplicate for the benefit of our hard-hearted relatives. More was done by Tilly threatening to poison herself, most, however, was accomplished by our both making up our minds to tell a piece thereof to our parents and guardians, and telling them that if they did not acquiesce in our views, we would run away and get married at the very first opportunity. There was no just cause or impediment. We were young, healthy, and had plenty of money between us. Loads of money—as we thought then. As to personal appearance, Tilly was simply Lovely, and my whiskers had not been ill-spoken of in the best society in Dover. So it was all arranged, and on the twenty-seventh of December, eighteen forty dash, being the morrow of Boxing-day, Alfred Starling, gent., was to be united in the holy bonds of matrimony to Matilda, only daughter of Captain Rockleigh Standfast, R. N., of Snargate-stone Villa, Dover.

I had been left an orphan at a very early age, and the guardian of my moderate property (including the shares in the Caerlyon-upon-Usk Something-or-Other concern), and guardian of my person, was my uncle Bonsor. He sent me to Merchant Taylors', and afterwards for a couple of years to college at Bonn, on the Rhine. He afterwards—to keep me out of mischief, I believe—paid a handsome premium for my entrance into the counting-house of Messrs. Baum, Brömm. and Boompjees, German merchants, of Finsbury Circus, under whose tutelage I did as little as I liked in the corresponding department, and was much envied by my brother salaried clerks. My uncle Bonsor resided chiefly at Dover, where he was making large sums of money by government contracts, whose objects apparently consisted in boring holes in the chalk and then filling them up again. My uncle was, perhaps, the most respectable man in Europe, and was well known in the city of London as "Responsible Bonsor." He was one of those men who are confidently said to be "good for any amount." He had a waistcoat—worn winter and summer—a waistcoat that wavered in hue between a sunny buff and a stony drab, which looked so ineffably respectable that I am certain if it had been presented at the pay-counter of any bank in Lombard-street, the clerks would have cashed it at once for any amount of notes or gold demanded. My uncle Bonsor entrenched himself behind this astonishing garment as behind a fortification, and fired guns of respectability at you. That waistcoat had carried resolutions, assuaged the ire of indignant shareholders, given stability to wavering schemes, and brought in thumping subscriptions for burnt-out Caffres and destitute Fee-jees. It was a safe waistcoat, and Bonsor was a safe man. He was mixed up with a good many companies; but whenever a projector or promoter came to him with a plan, my responsible uncle would confer with his waistcoat, and within five minutes would either tell the projector or promoter to walk out of his counting-house, or put his name down for a thousand pounds. And the scheme was made that Responsible Bonsor put his name down for.

It was arranged that I was to go down to Dover on Christmas eve, staying at my uncle's and that we were to dine all together at Captain Standfast's on Christmas-day. Boxing-day was to be devoted to bonnets on the part of my beloved, and to the signing and sealing of certain releases, deeds, covenants and other documents connected with law and money, on the part of self, my uncle, and my prospective papa-in-law, and on the twenty-seventh we were to be married.

Of course my connexion with Messrs. Baum, Bröumm and Boompjees was brought to an amicable termination. I gave the clerks a grand treat at a hostelry in Newgate Street, and had the pleasure of receiving, at a somewhat late hour, and at least eighty-seven times, a unanimous choral assurance, not unaccompanied by hiccups, that I was a "jolly good fellow." I was unwillingly compelled to defer my departure for Dover till the 8:30 p.m. express mail on Christmas-eve, being engaged to a farewell dinner at four. at the mansion of our Mr. Max Boompjees, junior and dinner-giving partner in the firm, in Finsbury Circus. A capital dinner it was, and very merry. I left the gentlemen over their wine, and had just time to catch the mail train at London Bridge.

You know how quickly time passes on a railway journey when one has dined comfortably before starting. I seemed to have been telegraphed down to Dover, so rapidly were the eighty odd miles skimmed over. But it now becomes my duty to impart to you the knowledge of my Terrible Misfortune. In my youth, a little boy at a preparatory school near Ashford, I had experienced a touch of the dreadful disease of the Kentish marshes. How long this malady had lain concealed in my frame, and by what accident of time or temperature it became again evolved, I had no means of judging, but by the time the train arrived at Dover, I was in the throes of acute Ague.

It was a horrible, persistent, regular shivering and shaking, a racking palsy, a violent tremor, accompanied, I am sure, by fever, for my temples throbbed, and I experienced an almost deafening, jarring, rattling noise in the head. My blood seemed all in revolt, and surging backwards and forwards in my veins, and my unhappy body swayed from side to side with the distempered current. On the platform I staggered to and fro; and the porter of whose arm I caught hold to steady myself, seemed, lantern and all, by mere communicated violence, to be shaken and buffeted about as I was. I had always been an abstemious young man, and had not exceeded in the consumption of the hospitable junior partner's rare old hock; besides, for all the noise in my head, I could think and talk—albeit my teeth chattered, and my tongue wagged in my mouth with aguish convulsions. I had never known before that railway porters were a hard-hearted race, but one tall man in velveteen, grinned most impertinently as I was helped into a fly, and I am certain that his companion, a short, fat fellow, with a leer in his eye, thrust his tongue into his cheek as he heaped, at my desire, great-coats and rugs over me, and bade the flyman drive to the Marine Parade, where my uncle resided. I had told every one at the station about my attack of ague.

"He's got his load," I heard the tall porter exclaim, as we drove off. Of course he meant that the flyman had got all my luggage.

It was a dreadful five minutes' ride to my uncle's. The fit was so strong on me that my head and limbs kept bumping against opposite sides of the fly, and once came in contact with the window glass. And the noise in my head never ceased. I stumbled out, somehow, when the vehicle stopped, and, clinging to the knocker of the avuncular door, struck such a quivering peal of blows—I had previously scattered the cabman's fare on the pavement in the attempt to place the money in his hand—that Jakes, my uncle's confidential man, who opened the door, stared with astonishment.

"I'm very ill, Jakes," I stammered, when I had staggered into the hall. "I'm down with that dreadful Ague again."

"Yes, sir," answered Jakes, with something like a grin on his countenance too. "Compts of the season, sir. Hadn't you better go to bed, sir?"

"No, Jakes," I said, "I'll try and bear up. You had better bring me a little cognac, and some very hot water, into the dining-room. It will do me good, and the fit may leave me." What would you believe was the reply of this pampered domestic?

"Better not, sir," he had the hardihood to observe. "Christmas time, sir. Plenty more like you, better go to bed. Think of your head in the morning, sir."

"Fellow—" I began to retort, still violently trembling, when I saw my uncle Bonsor appear at the head of the staircase. There was a group of ladies and gentlemen in the back-ground, and as well as I could see for shaking, there were the dear golden curls of my Tilly. But her face looked so scared and terrified.

"Alfred," said my uncle, sternly, from behind his waistcoat, "you ought to be ashamed of yourself. Go to bed directly, sir!"

"Uncle!" I cried, with a desperate attempt to keep myself steady, "do you think I'm—" Here I made an effort to ascend the staircase, but my foot caught either in the carpet or over one of the confounded brass rods, and, upon my word, I tumbled heels over heels into the hall. And yet, even as I lay recumbent, I shook worse than ever. I heard my uncle's responsible voice ordering the servants to carry me to bed. And I was carried too; Jakes and a long-legged footpage conveying my shaking body to my bedroom.

The night was brief and terrible as in an access of fever, and I lay shaking and chattering in the burning bed. In the morning, my uncle sent word to say that my ague was all nonsense, and that I was to come down to breakfast.

I went down, determined on remonstrance, but holding on by the banisters and quivering in every limb. Oh! for the tribulations of that wretched Christmas-day. I was received with sneers and advised to take very strong tea with a little cognac; yet soon afterwards my uncle shook hands with me, and said that it was only once a year, and that he supposed boys would be boys. Everybody wished me a merry Christmas; but I could only return the compliments of the season in a spasmodic stutter. I took a walk on the pier immediately after breakfast, but I nearly tumbled into the sea, and bumped against so many posts, that I had to be led home by a mariner in a yellow sou'-wester hat, who insisted that I should give him five shillings to drink my health. Then came a more appalling ordeal. I was to call at Snargatestone Villa to accompany my Tilly and the family to church. To my great relief, though I was shaking in every joint of my fingers and toes, nobody took any notice of my alarming complaint. I began to hope that it might be intermittent, and would pass off, but it wouldn't, and rather increased in violence. My darling girl patted me on the head, and hoped that I was "a good boy, now;" but when I began, shiveringly, to explain my attack of ague, she only laughed. We went to church, and then my ague soon brought me into disgrace again. First I created terrible scandal by knocking up against the old pauper women in the free seats, and nearly upsetting the beadle. Then I knocked the church services and hymn-books off the ledge of the pew. Then I kicked a hassock from beneath the very knees of my future mamma-in-law. Then I trod—accidentally I declare—on the toes of Mary Seaton, my Tilly's pretty cousin, whereupon she gave a little scream, and my beloved looked daggers at me; and as a climax, in the agony of that extraordinary horizontal shaking fit of mine, I burst the pew door open, and tumbled once more against the beadle, who in stern tones, and in the name of the churchwardens, desired me either to behave myself or to leave the church. I saw that it was no good contending against my complaint, so I did leave; but as I lurched out of the edifice, I seemed to see the clergyman shaking in the reading-desk, and the clerk wagging to and fro beneath him; while the hatchments and tablets shook on the walls; and the organ in the gallery kept bumping now against the charity boys, now against the charity girls.

At dinner-time—my agonies had never ceased, but had not attracted notice—I began literally to put my foot into it again. First, handing Mrs. Van Plank, of Sandwich, down to the dining-room—my uncle Bonsor escorted Tilly—I entangled myself in the bugle ornaments which that wealthy but obese woman persisted in wearing; and we came down together with alarming results, I was undermost, shaking miserably, with Mrs. Van Plank's large person pressing on my shirt-studs. When we were assisted to rise she would not be appeased. She would not join us at dinner. She ordered her fly and returned to Sandwich, and as the carriage drove away, Captain Standfast, R. N., looked at me as though he would have liked to have me up at the gangway and give me six dozen on the instant, said:

"There goes poor Tilly's diamond bracelet. The old screw won't give it her now. I saw the case on the cushion of the fly."

Was it my fault? Could I help my lamentable ague?

At dinner I went from bad to worse. Item: I spilt two ladlefuls of mock turtle soup over a new damask tablecloth. Item: I upset a glass of Madeira over Mary Seaton's blue moire dress. Item: In a convulsive fit of shaking, I nearly stabbed Lieutenant Lamb, of the Fifty-fourth Regiment, stationed on the Heights, with a silver fork; and, finally, in a maniacal attempt to carve a turkey, I sent the entire body of that Christmas bird, with a garland of sausages clinging to it, full butt into the responsible waistcoat of my uncle Bonsor.

The peace was made somehow; I'm sure I don't know in what manner, but half an hour afterwards we were all very pleasant and talkative over our dessert. When I say all, I of course except my unhappy self. There had been no solution of continuity in my shaking. Somebody, I think, proposed my health. In returning thanks, I hit the proposer a tremendous blow under the left eye with my elbow. Endeavoring to regain my equilibrium, I sent a full glass of claret into the embroidered cambric bosom of that unhappy Lieutenant Lamb. In desperation I caught hold of the tablecloth with both hands. I saw how it would be; the perfidious polished mahogany slid away from my grasp. I turned my foot frantically round the leg of the table nearest me, and with a great crash over went dinning-table, cut-glass decanters, and dessert. Lieutenant Lamb was badly hit across the bridge of the nose with a pair of silver nut-crackers, and my uncle Bonsor's head was crowned, in quite a classic manner, with filberts and hot-house grapes.

The bleak December sun rose next morning upon ruin and catastrophe. As well as I can collect my scattered reminiscences of that dismal time, my offences against decorum were once more condoned: not in consequence of my complaint (in which my relatives and friends persisted in disbelieving), but on the ground that it was "only once a year." Lawyers came backwards and forwards to Snargatestone Villa during the forenoon. There was a great production of tin boxes red tape, blue seals, foolscap paper, and parchment; and my uncle Bonsor was more responsible than ever. They brought me a paper to sign at last, whispering much among themselves as they did so; and I protest that I could see nothing but a large pool of white, jogging about in a field of green tablecloth, while on the paper an infinity of crabbed characters seemed racing up and down in a crazed and furious manner. I endeavored to nerve myself to the task of signing. I bit my lips, I clenched my left hand, I tried to screw my wagging head on to my neck, I cramped my toes up in my boots, I held my breath; but was it my fault, when I clutched the pen and tried to write my name, that the abominable goosequill began to dance, and skate, and leap, and plunge, and dig its nibs into the paper; that when, in despair, I seized the inkstand, to hold it nearer to the pen, I shook its sable contents, in horrid, horned, tasseled blots, all over a grave legal document? I finished my achievement by inflicting a large splash on my uncle's sacred waistcoat, and hitting Captain Standfast under the third rib with the pen.

"That will do," my papa-in-law cried, collaring me. "Leave the house, scoundrel!"

But I broke from his grasp, and flew to the drawing-room, knowing that my Tilly would be there with her bridesmaids and her bonnets.

"Tilly—my adored Matilda!" I cried.

"No further explanation is needed, sir," broke in my beloved, in an inexorable tone. "I have seen and heard quite enough. Alfred Starling, I would sooner wed the meanest hind that gathers samphire on yon cliff than become the bride of a profligate and drunkard. Go, sir; repent if you can; be ashamed if you can. Henceforth we are strangers. Slave of self-indulgence, adieu for ever!" And she swept out of the room, and I could hear her sobbing her pretty heart out in the boudoir beyond.

I was discarded and expelled for ever from Snargatestone Villa; my uncle Bonsor repudiated me, and disinherited me from any share in his waistcoat; I hurled myself into the next train at the station, and shook all the way back to town. At about dusk on that dreadful Boxing-day, I found myself wandering and jolting about the purlieus of Soho.

From Soho-square — the south-west side. I think — branches a shabby, dingy little court, called Bateman's buildings. I was standing, shivering at the corner of the ill-favored place, when I stumbled against a gentleman, who looked about seven-eighths soldier and one-eighths civilian.

As was a little, dapper, clean-limbed, young-looking old man, with a yellow face, and grey hair and whiskers. Soldiers, save in the cavalry, didn't wear moustaches then. He wore a blue uniform coat, rather white at the seams, and a silver medal with a faded ribbon on his breast. He had a bunch of parti-colored streamers in his undress cap; he carried a bamboo-cane under his arm; on each sleeve he wore golden stripes, much tarnished; on his scarlet collar was embroidered a golden lion; and on his shoulders he had a pair of little, light, golden epaulettes, that very much resembled two sets of teeth from a dentist's glass-case, covered with bullion.

"And how are you, my hearty?" said the military gentleman, cheerily.

I answered that I was the most miserable wretch in the world; upon which the military gentleman, slapping me on the back and calling me his gallant comrade, asked me to have a pint of beer, warmed with a little spice, and a dash of Old Tom in it, for the sake of Christmas.

"You're a roving buck," observed my new friend. "I'm a roving buck. You never happened to have a twin-brother named Siph, did you?"

"No," I answered, moodily.

"He was as like you as two peas," continued the military gentleman, who had by this time taken my arm, and was leading me all shaking and clattering towards a mouldy little tavern, on whose door-jambs were displayed a couple of colored cartoons, and displaying, the one, the presentment of an officer in sky-blue uniform much belaced with silver, and the other a bombardier with an enormous shake ramming the charge into a cannon: the whole surrounded by a placard setting forth that smart young men were required for the Honorable East India Company's infantry, cavalry and artillery, and earnestly exhorting all smart young men, as aforesaid, to apply forthwith to Sergeant-Major Chutnee, who was always to be heard of at the bar of the "Highland Laddie," or at the office in Bateman's-buildings.

"The last time I saw him," went on the man with the yellow face and the grey whiskers, when he had tilted me into the "Highland Laddie," pinned me, shaking, against the bar-counter, and ordered a pint of sophisticated beer, "he had left our service, and was a field-marshal in the army of the King of Oude. Many's the time I've seen him with his cocked-hat and di'mond epaulets riding on a white elephant, with five-and-twenty black fellows running after him to brush the flies away and draw the soda-water corks. Such brandy he'd have with it, and all through meeting me promiscuous in this very public."

It is useless to prolong the narrative of my conversation with the military gentleman; suffice it to say, that within an hour I had taken the fatal shilling, and enlisted in the service of the Honorable East India Company. I was not a beggar. I possessed property, over which my uncle Bonsor had no control. I had not committed any crime; but I felt lost, ruined, and desperate, and I enlisted. For a wonder, when I was brought before a magistrate to be attested, and before a surgeon to be examined respecting my sanitary fitness for the service, my ague seemed to have entirely left me. I stood firm and upright in the witness box, and under the measuring standard, and was only deterred by shame and anguish at the misconception put upon my conduct at Dover from negotiating for my discharge.

I had scarcely reached the East India recruiting depôt at Brentwood, however, before the attacks of ague returned with redoubled severity. At first, on my stating that I had an ear for music, they began to train me for a bandsman, but I could not keep a wind instrument in my hands, and struck those that were played by my comrades from their grasp. Then, I was put into the awkward squad among the recruits, and the sergeants caned me; but I could never get beyond the preliminary drill of the goose-step, and I kept my own time, and not the squad's even then. The depôt sergeants wouldn't place the slightest credence in my ague, and the sergeant-major of my company reported that I was a skulking, "malingering" imposter. Among my comrades who despised, without pitying me, I got the nickname of "Young Shivery-Shakery." And the most wonderful thing is, that, although I could have procured remittances at any time, the thought of purchasing my discharge never entered my poor, shaking, jarring head.

How they came to send such a trembling, infirm creature as a soldier to India, I can't make out; but sent I was, by long sea, in a troop-ship, with seven or eight hundred more recruits. My military career in the East came to a very speedy and inglorious termination. We had scarcely arrived at Bombay when the battalion of the European regiment into which I was draughted was sent up-country to the banks of the Sutlej, where the Sikh war was then raging. It was the campaign of Aliwal and Sobraon, but it was very little that I saw of that glorious epoch in our military annals. In contemptuous reference to my nervous disorder, I was only permitted to form part of the baggage-guard, and one night, after perhaps ten days' march, throughout which I had shaken most awfully, an attack was made on our rear for mere purposes of plunder by a few rascally budmashes or thieves. Nothing was easier than to put these paltry scoundrels of the rout. I had been brave enough as a lad and as a young man. I declare that on the present occasion I didn't run away; but my unhappy disease got the mastery of me. I shook my musket out of my hands, my shako off my head, and my knapsack off my back, and my wretched legs shook and jolted me, as it seemed, over miles of arid country. There was some talk of shooting me afterwards, and some of flogging me; but corporal punishment did not exist in the Company's army. They sent me to a vile place of incarceration called a "congee house," where I was fed principally on rice-water, and at last I was conveyed to Bombay, tried by court-martial, sentenced and publicly drummed out of my regiment as a coward. Yes, I, the son of a gentleman, and the possessor of a genteel private property, had the facings cut off my uniform, and, to the sound of the "Rogues' March," was dismissed from the service of the Honorable East India Company with ignominy and disgrace.

I can scarcely tell how I reached England again; whether a berth was given me, whether I paid for it, or whether I worked my passage home. I can only remember that the ship in which I was a passenger broke her back in Algoa Bay, close to the Cape, and became a total wreck. There was not the slightest danger; we were surrounded by large and small craft, and every soul on board was saved; but I shook so terribly and incessantly while the boats were leaving the vessel, that the whole ship's company hooted and groaned at me when I was shoved over the side, and I was not allowed to go in the long boat, but was towed alone and aft in the dingy to shore.

I took passage in another ship, which did nothing but shake all the way from the Cape to Plymouth, and at last I reached England. I wrote innumerable letters to my friends and relatives, to Tilly and to my uncle Bonsor; but the only answer I received was a few formal lines from my uncle's lawyer, telling me that my illegible scrawls had come to the hands of the persons for whom they were designed; but that no further notice could be taken of my communications. I was put into the possession of my property to the last penny, but it seems to me that I must have shaken it away either at dice or bagatelle, or ninepins or billiards. And I remember that I never made a stroke at the latter game without hitting my adversary with the cue in the chest, knocking down the marker, sending the balls scudding through the windows, disarranging the scores, and cutting holes in the cloth, for which I had to pay innumerable guineas to the proprietor of the rooms.

I remember one day going into a jeweler's shop in Regent street to purchase a watch-key. I had only a silver one now, my gold repeater had been shaken away in some unaccountable manner. It was winter-time and I wore an overcoat with long sleeves. While the shopkeeper was adjusting a key to my watch, my ague fit came upon me with demoniacal ferocity, and to my horror and dismay, in catching hold of the counter to save myself, I tilted a trayful of diamond rings over. Some fell on the floor; but some, O horror and anguish! fell into the sleeves of my overcoat. I shook so that I seemed to have shaken diamond rings into my hands, my pockets, my very boots. By some uncontrollable impulse I attempted flight, but was seized at the very shop door, and carried, shaking, to the police station.

I was taken before a magistrate, and committed, still shaking, in a van, to gaol. I shook for some time in a white-washed cell, when I was brought up, shaking, to the Central Criminal Court, and placed, shaking, on my trial for an attempted robbery of fifteen hundred pounds' worth of property. The evidence was clear against me. My counsel tried to plead something about "kleptomania," but in vain. My uncle Bonsor, who had come expressly up from Dover, spoke strongly against my character. I was found guilty: yes, I, the most innocent and unfortunate young man breathing, and sentenced to seven years' transportation! I can recall the awful scene vividly to memory now. The jury in a body were shaking their heads at me. So was the judge, so was my uncle Bonsor, so were the spectators in the gallery; and I was holding on by the spikes on the ledge of the dock, shaking from right to left like ten thousand million aspen-leaves. My skull was splitting, my brain was bursting, when

I WOKE.

I was lying in a very uncomfortable position in a first-class carriage of the Dover mail-train; everything in the carriage was shaking; the oil was surging to and fro in the lamp; my companions were swaying to and fro, and the sticks and umbrellas were rattling in the network above. The train was "at speed," and my frightful dream was simply due to the violent and unusual oscillation of the train. Then, sitting up, and rubbing my eyes, immensely relieved, but holding on to the compartments near to me (so violently did the carriages shake from side to side), I began to remember what I had dreamed or heard of others' dreams before; while at sea, or while somebody was knocking loudly at the door; and of the old connections between unusual sound and motion on the thoughts of our innermost souls. And again with odd distinctness, I remember that at one period of my distempered vision, namely, when I was attested and examined as a recruit, I had remained perfectly still and steady. This temporary freedom from ague I was fain to ascribe to the customary two or three minutes' stoppage of the train at Tunbridge Wells. But, thank Heaven, all this was but a dream!

"Enough to shake one's head off!" exclaimed the testy old lady opposite, alluding to the oscillation of the train, as the guard appeared at the window with a shout of "De—ver!"

"Well, mum, it have bin a shaking most unusual all the way down," replied that functionary. "Thought we should have bin off the line, more than once. Screws will be looked to to-morrow morning. Night, sir!" this was to me: I knew the man well. "Merry Christmas and a happy new year! You'll be wanting a fly to Snargatestone Villa, won't you, sir? Now, por—ter!"

I did want that fly, and I had it. I paid the driver liberally, and did not scatter his money over the pavement. Mr. Jakes insisted upon my having something hot in the dining-room the moment I arrived. The weather was so "woundy cold," he said. I joined the merry party upstairs, and was received by my Tilly with open arms, and by my uncle Bonsor with an open waistcoat. I partook in cheerful moderation of the snapdragon festivities of Christmas-eve. We all dined together on Christmas-day, and I helped the soup and carved a turkey, beautifully; and on the morrow, Boxing-day, was complimented by my uncle's lawyer on my remarkably neat caligraphy, as displayed in the signatures to the necessary legal documents. On the twenty-seventh of December, eighteen forty-six, I was married to my darling Tilly, and have lived happy ever since.

RUSSIAN PROVERBS.

The Scotch and the Spaniards have hitherto divided the credit of possessing the largest store of proverbial wisdom; but were the literature of Russia more widely known, she might prove a formidable rival either to the land of oatmeal or to that of oranges. We give a few specimens, which, on account of their pointed terseness, their quaint, homely vigor, and dry Sancho Panza satire, scarcely need the aid of rhyme to recommend them. They are, indeed, more fully than words can express, the faithful mirror of the shrewd, simple, dogged, humorous Russian mind, ever veiling its natural keenness under a mask of habitual and impenetrable stolidity: "Every fox praises his own tail," "Go after two wolves and you will not catch even one," "A good beginning is half the work," "Trust in God but do not stumble yourself." "With God, even across the sea; without Him, not even to the threshold," "Without cheating, no trading." "Money is not God, but it shows great mercy," "The deeper you hide a thing the sooner you find it," "If God don't forsake us, the pigs will not take us," "A debt is adorned by payment," "Roguery is the last of trades," "Never take the crooked path while you can see a straight one," "Fear not the threats of the great, but rather the tears of the poor," "Ask a pig to dinner, and he will put his feet on the table," "Disease comes in by hundred-weights, and goes out by ounces," "Every little frog is great in his own bog," "Be praised not for your ancestors, but for your virtues," "When fish are rare, even a crab is a fish," "A father's blessing cannot be drowned in water, nor consumed by fire," "He who honors his parents shall endure for ever," "A mother's prayer will draw one up from the depth of the sea."

MAN himself is the author of most of his infirmities, and of them the greater number originate purely in mental or moral causes. It would be absurd to suppose that many diseases, and deaths too, should not arise from causes beyond the control of man; but his own pursuits and habits in life lay the foundation of by far the greatest portion

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 23, 1869.

WE ARE NOTHING, IF NOT SPIRITUAL.

When Joseph Smith inaugurated our Church, nearly forty years ago, it burst upon the world as a Revelation of spiritual power. The main peculiarity of our system was, that we asserted the necessity of close and constant intercommunication between this and the Heavenly worlds.

While we freely admitted that light and intelligence were continually being imparted by God to mankind through inspiration of an intellectual or mental kind, we strongly protested against the sufficiency of this kind of Revelation.

Our Elders went forth declaring the opening of a dispensation of angelic visitation; an age of Revelation and Prophecy; a new, grand period of Heavenly manifestions. The sick were to be healed henceforth mainly by the laying on of hands. Visions and divinely-given dreams were to be the constant companions of the members of the church; the curtains of Heaven were to be lifted up, and a church established which—to use the language of the Doctrines and Covenants—by the multiplicity of heavenly manifestations poured upon mankind in the flesh, was to prepare them for the fullness of Jehovah's presence in the world of glory, and without the enjoyment of which they could not be so perfected.

As a means to this end a spiritual power was to be built up to be called Zion, whose people should have a constant witness of the presence and association of Heavenly visitors.

Spiritual power was our battle cry! We were "nothing if not spiritual." We were founding a kingdom whose glory was not the wealth of its people, the extent of their farms, or the elegance of their homes, but the fire of the Omnipotent spirit and the presence and influence of the great ones of the invisible world, while sweet and holy sentiments, changing hearts and purifying the lives of men were to distill through inspired lips upon the church.

This was the programme to which we have given the most vital portions of our existence, and for which we have all borne the scorn of the world. Some of us traveling for years as poor dependents, over the face of the world, and all of us struggling through hardships innumerable to these desolate valleys, to pursue any and every occupation that might present itself—congenial or otherwise—solely that we might see a gigantic spiritual power rear itself in strength above the nations. For this we suffered, and for this we struggled through poverty and hardships to this land, and for nothing else.

"Abroad among the nations," we had plentiful corroboration that this theory was no idle dream, but based on facts. Wholesale spiritual manifestations did there attend us. Our sick were then healed by the hundred. During the great cholera-year in England, among about thirty thousand Latter-day Saints, scarcely one succumbed to the disease. We were rich in spiritual manifestations. We felt angelic presence even if unseen. We lived in an atmosphere that made us feel every day very near to God and the heavenly world. All this bore witness to us that there would be established upon the earth a great central reservoir from whence spiritual influences should spread with electric force and kindle the world afar in due time.

Cut this grand design out of the mission of this people, and there is nothing left. To open up the fountains of the Heavenly world—to stand hand in hand—the mortal church with the invisible behind the veil. This was the destiny for which we started as a people, and unless we realize it, we have done nothing worth talking about. We did not congregate together to build up a big nation whose numbers and might should overawe the world. We needed a distinct existence as a people, of course, and therefore required cities to live in and national influence; but these were but secondary objects—merely means to an end. Our temporal influence was simply to be a kind of bulwarks within which our spiritual powers should be developed. External surroundings, without the divine part of our religion, for which the whole was brought into existence, would, we understood, be nothing but mockery and a sham.

In the providences of God, for a number of years we have been marching almost entirely in the direction of temporalities, until they are the all-absorbing theme. It is temporalities upon the street, in the garden, in the meeting and in the council—temporalities from the rising of the sun to the going down of the same, and from one year's end to another. We have but one kind of subject—houses, fences, dry-goods and money, worlds without end. This is how it is at present, and there doubtless is a providential lesson in it, but we cannot remain so forever.

We say this much in calling attention to the true object of our existence as a people, because there is to-day an inspiration resting upon us as a community that we are very near to a day of spiritual power—one that will not only take us back to our old position, but eclipse the past by its brightness. Thousands of hearts in Utah feel that light is coming that will repay us for all, and justify all our grand expectations. It stands to common sense that temporalities without far more spiritual power than we have at present will not build up a heavenly Zion. No temporal order or system, by itself, can bring this about. The presence of Revelation widely diffused amongst us will alone constitute Zion, and that must depend upon the channels of Revelation in our souls being opened up. Everybody in the church may be wealthy, and the church as a whole, by its grand coöperation, have but one pocket, and thereby be able to out-purchase the world and bring it to our feet, and all this may add to our temporal comfort; but no union of wealth—or disunion either—can create a Zion of spiritual power. Spiritual power should in fact be first, and our union grow out of that and not our spiritual power grow out of our temporal union. The purity of our natures, the spirit of Christ in its self-abnegation and love in our bosoms, can alone bring angels to our homes. They will not come there because we all have our money in one bank, depend upon it. If they find our hearts right, they will come, because they will find their attractions there, and they will come no more, nor as much, if, as a Grand Commercial church, we hold the riches of the world in our hands and can buy or sell it at our pleasure, providing these characteristics are absent.

Supposing, then, as we do, that temporalities are useful and necessary in their way, they are not our ultimate destiny, it was not for this that angels left the Heavens and opened up a dispensation to man. Our destiny is to be a great spiritual nation, and all these temporalities are mere accessory aids. We were organized to bring the hosts of the Heavenly world nigh to man, the signs of whose presence in dreams, visions and inspirations, were to be daily and hourly felt—not by one man or a dozen, but by all. Unless we accomplish this sooner or later, our system is humbug and a delusion. Where is this close intercommunication with heavenly things, to-day? Where the evidences of the nearness of the invisible worlds to our hearts? It is years upon years since many of us have heard even a gift of tongues, or felt the inspiration of a prophecy; and as to angels, we know many who talk of them as one of the weaknesses of the past. Supposing a Divine Hand has taken us off this pathway of spiritualities for its own great ends, must we not return before we can accomplish our destiny as a people? Let any man put this question to his soul, and the answer must be that we must return, and that speedily, and become a greater church of spiritualities than ever, or stand confessed before the world a grand and monstrous failure.

OVER-GOVERNING.

BY W. H. SHEARMAN.

The tendency of all despotisms is to overgovern. It is not only an evil, but an error which, eventually, defeats the object sought to be gained. Restraint is always irksome, and though it may, from necessity, be submitted to for a time, yet the spirit chafes under it and seeks to escape from, or throw off, the oppressive and unnatural authority. With men and women, as with children, the fewer the requirements and the less the governing power is felt the better. The laws that govern the movements of the material universe are few and simple, yet they produce grand results and maintain order and harmony in the spheres. But were God to undertake to control and hamper the operations of nature, as many men have attempted to hamper and dictate nature in men's minds in different ages on the earth, He would, as they have done, pile huge and overwhelming responsibilities upon Himself and involve the universe in inextricable confusion and conflict.

Nature, whether in the elements or in humanity, needs not so much hampering and controlling as freedom and guidance. The object of laws should be to preserve, as far as possible, free scope to the faculties of man and the operations of nature, and to prevent any unnecessary or unrighteous interference in the exercise of either. Laws to compel mankind to breathe, eat, drink, and sleep would be quite as sensible and consistent as many that are enacted for the government of society. Some men seem so dreadfully afraid that nature will go wrong that it would be no matter of surprise should they seek, by legal enactments, to compel the sun to shine, water to run down hill, and fire to burn. Such folly would only be consistent with their character. How long will it take us to learn that nature needs encouraging and developing instead of guiding or crushing. The latter course has cursed the world for ages, retarded its progress, extinguished many of its brightest lights, and cut out much of its life and joy. It practically says that God has left His work unfinished and that human wisdom must step in to supply the Divine deficiencies. The true object of all human legislation, as before remarked, is to secure to every individual the greatest personal liberty, and the freest exercise of every faculty and power of his organization, consistent with the exercise of the same rights in others and the general welfare of society. The simpler the laws by which these objects can be secured the better for all parties.

The divine wisdom and goodness was manifested by Jesus and his apostles in the early Christian Church by making the conditions of membership as few and as simple as possible, but afterwards men, assuming to themselves prerogatives which Deity never asserted, continued, in various ages, to multiply these conditions, until to-day, thousands of men and women in different parts of the earth groan under the galling yokes and the heavy mental burdens that have taken the place of the easy yoke and light burden impressed by the Great Teacher himself.

In the abstract, men admit love to be more powerful than fear, and that a throne based upon the love of a people is more secure than one sustained by a million bayonets. But as the love of power grows upon them, they become impatient of this slow but sure means of accomplishing their objects and adopt the shorter but less enduring process of mental or physical compulsion. The edifice thus speedily erected, however, sooner or later, crumbles to dust, and all their cherished dreams end in vexation and disappointment.

Thank God, the day of force and coercion, with its inquisitions, pious murders, and despotisms is rapidly passing away. A people have been gathered into these mountains who, under divine guidance and inspiration, are solving the greatest problems of the age; who are demonstrating the triumph of moral power over brute force; who understand that obedience should spring from love and a knowledge of correct principles alone, and who are laying the foundation of a system that will yet fill the world with the light, liberty, and glory of that heavenly Zion which has been the theme of inspired men in all ages.

THE MIND'S KINGDOM.

A bard once sung a strain like this:
"My mind to me a kingdom is,"
Another now may sing as free,
A kingdom, too, exists in me.

I'm king and subjects, laws and all,
My boundless realms obey my call,
I bow no head to mortal things,
The one I heed is King of Kings.

A tyrant here may bind my tongue
And bid me hear it when I'm stung;
But in mind's kingdom all is free,
No tyrant there can conquer me.

The rich man now, that once was poor,
Can turn the lowly from his door;
But, in my mind, both equal seem,
And wealth is counted but a dream.

I dare not speak my mind to all,
For some are seeking for my fall;
But, in my kingdom, Oh! how free
All acts are boldly judged by me.

The proud ones pass, they know not me,
The greedy grasp all they can see;
But, in mind's kingdom, I can find
How much they lack in worth of mind.

Some love authority to sway,
And drive meek Charity away;
But, in my kingdom, such a rule
Would brand each despot as a fool.

Some strive, like Satan, all they can
To spoil the agency of man;
But, in my kingdom, I am free
To act the man I'm made to be.

I wish the glorious day at hand
When God's great kingdom has command;
Its subjects in the gospel free,
And all as one in mind with me.

DELTA.

Provo, Sept. 29, 1868.

MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

We have received several letters from choir-masters in the settlements, containing inquiries as to whether we would accept and publish compositions that were not grammatically written.

We will answer that our musical, as well as our literary department, is open to receive home talent of merit, even if the compositions are not grammatically correct.

We grant this liberty to our contributors as an incentive to their genius for composition, and for this reason we are willing to labor to render the inspirations sent us—should they contain merit—fit for publication. We must, however, observe that our only object for doing this is to lead them to the study of composition, by the attention, which we trust that they will give to the alterations that we might be compelled to make either in their melody or harmony.

Some persons have an idea that if they are endowed with natural genius for composition, that they have all that is necessary for rendering their subjects perfect and fit for publication. This is a mistake, and to strengthen our opinion we will give a quotation from the popular and well-conducted magazine called Bow Bells, published in London.

The musical editor, in answer to a correspondent—on the above subject—says that "correct music is not to be written by the light of nature; on the contrary, it is a waste of time to attempt composition without knowledge of the elements of musical grammar."

This is true, indeed. Genius can produce good subjects, but science only can develop and place them in correct order. Practice is also necessary, and the adroit practical musical composers can assist both genius and science.

We, however, to encourage our home composers, for a time, will assist them in rendering their compositions fit for publication; but, as we have observed, they must compare our alterations with the original for their instruction. But we will add, begin and study, and make yourselves acquainted with the elements of composition. The most simple elementary work on composition, that we have read, is Hamilton's Musical Grammar, which is published by Cox & Co., Musical Publishers, London, England. The price of this work is three shillings.

At present, send us your compositions, and if we find merit in them, although grammatically incorrect, we will fix them and print them in our MAGAZINE.

J. S., FARMINGTON.—We have said more than once or twice, in our articles, that consecutive perfect fifths and octaves in similar motion are incorrect and the progression is bad.

The reason why they are incorrect is because they are non-euphonious, and in sound produces the same effect as tautology in a literary sentence.

PROGRESS OF ELECTRICITY.

The wire cord ran out with ease and precision; the comparatively shallow water along the shore offered no difficulty; and even when the cable dropped suddenly down the precipice, as steep and lofty as Mont Blanc, the electricity still flowed; the problem was solved. But soon after the cable broke, through the unskillfulness of an assistant, and the hopeful electricians, undisheartened, resolved to renew the attempt the next year.

The next year came, memorable for triumph and disappointment, and again, in June, 1858, the Agamemnon and the Niagara, groaning under the weight of their precious cargo, and manned by the chiefs of ocean telegraphy, set sail from Valentia Bay. It was designed that they should meet in mid-ocean, unite the ends of the cable, and, separating, sail slowly to the opposite shores. But scarcely had the fleet set out when disaster and ruin seemed to hover over it. A violent storm separated the vessels. The huge and overloaded Agamemnon, straining and cracking in the gale, heeled over, and threatened every moment to sink in the trough of the sea. Her great beams snapped in two; her cargo of coal rolled over her decks; and at length, on the 10th of June, three or four gigantic waves swept over her and threw her nearly on her beam ends. Her brave captain and her gallant crew now believed that death was near, and thought to sink with their cable on the Telegraphic Plain. A wave still more tremendous rolled toward them; the men fell on the deck in heaps, saved only by clinging to the ropes; the captain strove to wear his ship, and, at the risk of immediate death, contrived to place the Agamemnon before the storm. She escaped, and finally rode safely to the rendezvous in the midst of the Atlantic.

The ocean was now as still as an inland lake. The two great ships and their attendants met on the 25th of June, and commenced unrolling their iron web. It parted again. They returned to Ireland for new supplies of cable; and on the 29th of July the Niagara and the Agamemnon met once more to renew their labors in the midst of the Atlantic. Nor can one read without sympathy and admiration the story of the heroic perseverance of Field, Bright, Canning, and their faithful associates, who, while Europe and America were deriding them on the safe shore for their Quixotic folly, persisted in heaping benefits upon mankind. No failures discouraged them; they were ever certain of success. At last, on the 29th of July, a day of rare loveliness, the great ships sailed away from each other, the Niagara for America, the Agamemnon for Valentia Bay. But they were never separated. The busy cable still bound them together. Storms came; the ships rolled upon immense waves; a thousand dangers seemed to surround the solitary wire; yet it never parted. The deep sea was passed; it slowly climbed the immense heights on either shore; no flaw appeared in the two thousand miles of scientific workmanship; the ships drew near to land; and at length, on the 5th of August, 1858, a thrill of wonder shot through the two continents, when it was told that they were bound together by electric thought.

America and Europe rejoiced; it was a moment of universal hope and exultation, and the first important message that came over the cable gave glory to the Most High, and promised peace and good-will to men. The Queen, ever in advance of her people, saluted the New World with a humane congratulation; the President returned her kindly sentiment. From Canada to the Gulf, America resounded with salutes of cannon and the pealing of bells. Cities were illuminated, and public and private thanksgiving flowed from every heart. The press, ever in the front of progress, celebrated the victory of science; and the name of Field, with that of Franklin and Felton, was placed high among the benefactors of his race. It is not our purpose to relate the circumstances of the gradual destruction of these generous hopes, and the slow death of the electric cable. The event came upon the public like the loss of a powerful friend. The utterances of the wires grew indistinct day by day; some flaw had occurred in the chain of intelligence, and by the 4th of September the communication ceased. Gloom and doubt settled upon the great enterprise, and, with the usual reaction that often attends a sudden disappointment, men even believed that the story of the momentary union of the two worlds was all delusion or fraud.

Eight years followed, during which the silent cable slept almost forgotten on the Telegraphic Plateau. They were years full of political convulsions and fatal disorder. The reign of peace on earth and good-will to men, which had been so fondly promised by the message over the Atlantic, seemed to have faded forever; for the Union was threatened with destruction, and the hopes of the people of every land in the final triumph of universal liberty were bound up in the fate of our civil war. A bitter alienation grew up between the government of England and the people of the Union; a profound gulf opened between Europe and America deeper and more impassable than the Atlantic itself. In the turmoil of the great rebellion the telegraph and its projectors sank into neglect; and when at length the war ended few believed that the proposed plan would ever be successful, or that the project would even be renewed. Intelligent electricians openly denied that any message had ever crossed the ocean. It was urged that the electric current could not be made to pass through so long a route; that its source must be dissipated long before it reached its distant aim. New plans, therefore, were suggested and advocated with vigor, and new companies were formed to carry telegraphic cables to the Azores, and from the islands to the continent of Europe. The public had lost its interest in the Atlantic Telegraph, and looked with coolness and neglect upon the project.

Amidst such discouragements, Mr. Field and his courageous associates, in 1865, had once more revived their telegraphic company, provided a new cable, and gallantly prepared to brave the dangers of the sea. Everything that science could do to insure success had been contributed by the highest intellects of the age. The new cable was more perfect than any former one. Instruments of unrivalled excellence had been provided, and a single vessel, the Great Eastern had been happily created by the genius of Brunel, capable of carrying a whole Atlantic cable within its bosom. While men doubted and derided, Science seemed to watch tenderly the great enterprise, and descended from the skies, a new Minerva, to cover it with her shield. In July, 1865, the great steamer set sail from the coast of Ireland, dropping her cable into a tranquil sea. She was manned in part by the same ardent navigators who, seven years before, had heard the glad voice of congratulation from Europe and America as they joined the rival shores. Field, Canning, and their associates, were once more united in a voyage more adventurous than that of Jason, more doubtful in its end than that of Columbus. But they were, as ever full of hope. The voyage passed prosperously; the sea was not unfriendly; and night and day, as the vessel glided slowly on, the voyagers were cheered by the musical flow of the cable as it dropped peacefully into the waves. So long as they could hear that sound they were satisfied that all was well. Every eye in the great ship was watching the turning of a single wheel; every ear seemed to listen only for a single sound. And we can well conceive with what rapt attention sailors and men of science, captain and chief, hung upon the strange note of the flowing cable that seemed to assure them of success. They had now reached the deepest part of the ocean without any important danger. Their labor was nearly ended. But on the 2d of August a flaw occurred, and the cable was drawn up for repairs. Mr. Field was watching on the tank. The sound of the wheel suddenly stopped; the cable broke, and was lost in the deepest part of the ocean. "It was enough to move one to tears," says Mr. Russell; and when a man came aft with the broken wires, and the ship's company gazed upon the torn strand and lacerated core, they mourned as if they saw the mortal agony of a friend. The still, shining Atlantic had swallowed up the expiring cable, and the Great Eastern returned unsuccessful to her port.

She sailed again in July, 1866, her tanks filled with a new cable, and the ardent Field once more on her deck. It was the last and successful voyage. All went well. The cable sank patiently and almost noiselessly down upon the ocean plain; and on the 26th of July the Great Eastern sailed triumphantly into Trinity Bay. The connection was made at Heart's Content, a little Newfoundland fishing village, and its pleasant sounding name represented well the inmost emotion of the projectors of the Atlantic Telegraph. Not long after the lost cable of 1865 was raised and completed. The success of the great enterprise was doubly assured, and Europe and America were bound together by a chain of thought that must lead every where to the progress of freedom and the elevation of the people.

In fact, the moral and mental influence of the telegraph will far excel even its commercial value. Like printing, it opens a new epoch in the progress of thought. Its effect is instantaneous. The generous and progressive impulses of the New World are conveyed in a moment to the Old. The noble struggle of the Latin races in Italy, France, or Spain, to throw off the barbarous traditions of the feudal ages, and to become freemen, is sustained by the sympathy and applause that flows under the ocean from America. An eloquent Castellar speaks to New York as well as to Madrid. The republican orators of Paris know that they have an innumerable audience beyond the seas. Industry, temperance, probity, once more rise to command in nations, where for ages they have been derided; and men of intellect govern where they have been slaves. It is quite probable that as the whole civilized world is bound more closely together by new avenues of thought, and men are linked in unity as if by a single mind, we may reach that basis of common sense which Aristotle and Cicero discovered, and which Christianity approves, and that the era of peace on earth will be nearer than it has ever been before.

Such is an imperfect sketch of the triumphs of electricity. It is the most poetical of the sciences as well as the most practical. Its future is full of promise, and no one can safely affirm that it may not yet achieve discoveries more wonderful than any in the past, and produce a still more beneficial effect upon the progress of man. Yet its earliest cultivators can never be forgotten, and the gratitude of their race must always attend those laborious intellects whose endless toil snatched the thunderbolt from the skies and made it the useful servant of modern civilization.

From Harper's Monthly.

I COMBAT the errors of ages; I meet the violence of mobs; I cope with illegal proceedings from Executive authority; I cut the gordian knot of power; and I solve mathematical problems of universities, with truth, diamond truth, and God is "my right hand man."—Joseph Smith.

GIVE TRUTH a fair and open field. Let her grapple with error. Who ever knew Truth worsted?—Milton.

CURIOUS FACT.—In the Fish, the average proportion of the brain to the spinal cord is only 2 to 1. In the Reptile, the ratio is 2½ to 1. In the Bird, it is 3 to 1. In the Mamalia, it is 4 to 1. But in Man, it is 23 to 1 No less remarkable is the fœtal progress of the human brain. It first becomes a brain resembling that of a fish; then it grows into the form of that of a reptile; then into that of a bird: then into that of a mammiferous quadruped, and finally it assumes the form of a human brain, "thus comprising in its fœtal progress an epitome of geological history, as if man was in himself a compendium of all animated nature, and of kin to every creature that lives.

OUR SOCIAL REDEMPTION.

BY EDWARD W. TULLIDGE.

No. 1.

The social redemption of mankind is that which commands the special mission of nearly all modern reformers. A mere mission of doctrinal theology and fierce religious controversy possesses no charm for the broad-minded men of the present age, who are inspired more by the motives of practical good for society than the conscienceless spirit of religious fanaticism. Without caring largely to enter into the interminable controversies of Christian sects, to trace which particular one of the ten thousand is on the right road to Heaven, and which nine thousand nine hundred and ninety-nine are on the road to hell, thoughtful men come at once to certain very practical conclusions.

In the first place, they very generally realize that, if there are only a few thousand of the one particular sect on the right road to Heaven, out of the twelve hundred millions of human beings constituting the balance, it is scarcely worth while to attempt to find out who they are. The affair in such a case would be too insignificant for our modern conceptions of the grand intentions of a God, touching human redemption. And, coming down from Deity to man's own benevolent policies, we readily perceive how practically pernicious it is for any particular one of the sects to determine for itself that it alone is on the right road to Heaven, and that all the others are on the broad road to destruction. Moreover, giving this all important subject of man's salvation a scientific exactness, it is practically perceived that every large sect is divided into a hundred fractions of the particular faith, according to the intellectual and spiritual development of its disciples. Therefore, whether Catholic or Protestant, Calvinist, Methodist, or any other creed, there are scarcely two out of an average hundred disciples of any faith, who are in the same exact saved condition, and who can see the same truths in the same light. Of course when a common social interest, or the associations of community or brotherhood, throw a common salvation around us, the whole of the faithful members of any given church may be said to be on the same road to Heaven. But human experience shows that a corresponding class of minds hold very similar views, and are very similarly affected by truth, or perchance spiritual impressions, irrespective of these distinctions of communities. Hence there has been observed a remarkable resemblance between the religious and moral teachings of such men as Confucius, Zoroaster, Jesus and Plato, and also between the Grecian and modern philosophy. This is so striking, that crude infidels have charged Jesus with stealing his wisdom from Confucius and other sages, claiming it as the special outshootings of his own superabundant divinity, while the old Christian orthodox, has its side of the case, equally crude.

The foregoing is about a summary of our modern appreciations. And in connection with these there is another great fact of human experience which fills truly Christian minds of the present age with sentiments of charity towards all mankind. That fact is that the religious strifes and fierce hatreds of the ages past, have grown up, not between evil and malicious men, but between those most devoted to God in their intentions, and who have manifested the most earnestness in their lives, under the direction of potent, contending Priesthoods. Good men have cursed each other in their religious zeal and assumptions—brothers of a Christian faith have sent each other to the block or to the stake, believing in all solemnity of conscience they were doing God's service. Hence men have at length been brought to a broad sentiment of charity, and our modern Christian philosophy may be tersely defined thus: "In every nation he that feareth God and worketh righteousness, is accepted of Him" without reference to sectarian names or religious creeds.

Out of these advanced appreciations of modern times, there has grown up a new school of divinity, and a new order of Apostles. They are the Apostles of the social redemption of the human race. At the head of these may be ranked the great social Apostle, the late Robert Owen. They commenced in infidelity, or more correctly speaking, heterodoxy, because priests and crude religions had left the most important work of humanity, up to the present time, undone, namely, man's social relations. These men, however, were more deeply earnest in their lives, and full of a truly Christian faith. Indeed their work was the fundamental work of Jesus himself, who sought to elevate mankind, first on earth that they may be afterwards lifted to a greater exaltation in the heavens. So much has this been the case with these modern social Apostles, that Robert Owen made Jesus Christ his example, and in his great human work went hand in hand with the Divine Master. He and his class were at first infidel in appearance, because faith was so grossly in darkness upon earth, but not in darkness in Heaven. At length they changed their phase, or the world changed its phase, and they appear now in the light of men of faith. Robert Owen himself, though nearly all his days a sceptic to such truths as the immortality of the soul, died a modern prophet of the life hereafter, having in solemn manifestoes declared to the enlightened minds of all nations, that in this opening age, Zion or the New Jerusalem should be established over all the earth, resulting in the social and spiritual redemption of all mankind. This, he said, should be brought about by the direct administrations of the Heavens.

Without being identified with Robert Owen's early infidelity or later spiritualistic views, yet somewhat in conformity with both, there is now leavening the nations a social divinity and everywhere at work these social apostles. They rank among the Catholics, Protestants, Calvinists, Free-grace-men, Infidels, Spiritualists, Jew, Gentile—men of all nations, tongues, color and creed. Abraham Lincoln, when he emancipated the slaves of America, placed himself among them; Alexander of Russia did the same when he broke the state of serfdom; Joseph Smith when he and his Apostles proposed emigration to the serfs of Europe; but Congress is not true to the modern mission of social redemption, when it denies Utah her political rights. The latter fact, however, is one of the specialties of our subject concerning Utah, and her social redemption in many respects, to be considered hereafter. Return we again to the general subject.

The stinging reproach cannot be made that it is a herd of political schemers, or a class of Utopian dreamers, who now maintain the modern gospel of social redemption. There was a time when its advocates could be stigmatized as Chartists and Socialists, who were aiming to dethrone the men in power, that they might themselves be seated in their place. But the later Apostles of social redemption have numbered among them such men as Earl Russell, Brougham, Shaftesbury, Carlyle and others of the most eminent statesmen and the best intellect of Europe. Some years ago they organized themselves into a grand "Social Science Congress," the first presidents of which were Lords Russell and Brougham, for the purpose of accomplishing the social elevation of the people, and the general education of the country. But America is the place wherein the problem can best be solved, for here the Almighty has realized, for His own purposes and humanity's good, all the requirements for that solution. The dominant races who have gathered, had a virgin world to subdue.

Again we may imagine the Divine command to have been promulgated, "Be fruitful, and multiply and replenish the earth." Here is then a vast field for human enterprise—here States of a matchless republic to be founded east and west. It is a work for a glorious national brotherhood, in the labors of which mankind may forget the religious differences of their forefathers, and even their parents' nationalities, in erecting not only a grand Republican Commonwealth, but also in spreading over the entire continent a platform for every human enterprise and every social good. On that platform already stand all races and every creed in generous fellowship. One of its latest planks was the Emancipation of the Slaves, for God in the practical manifestations of his Providence declares that this age shall not be retained in the dominion over serfdom of any kind, but the whole earth shall be redeemed from all its slaveries.

There shall be no more partitions erected between the branches of the human race; and if men, in their ambitious or sectional hatreds, lift them up, GOD will beat them down again. Have we not seen this in His providence of the last few years? He has baptized this continent in blood to redeem it from the distinction of races, for humanity had come up towards Him and his own thoughts. The world has advanced to a state where it could receive human fraternity at least in their political and social relations. Indeed, He has immersed the age in His own policies by this baptism of blood, the same as in Cromwell's time He shocked the world into the conceptions of modern republics by cutting off the heads of kings. Thank God, this has all gone by; the last martyr to human liberties and the emancipation of races we hope has already been offered up—the faithful, the honest Lincoln. There is neither black nor white, bond nor free, Jew nor Gentile, North nor South recognized in God's providence for the coming age. This consummation belongs to the broad Gospel of Social Redemption, which shall be preached not only in America, but in all the world, in the power and demonstration of the Holy Ghost, for most surely does the Holy Ghost bear witness to this Gospel in every event of the times. Take, for example, the last three great events of this continent, namely: the Emancipation of the Blacks, uniting races; the Atlantic Telegraph, marrying the Old and the New Worlds; and, lastly, the Pacific Railroad, which not only binds the two halves of this continent into an inseparable Union, but which will send our modern civilization round into Asia, to regenerate mankind in the very Cradle of Empires. There shall be no more social slaveries in institutional forms, no more partitions erected, either of Churches or States, in this "New World," to separate mankind and perpetuate religious and national hates; this is the "Thus saith the Lord" to the age, not through one man, but through the best intellects of all humanity and great transpiring events. We may a little longer retain these pernicious distinctions and these wicked hates, but God, in the social redemption of this continent, will overrule us all.

DEATH FROM A SCIENTIFIC POINT OF VIEW.

It is a law of Nature that whatever has a beginning must also have an end, the idea of death itself being associated with birth.

But this term of life, the moment that reduces to inert matter the body which life had animated, may arrive sooner or later, accidently or naturally.

Accidently death happens when one of the essential organs of life, from some cause or other, ceases to act; these principal organs being the brain, lungs, and heart.

The action of the brain, however, may be almost wholly suppressed, and yet life continue; breathing may for some time be suspended, and yet life linger within; but when the beatings of the heart cease, then life is extinct.

Accidental death, therefore, is all the more rapid from its cause acting more immediately on the circulating center; it may happen at all ages, although it is much more frequent in the earlier than the latter stages of existence.

Natural death is much rarer; accidents or disease almost always consuming life before the period primitively fixed upon by Nature.

It may also happen at a more or less advanced age, according to the peculiarities of constitution, sex, race, climate, etc. When the work of destruction follows its usual course, life departs in an opposite sense from the one in which it had been developed; in the embryo life seems to march from the heart to the remoter organs, but in the old man it gradually forsakes his body from the circumference to the centre. Then the members, becoming motionless, and obeying the law of heaviness, lose their sensibility and heat; the muscles no longer obey the will, even if the will exist; the skin becomes cold and dry, or is covered with a vicious sweat; the face assumes a characteristic aspect, and appears emaciated; the eyes withdraw deep into their orbits, the cornea is unsettled, the eyelids are half closed by the lowering of the upper one, the cheek-bones become prominent, the nose droops, and the discolored lips are parted and puckered. The voice, like thought, becomes incoherent; the eyes lose their powers of vision and the olfactory nerves are insensible to odors; but hearing is among the last of the faculties that leave him. The abdominal and pectoral viscera cease to fulfill their functions, drinks fall into the œsophagus as into an inert tube; breathing becomes short, slow, and irregular, now suspended, now renewed, terminating finally in the last gasp. The pulse beats rapidly, but fainter and fainter, offering numerous remittances until it ceases to be appreciable. The heart still continues beating feebly and irregularly, and its last contraction marks the moment that separates life from death.

No vestige of life now remains except in certain tissues, which, even for some time after death, retain organic properties; the capillaries are contracted, so as to drive into the veins all the blood they contain; the irritability of the muscles is demonstrated when placed under the influence of the voltaic pile; the uterus can expel the infant within, even when the heart has ceased to beat, etc. These last phenomena of life soon disappear, then the blood decomposes, its liquid parts infiltrating the tissues, and its solid elements being deposited either on the heart or on the sides of the vessels. Then follows decomposition, which slowly and mysteriously reduces the whole to water, carbonic acid and ammonia being the productions into which are resolved all animal matters in a state of putrefaction. These matters of complex composition return to the inorganic combinations which enabled the plants to elaborate them; thus the study of putrefaction, at first so revolting, acquires a special philosophical interest, while revealing to us a chain-work of phenomena admirable on account of its beautiful simplicity.

A FAILURE.—A recent book of historical reminiscences of the House of Commons narrates the laughable failure of one member who rose fully primed for a first attempt. He said: "Mr. Speaker, I am astonished—sir, I am astonished—sir, I am astonished;" and then his astonishment overcame him, and he sat down never to rise in parliament again.

THE LOTTERY DREAMER.

CHAPTER I.

THE MERINDA.

The "Cascine," as all know well who have done their Italy, are the delight of the "upper ten" (hundred) at Florence. The word, which is the plural form of Cascina, literally a cheese meadow, may be rendered by our phrase, a dairy farm. And the lovely spot in question was, in fact, the Grand Duke's dairy farm. There the richest milk and the best butter were to be had by all, who were willing to pay a higher price than the ordinary market rate for those luxuries, and who were also content to go some mile or so beyond the city gate in search of them. The past tense, indeed, need only be used as regards the ownership. For I have not heard that our Tuscan revolution in any wise disturbed the cows at their pasture, or turned the milk sour in the well-appointed dairy. So our "upper ten" take their evening drives as usual; those who think with Rousseau, that no dainties are so delicious as dairy dainties, still find cream and butter forthcoming in return for the accustomed pauls, and the Cascine are still as beautiful as ever, though no longer grand-ducal.

Few cities possess so delightful a public pleasure-ground as our Florentine dairy-farm. For driving, riding, walking, sitting, or lounging away a summer hour in the deep shadow of a forest glade, the Cascine are unrivaled.

Occupying a strip of ground immediately outside the city gates, about three miles or so in length, bounded on the south by the Arno, and on the north by the little stream of the Mugnone, which falls into the former river at the further end of it, the enclosed space comprises every variety of combination of meadow and woodland. A well-kept walk along the bank of the Arno, well fenced in from the winds sweeping down from the Apennines to the north by a magnificent high hedge of laurustinus, bay, and arbutus, and commanding the most picturesque peeps of the domes and towers of the city, framed in openings among the forest trees, offers as luxurious a winter's walk as can well be imagined. Soft sandy alleys cut in the forest, and appropriated especially to equestrians, present a ground for a gallop that "Nimrod" himself would have approved of. A good road round the whole space, now skirting the greenest coppice-embowered meadows, now plunging amid thick shady woods, and now again commanding a view of that lower range of the Apennine which shuts in the happy valley called after the Arno, makes a rarely equalled drive. There is no describing, without the aid of brush and palette and a right skillful hand to use them, the exceeding beauty of the view towards this mountain range, especially about the hour of an autumnal sunset. Passing over the strip of highly cultivated and rich alluvial flat which forms the bottom of the Valdarno, the eye is charmed with the extraordinary multitude of villas, with their surrounding trees and gardens, which stud the lower slopes of the hills. These are the abounding evidences of the luxury and wealth of the ante-ducal days of Florence, which so struck Ariosto by their number as to lead him to say, that if Florence could gather them within her walls, she would be equal to two such cities as Rome. Above these rises the range of hills which, under the names of Monte Morello, Monte Acuto, and the Mugello Hills, forms the barrier of the Val d'Arno. At the hour I have named they are all bathed in a rose-colored bloom, gradually deepening into purple plum color, as the short southern twilight dies away; and then whitening into pale ghosts of mountains, as the moon rises over the slender tower of Fiesole on its saddle-backed hill to the right, and far away in the same direction, over the dark pine forests of Vallombrosa, the sombre darkness of which sullenly refuses to smile beneath the pale ray like every neighbor hill around.

But before the last of these phantasmagoric changes has taken place, the band that has been playing among the rhododendron clumps in front of the handsome range of buildings containing all the dairy accommodation and appurtenances, has finished the last favorite bit from Verdi's last opera, and the last lingering carriage of all the closely-packed crowd drawn up in the open graveled area between the building and the band, has moved off towards the city. 'Tis the mode with the cosmopolite Florentine "upper ten" to halt in the spot described, after their drive for half an hour or so, before returning to the city. Some like to listen to the music, many enjoy the cool evening air blowing down from the hills. Almost all love dearly the polyglot flirting at carriage doors and windows, most conveniently and amicably performed when a dismounted cavalier is stationed on either side of a carriage containing two fair dames. All feel the absolute necessity of remaining in the spot, where fashion has decreed that it is at that hour essential to be found. So it often occurs that thinly-clad belles, who have been yielding to one or all of these temptations, may be seen gathering handkerchiefs and scarfs closely around delicate throats, while they are carried off through the darkening avenues at a sharp trot. For our Cascine with all its unrivaled charms, has, truth to tell, the reputation of being not wholly salubrious during the first hour after sunset. A light fleecy mist may at such times be observed to settle down upon it, while Florence and the neighboring hills are as free from damp as at mid-day. The bright emerald green of the meadows hints that all the advantages of different climates cannot be perfectly combined. And it unfortunately happens in this, as in some other cases, that the sanitary laws and those of "la mode," taking no cognisance whatever of each other's edicts, are apt to be a little at variance on the subject of evening drives to the Cascine.

But despite the habits of fashion, the social life of Florence is, perhaps, the least aristocratically exclusive of any to be found in the cities of Europe. There is even still deep down at the bottom of the national character a foundation of republican sentiment, surviving from the grand old days when Florence was said to be "the most republican of all republics," which very perceptibly modifies the manners and ways of the people. "Nobili" and "Snobili" are right classical Tuscan terms. Yet the division signified by them is a more impassable one on the banks of the Thames than on those of the Arno. Accordingly, we have no Hyde Park for the one class, and Victoria Park for the other. Our beautiful Cascine serves for all. And the working people of both races are quite as alive to its charm, quite as fond of enjoying it, quite as anxious to make themselves smart for the occasion of doing so, and often—taking into consideration the advantages imparted to a Manchester cotton-print by a lithe figure, and the disadvantages inflicted by a dowdy one on a French muslin—quite as successful in achieving that end.

But, although holidays are by no means such rare things in Florence as they are in London, still every day is not a holiday. Some are only half-holidays. There are even a few which are not holidays at all. And the snobile population, for the most part, limits its Cascine gayeties to those which are. Nor for that reason, it is to be observed, do the non-working classes at all take it into their heads that pleasure-seeking becomes thereby "vulgar" on a holiday. On the contrary, the same days which witness the greatest concourse of plebeians in all sorts of places of resort for the purpose of recreation, witness also an increase of the throng of patricians.

But there are certain days in the year when the true cockney Florentine especially makes a point of visiting the Cascine. It is in the prime of the early summer, in May, that the working world of Florence make their great Cascine holiday. A "merenda," or luncheon to be eaten in the southern meadow on the bank of the Arno, is the great enjoyment looked forward to, and the object, in many cases, of weeks of previous careful saving and scraping.

It is one of the very rare occasions on which eating and drinking enters into the plan of popular Florentine holiday-making. But very little out of the little that the working-classes can spend, or ought, beyond the bare necessaries of life, goes on what we northerners especially designate as creature-comforts. The theatre, cigars, a drive in a hackney-coach, six inside, the lottery, and dress, have all prior claims to the stomach. In no community in Europe, probably, is so large a proportion of the income of the entire society spent in dress as in Florence. The northern visitor, whose eye has been attracted by a pretty face at the window of a humble tenement, with its magnificent raven tresses most artistically dressed, and a finely-shaped bust encased in a snow-white and well-fitting bodice, could never imagine, that the reason why the fair one thus contended herself with exhibiting half her pretty person at the window instead of showing the whole of it among the holiday crowd in the streets, consisted in the dire impossibility of accomplishing a presentable toilette for more than one half of herself.

> In a fish-tail ends the form so fair above, says Horace, speaking of a mermaid; and the case in question is almost as distressing:

> In a bedgown ends the form so fair above.

At all events, Laura Vanni, the daughter of old Laudadio Vanni, the jeweler and goldsmith on the Ponte Vecchio, was as good a girl as a good man could wish to make a wife of, and as good a daughter as her father could desire, and very much better than he deserved. And yet had it entered the old man's head to propose to her that any portion of her habiliments should be contrived with a view to disfiguring rather than enhancing the advantages of face and figure with which Nature had endowed her, it is probable that an absurdity so monstrous in her eyes would have made a rebel of her. That it should be enjoined on her by any of the higher duties or sanctions, that she should make herself appear less beautiful than she might do, would have been so new, so unheard-of, so utterly incomprehensible to her; that it would have been a hopeless task to introduce such an idea into her brain.

Heaven knows her little toilette was simple enough on the morning on which I wish to present her to the reader, as she walked with her father and a couple of other individuals, to their annual festival in the Cascine. She had a plain white dress of some far from costly material, with a simple broad hem at the bottom—a skirt I believe I should say, for I mean only to speak of that part of it which robed her from the waist downwards. It was simple and cheap; but it was made of modest amplitude, and was irreproachably washed, starched, and ironed. Her bust to the waist was dressed in a black silk jacket, open in front so as to show a bit of worked muslin of the form of an inverted pyramid, extending downward to within an inch of the sash at the waist. This bodice also was quite plain. But it sat to perfection on the rich contours of her figure. Large heavy bands of dark brown wavy hair were skillfully arranged on either side of her face, and were surmounted by one of those coquettish dark brown hats which are assuredly the most becoming head-gear that fashion has yet invented for the young and pretty; though many of those who are both silly enough to let themselves be cheated out of the use of it by the stupid declaration of those who are neither, that it is "vulgar," only because the simplicity and easy cost of it place it within the reach of many.

And now how can I give an idea of the face that was beneath the hat, and between the bands of her hair? It was a face of the veritable Florentine type, with smaller features, more delicately chiseled, more expressive of intelligence, more mobile, than Roman female beauty. There was none of the massive dignity and harmonious repose of the Roman type of loveliness. A much larger portion of the charm of the Tuscan girl depended on the soul within, expressing its meanings through the large well-opened clear grey eyes, and in the constant play of the lines of the mouth. Altogether, there was less of purely animal perfection. The type of countenance was the product of a race that had passed through many generations of a higher civilization than modern Rome has achieved. The delicately-formed rounded little chin, with its dimple in the middle, was somewhat prominent. The mouth beautifully shaped, and capable of an infinity of varying expression. The lips might perhaps have been called too thin, and might have been held to indicate that form would be considered more important than color. The nose small, thin, and straight, but the least in the world retroussée. The great grey eyes were exceptional in a model Florentine head, and seemed to indicate that a rill of northern blood had in some antecedent generation been mingled with that of Laura Vanni's Tuscan Forefathers. The eyebrows above these remarkable eyes were straight and strongly marked, and the brow was slightly projecting. The forehead, of very fair height, was rounded rather than straight, and indicated an organization in which the perceptive faculties were more strongly developed than the purely intellectual ones.

Three male companions were escorting pretty Laura to the Cascine. Of these, two seniors walked together in front. One was old Landadio Vanni, and the other his intimate friend and gossip, and Laura's godfather, the Cavaliere Niccolo Sestini, who, having as a clerk in some one of the innumerable public offices spent his life till sixty years of age in doing as nearly as possible nothing, was now in the enjoyment of a pension of some eighteen pence a day, and of the felicity of having nothing whatever to do from morning till night. He had possessed this happiness for the last ten years, and still deemed his lot a most enviable one. He was a bachelor, and his friend Vanni a widower of many years' standing. In appearance the two old men were singularly contrasted. The cavaliere was a short, fat, roundabout little man, with a head shaped like the large end of an egg, and a skull as bald as an eggshell; rosy fat cheeks, from which every vestige of whisker, beard, or moustache, was scrupulously shaven; and a face utterly void of any expression save that of profound contentment and placidity.

The old jeweler, Laudadio Vanni, was a very much more remarkable-looking man. His unusually tall and strangely-slender figure was alone sufficient to attract attention; but the impression produced by it was exceedingly enhanced by an abundance of long straggling locks of silvery whiteness, which were blown about by the breeze as he walked, carrying his hat in his hand, and by an ample and flowing beard of the same hue. But the singular expression of his face was needed to complete the portrait, which the memory of those who saw him rarely failed to retain. It was long, narrow, and emaciated as his body. The forehead was higher and straighter than his daughter's, but much narrower, and remarkably pinched about the temples. But the eye was what gave the whole face its peculiar and striking expression. It was the same large clear grey eye that Laura had, scarcely dimmed by old Laudadio's eight-and-seventy years, but with a strange wildness and eagerness of expression that seemed to impart something almost "uncanny" to the physiognomy. The head might have been taken as a model for that of some rapt Ossianic bard, had it not been that there was a certain meanness about the lines of the mouth and in the expression of the narrow retiring forehead that would have been inconsistent with the idea. The old man stooped a little, not at the shoulders, but at the hips; and the attitude thus given to his body, joined to the slight protrusion of the chin, caused by the habitual rectification of the stoop, gave an air of restless anxiety to the figure which was very striking.

The fourth member of the party was, like old Vanni, a goldsmith and jeweler; but, though he had reached his five-and-thirtieth year, he was not yet master of a shop and business of his own. A better workman at his art than Carlo Bardi could not be found in Florence, and that is saying a great deal. Nor could there have been found a more thrifty man, which, as these are especially Florentine virtues, is saying much more. But Carlo had been unfortunate—had been obliged to support entirely a sickly sister, and pay the debts of a worthless brother. Both these had now been dead some years, however, and Carlo was once again beginning to hope that he should achieve the establishment of a shop and business of his own, and fulfill the almost equally long-deferred hope of making Laura Vanni his wife. It was quite understood between them long ago that the hope was mutual; and their talk, as arm in arm they followed the two old men along the path by the bank of the Arno, was accordingly more of material interests, and less of the pleasant nonsense of love-making, than might have been the case some eight or ten years before. For Laura, I am shocked to say, had reached her seven-and-twentieth year.

When they reached the favorite meadow selected by the Florentines for the annual celebration of their "merenda" festival, the ground was almost entirely occupied by parties of four or five, or sometimes ten or twelve, covering with their clean white cloths, pitched in most unexclusive neighborhood to each other, nearly the whole turf. The porter hired for the occasion, who had been sent on with the materials of our friends' "merenda," had selected for them what he deemed a desirable spot. But the old cavaliere was not so easily contented. One place was exposed to the wind from the hills, another would be in the full sun in half an hour; a third did not command a view of the "palazzo vechio" tower; and he had eaten his "merenda" in sight of that every Ascension-day for the last ten years. His old friend the while took no part in his search for a spot to suit him, but seemed, with his strange eager look, intently occupied in counting the numbers of the different parties on the ground around—counting the men, counting the women (for almost every knot was composed of family parties)—counting everything he could see, and all with an appearance of the strangest interest.

At last, old Niccolo—"Il Cavaliere," as his friend Vanni never failed to call him—found a spot to his liking; and the little party seated themselves on the grass, and made the necessary preparations for their feast. It cannot be said that the cavaliere's choice of a locality was a bad one. It was close under the thick tall hedge that forms the boundary of the meadow furthest from the city. The river was thus on their left; the meadow crowded with the holiday-makers, and the more or less pretentious and luxurious preparations for eating and drinking, with the towers and domes of the city in the distance, in front of them; and the thick woods of the Cascine, and above and beyond these the hill of Fiesole, with its tower and its villas, to the right.

Laura drew forth from their store a clean white cloth, and four very coarse, but nicely washed, napkins; while the cavaliere was ascertaining that the flasks of wine had traveled safely in the basket made expressly for the purpose of carrying a couple of Forentine flasks, and consisting of two circular receptacles some nine inches in diameter, and as much in depth, joined together at one point of their circumference, and surmounted by a semi-circular handle. Such a contrivance is needed for moving the fragile egg-shell-like flasks, which enter so largely into Tuscan domestic uses. Flasks for wine, flasks for oil, flasks for milk, flasks for medicine, flasks for water. The legal Florence flask contains seven pounds' weight of wine, and is equal to nearly three ordinary bottles. But the glass is of the very thinnest; and even the baskets described above would fail in securing their large bulging sides and long slender necks from frequent breakage, were they not invariably covered with a rush-work coat as high as the shoulder. The neck, which ends without any rim, and looks just as if it had been irregularly broken off, is so slender, that corking it in our fashion is out of the question. The Florentine, therefore, when he has filled his wine-flask, pours into the narrow neck a little drop of olive oil, which, resting on the wine to the thickness of about half an inch, effectually and hermetically closes the aperture. A wisp of straw, or, oftener still, a vine-leaf, loosely placed in the mouth of the opening, serves to keep out flies, dust, and such matters, and the flasks, which of course remain always upright on their rush-plaited bottoms, may stay thus for years. When wanted, a morsel of wool or cotton thrust into the neck of the flask readily absorbs the oil, which is thus removed; or, without any such contrivance, a practised Florentine hand will toss the oil out with a jerk, without spilling a drop of the wine.

"There!" said the cavaliere, "those ought to be a couple of flasks of as good Pomino as you would wish to drink. I went to the bishop's cellar for them myself yesterday."

"Red wine—that gives me the number 33. I want my third number!" muttered old Vanni; "a very remarkable combination."

"Does all the Pomino vineyard belong to the Bishop of Fiesole?" asked Carlo.

"All," replied Signor Sestini; "but the worst of it is, that the bishop has other farms besides, on which he makes a very inferior wine; and his lord is just as apt to mix his flasks, and cheat his customers, as any wine-shop-keeper in Florence."

"Bishop is number 32!" cried Vanni; "very curious indeed."

Laura had by this time spread the cloth, and produced a long loaf of brownish bread, two feet or near it in length, by four inches in width, and three in height; a quantity of "salame," or Bologna sausage, uncooked thinly sliced, and wrapped in abundance of fresh vine-leaves; some salad; a quarter of roast lamb—the grand dish of the repast—about as large as a good-sized quarter of rabbit; and some apples.

The fat little cavaliere and ex-clerk fell to at once; and the young people followed his example. But old Laudadio's head was still running meditatively on his numbers.

"The three objects of discourse that first spontaneously strike your mind, and take your attention," said he, more to himself than to his companions; "certainly they were the red wine, the bishop, and the apples. Why did my mind fix on those in preference to all the other things spoken of? Aha! there is the force of the cabala. I multiply the number of the first object by that of the second, and thus get 1056. I multiply this again by the number of the third, and this gives me 2100."

"But what is the connection," said Carlo, with something almost like a groan, "between red wine and the number 33, or between a bishop and number 32?"

"What is the connection," returned the old man, sharply; "does not every one know that there is a profound and mystical relation between certain numbers and every object in nature and art, and every act which a man can do? Are they not recorded in the book which contains the result of the life-long labors of the greatest sages of the generations past?" And putting his hand in the pocket of the threadbare old long frock-coat, which hung loosely on his attenuated figure as on a clothes-horse, he pulled forth a dirty, greasy, and well-thumbed volume, entitled "Fortune for all Men. A Book of Dreams for Players in the Lottery. The last improved edition, published at Florence, in 1858." "Here," said he, laying his tremulous hand reverently on the book, "here is the connection, friend Carlo," and proceeding hurriedly to refer to his oracle, he turned to a kind of dictionary of all sorts of objects, name, and actions, which occupied one hundred and eighty-six out of its two hundred and fifty-six pages, and pointed to the above-mentioned numbers appended to the objects in question. "Ah! the science of numbers is a great and wonderful science!" said he.

"But to think of your knowing the numbers denoted by the red wine, the bishop and the apples, without turning to the book!" said the old cavaliere, with evident admiration. "Ah, my friend, what a head! what a mind you have!"

"Why, papa knows every number in the list, I do believe," said Laura, laying her hand on the old man's silver locks, as he sat beside her, and kissing him on the forehead; "few know as much of the cabala as papa does."

"Few have studied them, perhaps, as profoundly and as long," returned he, with the mock humility of gratified vanity. "But, alas! Art is long, and the longest life short."

"The longest life would indeed be too short, I fear, to reach the goal of your studies, Signor Vanni," said Carlo, not without bitterness.

"Who knows!" cried the old man, fiercely. "Who knows when the reward may come to the watchful and unwearied student—come in a moment, suddenly, unexpectedly, rich and abundant! 2100, I said. Multiply this by the number of the current year, add the golden number, and with the product from the pyramid of the great Rutilio of Calabria. Take the second line of it for your first number, the two figures at the right hand of the base for your second, and the two figures at the left hand for your third number; place these beneath your pillow at night; and, should you dream of them, the result is sure;—almost sure," added the old dreamer, with a long-drawn sigh.

The cavaliere, meanwhile, was doing great execution among the eatables; and it was not till the last diminutive bone of the cat-like lamb was picked, that he lit his cigar, and soon afterwards fell asleep in perfect beautitude smoking it. The old jeweler ate very sparingly, and fell to conning his book, and doing endless multiplications and additions. The lovers, of course, were happy, and busy in talk of their hopes of shortly accomplishing the long-waited for marriage. And thus the merenda lasted far into the afternoon; and it was nearly sunset when the little party started to walk by the river-bank to Florence.

THE ANCIENT EGYPTIANS.

FROM A LADY'S LETTER TO ANOTHER LADY.

The life of an ancient Egyptian lady was not so very different from that of our modern belles. Fancy yourself one, and I will tell all you would do. You rise in the morning and perform your toilet by the aid of a mirror of polished metal, whose handle is in the form of some monster—to heighten, by contrast, the beauty of the reflected features. You lengthen your eyebrows with kohl, and paint a dark rim around your eyes to make them look languishing, and you tint your fingers with rose-colored henneh. Then your maids oil and perfume your hair and plait it in narrow braids which bang down behind. You array yourself in fine linen and broidery, and I am afraid I shall frighten your husband if I tell him of the gold and silver jewels you adorn yourself withal. Bracelets of serpents and asps, and the holy scarabæus, rings and earrings of all imaginable shapes; Mediterranean shells, the flowers of the lotus, or waving papyrus, a slender palm leaf, grapes, bells, the sacred cat, or Path's hideous head, made of all precious things; necklaces of lapis lazuli, with hanging ornaments of every shape that the cunning artificers of Memphis can invent. You deck your feet with sandals of gilt and painted leather, or perhaps with the cool papyrus slipper. Perhaps you go upon the house-top to have a chat with your neighbor; but, no, I think you will wait till the cool of the evening for that. May be your husband will go fishing this fine morning, and as you see him coming, you prepare a boquet of the favorite lotus to offer him on his arrival. Then you accompany him to the papyrus boat, and watch the sport. As the boat wanders among the rushes, you sometimes grasp at them to steady it, and you applaud heartily as a skillful throw of the double spear captures two of the finny tribe. It is evident that the ancient husband has all the love for music that distinguishes the modern one; for his wife entertains him, after the fatigue of the morning's sport, with airs on the harp, while other members of the family accompany her on the lyre and guitar. Afterwards you beat him at a game of chess, and the rest of the day is passed perhaps at a dinner party at a friend's, or in entertaining company at home. In this case, your guests admire your elegant furniture of foreign wood, your glass vases of many colors and rare and elegant ornaments. The gentlemen note each other's wigs, their shape and size (for all are close shaven), while the ladies compare their ear-rings, and give various opinions upon the relative merits of kohl and antimony for darkening the eyes. Soon the servants bring in the sumptuous dinner, and the guests do full justice to the meats and vegetables (you ate onions there), and pastry; and you may be sure the wines are not neglected. During the dinner, and after it, your guests are entertained by a band of musicians, while dancers and buffoons add to their amusement. You end the day by ascending to the house-top to enjoy the delicious moonlight, such as no other land can boast, and gaze away into the west, where the great desert's sand seems to roll in golden billows. Your bed is of elegant shape, and as you rest your head upon the alabaster pillow and offer your last prayer to the Sun, that he will lighten you through other happy days, let me hope that gentle sleep will soon embrace you, and all evil dreams flee far away.

The ancient Egyptians were, without doubt, acquainted with the art of glass-making. I have seen paintings on the tombs representing glass-blowers, and others of bottles half full of wine, where its red color is represented as visible through the clear glass. In one of the tombs a glass bead was found bearing the king's name. If I remember rightly, it was that of Thothenes III, the Pharoah of the Exodus. It seems to be also evident that they carried the manufacture of colored glass to a perfection which has not yet been attained by modern artists. Some specimens of their workmanship have received the highest commendation. One piece of glass was found in which the colors were arranged to form the figure of a bird somewhat resembling a duck, and in this the different colors continued through the entire thickness, so that if a horizontal section of any depth was made, the figures would still remain perfect. The microscope shows that the whole of this specimen is formed of minute cylinders of different colors, welded or fused together with a precision and accuracy which workmen of our day try in vain to emulate. You can imagine what progress they had made in art when they were able to manufacture these microscopic cylinders of various colors, and then fuse them together into any shape.

Nevertheless, they did not use glass windows then. The advantage of having a window of glass is simply to keep out the air while it lets in the light, and is peculiarly a necessity of northern countries. In Egypt, where comfort absolutely demands shelter from the sun's parching rays, and where, even if its direct beams are excluded, the very light, reflected from the white hills and glowing sands, is almost intolerable, the necessity was exactly the reverse—to admit the air while keeping the light out. "Necessity is the mother of invention," you know; and the lack of this necessity was, in my opinion, the only reason for the lack of the invention. They were certainly far enough advanced to have made it. At a very early period they made successful imitations of the amethyst, emerald and other precious stones, and a large proportion of foreign commerce was in these spurious gems.

The Egyptians excelled in other departments of manufacture. You remember that Ezekiel, in speaking of the wealth and splendor of Tyre, says, "Fine linen with broidered work from Egypt was that which spreadest forth to be thy sail." This was written, however, in Egypt's later day, 588 B.C. The Egypt of which I have been speaking is that ancient land which Abraham visited, and where Joseph's brethren sought refuge. In those remote days the Egyptians enjoyed many of the refinements of civilization, and we may trace, in the history of the exodus of the Jews the influence of the art and culture they had left behind. Egypt had taught them how to make the sacred statue of Apis long before they erected the golden calf in the wilderness; but afterwards they used the knowledge they had acquired in a worthier service. When "the wise-hearted women did spin with their hands, and brought that which they had spun, both of blue, and of purple, and of scarlet, and of fine linen,'" they were honoring their God with those talents and that skill which had at first been employed in the service of their heathen mistresses; and we may be sure that God used the proper Egyptian workmen as instruments in teaching Bezaleel and Aholiab "in wisdom, and in understanding, and in knowledge, and in all manner of workmanship; and to devise curious works, to work in gold, and in silver, and in brass, and in carving of work, to make any manner of cunning work, to work all manner of wood of the engraver, and of the cunning workman, of the embroiderer, and of the weaver. Some specimens of the ancient linen are perfectly wonderful. Their fineness and evenness are equal to that of our finest cambric. You can imagine what excellence they had attained in this manufacture when I tell you that, in one specimen, 140 threads were counted in a square inch, and in another 180.

A Teachers' Institute.—We have received an excellent letter from a Grantsville friend, urging the necessity of the establishment of a Teachers' Institute, or an organization for the purpose of securing uniform methods of teaching, as well as—that great necessity of our Territory—uniformity in the kind of books used in our schools. An organization of this kind at which the teachers of the Territory could periodically meet and discuss these and similar questions would be a blessing to our community. We urge attention to the subject and regret that our space will not permit us to say more in favor of it at present.

Correspondence.

Editors Utah Magazine:

Gentlemen—As a member of the "great public," permit me to thank you for the excellent manner in which you have thus far conducted your worthy periodical; and for such a beautiful display in its columns of original, talented, home-made articles—the high appreciation of which is, I presume, ten times more than you have ever dreamt of.

The Utah Magizine is now an absolute necessity—such as the thinking portion of Utah (whose ranks are by no means thin) cannot dispense with. The bold, firm, and unyielding, yet fair, intelligent and impartial stand which it has taken, has drawn towards it admiration from the hearts of all classes through the land, and laid for itself a foundation for a wide circulation and great success. Think not this flattery; for such must certainly be its happy fate, if the editors thereof do not change base and detract from the advocacy of principles so bold as at present adorn the pages of their weekly luminary.

Wherever I go, I hear naught but praises bestowed upon its head, accompanied with a wish that it might ever continue in its development of mighty truth to the world. For the people are satisfied that the great want of this world below—Truth—is competent enough to take care of itself, and the rough handling it might receive from us will only make it to appear brighter, and then it will have no naked deformity to present when the veil between us and it is rent asunder; but like the fountain of light itself the nearer we approach it the more we can perceive its beauty and goodness.

Your articles on "Steadying the Ark," "Our Workman's Wages," "A Real Representative of the Most High," "The True Development of the Territory," "Justifiable Obedience," and scores of others are certainly a great treat to thousands; and depend upon it, they are greatly if not duly appreciated by immense numbers. They are certainly an array of self-evident truths; all candid, thinking men readily accord them praise, and rejoice at the multiplication of means for carrying the grand, impressive truths of the gospel.

When knowledge and light march hand-in-hand with a firm step, ignorance must melt into nothing, God will be revealed as He is, although it may be galling to crabby, sanctimonious, self-righteous souls to find that there are others in the world who toil, not for pay alone, but who live for their fellow-creatures, who aim at worshipping God with all the fervor of their souls; but probably on account of their more enlarged views are not minutely scrupulous in the observance of outward ceremonies, and yet move in accordance with the will of Heaven. Presenting no zeal disproportionate to their knowledge, and never led by blind fanaticism.

The "great future" will undoubtedly discharge from its hold many surprises; but should we find glory bestowed upon heads contrary to our expectation, we should not feel grieved: it should be our aim to rejoice at the welfare of others. Nothing but merit will bring us exaltation, and against the rewarding of that noble quality, no one should raise his hand. The heaven we ourselves make will be the only one we shall enjoy; therefore, no one should envy us of that which we labored hard for. Neither would our enjoyment of a blessed abode on a celestialized world lessen the glory of the habitations of some one else any more than would the borrowing of a light from a candle rob it of that which gives it luster. Then let truth spread on in its progress, chasing away ignorance and superstition, and imparting to mankind a great conception of the life that is, and the life that is to come.

May prosperity attend your laudable exertions, and peace and plenty be your portion, is the desire of

Your well-wisher,

Carabantos.

MUSICAL DOINGS.—Since Mr. Waters gave up publishing sheet music, he has devoted his whole capital and attention to the manufacture and sale of Pianos and Melodeons. He has just issued a catalogue of his new instruments, giving a new scale of prices, which shows a marked reduction from former rates, and his Pianos have recently been awarded the First Premium at several Fairs. Many people of the present day, who are attracted, if not confused, with the flaming advertisements of rival piano houses, probably overlook the modest manufacturer like Mr. Waters; but we happen to know that his instruments earned him a good reputation long before [illegible] positions and "honors" connected therewith were ever thought of; indeed, we have one of Mr. Waters' Piano-fortes now in our residence, (where it has stood for years,) of which any manufacturer in the world might be proud. We have always been delighted with it as a sweet-toned and powerful instrument, and there is no doubt of its durability; more than this, some of the best amateur players in the city, and several celebrated pianists, have performed on the said piano, and all pronounce it a superior and first-class Instrument. Stronger indorsement we could not give.—Home Journal,

HARVELL'S
HORSE POWDERS.

These celebrated and renowned powders for horses and cattle have been tested by an intelligent public for sixteen years. Hundreds of the principal horsemen of the Union have pronounced them the only Condition Powders safe to use and work the horse. There is nothing in them to expose the animal, but, on the contrary, everything to improve them. The proprietors of horse railroads, omnibusses, and stage owners in all the principal cities use them; and their combined testimony stamps them one of the wonders of medical science. Letters sufficient to fill a small book are in our possession, testifying to their goodness. Merchants are requested to warrant them, and refund the purchase money should they fail to give satisfaction.

ALLCOCK'S POROUS
STRENGTHENING
PLASTERS.

ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS are the results of studies and experiments of Dr. Schleut, of South Carolina; of Dr. Wm. Wagstaff, now Baron Wagstaff, of Horace H. Day, the distinguished manufacturer of rubber goods; and of Thomas Allcock, Chemist and member of the College of Pharmacy of New York, now General Allcock, etc., etc.

Step by step this commodity has attained its unprecedented fame. They are universally approved. They support, strengthen, and aid the growth of muscles. They appear to have a peculiar effect upon the nerves, allaying irritability, while supplying warmth. They seem to accumulate electricity, and aid the circulation of the blood through the part where applied, by which healthy actions are induced.

Even in paralysis, where articulation was suspended, the use of the Porous Plasters to the spine restored the articulation, and materially reduced the paralysis. In fact, the patient could help herself, while before the Porous plaster was applied she was as helpless as a baby. We refer to Mrs. Sally Elliot, Springfield, Mass.

Dr. Myer, of Savannah, Ga., says they are the best mechanical supporters for weak muscles ever discovered; that by their warming properties they bring power and health, until the strength of the muscles are entirely restored. That he knows a case where Allcock's Plasters cured a gentleman of a weak spine. That he daily prescribes them in his practice with the happiest results, and desires us to refer to him.

Dr. Henderson, of Farmsville, Louisiana, says:

"The counter-irritant effect of Allcock's Porous Plasters is produced in such a mild and gradual way, they so invigorate the circulation around the parts to which they are applied, and exert upon all nervous diseases such a great sedative influence, that I place them confidently at the head of every plaster now in use."

Dr. Johnson, of Hartford, says:

"My daily experience confirms the very superior excellence of your Porous Plasters. At this moment of writing, a man applies for one, who, by entanglement in a shaft of machinery, had both his legs broken, spine severely injured, and was for nearly a year entirely helpless. This man found relief very soon by the application of a plaster to his spine. He was soon enabled to work, and now he labors as well as ever. He would cheerfully pay five dollars for a single plaster, if they could not be had at a lower rate. Surgeons should make use of these perforated plasters, to the exclusion of all others, as their flexibility and adhesiveness are greatly in advance of all other plasters with which I am acquainted, while the perforations peculiar to them render them greatly superior to all others for ordinary surgical uses. Knowing the plasters to be so useful, I have no scruples that my sentiments should be known.

J. W. JOHNSON, M. D."

Dr. Sterling's testimony:

"For two years, I have been a great sufferer from neuralgia in the head, and found only temporary relief from all the various remedies that I have tried, until I applied one of Allcock's Porous Plasters. I cut it into three strips, placing one under each shoulder blade, and the other over the small of the back; and for the past three months, I have had scarcely a twinge of the old pain.

I advise all who suffer from nervous diseases to lose no time in making a trial of the wonderful Porous Plaster.

A. F. STERLING, Sec. Singer Mfg Co.

New York, June 8, 1868.

MEDICINAL QUALITIES
—OF THE—
POROUS PLASTERS.

The Porous Plasters possess the soothing, warming and sustaining qualities of the combined plasters of the dispensatories. An Electrician, who has great experience of their effects in Local Rheumatism, in Tic Doloreux, and deep-seated nervous and other pains, and in affections of the kidneys, etc., etc., attributes all their sedative, stimulative and pain-relieving effects to their ELECTRIC qualities. He asserts that they restore the healthy electric condition (equilibrium) of the part, and that being restored pain and morbid action cease. He was amazed at the great number of beneficial indications produced by one of these plasters. He affirms that Head-ache is cured by one worn just below the breast-bone; that one placed over the navel will cure hysteries, as well as dysentery, and affections of the bowels.

PATENT
ARION PIANOFORTE

GRANDS AND GRAND SQUARES,

7¼ OCTAVE.

The "ARION" is the very best Piano for the Great West, because it stands in tune longer than any other Piano. It requires no repairing or regulating; shipping any distance, or dampness does not affect them.

WHY?

It commences where the "First Premium" Makers stop, and upon the most improved Modern scale makes four patented improvements; which make the Arion more simple, yet stronger; increasing its volume and beauty of tone, while rendering the instrument more enduring.

WHAT THEY ARE.

First. The patent Arion Reversed Wooden Agraffe Bridge, which retains all the purity of tone only found in a wooden bridge (the less, whereon the strings lay), and obtains all the solid prolonged strength of tone of the metal Agraffe, without that acute metallic noise which the metal Agraffe develops by use.

Secondly. The Patent Arion Compound Wrest-Plank, which holds the tuning pins, is six thicknesses of hard maple, the grain of each layer runs in a different direction. The advantages are, the 20 tons strain of the strings cannot split our Arion wrest-plank, as frequently happens in other Pianos, and when people say "My Piano won't stand in tune," all other makers must use the single wrest plank with the grain running only one way.

The Arion Tuning-Pins have end wood to hold them on every side, while all other makers can have it only upon two sides of their pins.

Thirdly, The Patent Arion Dingonal Sustaining Bar, extending parellel with the steel strings under the over strung Bass strings. The Arion is the only Piano wherein the enormous strain of the large steel strings is resisted in the natural place and direction. Using this bar renders the weakest part in all other over strung Pianos the

STRONGEST IN THE ARION.

Fourthly, The Patent Arion Iron Frame concentrates all the metal in front of the tuning pin line, and its frame is let into (butted) the front edge of the wooden wrest plank, thereby preventing the great strain of the strings upon it from splitting or moving it one particle. All other "Full Iron Frames" cover the entire wrest plank, and when it is split it cannot be seen, the wood of the Arion wrest plank is seen.

THE ARION STANDS UPON ITS OWN MERITS.

unsupported by either buncome, weak facts, or useless or complicated Patents. We append a few unbought opinions of those who

KNOW THE ARION.

The Musical Director of the New York Conservatory of Music, Edward Mollenhauer, says. "The Arion I bought of you is the best Piano I ever played on; that rolling bass and silvery treble, etc."

John H. Woods, Piano Dealer, Oswego, N. Y., says: The tone is truly immense, and I surpasses anything in the shape of a Piano we ever saw or heard of, etc."

Horace Greely said: "The Arion is the best Square Piano, superior for its clearness and brilliancy of tone," &c.

Louis Wagner, Fort Leavenworth, says: "My Piano arrived here in splendid order. Its tone fills my parlor with melody—it is the wonder and admiration of all who hear it. Miss ——, who is teaching the Piano desires me to order one for her," &

Dr. CADY'S CATARRH REMEDY.

A CERTAIN CURE FOR CATARRH AND ALL Mucous Diseases of the Head, nose and throat.

This is a Medicine never before used or known to the public. Dr. Cady, the discoverer, was a sufferer from this terrible disease for twenty years, and after testing all the remedies extant—without relief—in his efforts to obtain a cure he discovered this UNEQUALLED REMEDY, which cured him in the short space of eight weeks.

It has been thoroughly tested, and has not failed in a single instance. Several of the most obstinate cases have been thoroughly cured by this remedy, after every other known medicine had failed. Every one who has tried it will testify to the truth of the above statement.

Every one afflicted with Catarrh should give it a trial and find out for himself whether it is a humbug.

Saratoga A WATER.

The Saratoga "A" Spring Water is probably the most effective mineral water found on either continent. It has ten per cent. greater mineral properties than the celebrated Congress Spring; four times that of Baden Baden of Austria; five times that of Aix La Chapelle in Prussia; twice that of Vichy in France; nearly three times greater than the renowned Seltzer of Germany; and equally over the Spas of Bath, England, and Kissengen in Bavaria.

The reputation of this water is based upon its effects in diseases of the stomach, liver, bowels, kidneys and spleen. It acts with wonderful benefit in cases of chronic dyspepsia, constipation, gravel, gout, Scrofula, cutaneous affections, general lethargy, soreness and prostration of the system.

After the furrow, the waiting seed;
After the shadowy river—rest.

ROSAMOND'S BOWER.

Love was everything to Margaret Mercer—love and home. She was such a very woman to the heart's core, that I doubt if she had any ambition. To wish to be great, to be known of all the world, to be very wise or learned, never entered her simple mind; but one thing she hoped and labored for with all her might—to be empress of her husband's heart, and living queen regnant in his home. Such a home as she made of it, too—so bright in every nook and corner—so bright as she was with her fair, smooth face—smooth save for dimples.

Mathew Mercer should have been a very happy man, and so he esteemed himself. Two children as pretty as their mother played at her knee; and there never had been an angry word between the pair since he first courted her. They were as greatly blest as were Adam and Eve in paradise. But even to paradise, as we remember, there came a serpent. So to Margaret Mercer's home came one day Elsie Grey, as fair a serpent as one could meet—a woman of whom one said, looking at her for the first time, "She is as good as she is beautiful." She came as governess for the children; and Margaret, charmed by her sweet face, made a compact of friendship with her at once, and was well pleased that Mathew liked the girl.

"She is so lonely, my dear," said Margaret, looking up into her husband's eyes, as they stood together before the pleasant fire on the first evening after the governess' coming. "And it is hard for any woman to earn her bread among strangers; let us be very good to her."

"You could not help being good to any one, Margaret," said Mathew, "and I will try; but I must not quite make love to her—eh, Maggie?"

Then the wife had turned and kissed him.

"I should be jealous, and put poison in a bowl of coffee, and offer her the choice between that and your sharpest razor," she said, laughing.

That was in December. One day in June Margaret walked a little thoughtfully among the roses in her garden, and wondered whether it might not be that she was a little jealous.

"So wrong of me," she said to herself. "Mathew is only kind to Elsie."

A tear trembled on her eyelash, and at last she sat down upon a bench and fairly sobbed aloud, telling herself all the while how wrong it was.

And just then, without knocking, in walked Miss Euphemia Jones, her next door neighbor, and looked straight into the wet eyes, turned, somewhat indignantly upon her.

"An't well, eh?" said the spinster.

"Not very," said Margaret. "And tired you know and—"

"And unhappy," said the spinster. "Don't tell me, Mrs. Mercer. And this I say—get rid of that sly boots of a governess, or you'll have more reason to cry than you have now. Men are men, Mrs. Mercer, and your husband——"

"He is the best man in the world," said Margaret.

"But he's a man," said the spinster. "Why, look here, my dear. Men are men. The last bright eyes are always brightest. It's only women that love through long years with nothing to show for it—not a kiss, not a word, not a letter; women that love some one without a speck of beauty until there couldn't be any face so bright and dear to them in all the world. Men an't like us, and never will be, and this Elsie Grey is pretty, my dear."

"But Mathew is my husband," panted Margaret.

"Then he ought not to go a-walkin' with Miss Grey," said the spinster; "holding her hand, too—he oughtn't. Don't be frightened. But there's something you ought to know—he oughtn't to go out of town along with her. We saw them go, I and Mrs. Thompson, only an hour ago. My dear, did you know they were going? My dear, dont look so; don't feel so, if you can help it. She had a bag with her; so had he. She——"

But then the wretched wife fell forward into her neighbor's arms, insensible.

Other neighbors came in, and they put her to bed and took care of her, as though for once all women were sisters. There was no doubt on any one's mind that the very worst had come to pass; and so, indeed, it had. Bewitched by the beautiful serpent his wife's kind heart had warmed and nourished until it had strength to sting her, Mathew Mercer had left his home, his wife and his children, for her sake.

Margaret had no father or brothers to take her part; she could only suffer in silence. That which aroused her first was the need of earning bread for her children—the two who ceased their play to wonder why home had grown so dull a place, why papa never came home, and why mamma wept so bitterly, and the unconscious little creature born at the time when her grief was greatest and the blow but newly fallen.

What could she do for her children's bread? With the question came a thought to which ambition never would have given birth. She could paint. Already certain little bits of still life, scraps of landscape, and a child's head or two, proved her power to put a pretty thing, if not a fine one, upon canvas. Many artists at least lived by their art. She would live, and her children should know no want. And so she began her life-work.

There were hours to come of poverty so great, that the prayer for daily bread was answered with no more than bread and water. There were nights passed in the dark, because the purse held nothing which might be spent for oil or candle. There were fireless days in dead winter; but through all, hope lived, and pride, and a mother's love.

No one guessed what Margaret suffered; and at last her prospects brightened. A certain fashonable clique took a fancy to Mrs. Mercer's pictures; her bits of still life sold; her children's heads were voted gems; the womanly prettiness of her conceptions pleased the eyes of other women, and Margaret felt very rich and prosperous.

She had begun with no ambition save that of love; she had struggled only for her children. Now she began to dream of a name and fame—of painting great pictures—of being a great woman. Strange hopes for Margaret Mercer—hopes that seldom come to any woman until the natural hopes and ambitions of her life are blasted.

So, with no fear of starving upon her now, after five years of labor—ten years in which no word had ever come to her of the man she had loved so truly, and who had so wofully broken the vow he uttered, to cherish and protect her while life should last—Margaret began the first picture which went beyond mere prettiness—the first in which action and expression, rich draperies and knowledge of the costumes of the past, were needed; a picture of Queen Eleanor in Rosamond's Bower. It was an illustration of an old ballad which told the tale; and Rosamond was wondrous fair, and the Queen mightily stern and cruel, if the poet were to be believed; but as she painted, that which slept within her soul found utterance.

Rosamond, beautiful indeed, had a face as false as it was fair; and Queen Eleanor's eyes held in their depths a look of such reproach, that one might see she was an injured wife; and the bowl was at Rosamond's lips; and upon the wall of the bower hung a portrait—the portrait of the King. Margaret did not mean it; but as she painted hard and fast through the long summer days, the faces that grew upon the canvas were portraits.

Rosamond was Elsie Grey; Eleanor had her own features; and the portrait of the king upon the wall was that of Mathew Mercer.

Margaret's children watched her as she painted—the boy of sixteen and the girl of fourteen and the younger boy who had never seen his father.

"She is just like mamma—the Queen, I mean," cried this little one at last; "only mamma never looked so cross."

"Not cross," said the girl. "The Queen is not cross, but angry, and sorry and proud."

The elder boy said nothing for a while. At last he muttered, "She's pretty, though, that girl. Who ever looked like her? I know some one. Who was it? The king is like what I'll be when I get a beard."

Then Margaret knew what she had done. She sent her children out to walk, and locked the door. Then she stood before her easle, struggling with herself.

The woman within her said, "Dash your brush at it; paint it out for you have written down your life history." The artist said, "Let it stand. What though it wrings my heart to look at it? it is the best thing I ever painted."

The woman looked upon the false face of Rosamond and the beautiful portrait of the King, and cast herself down and wept. The artist arose and saw the gloss upon the golden hair, and the reflex of light upon the white satin and the purple velvet, soft as though one could lift it in its folds; saw the flesh like flesh—the shadow, and the like real light and shadow—saw power and feeling in the picture and smiled through her tears.

For the first time she understood that love was not all of life, for the first time she stood proud and ambitious and hopeful of fame, and desirous of it; and this before the record of her life-grief, with the beautiful faces of her false husband and his love, created by her own pencil, looking down upon her.

Then she opened the door and went to seek her children in the garden; and told them how some day they should all go to Italy together; and was happy, with a strange prideful happiness new to her and new to them.

The picture was sent for public exhibition It hung in a great gallery set off by a dusky proscenium; people went to see it, and it was admired; critics praised it. A rich man offered a great price for it. Margaret was proud and glad; so were the children, to whom she spoke again of Italy, where she would paint such pictures as she had never painted before.

And meanwhile a man, threadbare and rusty, old before his time, with remorse so stamped upon his handsome features that a child could read it there, prowled often about the door of the gallery where the picture hung, and looked in along the still echoing entrance, at the end of which the man who took the tickets sat. At last he ventured in.

"Look here," he said in a sort of shame-faced way to the ticket-taker; "I want to see that picture. I haven't any money; but I knew Mrs. Mercer once. Let me look, won't you? It can't hurt you, or any one."

"If you know her, why, I suppose——" yawned the man —"only look here; don't stay long——"

But the man had passed him. He walked up to the picture, and looked at it. Then he pressed his hands upon his forehead and ground his teeth together.

"Margaret! Margaret!" he muttered, "oh heavens! Margaret!"

And then he sat down, staring at the picture with eyes that saw those likenesses as none others ever had.

He sat there still, when a rustle of silk, a sweep of velvet; the high tones of young voices filled the gallery A lady walked up the room, and stood before the picture—a child by her hand, a tall girl and boy behind her.

"It looks better here than in my studio," she said quietly; "only I shall touch Eleanor's face again when I have it home. It is not stern enough."

The man heard the voice, gave one look, dragged his hat over his eyes, and cowered down upon the bench, huddling himself together as a beggar does—seldom any other. The lady did not look at him; but the child did. In a moment more it had pulled its mother's sleeve.

"There's a man just like the king," he said; "just such a beard, mother."

And Margaret turned her head. Then her face grew white. She took a step towards the man. He started to his feet.

"Mathew!" she cried.

He only turned his face away.

"Mathew," she said again, "did you come here to find me?"

"No," he answered, "I am not coward enough for that. I came to look at that picture. I knew what I should see; that picture, born of your grief, with the story of my treachery and your wrong stamped upon it Did you say to yourself as you painted it, that thus the memory of that evil done you should outlive you, and those who injured you?"

"I painted the picture with no thought of that," she said. "O Mathew, Mathew! I ought not to speak to you; but you are poor—you are unhappy——"

"I am as poor as I deserve to be," he said. "Nothing has prospered with me since I left you. As for the woman there——"

"That is Rosamond," said Margaret, as he pointed to the canvas.

"It is Elsie Grey," he said. "As for that creature, she has been as false to me as to you; and worse than the bowl of poison or the dagger was offered to her by fate before she died."

"She is dead, then said Margaret.

"Yes, of a dog's death," he muttered; "in a hospital. That's the way she died, as I shall."

Margaret went one step nearer.

"You have not asked me to forgive you, Mathew," she said softly.

"Forgive me, when you have painted my crime down for all posterity to look upon!" he said. "Is it likely? Besides you are rich now"—and he looked at her costly dress; "and I next door to a beggar."

Great tears filled Margaret's eyes.

"Mathew," she said, "does that picture stand between us?"

"Your hate—your scorn—that which gave birth to that picture, must," he said.

"Have you a penknife?" she asked.

"A penknife?"

"Yes."

Perhaps he thought she meant to kill him. He took it from his pocket and opened it, as he handed it to her, and flung his coat back, and stood, as it were, ready for a blow. And she indeed lifted the knife, but the blow fell upon the picture, upon the painted face of the King, upon the golden hair of Rosamond, and the royal robes of Queen Eleanor—slit and tore them, dashed from the canvas all the toil of months, in a few short minutes. There was no picture left, as she turned from her work, for critics to stare at, or rich men to buy; but her eyes sparkled, and her cheeks were aglow.

"Nothing stands between us now, Mathew," she said. "There is no memory of the past on my heart, any more than on that canvas. Let it be blotted out for both of us, and let us begin our life anew together."

And in a moment she wept upon the bosom of the man who, whatever had been his faults, was still her husband, and the father of her children—and the only man she had ever loved in her life.

I think Margaret will never paint another great picture in her life. Pretty things—bits of still life and woodland nooks, and doves upon their nests still grow beneath her pencil; but no dreams of art or fame, no longings for Italy, slumber in her dark eyes now. Instead, you see there the sweet light reflected from the fireside, and all her dreams are of home. Perhaps she ought not to be happy, but she is. And he who has repented is dear to her, as the Bible says repentant sinners are to heaven. And Queen Eleanor, and Rosamond, and the false King, and the wrongs and woes that gave bulk to those "counterfeit presentments," have faded from her mind for ever.

As for the picture, no one guesses how it was destroyed, except the ticket-taker, who, laying the deed to the charge of the man, he admitted, keeps his own counsel, lest he should be blamed.

A COURT PREACHER AND FATHER HYACINTHE.

A combination of fortunate circumstances, with which I need not trouble the reader, enabled me to witness very recently two religious services in Paris, which, striking in themselves, were still more so as representing the chief phases of religious feeling in France at the present day.

The first was the celebration, by an archbishop, of high mass, at the private chapel of the Tuileries, where the "elder son of the Church," with his graceful empress and charming little boy, performed his devotions in the presence of a very select congregation, and listened to the exhortations of a bishop chosen on account of his great talent to pronounce the discourse which is always added in Lent. The second was a mass, very simply performed at the Madeleine as a preliminary to a sermon on behalf of the sufferers from the Mexican earthquakes, delivered by Father Hyacinthe, that great Carmelite preacher, whose wide-spread fame filled the great church hours previous to the time fixed, and sent hundreds of disappointed persons from the doors long before he appeared.

A brief account of these strangely-contrasted services may, I think, be interesting to those who wish to know something of the forms in which religion appears at the present day to our neighbors over the water.

Admission to the chapel at the palace is not now easily procured: it is to be obtained only by tickets issued by the Duke de B—, Grand Chambellan de la Cour, to those whose social status is supposed to entitle them to the entrée. Fortunately, the gentleman in whose house I was staying was in a position to demand this privilege for himself and his guest, and in due time the tickets arrived, inscribed with an order to appear in full dress, and in the mourning which the court was then wearing, somewhat late in the day, for the Duke of Brabant. I was told that any one neglecting to comply with these requirements of etiquette would be unceremoniously turned back at the door—a statement which I afterward saw verified in the discomfiture of an unfortunate individual whose equipment was not up to the mark.

A more agreeable intimation on the ticket stated that our seats were to be in the premier banc a droite, which proved to be the front row facing the altar, and immediately behind the chairs placed for the emperor and his wife and son.

Sunday, the 14th of March, dawned amidst falling snow and piercing blasts of the bitter wind from which gay Paris suffers so severely in the spring; but all recollection of the unpleasant weather outside vanished when we passed into the warm fragrant atmosphere of the gorgeous chapel at the Tuileries.

It has many sad historical associations, this royal palace of worship; but no trace of the storms of the past has been allowed to remain within it now, and everything that art and good taste can do has been done to render it beautiful and luxurious. A magnificent altar stood at the east end, draped with ruby velvet and splendid lace, and glittering with gold, which reflected back the rays of innumerable lights. In front of it was a sort of throne, with a large chair to the left and a smaller one to the right, and the prie-dieux before them supported jeweled books, in which a priest assiduously marked the places before the service began. These chairs, as well as the seats where the congregation sat, were gorgeous in crimson and gold, and so was the pulpit, which was placed on the left of the altar.

The lower half of the chapel was already crowded when we went in; but fortunately very few had tickets for the upper part where we sat, and where we were joined only by some of the ladies of the court. They soon came in, all in mourning, but dressed with the inimitable good taste and elegance of high-class Parisians. Most of them were the wives of men holding high offices under Government. A duchess with a well-known name sat in the seat with us, and marquises and comtesses were rife on the opposite side; but, for all that, the old aristocracy of France had no representatives among the members of the empress's household. As is well known, the Faubourg St. Germain does not patronize the court. I had paid a visit the day before to one of the baronnes of the ancient regime, in her old gloomy, low-roofed house in the said faubourg, and there I found a stately circle of grandes dames, not one of whom would condescend to set her foot within the Tuileries while Napoleon III has his habitation there.

This fact speaks somewhat ominously for the future of the gentle little boy on whom the hopes of the present dynasty are fixed, no less than the sinister meetings of Red Republicans, which, at this present time, are being held constantly in Paris, where the fatal bonnet rouge is worn, and the doctrines that heralded in the political convulsions of '93 are openly proclaimed. Meantime, however, the empress had certainly succeeded in collecting a band of very fair and gracious ladies round her, whose appearance was followed almost immediately by that of the Demoiselles d'Albe, the orphan daughters of the empress's sister, whose death was so deeply mourned by her She has taken the entire charge of these young girls, and, though a certain approach to royal honors is paid to them, she very sensibly allows them to attend the cours de lecture which are open to all the daughters of gentlemen in Paris.

At last, after a somewhat tedious delay, the procession of the clergy filed in through a side-door close to the altar; choristers, with their long cassocks of scarlet cloth falling below their muslin surplices, and their arms folded over their broad blue sashes; priests, walking two and two; then the bishop who was to preach; and lastly, the archbishop, whose vestments were certainly the most splendid that could well be imagined. He, too, had a long train of crimson velvet; over it a surplice composed entirely of the richest lace, and a chasuble, stiff with gold embroidery and precious stones, which formed a large cross on his back. Other portions of his attire, which were new to me in shape, were equally gorgeous, and on his head he wore a red velvet skull-cap.

For some time these dignitaries sat in their places studying their breviaries with much attention, until at length they were roused by a sign from an individual who seemed very much out of place, standing where he did, close to the altar, for his dress and appearance were exactly those of a respectable butler, with only the addition of a gold-laced cocked-hat, which he held in his hand. Some mystic movement on the part of this functionary intimated to the clergy that the emperor was at hand, and rising from their places they filed out of the chancel and walked down the central passage to meet him. At the door they waited for some time, and then the pompous-looking butler, if butler he was, advanced in front of the altar, and proclaimed in a loud voice, "L'Empereur!"

I must say, this part of the ceremonial appeared to me to be in extremely bad taste in a church—as it was exactly like the announcement of a visitor in a drawing-room. Then the clergy returned toward the altar, and following closely after them came first the prince imperial—an exceedingly graceful, gentle-looking boy—appearing taller than he really is from the slenderness of his figure—with smooth dark hair, and a pale, thoughtful countenance, which has a very pleasing but rather melancholy expression. He is not at all like the Bonapartes, but resembles his mother, though he does not possess the striking beauty which must in early youth have characterized her fine face. He was dressed simply in jacket and trousers, but in mourning for that other prince, like himself the only son and heir of royal parents whose young head has been laid low in the dust of death. The son of Napoleon III came forward, bowed from side to side, and took his place on the smallest of the chairs in front of the altar.

Immediately after him followed the empress: she has now only the appearance of a woman who has been very beautiful, as her fair face is somewhat faded and worn; but there is a great charm in her refined and delicate features, and in the extreme grace of her movements.

I believe the Empress of the French is considered a high authority in matters of dress; and if so, her appearance entirely condemned the fantastic costumes in which our English ladies have been appearing of late. She wore no huge chignon or streaming hair, no looped-up tunic or short petticoats; but a plain black-silk dress falling in long folds to the ground, with a quiet little black lace bonnet over her very simply-arranged hair. Perhaps the best description of her personal appearance would be to say, that she was simply an extremely lady-like woman, with an amiable expression and pleasing manners

By her side walked the emperor, steadily and sturdily, as if to him the whole thing were simply a business which had to be gone through, and the sooner the better. Napoleon III, short as he is, and now, in advancing years, decidedly stout, is still a striking-looking man. That large head—too large in proportion for the size of his body—those strongly-marked, resolute features, seemed well fitted to the man, whose ever-working brain teems with the destinies of nations and hides in its hidden cells the projects which may one day fling the whole of Europe into convulsions. His hair is now of an iron-gray, and so are his mustaches and small, pointed beard; but there is no sign of any decay of force in the Emperor of the French; he has the look, more than any one I have ever seen, of un homme capable, which untranslatable term seems specially to characterize him.

They went forward at once and knelt down on the prie-dieux prepared for them. I believe it is only during Lent that they perform their devotions there in view of the congregation. At other times they occupy a gallery where they are not seen at all.

The service commenced with a litany, very well sung by an unseen choir, and then the bishop ascended the pulpit, and the chairs of the imperial party were turned round so as to face him, by which means they were also brought in front of us, and separated from our seat only by some four or five gray-headed, weather-beaten officers of high rank, who formed the emperor's suite. The sermon proved to be one which powerfully affected both the emperor and empress, for it so happened that the young prince's birthday of thirteen was to occur in two days, and the whole of the latter part of the discourse referred to this young child, in whom such high hopes centered.

The first portion of the sermon consisted of a very able comparison between the man who lives for the honors and pleasures of this life, and he who tramples under foot all earthly desires, and seeks the glory of God and the joys of heaven alone. It was a striking discourse to be pronounced in that gorgeous chapel, and in face of those who had risen to so unusual a share of this world's pomp and greatness; but the empress seemed greatly to approve of it. Whenever there was a burst of special eloquence from the bishop, she turned to one of the gray-haired officers close to her, and nodded and smiled to him in evident admiration. She did this more particularly when the preacher, having expatiated on the deep bliss of a life hid with God, wound up by exclaiming that sorrow and evil over such a one had no power. "Like other men he seems to suffer, but he suffers not; and when his last hour comes, he seems to die, but he dies not; death has no dominion over him—he lives—and even lives to God." Probably the empress thought, as the lady seated next me told me she did, that this fine closing sentence was original; but in truth it was simply borrowed from that lovely passage in the Apocrypha which says that—

> "The souls of the righteous are in the hand of God,
> And there shall no torment touch them;
> In the sight of the unwise they seemed to die,
> And their departure is taken for misery,
> And their going from us to be utter destruction:
> But they are in peace."

While his wife, however, showed her approbation by such evident signs, none could have told from the impassible face of the emperor what he thought of the sermon, or whether he thought of it at all; up to this moment, he had remained looking fixedly before him, with a keen, thoughtful gaze, which seemed to penetrate far beyond the walls of the Tuileries.

But now the bishop began on a theme which riveted his attention at once:

"I have spoken," said the preacher, "of the triumph of him who enters as a conqueror into the kingdom of God, and I am reminded of an anniversary which will take place the day after to-morrow; for it was the saying of our most saintly king of old—that the crown of France is second only to the crown of Heaven; and these words impel me irresistibly to a consideration of the destinies of that young child who is inheritor of both, and who stands even now on the threshold of another year, which carries him another step on that path which cannot fail to be a marked and eventful one on earth."

He then went on to speak of the great interests which hung on this young life, of the pomp and glory which had surrounded his birth, and would, he trusted, surround him to the end; and, with the sanguine hopes of a devoted adherent of the second empire, he predicted a glorious destiny, alike on earth and in heaven, for that child of many hopes. He trusted, he said, that, long after the men of the present day had all passed away, this young prince would wear the crown of France in peace and prosperity, and surrender it only for the brighter crown of heaven, whose glory would never fade throughout the eternal ages.

And, as the bishop spoke thus, the fair face of the empress flushed and paled with emotion, and the keen eyes of the emperor looked out from under the shaggy eyebrows, and fastened on the face of the preacher with a softness of expression of which they had scarcely seemed capable; while the young boy, toward whom the eyes of all were turned, bent down his graceful head till his face was completely hidden.

To me, while the bishop spoke, there came back the memory of a scene I would fain have forgotten at that moment. The chapel of the Tuileries, and the gray sky and snow-clad earth, all seemed to vanish away, as a vision rose up before me, glowing in summer sunshine, of the beautiful gardens and palace of Schönbrunn at Vienna, where the only son of another Napoleon, born to the same inheritance, object of the same high hopes, passed through those years of early youth on which his young successor now was entering. But, passing from the sunny gardens where that short and most sad life was spent, my thoughts were constrained to turn to a dark vault, where a coffin was once pointed out to me as the last receptacle of the ashes of that "King of Rome," heir of the first great emperor, who had gone down mysteriously to his grave in the brightest years of opening youth, before the crown of his birthright had ever touched his brows. How many ominous points of resemblance there were between the early destinies of the dead and the living "son of Napoleon!" The record of that first young life is sealed up and laid aside forever; but over the opening page, where the history of the second shall be written, dark shadows are already stealing, which seem to indicate that for him, no less than for the early dead, it will be a blessed thing if the crown of heaven proves a surer inheritance than that of France.

The sermon was over. The general tone of the whole had been marked by the strongest ultramontanism, and it was in this respect that it formed so complete a contrast to that which I heard elsewhere from Père Hyacinthe, the first French preacher of the day.

The emperor and empress returned to their places before the altar and knelt down—a few words having passed between them, evidently on the subject of the allusions to their child in the sermon, and then high mass began. It was conducted with great solemnity—all but one episode, which struck me as appearing both irreverent and ludicrous. It was the sudden apparition of the butler before mentioned, who, with a quick movement, came up behind the archbishop, and literally snatched the velvet skull cap from his head—of course with the object of enabling him to perform the most solemn part of the service uncovered; but it was done in a manner so exactly resembling the way in which a saucy boy in the streets performs the same ceremony on his companion, that it conveyed a painfully absurd impression; as did also the proceedings of the choir-boys, who, every time they genuflected before the altar, turned round and repeated precisely the same act of homage to the emperor, as if there was to be no distinction between the honor they wished to show the King of kings and that offered to the earthly monarch.

PRESIDENT BRIGHAM YOUNG—

My Dear Sir,

Holding my connection with the UTAH MAGAZINE, you can no longer give to me your fellowship, nor can I conscientiously ask it. I believe that you would manifest towards me, personally, much tenderness, for which I am grateful. Were I in the States or California, I do not think you would take any exceptions to my writings for I am simply an author, while you are the leader of a people. As it is I see no virtue in multiplying words in justification, knowing myself to be heterodox. For years I have tried to shun the issue of this day, for theoretically I have been a believer in republican institutions and not in a temporal theocracy.

I am, Sir,

Very respectfully, Yours,

EDWARD W. TULLIDGE.

AN APPEAL TO THE PEOPLE.

Since the date of writing my last editorial, a startling change has taken place in my situation, although not in my feelings or sentiments towards the members of our Church. For writing such articles as "Our Workmen's wages," "The True Development of the Territory," "Steadying the Ark," etc, a charge has been preferred against me of apostacy, on the ground that I have no right to publicly discuss the wisdom of any measure or policy of the Priesthood and expect to retain a membership in the Church at the same time. For asserting my belief that the Gospel gives me the freedom to differ with the leaders of the church, and the privilege of stating my difference of opinion, provided I do it honestly and respectfully, I have been deprived of my membership in the Church — the doctrine being positively laid down on the occasion of my trial by President Brigham Young and Elder George Q. Cannon, that "it is apostacy to honestly differ with the Priesthood in any of their measures."

If this definition of apostacy be correct, of course, I am an apostate, because it is true that I do not see eye to eye with our ecclesiastical leaders on the subject of the reduction of our workmen's wages, the mineral development of the Territory, and similar matters.

I wish to give, in a brief way, a statement of the circumstances attending my expulsion, and the reasons by which I have been guided in the course I have taken, so that all my friends may judge for themselves. In doing this, I shall have to omit most of the preliminaries connected with the case, inasmuch as they occurred at the "School of the Prophets." Suffice it to say that, on Saturday, 16th October, an announcement that we had been violently denounced by President Young reached our ears, and on the following Saturday we were publicly cited to appear before the High Council and "be tried for our standing."

On Monday we appeared before the High Council at the City Hall, which was densely packed with the authorities of the Church—no ordinary members, except those who appeared as witnesses, or were specially invited, being allowed to be present. The following is a brief synopsis of the trial, from minutes made on the spot.

After the charge of Apostacy had been preferred by Elder George Q. Cannon, on the ground of articles in the MAGAZINE containing views on financial questions differing with those of the President, as well as on account of an expressed belief that members of the Church held not only a right to think but to express their ideas on such subjects, the question was put to Elder Cannon whether "it was apostacy to differ honestly with the measures of the President," to which he replied.—"It is apostacy to differ honestly with the measures of the President. A man may be honest even in hell." This idea President Wells confirmed by remarking, that we "might as well ask the question whether a man had the right to differ honestly with the Almighty." Thus the doctrine was unqualifiedly asserted that the Almighty and the Priesthood, so far as its official dictates were concerned, were to be accepted as one and the same thing, on pain of excommunication from the Church.

William S. Godbe stated that his claim to conscientiously differ with the views of the leaders of the Church on certain questions, could not be apostacy, inasmuch as he had always believed that such were his rights. While he bore testimony to the divine mission of Joseph Smith, and to the appointment of Brigham Young as his successor in the Presidency of the Church, he denied his right to enforce unquestioning obedience upon all subjects secular and spiritual from its members. He believed the preservation of our unity was worth any price short of the concession of the right of thought and speech or any other true principle. That price he was not willing to pay even for unity. He claimed that he entertained none but the kindest feelings towards the Presidency and Priesthood severally, and trusted, however much they might object to his views, that they would at least concede to him honesty and purity of purpose.

E. L. T. Harrison then stated that if it was apostacy to differ conscientiously with the Priesthood of the Church, he must be considered an apostate, for he certainly did differ with them on some matters. The point upon which he most particularly differed, was their right to expel people from the Church because of a difference of opinion on matters of Church policy. He admitted that they had a right to demand of him implicit obedience to every gospel ordinance, as well as to every condition of a pure life. All that he claimed as his right was respectfully and temperately to discuss any difference of opinion he might entertain, without being cut off from the Church for so doing.

His reasons for considering that this was his privilege as a member of the Church were, that it was part of the gospel offered to him in foreign lands. He was told that in this Church the utmost freedom of speech would be permitted. Popery and other systems had muzzled freedom of speech, but in this Church such oppression was to be crushed for ever, and never raise again its accursed head. He accepted the gospel on these terms, not simply because the Elders told him these were his rights, but because the Holy Spirit bore testimony that they but uttered the truth when they so taught, and he was there that day to claim these privileges of the Gospel.

When he was examining the doctrines of this Church, he was advised by the Elders to use his judgment and his intellect to the fullest extent, and dispute every principle that he could not understand. This had resulted in his entrance into the Church. If he had mounted up the ladder of his own reason and judgment to get into the Church, why should he now be called upon to kick that down by which he had ascended, and go along without it? If it was a good thing, and had brought him blessing to use his own opinion at the first, why should he not continue the use of that which had done him so much good?

He objected to the requisition for any man to accept any doctrine or principle that he did not fully understand: such a dogma could not be supported by sound reason. We could only be expected to accept any principle, because it was beautiful and true. We were not required to accept God or Jesus because they were God or Jesus, but because they presented teachings higher, holier and more heavenly than any other beings. How could we tell that any principle came from God, except it was that it was better to our intellect and judgment than other doctrines. Beyond this witness of the light of truth within us, we had nothing to fall back upon to guide us.

It had been argued that we must passively and uninquiringly obey the Priesthood, because otherwise we could not build up Zion. He could not see this. A nation built up on such a principle could be no Zion. The only glory or beauty that there could be in a Zion must result from its being composed of people all of whom acted intelligently in all their operations. Fifty thousand people acting in concert, building up excellent cities or doing any thing else well, but doing it mechanically, because they were told, was no sight to be admired. A dozen persons, not operating half as perfectly as to the nature of their work, but doing what little they did intelligently, must be a far more delightful exhibition to God and intelligences.

These were his views. If they constituted apostacy, the Council must deal with him according to their laws. One thing, however, they could not do. They might cut him off from his brethren, but they should never cut his brethren off from his affections. He had been twenty years a member of this Church, and he intended to live and die with them, and no one should ever drive him from their midst.

He knew and could bear testimony that Joseph Smith was a prophet of God. He could bear testimony that Brigham Young was divinely called to succeed Joseph Smith in the Presidency of the Church, and he knew that the President was inspired to bring this people to these mountains.

He then read the following:—

PROTEST.

To whom it may concern:

We, the undersigned, members of the Church of Jesus Christ, of Latter-day Saints, temporarily suspended from fellowship, on a charge of irregular attendance at the "School of the Prophets," before any further action is taken on our case, do present the following declaration of our faith, on the subject of Church control:—

We hold that it is the right of all members of this Church to refuse to accept any principle or measure, presented to them by the Priesthood, further than the light of God within them bears witness to the same.

We believe that it is the right of all persons, so long as they obey the ordinances of the Gospel, and live pure and moral lives, to retain a standing in this Church, whether they can see the propriety of all the measures of the leaders of the Church or not.

We also believe that it is the right of all members of the Church to discuss, in the pulpit or through the press, in public or in private, all measures presented to them by the Priesthood, provided that they do it in the spirit of moderation, and with due regard to the sentiments of others.

We, therefore, hold that it is an illegal and an unrighteous use of the Holy Priesthood to expel any person from the Church, because they cannot conscientiously admit the divinity of any measure presented by the Priesthood.

We protest against counsel for the members of this Church to watch one another and observe how each votes or acts, as calculated to breed suspicion, coldness, and distrust between our brethren; and as opposed to that voluntary spirit which is the greatest beauty and glory of the gospel of Christ.

We also protest against the inquisitorial practise of catechising the members of this Church, through the teachers, as to their private views respecting Church measures.

And, finally, we protest against the spirit of compulsion in every form, as well as against the irresponsible investment of power in any person holding the Priesthood.

We claim the right of, respectfully but freely, discussing all measures upon which we are called to act. And, if we are cut off from this Church for asserting this right, while our standing is dear to us, we will suffer it to be taken from us sooner than resign the liberties of thought and speech to which the Gospel entitles us; and against any such expulsion we present our solemn protest before God and Angels.

As witness our hands this 23, Oct. 1869. { E. L. T. Harrison. W. S. Godbe.

Speeches on the question were then made by Presidents Brigham Young and George A. Smith, also by Elder Cannon and members of the Council, and a verdict of excommunication against W. S. Godbe and E. L. T. Harrison finally rendered.

For replying in the affirmative to the question whether he sustained the above brethren in their course, Elder Eli B. Kelsey was summarily cut off from the Church.

During the above trial, remarks were made by various speakers, comparing us to every foul apostate—the Laws, the Higbees and Fosters, and every debauchee, drunkard, whoremonger and gambler—that ever left the Church for his own iniquitous purpose. In reference to this, I have only to say that our past lives are before the people, and the future will show whether there is any difference between men who come out in the assertion of a principle, and men of the class referred to.

It was also asserted, without the first fraction of proof, that we were seeking Gentile influence and aid to the injury of the religious interests of our community. Inasmuch as this statement will, doubtless, be reiterated in order to arouse the feelings of the people of the Territory against us, while we boldly avow that we respect all men, Gentiles or otherwise, in exact proportion to their private virtues, we dare any Gentile in this Territory or out of it, to come forward, from whom, up to this very moment, we have ever sought the first particle of assistance or coöperation, and challenge any man in existence to produce such a person. The ties of faith and principle necessarily unite the hearts of men closer together than they can be without these bonds; and to this extent, we love our brethren more than all other men; but independent of this consideration, and viewing men as men alone, we respect Gentile as much as Mormon, provided they act as well, and better than Mormon if they act better.

We have sought no Gentile coöperation, and shall seek none further than we shall desire and seek the friendship of all good men, because we believe that, as a people, we need no aid beyond our own. And at once, and forever, to crush out this slander, we publish now to the whole Gentile world our sentiments upon this subject. We wish them to understand that we have intelligence, manliness and divinity enough among our people and in our system to correct our own evils where we have any. We gratefully accept, as all men should, the sympathies of our fellow men in every good word and work, but our faith is that God is in our system, and that Zion is perfectly capable of purifying her own fountains, and presenting herself before the world a model of freedom and a center of light and truth.

There is another subject upon which we wish to say a word. During the investigation of our case, President Young many times asserted his willingness that we should enjoy freedom of speech and of the press. This we believe to be true, so far as our civil rights are concerned. We have no quarrel with him or any other man in the Priesthood on the question of our civil right to speak and publish in Utah. No one has interfered with us in this respect. This is not our difficulty. Ours is a Church question—a question of our right to speak and publish and retain our positions, as members of the Church. In every other respect we have all the freedom we want. We make this statement now to all, because an effort was and will be made to prove that we want the outside world to believe that there is no freedom of speech in Utah, and thus bring on a collision with our people. This is a charge as false as it is unscrupulous. What we complain of is that there is no freedom to think and speak within the limits of the Church. What a farce to say, "Brethren, you have all the freedom to speak and publish what you please," and in the next breath remark, "But I shall cut you off from the Church and send you down to hell if you do. Brethren, use your privileges." What freedom is this? Who, among even despots, does not give as much? All monarchs say, "Think and speak as you please; but we will imprison and punish you, notwithstanding." President Young says, we are free to differ with him, but he will cut us off from the society of God and holy beings; separate us from all we hold dear in the Church, and wither up all our hopes of eternal life if we attempt it. Who uses the greatest amount of compulsion or intimidation? There is no force or coercion like that applied to men's hopes and fears of a future life, and this is the lack of freedom we complain of. President Young admits our right to speak outside the Church. On that point he neither tries nor wants to coerce us; what we want is our right to speak within it.

In the course of President Young's speech, he drew attention to a remark in the article called "Steadying the Ark," to the effect that "the Priesthood is not intended by God to do our thinking." He stated that this was true, and said, "The Priesthood is only intended to help us to think." Was this principle practically acknowledged by President Young, as much as theoretically, he would concede all we claim; but it is not so, for, immediately upon the top of this statement that the Priesthood only assumes to "help us to think," comes the doctrine that unless, when they do "help" us, we think exactly as they direct us on every subject, we shall be expelled from the Church. This, every sensible person will see, is not "helping," but forcing us to think, whether we will or not.

Among other matters urged against us, at our trial, was the idea that we wished to flood the country with the refuse of society in search of gold. This was indignantly denied. We refer our readers to our article on "The True Development of the Territory." It will be seen there that we do believe that the chief hope of this country lies in its minerals, but there is no invitation therein for the outside world to develop our mines. In that article, we specially urge our own people to develop them. It was to urge our people to work their minerals themselves, instead of letting capitalists from every part of creation come in and take their rights out of their hands, as they will do, unless they bestir themselves, that we wrote that article. Every impartial reader will see this; and the false charge attempted to be fastened upon us will fall harmless to the ground.

It will be seen that we have borne testimony to the legality of the appointment of Brigham Young as President of the Church, even while we object to some of his views. We do this consistently, for we hold it is a false doctrine, because God in his providence calls any man to preside, that that man necessarily is the will and voice of the Lord, in all he chooses to do and say. It is a manifest truth, and agreeable to all experience, that God can only inspire a man to the extent that his organization and spiritual character will admit. A man may have a strong and determined bias, and conscientiously believe that his projects are the will of heaven when he is only following the bent of his own organization. God never did or can work through any man further than that man's character and will may permit. On this account, all prophets or presidents must be fallible in their dictation, and to build upon them—even the greatest and the best, independent of the light of God within us—is to build upon the sand. Priesthoods and presidents are not given for man's infallible guides, they are merely aids or "helps" for the cultivation of the greater and more absolute light within the soul. That light is infallible, because it travels beyond all earthly weaknesses, and drinks directly and immediately from the throne of God itself.

With these explanations, I present my case and that of my friend, William S. Godbe, before the Church, and the world at large. We have no intention of suspending the issue of this Magazine, but from time to time, shall in its columns take up this question and analyze it in every light until our brethren understand the question thoroughly. We should, and will, yield our judgment to that of a child, if it can point out to us an error of thought or spirit, but we will not bow to force. The day has gone by for that, and there dawns upon the hill tops of Utah a bright and radiant star of ecclesiastical, as well as civil, freedom. Let every heart rejoice, God Reigns! The day of darkness flies before the era of advancing thought. From out our mountain valleys shall yet be borne a banner emblazoned with a wider creed, a nobler Christianity, a purer faith than earth has ever seen. Men shall yet learn that the true mission of priesthood is to teach and not to control, and in our midst shall stand the same priesthood that we believe in to-day, but whose greatest glory shall be that they represent a spirit from which every principle of coercion has been wiped away.

In the full assurance that that time is at hand, I subscribe myself a brother to all who do right, and no less a friend to all who ignorantly err.

E. L. T. Harrison.

A CARD BY W. S. GODBE.

To the Public:—

Having been, for twenty years, a member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, and eighteen years a resident of Utah Territory, and the High Council having excommunicated me from said Church on a charge of apostacy, and turned me over to "the buffetings of Satan" until I repent, I feel it due to myself and my numerous friends throughout the Territory and elsewhere, to give the following particulars in regard to it:

On the 16th inst. I received a note, of which the following is a copy:—

Salt Lake City, Oct. 16, 1869,

Elder W. S. Godbe,

Dear Bro.:—I hereby inform you that a motion was made, seconded, and carried by a unanimous vote of the School of the Prophets to-day, that you be disfellowshipped from the Church until you appear in the School and give satisfactory reasons for your irregular attendance there.

Your Brother in the Gospel,

George Goddard,

Secretary.

In response to this communication, I presented myself at the School on last Saturday and stated, in answer to the charge contained therein, that, with very few exceptions, I had been punctual in my attendance at the School ever since

I became a member, excepting when absent from the City or Territory, or when illness in my family prevented me; consequently was innocent of any wrong in not having been always present at their meetings

What further transpired on that occasion the rules of the School will not permit me to state, but on the same night I received a notice to appear for trial on Monday, 25th October on a charge of apostacy, which charge was sustained on the ground of my having endorsed the sentiments contained in the UTAH MAGAZINE, of which I am one of the publishers, advocating freedom of speech and the press, and differing from the authorities of the Church on the question of unconditional obedience to their requirements, although nothing bordering on immorality or unchristianlike conduct was brought against me, but, on the contrary, a great amount of testimony was volunteered by the speakers to the purity of my life and correctness of my course up to the present time.

I will now give some of my views in regard to the action taken, and the principles involved in it.

According to my knowledge of the rules of the Church, no man or number of men—irrespective of their position in the Priesthood—have a right to disfellowship a man for such dereliction. Had I been guilty of irregular attendance at the School of the Prophets without justifiable cause, I should only have broken one of its rules, the penalty of which, at most, could not have exceeded dismembership from the School.

In attempting to discharge this duty, I desire to be guided by the inspiration of Heaven, that my readers may have a correct understanding of my views, and appreciate the high motive that now prompts me to give them expression.

In the first place I wish it distinctly understood that I will speak about principles and not persons: let there be in your minds a clear line of demarcation between them; for while I feel solemnly impressed to speak with the utmost freedom concerning some principles that may reflect unfavorably on the judgment of the Authorities, let it be remembered that I do not impugn their motives, question their integrity or attack them as men; but it certainly is my right to judge as to the correctness of the principles taught by all men, whether they be inside the pale of the Church or not.

It is proper for me to state in this connection that I possess only the kindest feelings towards my brethren in the Priesthood, and to all mankind, and especially so towards President Young, with whom none but the most friendly and intimate relations have existed since, in the days of my boyhood, I first came to this Territory; and whatever erroneous opinions I may think he possesses. I regard them as imperfections of the judgment of a great man.

Instead of enumerating the measures lately adopted that my judgment cannot endorse, I will at once call attention to the fundamental principle they involve—the soundness of which justifies or condemns them—I refer to the doctrine of unconditional obedience; implicit obedience of one portion of the Priesthood to the edicts of another portion of it who may be called to fill the leading positions in the Church. For it is well known that they claim the prerogative of absolutely dictating the people as to where they shall live, and what they shall do, what they shall eat and what they shall drink, what they shall accept as true and what they shall reject as false, and this assumption of priestly power goes as far as to determine what we shall think in regard to things temporal as well as things spiritual, as much as with reference to where we shall purchase our goods, as to the most cardinal points in our Most Holy Faith; in a word, in regard to everything that interests us here or hereafter—that pertains to time now or time to come.

To minds unshackled by superstition, and free to think, the bare statement of such a principle would be sufficient to show its fallacy—its dwarfing influence on the intellect, its fearful and dangerous tendency.

Yet this doctrine is asserted and enforced, and those who dare question its divinity, do so at the imminent risk of their standing in the Church, in losing which they become banished from social circles, positions of public trust and honor, and to some extent, from business patronage. Neither does the mischief end here, for in nearly all such cases the verdict against the parties cut off is, that they are grossly immoral, and, therefore, have got into spiritual darkness and allowed the devil to lead them captive at his will, no matter how long their standing in the Church, how much they may have done for the advancement of its cause, or how irreproachable their lives.

Inasmuch, then, as such vital interests are involved in this principle, it will not be wondered at that I should have realized how important it was to arrive at a correct conclusion in regard to it. For so strong is the force of first impressions; with such tenacity do early trainings—especially religious ones—cling to the mind that, although my reason always taught me that the doctrine of unconditional obedience was false, yet, until within the last few years, I did not dare to trust wholly to that reason—for I was taught that "the wisdom of man is foolishness with God," and that there was safety only in following the dictates of the servants of the Almighty, whether I could see their utility or not. Moreover, of late years I have been, more or less, interested financially in some of the enterprises of the Church, and thought it probable I might be required to be more so. I deemed it, therefore, to be absolutely necessary that I should have my faith intelligently based, my principles clearly defined, and settle this question of obedience to an infallible Priesthood forever.

I looked above and sought for light from its great fountain, and the light came, and with it, a direct testimony that Joseph Smith was a Prophet, Seer and Revelator, and fulfilled a divine mission, and that Brigham Young became President of the Church by the will of the people and the approval of Heaven. But did it follow of necessity that all his schemes were fraught with Heavenly wisdom, or that obedience to them must be rendered under pain of excommunication; that his voice was the voice of God to the people in all things, and that there was no access to the illimitable fountain of truth but through him? By no means; but, on the contrary, it bore testimony that the light within the soul, however faint it might be, was a divine spark that could only have been kindled by its Creator and its God, and that it was the privilege of all to so live as to possess sufficient of its brightness to guide them in the true path; and that while, on the one hand, obedience to the counsels of the servants of God, free acceptance of their doctrines, and a whole-souled response to their requisitions, are sound propositions, and essentially conducive to the good of the community, yet on the other hand, should such counsels, doctrines, or requisitions come in conflict, with what, by History, Experience, Revelation or Reason, we knew to be right—when conscience tells us they are wrong, then response to them is idolatry, and those who render it violate the noblest instincts of their natures—and obedience to men under such circumstances—irrespective of their priesthood—becomes disobedience to God.

But it is urged by some that such liberty of conscience should only be exercised by advanced minds, that it is only natures enriched by the influences of continued virtue, that can enjoy this freedom without abusing it; that people, in a low state of progress religiously as well as politically, have to be governed by authority, and like children be required to conform to a rigid discipline. The force of this objection I am free to admit,and, so far as the principle it involves finds application to us as a people, let it be carried out; but it will not by any means apply to the whole community. For I know by personal experience that there are thousands among us whom the truth has made free, and who sense in the gospel of Jesus, "a perfect law of liberty,"—not liberty to do wrong,—but who, in the consciousness of their integrity, purity of purpose and love of humanity, dare to think for themselves in regard to all principles whether they emanate from the lips of the Priesthood or not. To all such the severe regime to which we are subjected, is terribly oppressive; their condition demands a more liberal one, their souls are faint for spiritual food, and they thirst for the waters of that unfailing fountain that was opened up by the meek and lowly Jesus.

To such as believe that all the measures instituted by the President are fraught with divine wisdom, I will say that many of them have resulted in failures too well known to need enumerating. I will, however, mention the building of a warehouse on the Colorado, in 1864, at a cost of about eighteen thousand dollars, which has never realized any income, and is now next to worthless. I give this as my opinion, but am aware that the President disagrees with me, for he said at the High Council that the Colorado Warehouse would yet be a success, and that he would yet buy out the stockholders. Now to prove my sincerity in this statement I will thank the President, or any one else, to give me twenty-five cents on the dollar on the amount I have invested therein, namely, three thousand dollars.

The Utah Produce Company, for the purpose of shipping flour and other Home products to Montana, was originated and controlled by the President, and cost the stockholders of whom I was one, to the amount of one thousand dollars, not only all the money they invested in stock, but half as much more besides. I wish it distinctly understood that these failures do not necessarily prove President Young to be a bad financier, but simply that his judgment, being human, is liable to err like that of other men; and that, in such matters, at least, he is not infallible. But the defenders of the belief that "the Pope can do no wrong," tell us we are incompetent to judge in such matters, even if they do result in apparent failure, for, say they, the Lord may design to try the people by such means, and it is impossible to tell what hidden motive or purpose existed in His mind in regard to them. This is very true, and the logic is irresistible, when based on the assumption, in the first place, that all such measures, whether according to human judgment, they are successful or not, are nevertheless inspired by God. But how can we accept any such assumption when by so doing, we ignore the light of reason, and have no further use for the faculties with which we are endowed by the Great Creator? Is it not wiser and safer to judge a tree by its fruits, and the wisdom of enterprises and policies by their manifest results?

I will now call attention to what I regard as the most baneful effect of forced compliance to such doctrines and rules of Church discipline, which first engender and then foster hypocrisy. Hundreds of good men in this Territory are guilty of evasion and dissimulation; they cannot see the wisdom of some things they are required to accept under pain of being disfellowshipped; and this is not the worst of it; they are not even permitted to think differently from the appointed way, for, as is well known, they are visited by teachers, who, as a class, are made up of our most faithful men, who are themselves compelled to put such inquisitorial questions as will force the questioned either to a truthful avowal of their views, in which case, should they be heterodox, excommunication would be certain.) or evade the objectionable points, failing in which they resort to dissimulation. In nothing is this hypocrisy so much manifested as in our so-called voting. It is a principle well understood, that in order that people should enjoy the right of voting in its true sense, they be influenced neither by fear nor favor; and yet with us, if a man raises his hand against any measure emanating from the Priesthood, he does so at the almost certain loss of his fellowship. Neither is he permitted to withhold his vote; he must sustain the measure or oppose it, the effect of which is to make good men conscientiously hypocritical: for, much as they may hate dissimulation—far as their natures may be removed from hypocrisy, they believe it to be better to submit to this sort of compulsion, quieting their consciences for the time being with mental reservations, than come out in opposition to their brethren, whom, notwithstanding their differences of opinion, they both love and respect. This accounts, in a measure at least, for the unanimity so universal in our voting. One case illustrating this fact occurred the other day. A friend deeply interested in my welfare, expressed regret that he would have to be present at my trial; for, although his views in regard to certain measures of Church policy and government corresponded with mine, he knew that, in case I did not renounce those views, he would be required to vote for my severance from the Church; refusing to do which would be noticed, and an explanation called for which would probably result in the loss of his standing in the Church. Another instance bearing on this subject, illustrates the fear some have of President Young. A man occupying a high position in the Church, said he would not dare to tell the President anything he did not want to know, meaning, any thing that did not accord with the President's views.

Some twenty years ago I became identified with this people, because the principles presented to me appealed to my reason as being true, and the sweet influence that accompanied them, told my heart that the work must be divine Since then, the weaknesses of human nature permitting, I have been faithful to the truth I then embraced, and have learned to love it more and more as my nature unfolded and my appreciation of its beauties increased. And it never was so priceless, so dear to my soul as it is to-day. I have responded to the requisitions of the authorities frequently, because I have seen their utility and felt myself interested in their accomplishment; but sometimes I have done so at the cost of thousands of dollars, when I was of opinion that the measures were not wisely planned, and the results have proved that my judgment was not at fault. I obeyed, in those cases, to preserve unity of action, believing then as now, that our union is worth more than money, that it should be maintained at the cost of individual interests. Indeed, I regard union as a gem of such worth that we should do everything but wrong to maintain it; that we must not do even to preserve us from disunion; and a man does wrong when he acts contrary to the dictates of conscience, God's monitor in the soul, for then he violates the divine part of his nature and sins against light and truth. I have not done these things simply because I was told to do so; but because the light of Deity within me testified it was right.

This issue has been by me unsought; it has been forced upon me. I have endeavored to meet it like a true man, who, although valuing most dearly the friendship of this people, which has been so long and uninterruptedly enjoyed by me, and fully appreciating all the advantages resulting therefrom, would rather incur the temporary displeasure of some and its consequences, than do violence to his sense of right, disregard the holiest promptings of the soul, and thus, in sinning against nature, sin against nature's God.

With regard to apostacy, I know myself to be wholly innocent, the truth of which. God will in the early future make fully apparent. I might as consistently be charged with the violation of a trust that I never accepted. To apostatize from religion, is to abandon it. This I have not done. It is because of my firm adherence to my religion that I have been thus dealt with. My faith at the outset was accepted on the basis of my understanding of the truth; it rests there now; and there it will continue to rest, while reason holds her sway or immortality endures.

I am charged with no crime or immorality of any kind. My only fault is in being one of the publishers of the UTAH MAGAZINE, and for endorsing the sentiments and principles set forth in its columns. Whether these be true or false, treated upon in a temperate and respectful manner or not, you will be the judges; you can read the articles; they speak for themselves. The Magazine was started with the consent and approval of President Young, although he then expressed serious doubts as to its financial success, in which I did not very much differ; but money-making was not the object for which it was started. Its aim was to disseminate liberal ideas and advocate broad, generous principles; but such only as were compatible with our faith, at least, in its most universalian aspect; in a word, to do good to the people with whom our lot was cast; and it has been devoted faithfully to that object ever since.

We have taken the privilege of freely advocating our views in its pages, as an inalienable right, that no man can righteously dispossess us of; and unless they conflict with truth or militate against progress, no action of an ecclesiastical character can justly be taken against us for so doing. Am I wrong in this?

Let the future, with its irresistible logic of facts, answer!

Meantime, would you have me false to my convictions, to the holiest impulses of my being, and quench the divinest aspirations of my soul for religious liberty? If I would, I dare not, for am I not accountable to the great God for so much of light, and so much of truth as he has blessed me with, and how can I sin against Him who is the perfection of goodness, the embodiment of love?

W. S. GODBE.

A CARD TO THE PUBLIC.

TO MY FRIENDS IN UTAH AND ELSEWHERE:

I was, at the meeting of the High Council held in the City Hall, Salt Lake City, Monday, the 25th inst., summarily cut off from the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, and "handed over to the buffetings of the devil," because I voted in the negative, when the vote was taken to cut off Elders Harrison and Godbe, who were then upon trial for apostacy. I feel it not only my privilege, but a duty that I owe to myself and those interested in my welfare, to plainly define my position with regard to the faith I have clung to so firmly and advocated so strongly for a period of over twenty-six years of my life. My faith in the divinity of the mission of Joseph Smith, as the Prophet of this dispensation is stronger, if possible, to-day than ever before; I heard, with my own ears, the Prophet declare in the spring of 1844 that he had placed upon the heads of the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles all the powers necessary to build up the Kingdom of God upon the earth and bear off the Gospel to the nations." I was with the number that were expelled from Nauvoo; the Church was governed by the Quorum of the Twelve in council, until December, A.D. 1847, at which time a re-organization of the Church authorities took place, by which Brigham Young, Heber C. Kimball, and Willard Richards were taken out of the Quorum of the Twelve and constituted a quorum or First Presidency, by the voice of all the quorums and members of the Church, for the purpose as then avowed, of enabling the quorum of the Twelve to really act as a "Traveling High Council" of the Church, as contemplated in the Revelation in the Book of Doctrines and Covenants. I was present at that organization, and voted for it in connection with my brethren of the Seventies. I felt then that that move of the Church met the approval of the Heavens, and I am, if possible, more firm in that conviction now than then.

I here declare in all truth that I am as firm in my faith in the Gospel, as when I proclaimed it so fervently in my four years' mission to Europe, (from 1848 to close of 1851), or at any time since then.

My mind was first stirred up to a closer inquiry of the Revelation given to Joseph Smith upon the subject of Church government, as well as to all Revelations containing anything on the subject of the inspirations of the Spirit of Truth upon the heart and mind of the believer, by a startling declaration made by President Young, nearly two years ago, "That it was his right to dictate to the Church in all things, either spiritual or temporal,—even to the ribbons the women wear;" and was still more startled when he gave a definition of his views of the Order of Enoch, and of the Law of Consecration. When the policy of a coercive system of coöperation was inaugurated, and the faithful everywhere commanded to trade only with the orthodox establishments of Zion's Coöperative Merchantile Institution upon pain of excommunication, I then fully opened my eyes to the fact that I must make a stand for liberty or be forever in bondage; that the Order of Enoch and the Law of Consecration, as he interprets them, were calculated in their combined results to reduce the people to the condition of "Tenants at Will," and thus render them utterly powerless to resist the most oppressive conditions that it might be thought wisdom to heap upon them.

I invite all to carefully read the four Revelations given on the order of Enoch, and, if I mistake not, they will there find that all who may become members of that holy order are to be equal in temporal things, that they may be equal in spiritual things,—that each member has an equal voice in all things pertaining to the interests of the order. I also invite all to read carefully the Revelations that treat upon Consecration. They will find, if I mistake not, that they teach the rich and well-to-do sort of men to consecrate all of their surplus properties for the benefit of the poor of the Church; they will also find that each poor man, who becomes a recipient of any portion of the properties so consecrated shall forever thereafter be a steward unto God; and not a steward of the President of the Church through the bishops.

I have apostatized from no doctrine nor commandment ever given to the Church by revelation through Joseph Smith, nor, indeed, from any of the measures of President Young—save it be wherein he claims infallibility for President Young, at the same time, admitting his fallibility as a man. Hildebrand admitted his fallibility as a man in the same breath that he claimed infallibility as Pope. I cannot, for the life of me, distinguish the difference between the man and the president. The fallibility of the man cannot, in my view, be made infallible by the office of President. I, myself, in my ordinations in the Priesthood, was told that I had then been made a recipient of the highest priesthood, in degree, that had ever been conferred upon man on the earth.

If a man's testimony of himself cannot be believed, in the name of all that is true, I ask, whose testimony shall be received? I have heard President Young assert, again and again, that he (speaking of himself), was neither a prophet nor the son of a prophet, but simply claimed to have been "profitable to this people,"—if not indeed a prophet, what, I ask, is the character of his inspirations, that they should be worth everything and mine worth nothing, unless sanctified by his? If, through the laying on of hands, the Holy Ghost was given to me as a comforter, by whose inspirations "the things of the Father and the Son would be made known unto me," did I not, through my faith and that holy ordinance, receive the right to drink of the waters of the river of life? Who shall say to me, after I have drunk of the blessed stream, that the water is bitter, when I know, for myself, that it is sweet to my soul?

My acquaintance with Brothers Harrison and Godbe has reached over a period of many years. A congeniality of temperament, and a similarity of views, on all the topics of interest that have occupied our attention for years, has rendered our friendship very warm and enduring. I have proved to myself, by the best of all evidences, namely, that of close personal intercourse, that they are men of the highest moral worth and unfailing integrity—men in whose breasts flows richly the milk of human kindness; men, who are true in their allegiance to God and the Gospel of Jesus Christ. Why, then, with all this knowledge of the men, should I hold up my hand to cut them off from my fellowship? I knew that they had done no wrong; that they were only in resistance to the mere assumption that to differ in opinion with the Presidency, on any question, ecclesiastical, civil, commercial, or political, is the rankest apostacy. I feel deeply the hasty, inconsiderate, and intolerant manner that we have been dealt with. Speaking for myself alone, I ask every candid and considerate mind to pause before they condemn. I have every earthly consideration to urge as an excuse for desiring to be at peace and good-fellowship with my brethren of the household of faith. All my interests and affections as husband, father friend, and citizen, would naturally impel me to desire to be at peace with the powers that be. I am fully aware that, for a period in the future, a heavy, gloomy cloud will hang over me; that my social status in society will be deeply injured; in other words, that I shall be "spotted" as a man, by hundreds and, maybe, by thousands, of my former acquaintances. Yet, as is my faith in God, so is my faith that truth will triumph, and human liberties in these Mountains be placed on a sure basis that shall endure forever.

With an earnest expression of a strong desire to be at peace with all men, and at war with none, I close.

Eli B. Kelsey,

LIBERTY.

BY EMILY E. TEASDALE.

Note.—The following was crowded out of our late issue.

Perhaps no word in the English language is more full of meaning than that of LIBERTY. It decides the development of nations. All the natural creatures of God boldly bear its impress; ask the the warbling lark for what she would exchange her liberty, and, could she speak, she would tell you death would be preferable, for liberty is the burden of her song. Bondage is of earthly origin, dictated by the ambition of man. If we take China for instance, where is her development? A word to her without a meaning. Man knows liberty and power are synonymous, and the tyrant endeavors to throw his shackle around his brother man, that he may lord it over him. Many a noble spirit, with heart and brain well calculated to elevate the sufferings of humanity, has dragged out an existence in obscurity and toil, because destiny has clasped with a monarch's diadem some mean, contracted soul, who would not hesitate even to shed the blood of the innocent, if he imagined he might, some day, rival him in power. From the days of Cain, man has ever allowed this earth-born element to creep into his nature; in his shortsightedness, he realizes not that another power detracts not from his own, because every man must eventually fill the niche carved by his own intrinsic worth. How frequently do we blame unseen influences for the misery we bring upon ourselves; through our own cramped feelings;

If we would study the benefit of humanity instead of our own exclusive aggrandizement, we, too, should share the benefit of an improved condition of society in general. We may read in nations the efforts of liberty, and vice versa. What has Russia gained by the bondage in which she has held Poland? Whereas she might have secured her friendship, and by so doing, an ally. Ask the poor Pole what he would be willing to do to liberate his country and his life, his all would be laid on the altar of sacrifice. When man has attained his full development, we shall find love alone will rule. Bondage makes of man mere automatons,—their pinions are clipped,—the noblest aspirations of the man are crushed; henceforth he turns his attentions to the groveling things of earth, that he may accumulate its dross, forgetting the counsel of Jesus, to lay up treasures in heaven. Man has ambition so strongly implanted in his nature that, if it is turned from its legitimate channel, it takes a lower aim. But God has destined man to rise from tyranny, oppression and wrong; and He will accomplish the mighty work he has commenced. Surround a man or woman with every luxury the world could produce, yet deprive him of liberty, and to what would it amount? The spirit of God is the very essence of love and liberty, Jesus conveyed this idea, when he said "my yoke is easy and my burden is light." Love was his crowning attribute, a yearning for man's redemption to see him rise from the thraldom of earth to the love and liberty of the heavens. Could man see as God sees, all envy of another's greatness of course would cease, and he would only see another instument in the hands of God for man's development. The purest happiness we can ever know springs from a knowledge of being a blessing to others. The spirit of God whispers a time will come when earth will be ruled by intellect, dictated by the spirit of God.

The gloomy night is breaking,
The gospel light now rests,
With a bright and cheering radiance,
On the hill-tops of the west.
The mists are gently rising
From the valley and the plain,
And a spirit is awaking
That shall never sleep again.
And ye may hear that listen,
The spirit's stirring song,
That surges like the ocean,
With its solemn bass along.
O can ye stay the rivers?
Or bind the wings of light?
Or bring back in the morning
The old departed night?
Nor can ye check its impulse,
Or stay it for an hour,
Till earth's deluded millions,
Have felt its healing power.
This spirit is the gospel,
In the vigor of its youth—
The foeman of oppression—
And its armour is the truth.
Old Error with its legions
Must fall beneath its wrath
Though blood and tears and anguish,
May work its brilliant path,
But onward, upward, heavenward
The spirit still will soar,
Till peace and love shall triumph
And falsehood reign no more.

THE LOTTERY DREAMER.

CHAPTER II.

THE JEWELER, AND THE JEWELER'S DAUGHTER.

On Tuscany, and on the dynasty of Lorraine, must rest the disgrace of having first given to Europe that evil example of a government exciting and pandering to the most pernicious and anti-social vices of its people, by making gambling a national vice. The lottery, as a means of revenue, was first introduced there in 1740, shortly after the death of the last Medicean duke. Something of the kind had previously existed in the republic of Genoa. It was said to have arisen there from a system of betting on the different candidates for the various magistracies to be elected by ballot; and it was in its early days known as the "Genoa Lottery." But it was at Florence that the lottery became a systematised means of duping and plundering the people. From Florence it passed to Vienna. France eagerly seized on the new invention. England, as we know, permitted state needs to override the perfectly understood, but deliberately disregarded, principles of state morality. To Frederick the Great belongs the honor of having resisted the temptation, and strictly forbidden the introduction of the abomination into his states. In proportion as the different countries have advanced in moral civilization, they have discountenanced and abolished their lotteries. In Italy, as might be expected, the system still continues in full vigor. Rome, struck at first sight by the immorality of the thing—but not at first sight comprehending the profit to be drawn from it—began by anathematising the lottery, but pocketed its infallibility and adopted it, immediately on perceiving its real object and value.

In central Italy, the Grand-Duke of Tuscany and the Father of the Faithful were partners in keeping the public hell for their respective subjects. And by this arrangement the lottery drawing in the various Tuscan cities served the Pope for continually "making the game" with his "children;" while that at Rome assisted the grand-duke in like manner. It is understood that the immoral and disreputable keepers of the gambling-tables at Baden-Baden, and Homburg, have chances in the games played to the extent of five per cent against the players, who are perfectly well aware of the fact. But the amount of "the pull" which his Highness the Duke and his Holiness the Pope permitted themselves against their subjects, was, as near as may be, seventeen per cent.

The "game is made, gentlemen," in this wise: The drawing takes place every week in one or other of the different cities, more or less frequently in each in proportion to their size and importance, according to a regular fixed cycle. This change in the locality of the drawing has no other object or effect than to give each place in turn a share of the amusement of seeing the ceremony. The offices are always open in all the towns, and a man at Rome may play on the drawing to take place at Florence, or vice versâ, just as well as if the drawing were to be performed in his own city. The numbers put into the wheel are always from one to ninety inclusively. From these, five are drawn. The player, therefore, bets that such or such a number will be drawn.

When the drawing is to take place, a scaffolding, handsomely ornamented with upholstery, is raised in one of the most conspicuous spots in the city, and a band of music is provided. Three magistrates attend in their robes of office; the wheel is placed before them at the front of the platform, and a boy stand beside it. The numbers are called aloud by one of the magistrates, held up to the sight of the people, then passed from one of them to the other two successively, and lastly to the boy, who drops them, one by one, into the wheel. Two or three turns of the machine mixes them well up together; and the boy proceeds to take out one. It is handed to the presiding magistrate, who calls it aloud, shows it to the crowd, and then affixes it in large figures to a board provided for the purpose. Then comes a flourish of music; and so on, till the five numbers have been drawn. They are immediately put up conspicuously in all the lottery offices; they are communicated as quickly as possible to the other cities; and the fortunate holders of them, if there be any such—for it will be observed that by this system it by no means follows that there will be any prizes to pay at all—present their tickets for payment at any of the offices.

It is difficult to give an adequate idea of the degree to which the lottery occupies the thoughts of the Tuscan populace, or of the largeness of the place it holds in their daily life. It has even modified their language. Expressions, allusions, metaphors drawn from it, have become part of their household speech. The walls and pavements throughout the city are always scrawled over with figures, generally in combinations of three or five. It is a constant subject of conversation; and if a working man has occasion to put his hand into his miscellaneously filled pocket, the chances are, that you may see him pull out, among other matters, one of the abominable little strips of coarse grey-blue paper which constitute the tickets in the lottery. Hawkers, crying their special numbers, may constantly be heard in the street. A ticket may be bought for a sum somewhat less than a penny; and the mendicant risks his alms in preference to buying himself a bit of bread. Many and many of the poorest classes play every week; and there is always an especial run on the government pawnbroking establishment a few hours previous to the closing of the sale of tickets.

> Hell's darksome gate stands night and day agape, says the Latin poet.

A confirmed lottery player is to a Tuscan family almost as fatal a cause of misery and ruin as a confirmed gin-drinker is to an English hearth. And the reader will be prepared to find that the home to which we left Laudadio Vanni and his daughter Laura returning, after their day's holiday at the Cascine, was not a prosperous one. Yet, had it not been for the curse that was on the old man, there were reasons why it ought to have been both. Laudadio Vanni had once been celebrated in the little world of Florence for his talent in his art. Ideas which have once become a portion of the popular mind in any country are endowed with a wonderful vitality. The goldsmith's art in the palmy days of Florence—from the old time when Giotto drew the perfect circle without compass as he sat at his work-bench, to the later generation when Cellini delighted Europe with the elegance of his fancy and the daintiness of his handiwork— was one of the fine arts. The statue of that unrivaled art-workman stands among the great ones, poets, painters, sculptors, statesmen, and captains, whom Florence still delights to honor; and his works are among the undying possessions which still bring the lovers and students of art as pilgrims to its shrine in Florence, from every part of the civilized world. And to the Florentine mind the cunning and tasteful worker in gold and its combinations is still an artist.

And Laudadio Vanni was held to have caught more of the ancient spirit and traditions of Florentine art than any of his contemporaries. If a restoration was needed of some treasured relic of former magnificence, no eye was so sure as Vanni's to comprehend the feeling of the original design, and no hand so capable of equalling the original workmanship. If a stranger needed a fitting setting for some gem of mediæval art, the acquisition of which was the main triumph of his tour, Vanni, was the man to whom he was recommended. His was the shop on the Ponte Vecchio which travelers in search of some memorial of their stay at Florence especially sought out. And all this ought to have "led on to fortune." More especially as the old widower's only daughter from an early age began to prove herself a very valuable assistant to him.

Laura Vanni was indeed a born artist. Had the circumstances of her position put it within her reach, she would have undoubtedly excelled in some one of the higher branches of art creation. She had striven hard, and had effected much, towards retarding her father's down-hill path on the road to ruin. Her talent had made itself known; her designs were sought; and the old shop on the Ponte Vecchio had a new attraction added to it. But the evil spirit she had to fight against was too strong for her; and gradually things went from bad to worst. A precarious hand-to-mouth struggle with difficulties drove them to substitute mere manufacture for the slower process of artistic elaboration. Visitors who sought the shop in the expectation of finding some charming chef-d'œuvre of grace and fancy, found only the ordinary bunches of turquoises and garnets and pearls, which made the staple of every shop on the bridge. The display even of these soon began to be scantier and shabbier than those of their neighbors and rivals. It was not only that the old man neglected his business, and did nothing, being wholly absorbed in cabalistic calculations, and endless searches for fortunate numbers from every object in life and in nature. Had this been the worst, Laura, by her own industry and talent, and with the true-hearted help of her faithful friend and patient lover, Carlo Bardi, might have managed to keep the old man and herself without any assistance from him. Carlo would willingly have installed himself as the old jeweler's assistant and workman, and have served his seven or twice seven years for his love, had such a scheme promised any good issue. It had often been talked over between them, and as often abandoned as hopeless. For old Laudadio was in the habit of pilfering from his own shop to supply the means of gratifying his passion. Any chance suggestion of a combination of numbers to his diseased brain was sure to be followed by the abstraction of a brooch or a bracelet; and a dream was a sentence of sacrifice under cost price of the most valuable article in the shop.

It will be seen that poor Laura's task was an up-hill one, and her position sufficiently hard. Without the frequent and always ungrudgingly bestowed assistance of her godfather, the cavaliere ex-clerk, old Sestini, it would have been impossible for her to have got on from one year's end to another. But it was curious enough, that though old Niccolo was held by all who knew him to be a fool, though he seemed, in truth, not to have two ideas on any subject under the sun, and, still more strangely, though he always testified the utmost admiration for his friend Laudadio's profound cabalistic science, yet some species of instinct with regard to the side on which his own bread was buttered, prevented him from ever risking a farthing in the lottery himself and also led him so to manage his benefactions to Laura, as that they should always reach their hands, just when needed to meet some special pressure, and should never find their way into those of his profoundly mathematical friend.

Under these circumstances, it would seem that pretty Laura Vanni must have been among the many victims who have cause to hate the paternal institution of the lottery as the one cause of all their sorrow in life. How numerous must be the victims ruined by the fatal passion in those on whom they depend! Yet no such feeling is common among the people, even among those who are themselves free from the lust of gambling. And Laura herself had no such feeling on the subject. It was not only that her affections for her father was in no wise diminished by his conduct, but she did not seem to feel either hatred or anger against the thing itself.

While the old shop on the bridge was becoming stripped, and things were getting worse and worse with Laura and her poor old incorrigible father, worthy Carlo Bardi was slowly making his way up fortune's hill. By rigid economy and hard work as a journeyman jeweler, he had contrived to save a sum which at last placed him in a position to make a proposal he had been long meditating. This was nothing less than that Laudadio should give up the shop and business to him, that he and Laura should forthwith be married, and that he should charge himself with finding the old man a home and maintenance during the remainder of his days. The business had, in fact, become worth nothing, and the shop was as nearly as possible bare. Nevertheless, Carlo hoped to be able to stock it with his little capital, and by his own industry and skill, and his wife's talent and taste, to recover in some degree its old credit. It was a bold scheme, for poor Carlo's means were of the smallest. When matters were canvassed between him and Laura, he steadily set his face against all notions of partnership with the old jeweler. Laura feared that her father's pride would rebel against this proposal of complete abdication. But Carlo was of opinion that the lottery had swept all that away, together with so much else.

At all evdnts, it was settled between them, as they walked back from the Cascine on the Ascension-day evening, that the attempt should be made. Carlo went over his calculations yet once again, and, as usual, a certain sum of a hundred dollars figured in the little budget, which Laura was to receive on her marriage from her godfather. These hundred dollars had been laid aside years and years ago by the little cavaliere, long before he had quitted his place in the government office, and had they been placed at interest, might have been two hundred by this time. But nothing, to Carlo's great disgust, could ever induce Niccolo Sestini to take any step of the kind. There were the identical dollars, all fresh from the mint, and those dollars he should put into Laura's hand when she was to be married. Over and over again he had resisted temptation to permit the little hoard to be diminished. And he was equally immovable in refusing to touch it for the purpose of increasing it. "How could he know," he observed, which it was shown him that the hundred might ere this have become two hundred—"how could he know that Laura would have remained single so long?" So the hundred dollars were but a hundred; but they were counted on by the young couple as a very important fund for meeting the immediate expenses of starting, and thus leaving Carlo's little capital free for the all-important work of stocking the old shop.

It may be surmised that Laura and Carlo saw little of the surpassing beauty of their sunset walk by the bank of the Arno from the Cascine to the city gate, and thence by the long line of the Lungarno to the Ponte Vecchio. It was then arranged between them that Carlo should call on her father on the following morning, and make his proposal. Old Laudadio, who, as in the morning, walked in front with the cavaliere, was equally blind to all around him, unless it were that he occasionally recorded to himself the numbers suggested, according to his science, by the objects that met his eyes. A little boy patiently dangling a bit of string at the end of a stick in the river, produced the remark that fishing with a hook was 41. Two men, with bare brown legs and arms, in a boat, which they were loading with sand scooped up from the shallows of the river, and which looked as if one more shovelful added to the heap which had already brought their gunwale to the level of the water must surely sink their boat, led to the observation that sand denoted number 20.

Old Niccolo alone seemed, as he gently puffed his cigar, strolling onwards with his hands behind his back, to be enjoying the lovely view of his dear Florence to the utmost. For among these Southern organizations, be it observed, it does not follow that because a man is seventy years of age, an ex-clerk in a public office, fat and paunch, and an old fool into the bargain, he is therefore insensible to beauty of any kind. A Parisian, in a similar position and circumstances, would see no beauty save of a far more facetious kind. It is not so with a Tuscan.

"Ah! come è bella! come è bella!" he exclaimed, as the moon rose over the black pine-forests of Vallombrosa, and tipped the pinnacles of the Palazzo Vecchio's tall slender tower with her light.

"Moon," said Laudadio, "is number 6."

"She must be full to-night, I think," remarked Sestini.

"But full moon is 90, my sympathetic number!" cried old Vanni.

"What a head he has! What a philosopher's head!" said the ex-clerk, shaking his own in admiring wonder.

And so they passed under the shadow of the quaint old buildings on the Ponte Vecchio.

The Ponte Vecchio, or old bridge at Florence, is one of the most remarkable specimens remaining in Europe of the mediæval fashion of turning bridges into streets, by loading them with rows of houses on either side. Space within a walled and fortified enclosure was of course scarce and valuable; and the difficulty of lodging an increased community within the unelastic circuit of its stone girdle, led citizens to this and other non-sanitary expedients, which, according to Dame Nature's usual just and inexorable mode of dealing with us, levied inevitable retribution on mankind for the crime of so mis-managing their lives on this fair earth as to make stone walls round their dwellings necessary to them. In a simply artistic point of view, something may be found to be said on either side—in favor of the old building-laden bridge, as well as of the modern unembarrassed structure. If Waterloo Bridge be a beautiful and magnificent work of art, ancient London Bridge, as its appearance has been preserved for us by old pictures and engravings, was rich in picturesque beauty of its kind. And on the banks of the Arno, although the Ponte Santa Trinita, situated a few hundred yards down the stream, is a masterpiece of elegance, lightness, and scientific construction, it is its ancient neighbor, with its quaint superstructure of queer little shops, that attracts the eyes and occupies the sketch-books of both resident and pilgrim artists.

The Florentine working jewelers, who produce the combinations of pearls, garnets, and turquoises, which are peculiar to Florence, and who invent cunning Etruscan settings for pietra dura and cameo ornaments, still stick to the Ponte Vecchio. Their shops are of very diminutive dimensions. Behind most of them a tiny little back-shop is contrived, generally for the purpose of a workshop, by dint of projecting the buildings over the sides of the bridge, and supporting them by timbers, resting in a sloping position on its solid masonry. Notwithstanding what would seem a somewhat insecure foundation, these buildings are of two, and in some cases of three stories. They are built with complete contempt for all uniformity and regularity; and being adorned, here with an ancient stone-cut coat of arms or an inscription, there with a fragment of fresco or a tabernacle to the Virgin, with its pendent lamp in front of it, the general effect is picturesque in no ordinary degree.

Laudadio Vanni and his three companions turned up the bridge from the Lungarno, and stopped before the narrow door of one of the little houses on the left hand as you cross from the north to the south side of the river. Massive iron-bound shutters, not made to stand perpendicularly against the front of the house, but projecting from it in a slope, so as to cover and protect the cases of jewelry made to jut out from the little window fronts; in order to gain a little space at the cost of stealing it from the public way, were in front of every tenement on the bridge, and now that they were all closed on this high day and holiday, had the appearance of huge sloping-roofed chests deposited on the pavement in front of each little house. Every narrow door, barely large enough for one person to pass through it at a time, was secured by two or more huge locks. The Florentine locksmith still looks mainly to massiveness and size as the elements of security, and dreams not as yet of the cunning devices by which an ounce of steel in the hands of a Bramah or a Chubb is made to render better service than half a dozen pounds' weight of less-skilled workmanship.

The old jeweler deliberately drew from his pocket a sufficiently greasy-looking leathern bag, or key case, which with its contents may have weighed some six or eight pounds. Unwinding the thong which was bound around it, he took out first one huge key, which he applied to a lock at the middle height of the door, and gave it three complete turns. Then another such lock was opened at the top of the door. And lastly, an immense padlock, which secured an iron stanchion across the whole width of it, at the bottom, was removed; and then at length the narrow door thus jealously secured was opened. There was little enough at present in old Laudadio's shop to necessitate all these precautions, but such had not always been the case.

Laura struck a light as soon as all four had entered the miniature dwelling, and proceeded, while her father carefully put up his keys again, to light two of those slender tall brass lamps, with their implements—snuffers, scissors for cutting the wick, and pin for trimming it, hanging around it by three brass chains—and their oil reservoirs and burners, made still in the shape of those found in old Etruscan tombs—lamps which are seen in every Tuscan house; and have in the eyes of strangers such a curiously classical appearance.

Placing one of these on the narrow little work-bench before the window on one side of the door, which was her father's now rarely occupied place of work, and in front of which stood his old worn arm-chair, she passed with the other through a door still narrower than that which communicated with the street, into the second room, if a space of some six feet square could be called such. Here, in front of a tiny window over-hanging the river, was Laura's own little work establishment, with its appurtenances of multitudinous small tools, spirit-lamp, blow-pipe, &c. Three or four casts of bronzes and basso relievo were hung round the little cabin. One or two old books, in a sadly dilapidated condition, containing engravings of celebrated gems and cut stones, lay upon a hanging table (or shelf rather, it was so narrow) against one of the side-walls. The little bit of a window, small though it was, gave the inmate the precious advantage of a pure and unbroken light; for, looking out over the river as it did, there was nothing between it and the heavens.

Here, seated at her bench and busily at work in shaping the delicate materials of her art into the expression of some dainty device or skillful reproduction of mediæval workmanship, Laura passed the happiest hours of her life; unless, indeed, those exceptional ones of the society of Carlo are to be counted as ranking first in her estimation.

And now this evening, one of the last, as she hoped, silly mortal! of that sort, never-returning blossom-time of a life which precedes love's fruit-season—this evening she would celebrate by a combination of both delights. The two old men sat down in the front shop for a "chiacherata"—a bout of gossip; and Carlo, as she had intended him to do, followed her into her work-shop and artistic sanctum. She sat down in her accustomed seat at the narrow work-bench before the window, and Carlo took the only other seat in the little room, and placed himself at the end of the bench, and thus at right angels to her and the window. Of course they had enough to talk of. But if Laura had been intent on talk only, the lamp would hardly have been necessary. For the moonlight was streaming in at the little window, and was reflected in a long pathway of light on the water, extending from the edge of the shadow cast by the "Ponte alle Grazie"—the bridge next above the Ponte Vecchio on the river—till it ended beneath the arches of the old bridge under their feet. Few quainter and more characteristic town views could be found than that commanded by the little window at which the lovers sat. In front, the queer old bridge of the Grazie, with its chapels, and little shops on its massive piers all in deep shadow, and the Chianti hills in the distance; to the left the river facade of the Uffizi, with its noble arches and harmonious Palladian architecture—that frontage of which Vasari was prouder than of all his other various art-works, and of the difficulty of rearing which on the unstable soil of the river-brink he boasts so much—all this, too, black in deep shade; then, to the right, the strangely varied line of the backs of the houses, which at this part of the river come sheer down to the water, without any intervening quay or pathway. These were in the full moonlight; but the irregularities of the buildings chequered the light with innumerable variously shaped patches of shade. The backs of houses always offer a more suggestive and amusing view, and often a more picturesque one, than their more uniform street fronts, got up with a view to respectable appearance in public. The inhabitants of every one of them would be far more interesting objects of observation than they mostly are, if one could get a peep at their minds and opinions in an analogous behind-the-scenes point of view. And it is the same with their dwellings.

CHAPTER III.

THE JEWELER'S SHOP.

Laura's lamp was not needed for looking on this scene, or for conversing with Carlo, as they sat in the moonlight. But she was never absent from her work-bench for a few hours without longing to be back at it. And now she was in a hurry to look at a piece of workmanship which she was completing, and which she was anxious to compare with an engraving she had recollected while at the Cascine. Laura's piece consisted in a most ingenious and tasteful combination and adaptation of several pearls of large size, but of very irregular shape, in such a manner as to make their abnormal forms serve instead of marring the purpose of her design. Most daintily fancied was the idea she had imagined, and Laura was pleased with her work, and eager to return to it. Carlo had not yet seen it, as she had intended to have shown it him only when finished. But this evening she could not resist drawing it forth from the little locked drawer beneath the working-bench; and so it was presented for the criticism of the Paris-taught workman in its still unfinished state.

"Charming!" cried Carlo, genuinely pleased with the beauty of the gem; "davvero, davvero—truly, truly, it is exquisite. There is but my Laura in all Florence this day capable of a design so deliciously fancied. There is the true sentiment of the cinquecento," added he, recurring to a Florentine artist's constant beau-ideal of art in all its branches.

"Ah, that is the real praise!" said Laura; "that is what I have been striving after. And if I could only hope that I had a ray of the real light!"

Very absurd, was not it, for a poor jeweler's prentice daughter to talk in such a strain? Absurd enough for a girl to meddle with men's work at all, and quite against all the rules of the trade! But then, you see, poor Laura was an enthusiast in her own way; knew all the glories of the Carrionis, Giuffuris, Torricellis, and Ginghis, the masters of her own craft in the days when fine art meant the creation of the beautiful in any form and in any material; knew especially the story of Francesco Borghigiani and his daughter, who at a later day won herself a niche in Art's Pantheon by her skill in works of the same class.

Quite a fanatica, this pretty little Laura! Yes; but not by very far so strange a one, observe, under the shade of Brunellesehi's dome, as she would have been under that of Christopher Wren.

Carlo Bardi had acquired more modern notions, and, moreover, was not an enthusiast in any way, though Laura's enthusiasm appeared infinitely beautiful to him.

"I do think, then, in all truth," replied he to Laura's outburst, "that your work has quite the style of the old workmen. But I very much fear, my Laura, that the world's tastes have so much changed, that, with the exception of here and there a purchaser with antiquarian tastes, this beautiful work of yours would not be calculated to meet the modern demand. Look, now, at this model of a brooch," added he, taking a small case from his pocket, "that we have just received from Paris at our place, as a sample of the last new style."

"A sample!" cried Laura, flushing with indignation; "and of the latest Paris style. Do tell me, Carlo mio, whether he who wrought that crucifix," pointing to a plaster model of an exquisite work by Benvenuto Cellini, "used to receive samples of the latest style from Paris?"

"Not so, Laura," replied Carlo, quietly; "unhappily, alas! Paris and Florence have changed places. Benvenuto sent the Parisians samples of the newest style. That is the difference."

"No! Carlo, no! and no again. What is this vulgar thing sent here for? That you and every one on the bridge may make fifty dozen exactly like it, if you could get the order for them. Is not it true? And do you think Cellini's works were sent to Paris with any such hope or expectation? When the French kind wanted Florentine art, he had to bring the Florentine artist, I think, and not samples to Paris."

"That is very true, Laura mia," said Carlo, stooping across the bench to press a kiss on the cheek that was so charmingly colored by her disdainful mood; "but say, darling, why do you call this French brooch vulgar? Is not it very pretty?"

"It is vulgar," said Laura, nodding her graceful head, "first, because it is a sample; and may serve for one; because anybody can make another exactly like it, and as good as the original. It is vulgar, secondly, because the value of it is more in the intrinsic cost of the material than in the workmanship; and, thirdly, it is vulgar because no sentiment went to the making of it; the maker put none of his individuality into it, and it is, therefore, as one would say of a human being, all body and no brain, and no heart."

"It is quite true," replied Carlo, "that our modern workmen would turn you out as many dozen of such brooches as you choose to order, not one of which could you tell from the original. But still, modern work has its advantages and excellences. See, now, these circular lines! They are perfectly accurate. See how truly in the center is the exact point that ought to be the center. You know how constantly the old works, even of the first hands, are inaccurate in such matters. A lopsided circle, an untrue angle, or a false center, would not be tolerated now-a-days."

"So much the worse for those who won't tolerate them!" cried Laura. "I love the careless inaccuracies of the old workers. Their care was occupied otherwise. These little departures from mechanical accuracy mark the individuality of the artist. An artist is not a machine, to work with machine-like precision. Is one man's mind the exact counterpart of another's? Am I the same one day that I am another? I like the careless inexactitude that marks the humanity of the artist without injuring the expression of his thought, better than the precision which only shows that your compasses were in good order. But as for my poor trinket here, one of the here and there individuals of antiquarian tastes has been met with, for this is a commission for an Englishman. It came to me through Signor Raddi, at the gallery."

"I am delighted to hear it; my own Laura!" said Carlo; "for the truth is, that I am thinking of the subject rather from the mercantile than from the artistic point of view. And you know, that if all goes well for our hopes to-morrow, as please God it will, it is in that light that we must look at it."

"Heaven grant that all may go well!" responded Laura, fervently; "but oh, Carlo, I fear, I fear. I think I shall sit here and work at my pearls all night. For then I shall think of my work, and get over the hours. But I am sure I shall not sleep a wink. Sometimes it seems to come out quite clear to me, that of course my father will never consent to take off the old name that has been over the shop for three generations. You don't know how much pride my poor father has in his business."

"I think, my Laura, that when the business was, the pride was; but both, I suspect, have been killed by the same malady," said Carlo, a little bitterly. "Besides," he added, "there is the too evident difficulty of going on, as things are. Surely your father must feel painfully anxious for the future, and will welcome a proposition which will, I trust, remove all anxiety from him for ever."

"You forget, Carlo dear, that my father feels poverty only as one does who is on the point of leaving it behind him for ever. He is well and truly persuaded that the prize, which has so often seemed within his grasp, will come at last, and that soon. And if it should, Carlo——"

"Laura! by all the saints, don't let me hear you talk in that way too! Have you not seen enough of lottery drawing and gambling by this time?" said sensible Carlo, sadly.

"But my dear father does understand the lottery as few others do," pleaded Laura. "And I am sure, if calculation and meditation on the cabala and the mathematics can avail, he ought to win."

"Laura! Laura! for Heaven's sake don't talk so!" groaned poor Carlo, with real alarm. "Tell me," said he, "did you ever buy a ticket, Laura? Did you ever wish to do so?"

"Surely you know, Carlo, I never did either the one or the other. I neither understand anything about it, nor ever attempted to understand it. The numbers for my terno are my own true love, my art, and my old work-bench. Papa would tell the numbers sympathetic to all three in a minute. Will my terno come up, Carlo?" said she, with a look which made it impossible for Carlo to scold.

"Dearest," he said, "I would rather talk of our happiness under any other form. Can it be that you really have any shadow of belief in the possibility of any connection between the numbers to be drawn out of the wheel at the lottery, and all the calculations, sympathetic numbers, and dreams that your father, and so many others, put so much faith in?"

"In truth, dearest Carlo," replied Laura, seriously, but without a particle of the animation and intense interest that had lighted up her face, and lent fire to her eye, a few moments previously, when she had been speaking of matters of art—"in truth, dearest Carlo, I have never given the question a thought, and know, as I said, that I understand nothing about it. But——"

"Understand it, Laura!" broke in Carlo, the sceptical and the sensible; "why, it is within the comprehension of a baby."

"And yet they all speak of it," rejoined Laura, humbly, "as a profound science and mystery, to be fathomed only by the longest and deepest mathematical study. See, now," she continued, "what reasons I have to believe these things, which seem to you so incredible. My dear, dear father, certainly was never considered wanting in intelligence. You know, before pressing want of money led him to devote all his attention to this subject, how highly his talents were thought of by all the men of art in Florence. And years of deep study have only confirmed him more and more in the certainty of his speculations."

Carlo groaned; but not letting him interrupt her, she went on:

"Then, as you remarked yourself, my father is far from singular in his belief. How many others think like him? And then again, above all, that book which he had with him this morning. I have never so much as looked into it. But I have often and often heard him quoting the names of the great philosophers whose calculations are there given. I know that the book states the correspondences and sympathies of numbers, and the possibility of winning in the lottery by their means, as matters of fact. And it is credible that the government and Holy Church, which takes such ceaseless care to prevent evil books of any kind from being printed, would suffer that book to be published and sold openly to thousands of people, deluding them in the most cruel and wicked manner, if it were all false? Is this in any way credible, I say?"

Carlo's Paris-grown ideas brought to his lips some pithy expressions of his estimate of the paternal care of "government and Holy Church," in reply to his Laura's triumphant arguments. But he suppressed them, wisely judging that so very large a dose of novel and startling doctrine, administered all at once, might be more than was good for the mental digestion of his pretty and much-loved patient. So contenting himself with inwardly resolving that a little enlightenment on these matters should reach his Laura's deeply art-instructed, but on all other subjects blank-paper mind, at some future and more convenient period, he merely said:

"Well, my sweet Laura, without pretending to give up my own ideas on the matter, I will be content if, as you tell me, at all events, never felt an inclination to dabble in the lottery."

"And if I had, Carlo, which I truly never had, would it not be enough for me to know that you did not approve of it?"

This, as the speaker doubtless felt, could only be answered by a very tender caress. And then it was settled between them that the all-important interview of the morrow should come off at ten o'clock, at which hour Carlo was to call on the old man for the purpose.

Of course Laura and Carlo would have sat on where they were as long as ever the two old men in the front shop chose to leave them undisturbed. But it was not long after they had finished their business and type-reproducible talk, and had betaken themselves to very orthodox hand-in-hand moon gazing, that the round-about figure of Godpapa Niccolo appeared in the too narrow frame of the little doorway between the two rooms. Laudadio, he said, was specially absorbed in some calculations of the influence which the full of the moon would have on the drawing of the lottery on the following Saturday at Rome, as deducible from the numbers that came up the last time the drawing took place at Rome in the quarter of the full moon. And he had betaken himself to the room above, which was reached by a ladder-like stair constructed in the thickness of the wall. Carlo, and he, he said, would go off to bed, and Laura was to close the door behind them.

The engagement between Laura and Carlo was perfectly well known to Sestini, and had his warm approbation. The hundred dollars, he said, were ready at the first intimation that the wedding was fixed. He was not aware, however, of Carlo's determination to bring matters to a crisis by the proposal the reader has heard. As they left the heavily ironed little door, which Laura was heard barring and bolting inside, Carlo told the old cavaliere his project, and asked his opinion as to the probability of Signor Vanni's acceptance of it.

"My opinion is," said Niccolo, "that he will gladly accept it. For when a man's head is occupied by the profound and intense studies which engross my respected friend, I have observed that he rarely troubles himself much about meaner things. A wonderful head has old Laudadio Vanni!"

"I have made much the same observation that you have, Signor Cavaliere," returned Carlo, "and it is on it that I build my hopes of success."

"I heartily wish it you, both for dear Laura's sake and your own. Good night, Signor Carlo."

"Good night, Signor Cavaliere!"

MUSICAL DOINGS.—Since Mr. Waters gave up publishing sheet music, he has devoted his whole capital and attention to the manufacture and sale of Pianos and Melodeons. He has just issued a catalogue of his new instruments, giving a new scale of prices, which shows a marked reduction from former rates, and his Pianos have recently been awarded the First Premium at several Fairs. Many people of the present day, who are attracted, if not confused, with the flaming advertisements of rival piano houses, probably overlook the modest manufacturer like Mr. Waters; but we happen to know that his instruments earned him a good reputation long before 3 positions and "honors" connected therewith were ever thought of; indeed, we have one of Mr. Waters' Piano-fortes now in our residence, (where it has stood for years,) of which any manufacturer in the world might be proud. We have always been delighted with it as a sweet-toned and powerful instrument, and there is no doubt of its durability; more than this, some of the best amateur players in the city, and several celebrated pianists, have performed on the said piano, and all pronounce it a superior and first-class Instrument. Stronger indorsement we could not give.—Home Journal,

HARVELL'S

HORSE POWDERS.

These celebrated and renowned powders for horses and cattle have been tested by an intelligent public for sixteen years. Hundreds of the principal horsemen of the Union have pronounced them the only Condition Powders safe to use and work the horse. There is nothing in them to expose the animal, but, on the contrary, everything to improve them. The proprietors of horse railroads, omnibusses, and stage owners in all the principal cities use them; and their combined testimony stamps them one of the wonders of medical science. Letters sufficient to fill a small book are in our possession, testifying to their goodness. Merchants are requested to warrant them, and refund the purchase money should they fail to give satisfaction.

ALLCOCK'S POROUS

STRENGTHENING

PLASTERS.

ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS are the results of studies and experiments of Dr. Scherut, of South Carolina; of Dr. Wm. Wagstaff, now Baron Wagstaff, of Horace H. Day, the distinguished manufacturer of rubber goods; and of Thomas Allcock, Chemist and member of the College of Pharmacy of New York, now General Allcock, etc., etc.

Step by step this commodity has attained its unprecedented fame. They are universally approved. They support, strengthen, and aid the growth of muscles. They appear to have a peculiar effect upon the nerves, allaying irritability, while supplying warmth. They seem to accumulate electricity, and aid the circulation of the blood through the part where applied, by which healthy actions are induced.

Even in paralysis, where articulation was suspended, the use of the Porous Plasters to the spine restored the articulation, and materially reduced the paralysis. In fact, the patient could help herself, while before the Porous plaster was applied she was as helpless as a baby. We refer to Mrs. Sally Elliot, Springfield, Mass.

Dr. Myer, of Savannah, Ga., says they are the best mechanical supporters for weak muscles ever discovered; that by their warming properties they bring power and health, until the strength of the muscles are entirely restored. That he knows a case where Allcock's Plasters cured a gentleman of a weak spine. That he daily prescribes them in his practice with the happiest results, and desires us to refer to him.

Dr. Henderson, of Farmsville, Louisiana, says: "The counter-irritant effect of Allcock's Porous Plasters is produced in such a mild and gradual way, they so invigorate the circulation around the parts to which they are applied, and exert upon all nervous diseases such a great sedative influence, that I place them confidently at the head of every plaster now in use."

Dr. Johnson, of Hartford, says: "My daily experience confirms the very superior excellence of your Porous Plasters. At this moment of writing, a man applies for one, who, by entanglement in a shaft of machinery, had both his legs broken, spine severely injured, and was for nearly a year entirely helpless. This man found relief very soon by the application of a plaster to his spine. He was soon enabled to work, and now he labors as well as ever. He would cheerfully pay five dollars for a single plaster, if they could not be had at a lower rate. Surgeons should make use of these perforated plasters, to the exclusion of all others, as their flexibility and adhesiveness are greatly in advance of all other plasters with which I am acquainted, while the perforations peculiar to them render them greatly superior to all others for ordinary surgical uses. Knowing the plasters to be so useful, I have no scruple that my sentiments should be known.

J. W. JOHNSON, M. D."

Dr. Sterling's testimony: "For two years, I have been a great sufferer from neuralgia in the head, and found only temporary relief from all the various remedies that I have tried, until I applied one of Allcock's Porous Plasters. I cut it into three strips, placing one under each shoulder blade, and the other over the small of the back; and for the past three months, I have had scarcely a twinge of the old pain.

I advise all who suffer from nervous diseases to lose no time in making a trial of the wonderful Porous Plaster.

A. F. STERLING, Sec. Singer Mfg. Co.

New York, June 8, 1868.

MEDICINAL QUALITIES

—OF THE—

POROUS PLASTERS.

The Porous Plasters possess the soothing, warming and sustaining qualities of the combined plasters of the dispensatories. An Electrician, who has great experience of their effects in Local Rheumatism, in Tic Doloreux, and depressated nervous and other pains, and in affections of the kidneys, etc., etc., attributes all their sedative, stimulative and pain-relieving effects to their ELECTRIC qualities. He asserts that they restore the healthy electric condition (equilibrium) of the part, and that being restored pain and morbid action cease. He was amazed at the great number of beneficial indications produced by one of these plasters. He affirms that Head-ache is cured by one worn just below the breast-bone; that one placed over the navel will cure hysterics, as well as dysentery, and affections of the bowels.

PATENT
ARION PIANOFORTE

GRANDS AND GRAND SQUARES.

7½ OCTAVES

The "ARION" is the very best Piano for the Great West because it stands in tune longer than any other Piano. It requires no repairing or regulating; shipping any distance, or dampness does not affect them.

WHY?

It commences where the "First Premium" Makers stop, and upon the most improved Modern scale makes four patented improvements; which make the Arion more simple, yet stronger; increasing its volume and beauty of tone, while rendering the instrument more enduring.

WHAT THEY ARE.

First. The patent Arion Reversed Wooden Agraffe Bridge, which retains all the purity of tone only found in a wooden bridge (the ties, whereon the strings lay, and obtains all the well prolonged strength of tone of the metal Agraffe, without that acute metallic noise which the metal Agraffe develops by use.

Secondly. The Patent Arion Compound Wrest-Plank, which holds the tuning pins, is six thicknesses of hard maple, the grain of each layer runs in a different direction. The advantages are, the 20 tons strain of the strings cannot split our Arion wrest-plank, as frequently happens in other Pianos, and when people say "My Piano won't stand in tune," all other makers must use the single wrest plank with the grain running only one way.

The Arion Tuning-Pins have end wood to hold them on every side, while all other makers can have it only upon two sides of their pins.

Thirdly. The Patent Arion Diagonal Sustaining Bar, extending parellel with the steel strings under the over strung Bass strings. The Arion is the only Piano wherein the enormous strain of the large steel strings is resisted in the natural place and direction. Using this bar renders the weakest part in all other over strung Pianos the

STRONGEST IN THE ARION.

Fourthly. The Patent Arion Iron Frame concentrates all the metal in front of the tuning pin line, and its frame is let into (buttted) the front edge of the wooden wrest plank, thereby preventing the great strain of the strings upon it from splitting or moving it one particle. All other "Full Iron Frames" cover the entire wrest plank, and when it is split it cannot be seen, the wood of the Arion wrest plank is seen.

THE ARION STANDS UPON ITS OWN MERITS, unsupported by either buncome, weak facts, or useless or complicated Patents. We append a few unbought opinions of those who

KNOW THE ARION.

The Musical Director of the New York Conservatory of Music, Edward Mollenhauer, says. "The Arion I bought of you is the best Piano I ever played on; that rolling bass and silvery treble, etc."

John H. Woods, Piano Dealer, Oswego, N. Y., says: The tone is truly immense, and surpasses anything in the shape of a Piano we ever saw or heard of, etc."

Horace Greely said: "The Arion is the best Square Piano, superior for its clearness and brilliancy of tone," &c.

Louis Wagner, Fort Leavenworth, says: "My Piano arrived here in splendid order. Its tone fills my parlor with melody—it is the wonder and admiration of all who hear it. Miss ——, who is teaching the Piano desires me to order one for her," &c

Dr. CADY'S CATARRH REMEDY.

A CERTAIN CURE FOR CATARRH AND ALL Mucous Diseases of the head, nose and throat.

This is a Medicine never before used or known to the public. Dr. Cady, the discoverer, was a sufferer from this terrible disease for twenty years, and after testing all the remedies extant—without relief—in his efforts to obtain a cure he discovered this UNEQUALLED REMEDY, which cured him in the short space of eight weeks.

It has been thoroughly tested, and has not failed in a single instance. Several of the most obstinate cases have been thoroughly cured by this remedy, after every other known medicine had failed. Every one who has tried it will testify to the truth of the above statement.

Every one afflicted with Catarrh should give it a trial and find out for himself whether it is a humbug.

A

WATER.

The Saratoga "A" Spring Water is probably the most effective mineral water found on either continent. It has ten per cent. greater mineral properties than the celebrated Congress Spring; four times that of Baden Baden of Austria; five times that of Aix La Chapelle in Prussia; twice that of Vichy in France; nearly three times greater than the renowned Seltzer of Germany; and equally over the Spas of Bath, England, and Kissengen in Bavaria.

The reputation of this water is based upon its effects in diseases of the stomach, liver, bowels, kidneys and spleen. It acts with wonderful benefit in cases of chronic dyspepsia, constipation, gravel, gout, Scrofula, cutaneous affections, general lethargy, soreness and prostration of the system.

AUTUMN.

There is a glory on the earth to-day,
There is a spirit in the changing trees,
There is a soft, low murmur in the heart,
And on the breeze.

Sweet Autumn sheds a gentle influence now,
The world is clad in beauty and in light;
The sunshine shimmers softly through the trees,
And all is bright.

Some spirit has made love to every flower
That breathes its love out on the passing breeze;
Some magic hand has thrown a witching garb
Upon the trees.

For all the blossoms blush—they seem rare gems
From the bright land of dreams. In earthward flight,
Some seraph's wing has swept the trees and left
Gleams of its light.

Above us bends the silent, cloudless sky,
And o'er its depths a lone bird wings its flight;
Seen for one moment—then, like gilded hope,
It fades from sight.

The spirit of the Wind has struck its harp,
But altered is the music of the lay;
The notes are wailing, and the burden is,
"Passing away."

We love to linger out. The deep, blue sky
Seems nearer now than when the Summer's here;
The rustling leaves a melting murmur cast
Upon the ear.

Yes, there is music in the fallen leaves;
They breathe the spirit of the mighty Past;
They wake a chord in each heart as they sigh
"Bright days fly fast."

"THE STUDENT."

A TALE OF GERMAN BROTHERHOOD.

Among my acquaintances in Gottingen, were two students, both Prussians, and both from the same small town of Madgebourg. They had been school-fellows, and came together to the university, where they lived together on terms of brotherly affection, which even there, where friendship takes all the semblance of a sacred compact, were the subject of remark. Never were two men less alike, however, than these. Eisendecker was a bold, hot-headed fellow, fond of all the riotous excesses of a Burschen life; his face, seamed with many a scar, declared him a "hahn," as, in student phrase, a confirmed duellist is termed. He was ever foremost in each scheme of wild adventure, and continually brought up before the senate, on some charge of insubordination. Von Muhry, his companion, was exactly the opposite. His sobriquet—for nearly every student had one—was "der Zahme"—the gentle; and never was any more appropriate. His disposition was mildness itself; almost girlish in his look, with large blue eyes and fine, soft, silky hair, which, German-like, he wore long upon his neck. His voice—the index of his nature—soft, low and musical, would have predisposed you at once in his favor. Still, these disparities did not prevent the attachment of the two youths; on the contrary, they seemed rather to strengthen the bond between them—each, as it were, supplying to the other the qualities which nature had denied him. They were never separate in lecture-room, or at home, or in the allee—as the promenade was called—or in the garden, where, each evening, the students resorted to sup, and listen to the music of the Jager band. Eisendecker and Muhry were names that no one ever heard separated; and when one appeared, the other was never more than a few yards off.

Such was their friendship, when an unhappy incident occurred to trouble its even course, and sow dissension between these, who never had known a passing difference in their lives. The sub-rector of Gottengen was in the habit of giving little receptions every week, to which many of the students were invited, and to which Eisendecker and Muhry were frequently asked, as they both belonged to the professor's class. In the quiet world of a little university town, these soirees were great occassions, and the invited plumed themselves not a little on the distinction of a card, which gave the privilege of bowing in the Herr professor's drawing-room, and kissing the hand of his fair daughter, the Frederica von Ettenheim, the belle of Gottengen. Frederica was the prettiest German girl I ever saw, for this reason, that having been partly educated at Paris, French espieglerie relieved what had been, otherwise, the too regular monotony of her Saxon features, and imparted a character of sauciness —or "fierte" is a better word—to that quiethood, which is too tame to give the varied expression so charming in female beauty. The esprit, that delicious ingredient, which has been so lamentably omitted in German character, she had imbibed from her French education; and in lieu of that plodding interchange of flat common-places, which constitute the ordinary staple of conversation, between the young of opposite sexes beyond the Rhine, she imported the light, delicate tone of Parisian raillery—the easy and familiar gaiety of French society, so inexpressibly charming in France; and such a boon from Heaven; when one meets it by accident elsewhere. Oh! confess it, ye! who in the dull round of this world's, so called, pleasure—in the Egyptian darkness of the dinners and evening parties of your fashionable friends—sit nights long, speaking and answering, half at random, without one thought to amuse, without one idea to interest you—what pleasure have you felt, when some chance expression, some remark—a mere word, perhaps, of your neighbor beside you—reveals, that she has attained that wondrous charm—that most fascinating of all possessions—the art to converse; that neither fearful of being deemed pedantic on the one hand, or uninformed on the other, she launches forth freely on the topics of the moment, gracefully illustrating her meaning, by womanly touches of sensibility and delicacy, as though to say these lighter weapons were her own peculiar arms; while men might wield the more massive ones of sense and judgment. Then, with what lightness she flits along from theme to theme, half-affecting to infer that she dares not venture deep, yet showing, every instant, traits of thoughtfulness and reflection.

And now to come back to the students, whom, mayhap, you deem to have been forgotten by me all this time, but for whose peculiar illustration my digression was intended; it being neither more nor less than to show, that if Frederica von Ettenheim turned half the heads in Gottengen, Messrs. Eisendecker and Muhry were of the number. What a feature it was of the little town, her coming to reside in it! What a sweet atmosphere of womanly gracefulness spread itself, like a perfume, through these old saloons, whose dusty curtains, and moth-eaten chairs, looked like the fossils of some antediluvian furniture! With what magic were the old ceremonials of a professor's reception exchanged for the easier habits of a politer world! The venerable dignitaries of the university felt the change, but knew not where it lay, and could not account for the pleasure they now experienced in the vice-rector's soirees; while the students knew no bounds to their enthusiastic admiration; and "Die Ettenheim" reigned in every heart in Gottengen.

Of all her admirers, none seemed to hold a higher place in her favor than Von Muhry. Several causes contributed to this, in addition to his own personal advantages, and the distinction of his talents, which were of a high order. He was particularly noticed by the vice-rector, from the circumstance of his father's holding a responsible position in the Prussian government, while Adolphe himself gave ample promise of one day making a figure in the world. He was never omitted in any invitation; nor forgotten in any of the many little parties so frequent among the professors; and even where the society was limited to the dignitaries of the college, some excuse would ever be made by the vice-rector, to have him present, either on the pretence of wanting him for something, or that Frederica had asked him without thinking.

Such was the state of this little world, when I settled in it and took up my residence at the Meissner Thor, intending to pass my summer there. The first evening I spent at the vice-rector's, the matter was quite clear to my eyes. Frederica and Adolphe were lovers. It was to no purpose; that when he had accompanied her on the piano, he retreated to a distant part of the room when she ceased to sing. It signified not, that he scarcely ever spoke to her, and when he did, but a few words, hurriedly and in confusion. Their looks met once; I saw them exchange one glance—a fleeting one too—but I read in it their whole secret, mayhap even more than they knew themselves. Well had it been if I alone had witnessed this, but there was another at my side who saw it also, and whispered in my ear: "Der Zahme is in love." I turned round, and it was Eisendecker; his face, sallow and sickly, while large circles of dark olive surrounded his eyes, and gave him an air of deep suffering. "Did you see that!" said he, suddenly, as he leaned his hand on my arm, where it shook like one in ague.

"Did you see that?"

"What?—the flower."

"Yes—the flower. She dropped it, when she crossed the room. You saw him take it up—did'nt you?"

The tone he spoke in was harsh and hissing, as if he uttered the words with his teeth clenched. It was clear to me now, that he, too, was in love with Frederica, and I trembled to think of the cruel shock their friendship must sustain ere long.

A short time after, when I was about to retire, Eisendecker took my arm, and said. "Are you for going home? May I go with you?" I gave a willing assent, our lodging being near, and we spent much of every day in each other's chambers. It was the first time we had ever returned without waiting for Muhry; and fearing what a separation, once begun, might lead to, I stopped suddenly on the stairs, and said, as if suddenly remembering—

"By-the-bye, we are going without Adolphe."

Eisendecker's fingers clutched me convulsively, and while a bitter laugh broke from him, he said, "You wouldn't tear them asunder—would you?" For the rest of the way he never spoke again, and I, fearful of awakening the expression of that grief, which, when avowed, became confirmed, never opened my lips, save to say—"Good night."

I never intended to involve myself in a regular story, when I began this chapter, nor must I do so now, though, sooth to say, it would not be without its interests, to trace the career of these two youths, who now became gradually estranged from each other, and were no longer to be seen, as of old, walking with arms on each other's shoulders—the most perfect realization of true brotherly affection. Day by day the distance widened between them; each knew the secret of the other's heart, yet neither dared to speak of it. From distrust there is but a short step to dislike—alas! it is scarcely even a step. They parted.

Another change came over them, and a stranger still. Eisendecker, the violent youth, of ungovernable temper, and impetuous passion—who loved the wildest freak of student, daring, and ever was the first to lead the way in each mad scheme—had now become silent and thoughtful—a gentle sadness tempered down the fierce traits of his hot nature, and he no longer frequented the old haunts of the cellar and the fighting school, but wandered alone into the country, and spent whole days in solitude. Von Muhry, on the other hand, seemed to have assumed the castaway mantle of his once friend; the gentle bearing, and almost submissive tone of his manner, were exchanged for an air of conscious pride—a demeanor that bespoke a triumphant spirit—and the quiet youth, suddenly seemed changed to a rash, high-spirited boy, reckless from very happiness. During this time, Eisendecker had attached himself particularly to me; and although I had always hitherto preferred Von Muhry, the feeling of the other's unhappiness—a sense of compassion for suffering, which it was easy to see was great—drew me closer in my friendship towards him; and, at last, I scarcely saw Adolphe at all—and when we did meet, a mutual feeling of embarrassment, separated and estranged us from each other. About this time, I set off on an excursion to the Hartz mountains, to visit the Brocken, and see the mines—my absence, delayed beyond what I first intended, was about four weeks—and I returned to Gottengen just as the summer vacation was about to begin.

About five leagues from Gottengen, on the road to Nordheim, there is a village called Meissner, a favorite resort of the students, in all their festivals—while at something less than a mile distant, stands a water-mill, on a little rivulet among the hills—a wild, sequestered spot, overgrown with stunted oak and brushwood. A narrow bridle-path leads to it from the village, and this was the most approved place for settling all those affairs of honor, whose character was too serious to make it safe to decide nearer the university; for, strangely enough—while, by the laws of the university, duelling was rigidly denounced—yet, however the quarrel was decided by the sword, the authorities never, or almost never, interfered—but if a pistol was the weapon, the thing took a more serious aspect.

Toward the mill, I was journeying at the easy pace of my pony, early on a summer's morning, preferring the rural breakfast with the miller—for they are always a kind of innkeepers—to the fare of the village. I entered the little bridle-path that conducted to his door, and was sauntering listlessly along, dreaming pleasantly, as one does, when the song of the lark, and the heavy odors, of dew-pressed flowers, steep the heart in a happiness all its own—when, behind me, I heard the regular tramp of marching. I listened—had I been a stranger to the sound, I should have thought them soldiers—but I knew too well the measured tread of the student, and I heard the jingling of their heavy sabres, a peculiar clank a student's ear cannot be deceived in. I guessed at once the object of their coming, and grew sick at heart to think that the storm of men's stubborn passions, and the strife of their revengeful nature should desecrate a peaceful little spot like this. I was about to turn back, disgusted at the thought, when I remembered I must return by the same path, and meet them—but even this I shrank from. The footsteps came nearer, and I had barely time to move off the path, into the brushwood, and lead my pony after, when they turned the angle of the way. They who walked first, were muffled in their cloaks, whose high collars concealed their faces, but the caps, of many a gaudy color, proclaimed them students. At a little distance behind, and with a slower step came another party, among which I noticed one, who walked between two others, his head sunk on his bosom, and evidently overcome with emotions of deep sorrow. A movement of my horse, at this instant attracted their attention toward the thicket—they stopped, and a voice called out my name. I looked round, and there stood Eisendecker before me. He was dressed in deep mourning, and looked pale and worn—his black beard and moustache deepening the haggard expression of his features, to which the red borders of his eyelids, and his bloodless lips, gave an air of the deepest suffering. "Ah, my friend," said he, with a sad effort at a smile, "you are quite apropos. I am going to fight Adolphe this morning." A fearful presentiment that such was the case, came over me the instant I saw him—but when he said so, a thrill ran through me, and I grew cold from head to foot.

"I see you are sorry," said he, tenderly, while he took my hand within both of his—"but you would not blame me—indeed, you would not—if you knew all."

"What, then, was the cause of this quarrel—how came you to an open rupture?"

He turned round, as he did so, his face was purple, the blood suffused every feature, and his very eyeballs seemed like bursting with it—he tried to speak, but I only heard a rushing noise, like a hoarse drawn breath.

"Be still, my dear Eisendecker," said I, "cannot this be settled otherwise than thus?"

"No! no!" said he, in the voice of indignant passion, I used to hear from him long before, "never!" He waved his hand impatiently, as he spoke, and turned his head from me. At the same moment, one of his companions made a sign with his hand towards me.

"What!" whispered I, in horror—"a blow?"

A brief nod was the reply. Alas! from that minute all hope left me. Too well I knew the desperate alternative that awaited such an insult—reconciliation was no longer to be thought of. I asked no more, but followed the group, along the path toward the mill.

In a little garden, as it was called—we should rather term it, a neatly chosen grass plot—where some tables and benches were placed, under the shade of large chesnut trees, Adolphe von Muhry stood, surrounded by a number of his friends. He was dressed in his costume, as a member of the Russian club of the Landsmanschaft—a kind of uniform, of blue and white, with silver braiding on the cuffs and collar—and looked handsomer than ever I saw him. The change his features had undergone, gave him an air of manliness and confidence, that greatly improved him—and his whole carriage indicated a degree of self-reliance and energy, which became him perfectly. A faint blush colored his cheek, as he saw me enter—and he lifted up his cap straight above his head, and saluted me courteously, but with an evident effort to appear at ease before me. I returned his salute mournfully—perhaps, reproachfully, too—for he turned away, and whispered something to a friend on his side.

Although I had seen many duels with the sword, it was the first time I was present at an affair with pistols, in Germany—and I was no less surprised, than shocked, to perceive that one of the party produced a dice-box and dice, and placed them on a table.

Eisendecker all this time sat apart from the rest, and with folded arms, and half-closed eyelids, seemed to wait in patience for the moment of being called on.

"What are they throwing for, yonder?" whispered I to a Saxon student near me.

"For the shot, of course," said he; "not but that they might spare themselves the labor. Eisendecker must fire first; and for who comes second after him——"

"Is he so sure as that?" asked I in terror, for the fearful vision of blood would not leave my mind.

"That is he; the fellow that can knock a bullet off a champagne bottle at five-and twenty paces, may chance to hit a man at fifteen."

"Muhry has it," cried one of those at the table; and I heard the words repeated from mouth to mouth, till they reached Eisendecker, as he moved his cane listlessly to and fro in the mill-stream.

"Remember, Ludwig," said his friend, as he grasped his arm with a strong clasp; "remember what I told you."

The other nodded carelessly, and merely said—"Is all ready?"

"Stand here, Eisendecker" said Muhry's second, as he dropped a pebble in the grass

Muhry was already placed, and stood erect—his eyes steadily directed to his antagonist, who never once looked toward him, but kept his glance fixed straight in front.

"You fire first, sir," said Muhry's friend; while I could mark that his voice troubled slightly at the words. "You may reserve your fire till I have counted twenty, after the word is given."

As he spoke, he placed the pistol in Eisendecker's hand, and called out:

"Gentlemen fall back, fall back—I am about to give the word. Herr Eisendecker, are you ready?"

A nod was the reply.

"Now," cried he, in a loud voice; and scarcely was the word uttered, when the discharge of the pistol was heard. So rapid, indeed, was the motion, that we never saw him lift his arm; nor could any one say what direction the ball had taken.

"I knew it, I knew it," muttered Eisendecker's friend, in tones of agony. "All is over with him now."

Before a minute elapsed, the word to fall back was again given, and I now beheld Von Muhry with his pistol in his hand, while a smile of cool, but determined malice sat upon his features.

When the second repeated the words over to him, I turned to look at Eisendecker, but he evinced no apparent consciousness of what was going on about him; his eyes, as before, were bent on vacancy; his pale face, unmoved, showed no signs of passion. In an instant the fearful "now" rung out, and Muhry slowly raised his arm, and levelling his pistol steadily, stood with his eye bent on his victim. While the deep voice of the second slowly repeated one—two—three—four—never was anything like the terrible suspense of that moment It seemed as if the very seconds of human life were measuring out one by one. As the word "ten" dropped from his lips, I saw Muhry's hand shake. In his revengeful desire to kill his man, he had waited too long, and now he was growing nervous; he let fall his arm to his side, and waited for a few seconds; then raising it again, he took a steady aim, and, at the word "nineteen," fired.

A slight movement of Eisendecker's head at this instant, brought his face full front; and the bullet which would have transfixed his head, now merely passed along his cheek, tearing a rude flesh-wound as it went.

A half cry broke from Muhry; I heard not the word, but the accent I shall never cease to remember. It was now Eisendecker's time, and as the blood streamed down his cheek, and fell in great drops upon his neck and shoulders, I saw his face assume the expression it used to wear in former days. A terrible smile lit up his dark features, and a gleam of passionate vengeance made his eye glow like that of a maniac.

"I am ready; give the word!" cried he in frantic impatience.

But Muhry's second, fearful of giving way to such a moment of passion, hesitated; when Eisendecker again called out —"The word, sir, the word;" and the by-standers, indignant at the appearance of unfairness, repeated the cry.

The crowd fell back, and the word was given. Eisendecker raised his weapon—poised it for a second in his hand—and then elevating it above his head, brought it gradually down, till, from the position where I stood, I could see that he aimed at his heart.

His hand was now motionless, as if it were marble—while his eye, rivited on his antagonist, seemed to fix on one small spot, as though his whole vengeance was to be glutted there. Never was suspense more dreadful, and I stood breathless, in the expectation of the fatal flash, when with a jerk of his arm he threw up the pistol, and fired above his head; and then, with a heart-rending cry: of "Mein bruder! mein bruder!" rushed into Muhry's arms, and burst into a torrent of tears.

The scene was indeed a trying one, and few could witness it unmoved. As for me, I turned away completely overcome; while my heart found vent in thankfulness that such a fearful beginning should end thus happily.

"Yes," said Eisendecker, as we rode home together that evening, when, after a long silence, he spoke: "Yes, I had resolved to kill him; but when my finger was even on the trigger, I saw a look upon his features that reminded me of his earlier and happier days, when we had but one home and one heart; and I felt as if I was about to become the murderer of my brother."

Need I add, that they were friends for ever after.

A COURT PREACHER AND FATHER HYACINTHE.

[CONCLUDED.]

All thoughts, however, of anything but the highest enjoyment soon passed away; for, when the little bell had announced that the consecration was over, and the deep silence which followed it had lasted a few minutes, there suddenly arose high above our heads, like an angel singing in the air, the most exquisite woman's voice I almost ever heard, breathing out a Salutarius hostia with a sweetness and pearly clearness of tone which were unspeakably beautiful. The singer was unseen; but so full and rich was the lovely voice, that one could not even tell from what direction it proceeded, as, quite alone, with only the softest organ accompaniment, it filled the whole chapel for some time with its pathetic melody, and at last died away in a sort of langour of sweetness which seemed still to breathe from the air when it had already ceased. I was told afterward that it was probably the chief prima donna of the day, as the first singers are always employed in the Tuileries' Chapel. But I do not know certainly that it was; I only know that neither Jenny Lind nor other noted singers I have heard, ever left such an impression of beauty on my mind as that one soft strain of sacred music floating in the upper air of the quiet chapel. At last, mass was at an end. The emperor rose at once, and, bowing as he went, passed down towards the door. The empress stopped for a moment, with her son at her side, to say a few words to the Duchesse de C——, who was in the seat with me; and her gentle unassuming manner struck me very pleasantly. Then she, too, went on, followed by her ladies, and the whole train passed quickly from our sight.

Very different, indeed, from this aristocratic congregation were the masses who thronged the Church of the Madeliene, when the Carmelite monk, who has acquired an European reputation for eloquence, preached the sermon which has since been the cause of so much excitement in the ecclesiastical world of Paris. I was told that, unless I went an hour and a half before the time fixed, I should not get a seat, and I found this warning perfectly justified, for already when I went there the great church was half full, and, had I been only a few minutes later, I should have failed in getting the place near the pulpit which I was fortunate enough to obtain. Within half an hour after, there was not standing-room for the men, who filled every passage, and ladies were sitting on the steps, on the floor, on the railings, and wherever a few inches of space were to be found. Every class seemed to be represented in this enormous crowd—la haute aristocratie, as well as la bourgeoisie and the peasantry, many of whom seemed to have come from the country, while there were members, I believe, of almost every religious order in Paris.

There was much to interest in the aspect of this great crowd of Parisians, and the time passed quickly, till a quiet, low mass commenced at the altar; then, scarcely had the creed been said when the noiseless approach of the great preacher was detected, and he was seen kneeling down in the pulpit, which he had entered unobserved. In another moment he stood up and silently surveyed the enormous mass of human beings whom the fame of his rare gifts had drawn to the spot. Father Hyacinthe has a noble face; his marked, well-cut features are of a very refined type; his eyes are clear and penetrating, and, unlike the majority of religious, he does not keep them fixed on the ground, but looks out with a free; bold glance, which is full of candor and truth; he is pale and thin, but scarcely ascetic-looking, and, though he seems to be no longer young, the fringe of dark hair below his tonsure is untinged with gray. He wore an under-robe of brown serge, with loose hanging sleeves, and over it the white woollen habit of the Carmelites.

Perfect silence reigned through the vast church, and all seemed to wait breathlessly for the first words from the lips that have spoken the truth to France more boldly than any others in this age. At last his accents were heard; in a clear, vibrating tone, which rang to the uttermost limits of the vast fabric, he gave out the words, "I heard Thy voice . . . . and I hid myself." He did not pause to state whence the text was taken, but instantly plunged into a graphic and startling description of the first guilty man seeking so vainly, so madly, to hide from the eye of the Omnipotent Being who had created him. Then he passed to an able and thoroughly philosophical explanation of the manner in which the whole human race became tainted by this first sin, and its effects on individuals. In this, as in every other part of his sermon, when he touched on dogmas which modern scepticism has disputed, the preacher gave a detailed resume of the arguments brought by unbelievers against the truth, and refuted them with a withering sarcasm which was full of power.

Then he spoke of the terrible earthquakes in Mexico, which had caused the suffering he expected his hearers to relieve. What, he asked, was the primary cause of these catastrophes? He would tell them in plain words, though he knew the majority of his hearers would revolt against the statement—he would tell them that these calamities were the chastisement of sin!—the sin that steeps this whole beautiful world in pollution, that infests the great cities of civilization—the mountain villages, the hamlets of the plain—that walks the waters of the sea, and burrows in the depths of the earth, wherever human skill has led human beings with their passions and their crimes—and in the lands where those convulsions of Nature had taken place, had there not been slavery and crime, and bloodshedding and torture, under the very shadow of the Cross, planted there by the Christians who first took possession of them in the name of Christ?

As he spoke on this theme, the flood of natural eloquence with which this man is so remarkably gifted, burst from his lips, and his description of the guilty condition of this world, on which the eternally-righteous God is forever looking down with eyes too pure to behold iniquity, was simply magnificent, and not the less so for being thoroughly philosophical. It was plain that this monk was a man who had not feared to face the mystery of the origin of evil and all the dark problems which spring from that great center; but deep and difficult as was the theme on which he spoke, the stream of thought that bore him onward seemed to carry him out of himself, and his voice rolled like melodious thunder over the whole vast church, vibrating through the resounding air till every one of that great multitude must have heard and felt each word. As he terminated his wonderful picture of that horror of great darkness which morally underlies the outward beauty and sunshine of this lovely world, his ringing tones died away into a sort of moan, and he remained silent, his gaze fixed on vacancy, as if contemplating the awful images he had conjured up. After a few moment's silence, he seemed, as it were, to draw himself back from the dark thoughts that engrossed him; he came forward, and looked down from the pulpit on the vast audience. "You will ask me," he said, speaking very quietly, "why this just chastisement of sin is to take effect on the persons of a few only out of the guilty masses who throng this fair, sad world—why these are to suffer and we to escape—why the yearning earth and the mountain wave are to swallow up those hundreds of Mexico, while the thousands of Paris and the millions of Europe are left in ease and safety, in luxury and rest?" Again, for a moment, he paused, and sent his keen glance over the multitude of faces upturned toward him. Then he folded his arms, and said, calmly, Mes freres, je n'en sais rien." Not a sound interrupted the momentary silence which followed, but almost instantly he raised his right arm, and stretched it out with a solemn gesture, as he said, "The question you would ask me hollows out beneath my gaze a dark and fathomless abyss—the abyss of the mind of God. Deep in the hidden councils of the Omnipotent, to whom the myriad worlds that throng infinity are but as moats floating in the sunbeams of the morning, and who yet deals with each individual soul on this one puny globe, as if it alone existed for Him in all eternity—deep in the mysteries of his justice and of His mercy, ever active, yet never opposed, lies hid the solution of that problem before which I, a mortal man, can but bow my head in adoration and submission. But my brothers," he went on, a sudden animation kindling in his eyes till they seemed to glow as with fire; "I can see well and clearly that, in this age of intellectual inquiry, God needs some such witness as the cleaving earth of Mexico to prove His hatred of sin, and His power to chastise as well as to bless; for it is no more as in times of less mental progress and lower culture, when falsehood and unbelief appeared before men in their true guise, and, if embraced, were embraced as the enemies of God and of religion; it is now by the appeals to the highest qualities of our souls, to our finest instincts, that we are asked to throw off the trammels of the faith—it is in the name of truth and virtue and brotherly love that we are called on to deny the God of revelation; and error, in our generation—error itself, has become transfigured as an angel of light in the heaven of our most noble thoughts."

On this theme the preacher went on long, showing that he had guaged the depths of the rationalism and infidelity of the day, with such an uncompromising candor and keen intelligence as are not often brought to the task.

Drawing now to the close of his sermon, he spoke of the remedies, with which we were bound, at least, to combat the evils of which he had been speaking; and it was in this part of his discourse that the most remarkable feature of the whole became so prominent. This was the freedom and liberality of thought—the utter absence of anything approaching to ultramontanism which, in a preacher who was a Roman Catholic and a monk of one of that church's most ascetic orders, was certainly very extraordinary. The most large-hearted and independent orator, that ever spoke to a monster-meeting from a platform, could hardly have exceeded Father Hyacinthe in the breadth and liberality of his views—universal love, brotherly kindness—the whole world girt about with a mutual interchange of benefit, irrespective of differing creeds or nationalities—all barriers between human beings, the common offspring of a universal Father, thrown down—no limits of government, ecclesiastical or temporal, to separate brothers of the human race—no conditions imposed on mutual help—the gifts, the powers, the wealth of each, to become by the law of charity the treasury of all—such were, in substance, the counsels he addressed from a Roman Catholic pulpit to a Roman Catholic audience. He ceased, and disappeared from the pulpit almost as suddenly as he had entered it: in silence the vast audience waited for the conclusion of the mass, and then they poured out in one huge stream through the streets.

EDUCATION.—The most valuable part of every man's education is that which he receives from himself, especially when the active energy of his character makes ample amends for the want of a more finished course of study.

NOTICE.

To insure personal responsibility etc. for every article that shall appear in the MAGAZINE hereafter—except where specially requested to the contrary—every writer, from the editor down, will have his name attached to his contributions.

We shall insert no correspondence unless the full name and address of the writer are given. This name we shall not publish without permission, but we specially request our contributors always to allow us this privilege, as it presents greater evidence of fairness to the public; and fairness is what we are after.

We are on the eve of a great and an important crisis in our history, for the great question of conditional or "unconditional obedience" has to be decided. We shall open our columns only to such articles as are written in a spirit of kindness and moderation. No intemperate or personal article will be allowed to appear. In this way we hope to shame the efforts of those who attack by covert insinuations of a personal character. Let our weapons be those of reason and intelligence, and depend upon it truth will take care of itself. [ED.

THE LIMITS OF THE PRIESTHOOD.

BY E. L. T. HARRISON.

The Doctrine and Covenants say that "to every law there are certain bounds and conditions, and all creatures who abide not within these conditions are not justified." This applies equally to the law or principle by which men act in behalf of Deity as to anything else. The Priesthood are invested with power to act in behalf of the Heavens, but all its acts must be in righteousness to take effect, or to entitle them to the sanction of the Almighty.

This applies to everything the Priesthood do or say. They baptize for the remission of sins, and they may pronounce the sins of the candidate remitted, but unless he has truly repented, all their baptism and their words are as wind. When they bless, confirm or ordain, they promise certain things, but it is well understood that the Heavens are not bound to recognize their promises, unless the heart of the person so promised is in an acceptable condition.

The great difference between our Priesthood and that of the Roman Catholic Church has always been, that, while that Priesthood has believed it had power to cause the drapery of sin to drop off the sinner at a touch, by virtue of its authority, ours has always acknowledged it had no such power, but that the virtue of all its decrees depended upon certain conditions. This feature, modifying and restricting priesthood—so just, wise and elevated, drew our admiration years ago when we came into the church, and we personally preached it as one of the greatest beauties of our system, for half a score of years, in all the conferences of the Church wherever we traveled, without ever hearing one dissenting voice. Priesthood, theoretically at least, has been proclaimed by us all over the globe as a system, the authority of which was restricted within certain laws of right. All its decisions must be in righteousness, meekness, lowliness of spirit, and love unfeigned, to be recognized above. There must be no feeling of spite, jealousy, selfishness or ambition interwoven in the matter, or the whole of its decrees fall to the ground, and are as the chattering of the crows over our heads. It may curse, but unless it is done in perfect righteousness, the curses will but return with interest to the bosom of the utterer. In a word, the Priesthood is a power only to do right, and it can only act within the right. Outside of the right, it has no more force or influence with heavenly beings than the whisperings of the wind. Hence the security of every soul in the church from oppression and wrong. No elevation or dignity in the Priesthood can lift men up above these laws. Whether priest or archangel, it is the same; they have no power only within the right. The weakest child of earth has rights which no being in the universe can infringe upon. All dominion and position claimed by the loftiest and most omnipotent personages in existence has to bow before the rights of the smallest, and their very power and influence depend upon their doing so. It is only poor, ignorant creatures in mortality, clothed with the priesthood, who ever imagine that the fiat of any being in the Priesthood must be obeyed irrespective of all conditions.

The safety of members of the Church lies in the fact that the Priestoood upon this earth are amenable to a higher Priesthood behind the veil, from whom all their power emanates, and by whom all cases are finally settled. Were this not so, where would be the protection for any of us? We all know that men in the Priesthood, like men out of it, are oft-times selfish and ambitious, and, were there no provision of this kind, any man could get up a case against us at any time, and put a bar between us and God.

These are self-evident truths that require no arguing, but there is another principle by which the Priesthood is limited, and that is by the laws of nature. The Priesthood with all their binding and sealing power—all the Priests that ever lived, with all the authority of all the beings in the universe heaped into one, cannot force into union that which by nature is uncongenial. Hence, no matter what promises or decrees may have been made upon our heads, no father can claim his child, or husband his wife, where the father or the husband has failed to attract by the power of love. Where we have tied hearts to our own by cords of affection, the Priesthood, of course, can ratify that which nature, care and love, have already made one. But we need never fear that because some words have been uttered over us by a servant of God, that we shall therefore be forced to live for ever with any one to whom our souls do not naturally cling. Depend upon it, the finest instincts of the human soul, in man or woman, are cared for in the provisions of the Almighty. Where else would be our Heaven—where our Paradise?

There is another point which all will have to understand sooner or later, and that is, the Priesthood have no authority beyond that of persuasion and love. Every principle of compulsion is antagonistic to the true spirit of the Priesthood, which is based entirely on the power of attraction and superior intelligence. Where men cannot control by persuasion, they walk outside the limits of their Priesthood when they attempt to coerce by threats of excommunication, which are the strongest kind of compulsion that can be brought to bear on men's minds. No one knew better than the great founder of our Priesthood what its rights and limits were. The following words were written by Joseph Smith while in Liberty Jail, Clay County, Mo. 1838. They will stand as a protest against the spirit of compulsion in the Priesthood for ever. Hear them, O Latter-Day Saints, for they are the truest and fullest definition of the limits of the Priesthood ever given by mortal man. Speaking of certain ambitious men in the Priesthood, Joseph says,—

They do not learn the lesson that the rights of the Priesthood are inseparably connected with the powers of Heaven, and that the powers of Heaven cannot be controlled nor handled only upon the principles of righteousness; that they [the powers of the Priesthood] may be conferred upon us it is true, but when we undertake to cover our sins, to gratify our pride, vain ambition, or to exercise DOMINION or COMPULSION over the souls of the children of men in any degree of unrighteousness, behold the Heavens withdraw themselves, the spirit of the Lord is grieved—THEN AMEN TO THE PRIESTHOOD, OR TO THE AUTHORITY OF THAT MAN.

Joseph further says,—No power or influence can or ought to be maintained by virtue of the Priesthood, ONLY BY PERSUASION, by long suffering, by gentleness, by meekness and by love unfeigned. [Times and Seasons, Vol. 1, Page 131.

Here we have words that take us back to the spirit we felt when we first entered the Church. They fall on our ears like the words of Jesus, saying, "Come unto me all ye that are weary and heavy laden and I will give you rest." They are full of inspiration, and carry their own testimony with them.

In these words of Joseph we have a clear admission that the Priesthood were liable to use "compulsion and dominion over the souls of the children of men." The doctrine that the Priesthood cannot exercise unlawful authority is therefore swept away at one blow. We also see that the Priesthood, like everything else, can be perverted by the highest as well as the lowest; for Joseph, Prophet, Seer and Revelator as he was, says, "when WE undertake," etc., thus including himself among the rest.

From these words of Joseph it is clear that the true province of the Priesthood is to teach and influence, but not to dictatorially control. It is their right to teach true principles, and leave men to carry them out as far as they have light and knowledge, and not to enforce their teachings as governors. The Priesthood is simply a great and grand institution for teaching and propagating truth. It is its privilege only to influence mankind on the principle laid down by Joseph Smith, when he said concerning the Saints, "I teach them true principles and then they govern themselves." "DOMINION" is therefore no part of the Priesthood, except where it is the dominion of love. Where it becomes anything more than this, its beauty, its power and glory depart. It evaporates into thin air; it is less than nothing; for the Priesthood is only a power and a force for "persuasion" and love.

It may be asked where can compulsion possibly be exercised in our system? We reply, whenever any man lays down his inspirations or conceptions as the sole rule of right or wrong, and requires his brethren to admit their divinity —or, if they believe them incorrect—hold their peace thereon, on penalty of being branded as apostate, and cut off from all their hopes of life beyond the grave, and from all for which they have given a life's labor to establish on earth. This is the most fearful kind of "compulsion and dominion" ever exercised by mortal man: compared to which threats of prisons, or the gallows, are as nothing. Men that hold a penalty of this kind in their hands—one which touches men's souls to the very quick—and threaten to use it on all who differ in opinion—provided they publicly express that difference—and in the face of all this, still talk of "freedom of thought and speech," must have very curious ideas of liberty. What is the use of being allowed to differ if we must not use our efforts to have the obnoxious measure set aside. Far better not to be allowed to think at all.

It must be understood that, by the word Priesthood we refer only to its human representatives, and not to the divine and perfect system itself.

When Jesus, the Great Head of the Priesthood, was upon the earth, he said but little about his Priesthood or his authority, but spent his life in preaching principle. The writer has often thought how different this to his personal experience; for ninety-nine out of every hundred sermons he has heard, have been about "authority" and "doing as you are told." As far as we can learn, Jesus simply reversed all this. All Priesthood, as pertaining to his dispensation, was centered in him, and yet the word Priesthood was never in his mouth. All harsh, authoritative dictatorial words were foreign to his nature. In him the true spirit of the Priesthood reigned—a spirit that will yet prevail in every heart that bears the same Priesthood. If there is a different spirit than that in any of us to-day, it arises from the weaknesses and misconceptions of men. Priesthood in itself is one divine, eternal, unchangeable thing—essence of love, persuasion, gentleness, patience and charity, and eternal enemy of "dominion and compulsion," it reigns in the sanctified worlds of eternity, controlling by its attractions alone; and as such it will yet prevail and influence mankind when the misconceptions of mortality have passed away.

"SOPHISTRY AND SPECIAL-PLEADING."

At the late High Council trial held in this city, it was repeatedly asserted that the editorials of this Magazine were "full of sophistry." Since then, we have heard that the same charge has been reiterated in a still more public manner, with a statement that they contain "sophistry and special pleading," with the intention of placing "the acts and counsels of the Authorities of the Church, if possible, in a wrong light." Now, what we understand by sophistry is the use of an unfair, unsound, or a weak argument, colored up to give it effect. But nothing is clearer than that, inasmuch as the Magazines are on hand, if any such arguments are used they can easily be detected and pointed out. If the arguments are unfair, the unfairness can be shown. If they are unsound or weak, they can be overpowered with stronger ones. And this is what should be done. No one wishes more than we do to see their weakness if they have any, and it is only fair that those who so earnestly assert their sophistry should at least be able to show wherein it consists. If they do not show this, but continue to cry sophistry, all thinking people will be compelled to believe that such loose, undefined charges are merely made for want of something better to say. Our articles are still before the public, and it is easy enough to analyse them, and triumphantly expose their fallacy if it exists, and this is the very thing we want. We have been "dealt with;" not because the arguments were false, or the conclusions incorrect —for this no man has ever attempted to show—but, simply, because they differed with the views of some one else.

We have waited in vain for some one to show an incorrect statement or position in our articles, and we now urge that it be done at once, so that we all may be set right. Let our friends take up the subject of our workmen's wages, for instance, and let them controvert our assertion that no commercial fact requires their reduction more than one-third at the very outside. Let them expose the weakness of our article on the mineral development of the Territory, by showing that minerals are not the best commercial opening for our enterprize; or let them show wherein we have set the "counsels of the Authorities in a wrong light." If they are put in an unfair light, it is certainly due the public—and no more than we deserve—that it should be shown, and we exposed. In any of these ways can the sophistry be demonstrated. Unless this is done shortly, an impression will rest on the public mind that the articles are incontrovertible —a very bad view for the case to have, we should imagine, when it can be so easily removed.

OUR FAMILY DIFFICULTY.

BY EDWARD W. TULLIDGE.

I have been asked several times by my friends why I acted so strangely at the close of the trial of Elders E. L. T. Harrison and W. S. Godbe. The circumstance will perhaps practically illustrate much concerning their case and mine.

As I listened to their trial, and especially as it drew towards the close, it seemed much as though my friends were about to lay their necks upon the dreadful block. There was no reason for my rising and appealing to the executioners to "hold," nor in my broken prayer to my companions not to be beheaded after the blow was struck; but there was the impulse of the same mighty feeling that bore them up at their trial. I have since calmly placed my own neck upon the block, though I was overwhelmed with emotion at witnessing their ecclesiastical execution. This case is above even our own will. It is a matter of principle, conviction and conscientiousness. To men of honor and purpose there is no choice. All must abide the issue, and those of us who are cast into this fiery furnace by our convictions and conscience, must endure the fire even if it consumes us. Yet my dear brethren who were upon their trial on that day had been as deeply moved before they came to it as I was then. Think not that they have met the issue in a spirit of rebellion, or that hardness of heart has made them firm. We have all been tortured with an agony of thought and feeling, not at the dread of hells or devils, in which we believe not so much as we trust in God and revere Him for His character of love, but we have been tortured by our very yearning towards the brotherhood and the great man who has so long been to us in the position of a father. My own heart never yearned so much towards Brigham as on the trial in question, and the impulse was to urge my companions to renounce themselves, and be obedient to him in all things as little children. And this I am assured they would willingly have done, had it been merely themselves to renounce; but it was the truth, and the right, and the conscience of humanity, required to be renounced, and not the mere self parts. Had my friends done this, I should have dispised them, though, at the time, I could have plead with them most earnestly to humble themselves to the Priesthood, even as I have since respectfully invited its action upon myself, because I hold the same views as my brethren do upon priesthood, and not because I brave its authority.

At the trial, the opinion was held by the judges that the conscience of those at the bar was the peculiar mood of their state of mind; and as that state was declared to be an apostate state, it was therefore the apostate's conscience. I will not condescend to the special pleading which any advocate could make upon this point, for the advantage of an argument is not the aim of those who represent the MAGAZINE. Let us rather affirm certain great facts in harmony with this conscience and our views.

The conscience maintained in the case, is that of humanity, and not of an apostate few who dissent from the Priesthood of this Church. History is the most infallible revelation not only of the great human problem, but also of the Divine Mind and Will concerning mankind. We cannot do better than to take the Catholic Church as our example, especially seeing that in its Priesthood and assumptions it affords so many parallels to that of the Mormon Church at the present time. A few centuries ago the Roman Catholic Church, was almost omnipotent in the world. Its Priesthood held the assumption of infallibility, not of its sovereign Pontiff, but of its order; and princes and empires were at its feet. That Priesthood maintained, for a thousand years, the union between Church and State, and sought to bring mankind not only under a spiritual, but also a temporal rule. It accomplished that object as completely as did the Hebrew Priesthood, and a hundred times more extensively, for the Roman Catholic was worthy in some sense to be considered the universal Church of Christians. Take the comparison. The Mormons are one hundred and fifty thousand; say the Catholics were three hundred million. Here then in the Romish Church was a grand union of Christian disciples upon a faith and a line of thought laid down, as by rule and compass, through a Priesthood. Mark, then, how false was that faith and how fallible that thought, when both Providence and humanity have since made such solemn and overwhelming appeals against that faith and thought, even to the Catholics of the present age, who cast down kings, and believe that popedom erred in its assumption of temporal dominion. Why, there is scarcely a point which the old heretics or apostates affirmed, that the Catholic Church to-day will not itself affirm. Galileo and the Catholic Priesthood would not now urge their family quarrel, nor would the philosopher have to recant, and in a manifesto renounce one of the great truths of the universe only to affirm again in an aside, "The world moves for all that." Neither would they excommunicate my brother Eli B. Kelsey, to-day, for showing "How the World Has Grown," in its intellectual, social and moral states, moving along in its grand course towards God's ultimatum.

Let it also be further marked, that the old heretics did not design in their hearts to forsake the parental rule of their pontiffs, but simply to affirm the right of mankind to travel in self-development, and receive light and truth from the everlasting revelation of God and Nature. Of course these promptings of the Divine Spirit, extended in time to solemn affirmation of liberty of conscience, freedom of thought and speech, a free press, and the general rights of man as laid down in that grand declaration of human liberties and necessities made by the American people for all mankind. Out of these Divine and human movements grew this conscience of the man of thought and honor—patriots and reformers—and finally the conscience of nearly all the civilized world—Jew and Gentile, Protestant and Catholic, Infidel and Christian. It would seem from the revelations of history, that neither God nor the heretics designed in the first intention to forsake the Fathers of the Church. This forsaking was brought about chiefly by the Fathers of the Church themselves persisting in chaining mankind down to conditions against which both God and mankind rebelled. But is it not too much to say that God rebelled? Yet He certainly has been one in the case.

Come now again to our family difficulty. My companions, then, are simply affirming what the Protestants for ages have maintained, what the Puritans of England fought for, and what the American nation won in revolution, and asserted by "inspiration" in solemn manifestoes for themselves, their children and all mankind. What then can we do? One thing only: remain firm to our convictions and the truths of God as illustrated in human experience, even though it should lose us the love of those whom we have called our brethren, and his to whom we have looked up as children to a great father. I do sincerely believe that Brigham has been that great father to his people, though I also believe that he is aiming to bring his Mormon children into impossible social and religious conditions. Nevertheless, on all points where it is merely a question whom shall we follow, Brigham or our own perverse wills, I say follow Brigham Young, for at least he is one of the greatest rulers that the world ever saw. He who would captiously differ from him is a fool —not a wise man; he who would go against him, from the motive of rebellion, is a dishonest Mormon; and he who would for ambitious purposes seek to lead the people's hearts astray from him, is a designing knave; but he who seeing the impossibilities of the social and religious conditions designed to be established, protests against them from a clear conviction that they would lead mankind backward is found, by the irresistible impulse of a true conscience, in his right place.

Let me pass from this subject of our "Family Difficulty," to continue the articles on "Our Social Redemption," including the popular questions coming up, one of which touches the great fact of the future, that

UTAH CAN BE NO LONGER ISOLATED.

The growth of civilization is simply the growth of universality. In proportion as nations become universal in their relations one with another, do they throw off the barbaric remains of the primitive ages and come more into harmony with the great Commonwealth of all mankind. The epithets "Gentile Dog" and "Disbelieving Jew," are no longer applicable, either in the Jewish or Christian vocabulary. They belong to times when the human race was in isolated conditions, each petty nation or tribe foreign to the other, and all baptized in vindictive hates. Then a tiny Israel was to its Prophets the sum of the value of all the universe: hence the contemptuous term "Gentile Dog." Judah, however, has since become wiser and a hundred-fold greater in his grand republicanism, as citizen of every nation, than when, in Palestine, he maintained his isolated theocracy. On the other hand, modern Gentile humanity in its generosities, has wiped out the curse placed upon Judah's head, so that his seed are no longer a despised and a dispersed people; and such will be the case with the Mormon Israel when they are redeemed from their exclusiveness and isolation.

But, passing from general views, let us consider the practical bearings of Utah, touching the condition of her isolation. In the first place, that condition to her people is most unnatural and constrained. Her citizens, except those born in the mountains, or brought here very young, were reared in the midst of the European nations or in the States. From the teeming millions of civilized men we have migrated to Utah, and for a time have hid ourselves in the "chambers of the mountains." This was, however, for the sake of our religion, and not from the love of isolation, which has always been most irksome, especially to the English and Scotch. The empire-founding Americans, whose fathers as well as themselves had been trained to go into the wilderness to build up cities, have on their part tolerated isolation for a time, because their training was somewhat in harmony with the necessities of their Mormon career. But the Europeans, and especially the Scotch and English, have been educated to city life, and thousands of them brought up in factories. Isolation in the Rocky Mountains, to them has been almost like transportation, and nothing but their religion could have made it endurable. There is scarcely a soul who has come from London, Edinburgh, Glasgow, Birmingham and Manchester, who has not somewhat pined in isolation on the first arrival in Utah, until property has accumulated to make the condition tolerable. Isolation, then, is destructive to the life our religion, rather than preservative, though the growth of property around may increase our worldly satisfaction. Hence their leaders have often reproached the Saints from the old countries with the fact that faith has died out of their hearts after their arrival in Utah.

But there is a much more important view of this subject than the mere repugnance of a large number of the people of Utah to the condition of isolation. There is the great fact of the repugnance of the American genius against it; the determination of the nation's course against it; the irresistible destiny of the United States to overrule our will in the matter. No argument of a simple writer can weigh a feather either for or against the inevitable in this case; no wish of President Young and his people will affect it; nor could the will and deliberate design of the whole United States change it on either side the breadth of a hair. The case is like the ordinance of day and night, above all human will and purpose —as much above the counsellings of the righteous, as the deep designs of the wicked. God has doomed the isolation of Utah to pass away, and every event in which we are concerned is proving this. That fiat of Heaven cannot have reference to our hurt, but must have reference to our good. Were all the Priesthood in the world to resolve against it, the course of the United States would come up towards Utah, just as the course of the mighty ocean would be unbroken were we to resolve to turn it back.

This fact is appreciated by all the intelligent men in America, outside of ourselves, especially by the Government, Congress, and members of the Press. They urge the fact that Utah can no longer be isolated; that America is now on our borders, and that her course must run through our very destiny. The inference drawn is that the Mormons would persist in their resolve for isolation in opposition to the will and course of the United States. For my part, I view the points as follows:

Utah is a Territory of the American nation, and she ought to be and must be soon a State. However much, then, her people as a religious community might desire isolation, they cannot maintain it against the irresistible course of this nation. Nor, indeed, ought they to be foreigners to the American people. No special religious or social problem of our own can justify us in making ourselves as aliens to the commonwealth of our great country, nor should the parent government and citizens from other parts of the Union, treat the Mormons as outlaws whom the tide of the nation's progress has at length overtaken in their mountain home. The development of the Pacific coast, and the enterprise of the nation westward, is no longer a divided Mormon and Gentile problem, but one in which all are alike concerned, and as far as possible there should be fair play and a generous admission of rights.

I think on one side there has been too much taunting of the Mormons for their isolation, and too great a tenacity towards it on this side. The isolation of the past has been the legitimate result of our peculiar circumstances; and the consolidations of our priestly and social power have tended to build us up as a people and preserve our name in the world. Nevertheless, when our circumstances change, we should change the base of our operations; or the very forces which have built us up thus far, if continued in the same direction, may hereafter break us down.

We can scarcely touch upon this point of Mormon isolation and consolidation without thinking of the great man who has led us. It is not too much to affirm that had not God in his providence raised up Brigham Young, this Church would have been a chaos to-day. Its own erratic forces would have exploded it, just as now his very potency of character may overwhelm the preservative tendency of his mission and coerce his people against their will. Hitherto we have run in unity with him in his own course, because our will, confidence and interests have harmonized; but, in all deference to him, I believe that a leader should go with his people and the circumstances of the times, instead of forcing his people and the times to go with him. And doubtless this is still largely the fact, though there are coming up such matters as a free press, free thought, free speech; the workingmen's wages, the development of the minerals of this Territory, and the impossibility of our continued isolation and exclusiveness.

There is, however, upon these very points much distrust. On one side the Mormons, and especially their leaders, have cause for suspicion that the wishes of the people in the States are against the continuation of the "Mormon problem;" while the Government and the whole fraternity of the Press equally believe that the Utah Priesthood are determined to pursue their own course, even though they should come in contact with the will of the entire nation. There is, undoubtedly, much clear and keen appreciation on both sides in the case; and it becomes all, in justice and good purpose, to determine how much can be legitimately held of the situations on either side. Touching faith and the religious conscience of men, that is all clearly guaranteed by the genius and Constitution of America to Brigham and his people, but touching the right of the United States to encourage on the Pacific Coast the nation's enterprise, maintaining their governmental supremacy above a temporal theocracy, the case, I honestly believe, is on the side of America. These are matters with which the moment is pregnant, and, if they are noted by the writer, it is because they are in the present thoughts of the country. We should, therefore, nicely discriminate at this very pass, for we are on the turning point of our destiny.

Thoughts which are firmly spoken in love, are more loyal than those which are concealed by the policy of adherents. I have resigned a twenty-one years' standing among my brethren, because the Priesthood has just determined, in solemn High Council, against men who hold views in common with myself on most points, and, as this liberty of thought has been purchased at so great a cost, it is now only becoming manliness to maintain the advantage of a free press and respectfully give it an utterance.

VALUE OF CHURCH ORGANIZATION.

BY W. H. SHEARMAN.

Judging from their conduct, very many persons appear to think that the Gospel consists entirely of an outward organization, with certain officers, ordinances and laws, without which it has no existence, and upon connection with and obedience to which—regardless of the Spiritual life or righteousness of either—depends their Salvation. Poor humanity is always running into extremes: too much government or too little—despotism or anarchy, fanaticism or infidelity; contempt for all outward ordinances and ceremonies, or a blind faith in their efficacy, without the Spiritual life and blessings they were meant to represent or convey. Organization, priesthood, laws, ordinances, are especially necessary in our present condition; but they are only the machinery of the Gospel, not the Gospel itself—the mediums for making it known and diffusing its blessings among the children of earth. The Gospel—so far as its Spirit is concerned—is independent of all organizations—it existed before the establishment of any as pertaining to our earth, and would be none the less a living, sublime, glorious fact, were it possible to sweep away every vestige of its present organization from the face of our planet. The Gospel is the kernel; priesthood and laws the shell; the latter necessary for the preservation of the former, but absolutely worthless, like a shell without fruit, when destitute of the Heavenly spirit, light and inspiration which alone give to it power. Devoid of this, one system would be as good as, or rather, no better than, another. The Gospel is "glad tidings of great joy" to all mankind. What tidings? Why, that God, instead of being a revengeful tyrant, is a kind, loving, merciful Father, whose bowels of compassion yearn over His children; who so loves the world, and is so anxious to bless, elevate and develop all His children, that He has done and is still doing all He can to accomplish this end; has enlisted the sympathies and coöperation of the whole Heavenly world in the great cause of human development, and is ready to bestow His Spirit upon all who seek it, filling their souls with peace, joy and love ineffable, causing them also to rejoice in laboring to bless humanity. In short, as the Apostle beautifully expresses it,—"The Gospel is the power of God unto salvation;" or, as President Young has said, "The power of endless lives, of eternal increase and development." Hence, we see, that the Gospel, like gold, has an intrinsic value, whether moulded into any particular form or marked by any particular stamp, though, for convenience and increase of circulation, both have been subject to certain external regulations. It is not, however, sufficient that a coin bear the external form and impress which Government has decided,—it must have the true ring, and stand the test which distinguishes the base metal from the precious. On the same principle, spiritually speaking, may we judge of any system professing to be of Divine origin Says the Savior, "By their fruits shall ye know them."

It is true, the feelings of the majority of men have to be reached through and influenced by a system that appeals to their external senses, and that they find it much easier to accept the dogmas of others than to think for themselves, or to exercise that faith and labor necessary to obtain spiritual light within and Divine guidance to their own souls. Hence, in all ages, it has appeared so natural and easy for men to transfer to their religious leaders and teachers, that allegiance which they vowed and owe to truth and God alone. This has led, in past times, to the most terrible evils and abuses that a corrupted priesthood could perpetrate or sanction. Men became so puffed up by the flatteries of their servile followers, that they assumed to themselves prerogatives which Divinity itself never asserted nor exercised,—not content with lauding it over the world temporally, but, as was predicted by the Apostle John, "making slaves of the souls of men." This was the origin of all the evils attending the domination of the Roman Catholic Church. So long as men would acknowledge the supremacy of its priesthood and authority, they might do almost what they pleased with comparative impunity. To question the infallibility and divine authority of its sovereign pontiff, was a worse crime than to take the life of a fellow creature. To doubt a dogma of the "church" was a sure sign of a corrupt mind and of impending perdition. Such is the tendency of all priestcrafts, because ignorance and slavery, physical and mental, are necessary to their perpetuity. Hence they hold their subjects in thraldom by superstitious fears and threats of divine displeasure.

To what should our faith and obedience be pledged? To the Truth. This is Nature's law, God's law—the higher law, which supercedes, and annuls everything that comes in contact therewith. He who is not faithful to his own perceptions of Divine truth, no matter who or what else he obeys, is a traitor to God and humanity. How far, then, should mankind obey their teachers and leaders, spiritual or temporal? Just so far as their teachings or requirements are in accordance with the will of God, the laws of nature.

and the rights of humanity. No Divine appointment ever did, or ever will, authorize any man to trample or infringe upon the poorest, meanest or most ignorant of his fellows. Were it possible for the Almighty himself to wilfully wrong one of the least of his intelligent creatures, he would cease to be God, and we should be absolved from that allegiance and worship which is due only to the personification of truth, justice, mercy and love.

Let no one imagine, from the preceding remarks, that the importance or necessity of organization and Priesthood si undervalued. The object is simply to show the necessity of enjoying the spirit of the Gospel as well as attending to its forms; of not only being led and guided by a divinely inspired Priesthood, but of also possessing the spirit of truth to enlighten our own minds, that we may be intelligent, humble, joyful co-workers with all holy beings in the great cause of the freedom, elevation and perfection of humanity.

MUSIC IN THE SETTLEMENTS.

BY PROFESSOR J. TULLIDGE.

FISHBURN'S CHOIR, BRIGHAM CITY.

In my first article on Music in the Settlements, I remarked that the progression of the divine art, in the City wards or in towns outside, depended much upon the interest rendered to its votaries—both instrumental and vocal—by the bishops in their various localities. My object in repeating this assertion is to make it known that wherever I have found a music-loving bishop, I have invariably found a creditable choir, and, in many instances, a good band also.

I think that it is pretty generally understood that President L. Snow, as well as his sister, Miss E. Snow, are not only fond of all that is beautiful in poetry but are also lovers of the sweet sounds of music, and I believe both of them have a high appreciation of the two arts combined.

About three years ago, with a view of understanding the progression of music in the Settlements, I started on a professional tour North. On this occasion I was accompanied only by two of my lady pupils: Mrs. S. A. Oliphant and Miss Mary Culen; I accordingly wrote to President L. Snow for his patronage, also for his interest with Mr. Fishburn to assist my small party at this concert.

When I arrived at Brigham City I and my little vocal selection were most hospitably entertained by President Snow at his residence, and we had a pleasant time with him in conversing on musical and other subjects; this conversation gave me the idea I entertain of his pure love of music.

At the period I have named, Mr Fishburn had just left, by request of President Snow, the direction of the choir at Smithfield, and had come to reside at Brigham City to conduct and instruct a body of singers at that place.

As the voices which Mr. Fishburn had then under his direction, had not been organized for four-part harmony, nor drilled sufficiently for effective rendition of compositions, I thought it unfair to request a hearing of his newly-formed choir under these unfavorable circumstances. However, I found this gentleman to be gifted with the true spirit of Apollo's sons and daughters, as he immediately offered, without fee or reward, to place himself and all those under his direction, who were efficient, at my service, and, with this assistance, we managed to give a very creditable entertainment, much to the satisfaction of those who attended it.

I had almost forgot to mention that the Bishop, as well as President Snow, used his interest to forward the entertainment, and he also lent me his organ for the accompaniment. I am led to believe, from observations made on my visit to Brigham City, that, in a great measure, the interest and patronage of President Snow and the Bishop have been an incentive to the exertions of Mr Fishburn, and have enabled him to keep his choir together; a selection from that body has given much satisfaction, by their performance of many excellent compositions, at several Conferences in this city.

With this introduction of Mr. Fishburn and his choir, at the period I have named, I will, by way of introduction, make a few remarks on this gentleman's method of drilling and conducting the choral body under his direction.

The opinion I at present entertain, is gathered from an experience of their rendition of pieces at Conference times.

In reviewing the conducting of musical compositions by Mr. Fishburn, and the performance of the same by his choir, I will here state that the few remarks I might make on the subject will be more for the guidance of conductors and principal singers in general, than for being personally critical.

I will say that I admire the principle of amalgamating the voices, adopted by Mr. Fishburn in the performance of pieces by his choir.

Lights and shades are exceedingly pleasing and also produce much effect in music; in fact, when it is perfectly brought out, it is Nature's beautiful coloring.

To explain more fully my meaning to the musical student, I will say that it is to understand the method of obtaining in its purity the piano, pianissimo, mezzo-forte, fortissimo, crescendo, and the decrescendo. When these points are gained by systematic training, the effect produced on the uncultivated as well as on the cultivated musician, will afford much pleasure. Although Mr. Fishburn has hit on one of the most pleasing methods of rendering effect in music, and, in a great measure, has succeeded in producing coloring beauties, I must say, that, although the shades are by no means perfect, they are better portrayed by his choir than by any other I have heard in the Settlements. Mr. Fishburn has not been professionally trained in vocal renderings, nor has he had a professional experience in conducting choral bodies, therefore much credit is due to him for what he has done, and doubtless has pleased and satisfied a vast amount of his hearers by his teaching and conducting.

I will now speak of the method adopted by eminent vocal teachers to obtain a perfect rendition of musical lights and shades.

To obtain, in vocalization, fine, artistic coloring, it is necessary to have a thorough knowledge of the use of the diaphragm, which will produce the sotto voce, or under-tone delivery. I have slightly touched on this subject when reviewing the choral department of the Murphy and Mack Minstrel Troupe. The thorough command of the voices, in this respect, displayed by that troupe, was the greatest beauty of their choral renderings; in fact, it was the crowning success of their songs. As I only, on that occasion, pointed to the effect produced by the sotto voce, I will on this, as I have before stated, explain the method for its acquirement.

The perfect piano with its various shades, the forte with its changes, and the crescendo and decrescendo beauties, can only be made effective by the thorough command of the voice in the under and full chest tone delivery. The pianos and fortes, without this species of practice, will not only lack the effective delivery but it will produce a throaty tone.

In order to obtain these perfect shades, great attention must be paid to the training of the voice as to breathing. The point of practice is to sustain a sound during several bars.

For want of space in this number I am compelled to leave my subject somewhat abruptly, but in the next I will endeavor to make my meaning plain to the musical student.

THE LOTTERY DREAMER.

CHAPTER IV.

THE TERNO.

It was a Friday evening about a month after the day of the "merenda" in the Cascine and the conversation following it, which has been recorded in the last chapter. And the same four persons were once again together in the little shop on the Ponte Vecchio. Upon this occasion, however, the party of four was not divided into two pairs as had then been the case, but were all assembled in the larger front shop. Carlo's proposition had been duly made to the old jeweler, as had been projected; and the result had fully confirmed the sagacity of his judgment on the subject. As soon as old Laudadio had been made to understand that it was intended to assure to him a home and maintenance, together with unbounded command of his own time, and ample leisure for pursuing studies which had become his master passion, he jumped at the proposal. All the feelings which would once have arrayed themselves in opposition to it—the citizen's pride, the artist's pride, the householder's pride—had long since died out under the blighting encroachment of the one domineering thought, like the healthful vegetation that perishes beneath the baleful shado of the upas-tree. Carlo had judged rightly. The lottery, which had killed so much else, had killed all these things in the old man.

The proposed arrangements, therefore, had all been brought to bear prosperously. The marriage of Carlo and Laura was fixed for the following Sunday. It was to take place in the quiet little church of Santo Stefano, which serves as a parish church for the houses on the northern part of the bridge. After some delay and trouble the necessary papers and certificates were all in order. Carlo, like most others of his class and generation, had not been near a confessional box for a long time. But it was neccessary to do so, and to have a certificate to that effect, before he could be married. And he had, not without considerable repuguance, gone through the ceremony, and obtained his papers accordingly. On the morrow the necessary agreements between him and old Vanni were to be formally executed before a notary; and the neat tablet, with the words, "Carlo Bardi, Jeweler and Goldsmith," in letters of gold on a blue enamelled ground, which had been duly prepared, was to be put up over the narrow little door, in the place now occupied by the half-effaced and faded name of Laudadio Vanni, which had been written there in old-fashioned black letters on a white ground more than half a century ago. This morrow, in short, was to be a very busy day with Carlo. The goods in which he had invested his little capital for the stocking of his shop had all been purchased, some in Florence, and some in Paris. The latter were still in the custom-house; some of the former not yet delivered. But Carlo hoped to have them all safe under his own roof by the Saturday night, and looked forward to a long day of hurry and bustle. Laura was to be equally busy in receiving the goods, arranging, cataloguing, and examining, all day long.

This Friday evening, therefore, was the last quiet hour before the marriage, and the last of the old jeweler's life as a householder and master tradesman. His life-long friend, Niccolo, had accordingly chosen this evening to bring his congratulations—and the bride's dower.

"Here they are, friends," said the cavaliere, producing two long rouleaux wrapped in paper, that looked as yellow as an old man's life-long treasured packet of love-letters; "here they are, two fifties, just as I rolled them up something like twenty years ago. They have never been touched since, though many a time there has been sore need of them. But trust old Cola Sestioi for that! Sure hind, safe find! And now, Laura mia," he added, as he put the heavy rolls into her hands, "there they are, and the keeping of them is off my mind."

"You know, Caro Signor Cavaliere," said Laura, "that grateful as Carlo and I are for an assistance so important to us, there is little more to be said about it than we ought to say every day. For God knows how things would have gone with us but for you. You must be tired of being thanked, and anybody else would be tired of doing the good deeds to be thanked for. Here Carlo," she added, as she put the packets into his hands, "you have not to learn now all that my godfather has been to me."

"Thanks, Signor Cavaliere, for my Laura's dower," said Carlo, as he got up to take the money, extending as he did so his right hand to the old man, "and a thousand times more thanks for your approval of our marriage. I will lock up the dollars, and leave them yet a little longer in their old wrappings. But I am afraid that their long repose is very nearly over."

And so saying, Carlo proceeded to place the two rouleaux in an iron-doored strong safe, constructed in the thickness of the wall; just opposite to the staircase, which opened in the doorway between the front and back shop. Carlo turned on them the massive key of the safe, and put it in his pocket, thus exercising the first act of mastership of the house.

"Godfather, thirty-seven; dower, twenty-five; marriage, twenty-eight," cried Laudadio, raising from his old arm-chair in great and evident excitement. "The very numbers! The numbers I ——" He checked himself, looking round on his three auditors with a sharp glance, half timid, and half suspicious; but continued, as he paced to and fro the few steps to which the limits of the little shop confined him, muttering to himself, "Was there ever a clearer indication? It satisfies all the rules. All, all! This at least is clear. At last! at last! And yet——Friends," continued the old man, reaching his hat from the peg on which it hung, "I must go out for a short time. I shall not be long. I will be with you in half an hour. Cavaliere, I shall find you here when I come back?"

Old Sestini and the young couple glanced at each other as the old man left the shop, and the former was the first to speak.

"They did come pat enough, the three numbers, it must be owned; didn't they, now? and all on the same subject, too, as one may say: godfather, dower, and marriage! Well, that is remarkable! Who knows, who knows!"

Carlo shrugged his shoulders, with an expression which consideration for Laura barely sufficed to keep half way between contempt and pity.

"Has he any money in his pocket; Laura?" asked he; for the errand on which old Laudadio was gone was evident enough to them all.

"Not more than a paul or two, dear Carlo, I know for certain," replied Laura; "and to-night, you know, for the last time, you won't object——"

"Nay, Laura mia, I say nothing," rejoined Carlo, rather sadly; "but as for the last time, I hope your father has some years of life before him yet; for a lottery player there is no last time till his own last hour."

"It would be hard on Vanni if he had not a ticket for to-morrow," remarked the cavaliere. "The drawing takes place in Florence, and it must be much pleasanter to see the numbers come up, one by one, than merely to read them all in a lump, two or three days afterwards. Besides, who knows? as my old friend so justly observed. I have great confidence myself in Laudadio Vanni's science. Such a head as he has!"

"But you don't avail yourself of the suggestions indicated by his science, Signor Cavaliere," said Carlo, with a dash of satire in his tone, which was quite imperceptible to the worthy ex-clerk.

"I? No, I don't. Why should I? Don't you see, Signor Carlo, I have got my crust, my cup of coffee, and my cigar, sure and safe, every day, as sure as the sun rises. I might lose them if I were to play ever so wisely. And I could not make Sunday begin over again, when Sunday night is come, if I won the biggest terno ever played for," said the old cavaliere, with more philosophy than he guessed.

Meantime, Landadio Vanni did not go at once, as his friends supposed he would, to the nearest lottery office, and there empty his pockets of their little all in exchange for a scrap of paper. He was in too high a state of nervous excitement for this. Those three numbers, which he had so promptly matched with the things to which they are appended in the cabalistic volume described in a former chapter, had, as he, correctly or not, persuaded himself, occurred to him in his dreams. It was, indeed, likely enough that they might have done so. The three ideas with which his "science" connected them had of course naturally enough been in his thoughts lately, And as his morbid mind incessantly and habitually fixed itself upon the numbers suggested by every incident, every object, and every idea which presented itself to him, and as these numbers were the continual subject of all his waking meditations, it is likely enough that he might have dreamed of them. At all events, to the old jeweler's diseased mind, the reiterated suggestion of these figures appeared, to be proof, "plain as heavenly writ," that these were the fortunate numbers, which, duly backed, would lead him on to fortune.

To minds in any degree accustomed to observe or examine the connection of cause and effect, it seems altogether impossible that any human being, not perfectly insane, should imagine that information of the numbers about to be drawn at hazard out of a wheel should thus be communicated to him. And, in truth, the existence of such a persuasion would be utterly incredible, did we not see it existing, and actively influencing, large numbers of persons, in other respects as sane as the average of mankind. A moment's consideration of the phenomenon sets one speculating as to the possible theories of these lottery devotees respecting the world they live in, the government, and the eternal and almighty governor of it; thoughts too large and serious, maybe, for this light page! Yet they are such as necessarily and properly rise from the subject of it; and without them we should fail to appreciate duly the thick and heavy darkness of the spiritual night—a darkness surely equal to that of the "untutored mind" of any fetish-worshipping Indian—which envelops the pupils of a "paternal" government and a dominant orthodox church.

It is difficult to imagine the nature of the workings of a mind under the hallucination which possessed poor old Laudadio Vanni. But, assuredly, doubt had no place among them. Success, the long-delayed reward of his studies, patience, and perseverance for long years, was now within his grasp! But how was he to avail himself of the great opportunity? Fortune slighted would assuredly never offer her favors a second time! Cruel, cruel fate! to place the prize within his reach just when he was unable—all but unable—to profit by the golden chance!

Tormented with these thoughts, the old man turned from the bridge, down the Via degli Archibusieri towards the Uffizi, and began pacing to and fro beneath the colonnade that faces the river. Pulling from his pocket the old leathern bag that served him for a purse, he emptied the contents into his lean and shaking hand, and counted up the amount of the various small coins. There was one paul, one half paul, a piece of two crazie, or quarter of a paul, and several of the small thin copper coins called soldi, the twentieth part of the lira, and containing twelve denari. The lira is worth eightpence; and its two hundred and fortieth part, the denaro, no longer exists in the body, but only as a money account. These Lire, Soldi and Denari are the originals of our £ s. d., but while prosperity and progress have with us pushed up the value of the coins to pounds and shillings, they have remained in Italy, during her period of stagnation, more nearly of their original worth. So that, although Laudadio counted up one pound ten shillings and eightpence, his whole available assets amounted only to an unstatable fraction more than a shilling.

Now this sum, invested in a ticket for a terno, would, in case of success, produce a prize of some twelve hundred crowns, or about two hundred and fifty pounds; a very large sum to Laudadio Vanni, but far from sufficient to repay him with interest all the moneys he had, in the course of his long life, sunk in lottery tickets. And he considered that Fortune owed him nothing less than this, and that she was now at last ready and willing to discharge all her debt to him, if he could only comply with the indispensable conditions. To make no more than twelve hundred dollars out of the great and sure opportunity now offered to him, seemed a stroke of misfortune and ill luck more difficult to bear than all the disappointments his worship of the blind goddess had hitherto exposed him to. Visions of riches paraded themselves before his mind, riches which should not only bring with them all the advantages which usually accompany them, but which should triumphantly justify in the face of all Florence, and especially of his own friends and family, his wisdom and prudence, and the accuracy and value of his much-boasted science. The more he thought of all this, and the more he pictured to himself the certainty of success, the more the small sum at his disposition seemed altogether contemptible and insignificant.

"If only they would believe me!" he muttered, as he continued in increasing agitation and excitement to walk up and down beneath the dark colonnade, turning over and over in his hands the poor little coins, for which he felt a growing contempt. "If only they in their ignorance would trust the knowledge gained by half a century of study and education! But they are obstinate as ignorance always is. And for whose sake do I need wealth now? Not for my own, I trow. And I could make their fortune for them! All too late for me! But I could make for them a life and position such as my Laura deserves, and such as Carlo Bardi has never dreamed of! And all that is wanting is a few dollars, which they have, and of which they can have no need, till after they will have been installed to them tenfold—a hundred-fold!—a thousand-fold!"

The old man had quickened his pace as these thoughts were passing through his mind; and he continued his walk, even quicker and quicker for some minutes, gesticulating with his arms, and ever and anon coming to a sudden stop in his walk. At last he turned towards the bridge, and slackening his pace considerably, and bending his face more than usual to the ground, he reached the door of his own shop. He paused before putting his hand to the door; looked with a sharp suspicious glance up and down the bridge; pulled a check blue handkerchief from his pocket, with which he wiped the drops from his brow; tossed with an impatient movement the coins he had been counting into his coat pocket, and then entered the little shop.

It was by that time about half-past nine o'clock, and the cavaliere and Carlo were thinking of saying good night. They all took it quite as a matter of course that the old man had been to the office, and had expended all the money in his pocket in a lottery ticket.

"You'll be watching the drawing to-morrow, my friend," said Sestini. "Shall I come with you? If you will, we can meet at the café in the piazza."

"No! I don't know—perhaps I shall not go to-morrow," replied the old man, hesitatingly; but added, after a pause, "well! yes! we will go together. I will look for you at the café a little before mid-day."

Laura and Carlo had meanwhile said their good nights, and once again he and the cavaliere left the shop together.

"Let us go to bed, Laura," said the old man, as soon as ever they were gone. "You will have a long day's work to-morrow, and I am sleepy."

Laura was rather surprised to hear him say so, for his usual habit was to sit up long after she had gone to her closet over the back shop. But she made no remark, her mind being, as may be supposed, full enough of her own thoughts.

"Good night, father," she said; "sleep well, and dream of the numbers of your terno for to-morrow;" and so saying, she climbed the steep stair to her miniature bedroom, leaving him to follow her up the ladder-like stair.

Laudadio went to the door of the shop, opened it and looked out anxiously, as it seemed, first in one direction, then in the other, then closing it, put his hand to the heavy bolts and locks, which he moved, as if securing the shop for the night. Yet he turned no lock, and shot no bolt, but, leaving the door thus simply closed, proceeded to climb the stairs, and entered his room over the front shop. There, instead of beginning to undress himself, he seated himself on the bedside, and remained perfectly still for ten minutes or a quarter of an hour. Opposite to the bed was a sort of cupboard contrived in the thickness of the wall, by the side of the one small window that lighted the room. To this he then went, and from behind some articles of clothing on the uppermost shelf, drew forth a large key. Having possessed himself of this, he again sat down on the bed for several minutes. He then arose, and creeping noislessly to the stair-head, again paused there some minutes. It might have been thought impossible for the old man to have descended the steep narrow stair with the perfect noiselessness with which he contrived to do it. Once at the bottom, he rapidly, but with caution to avoid the slightest sound, poured from his lamp a drop or two of oil on the wards of the key in his hand, and then applied it to the door of the safe in which Carlo had locked the cavaliere's hundred dollars. The key was, in fact, a duplicate one, laid aside when the other had years ago been entrusted to Laura for the nightly custody of the more precious articles in the shop, and long since forgotten, till the recollection of it had unfortunately occurred to the old jeweler, during his pacing under the Uffizi colonnade.

In less than a minute the two rolls of dollars were in his hands, and leaving the lamp burning on the work-bench, he stealthily stepped through the doorway on to the bridge, and quietly closed the door behind him.

Laudalio Vanni had been, though a gambler during the latter part of his life, yet an upright, honorable, and strictly honest man throughout all the many years of it, and it was in vain that he strove to conceal from himself the nature of the action he was now committing. The big drops stood on his wrinkled brow, and dropped from the ends of the straggling silver locks that fell on either side of his hollow emaciated cheeks. He trembled visibly; and instead of hastening at once on his errand, he paused at the top of the bridge under the colonnade, which at that part of it leaves the river visible. It was by this time nearly half-past eleven. The lottery offices on the night previous to the drawing remain open till twelve. After the first stroke of the clocks sounding midnight, no stake could be played for the morrow's drawing. Yet still he paused. It seemed as if he were half minded to give his honor and fair name the advantage in their struggle with the demon which possessed him, of the chance that he might be too late to accomplish his purpose.

There is under the arches, in the space void of houses, at the top of the bridge, an ancient and dingy picture of a Madonna, in a wooden tabernacle against the wall, and a little dimly twinkling oil-lamp was burning before it. He examined the two rolls of money in the faint ray of light thrown by this lamp, to ascertain that there was no writing on the paper in which they were wrapped; and then turned towards the parapet, and leaning on it again paused, while the minutes ran on quickly towards the moment at which the power of the tempter would be at an end. It wanted now but ten minutes of the time. But there is no part of the city in which that is not more than ample time enough for reaching a lottery receiving house. The paternal government takes care that the demon of play shall be ever at every man's elbow.

"What would they think of me," he cried, suddenly—"what would they think of me, if they knew all that I know, and knew, also, that I hesitated to obtain the prize for them? The money won with their money will be all theirs, of course. When I give it them, I shall say: 'Now will you believe that your old father's days and nights of study are worth something?'"

And as he muttered thus to himself, he hurried to the well-known counter, and thrusting himself among the crowd of wretches who were staking the half-pence they had succeeded in procuring just in time, he startled the clerks by putting down his two roleaux for a terno on the numbers, 37, 25 and 28.

The officials in these hells are not unaccustomed to strange sights. Remark on them in no wise enters into their functions. So the money was swept up; and the vile looking little strip of coarse grey-blue paper was duly scrawled over, signed, sanded and put into his shaking hand.

As he quitted the den, the great bell of the palazzo vecchio began to toll twelve. The yawning clerks shut up their books, and "the game was made" for that week.

After having first secured the precious document in an inner pocket, Laudadio's first movement was to return to his home, and he began to walk in that direction. But his steps became slower and slower, and by the time he had reached the foot of the bridge, he felt that he could not endure to pass the remaining hours of the night in the stillness of his little room over the shop. He felt a strange reluctance, too, to enter his house again, and pass by that safe in the wall at the bottom of the stairs. No! he would go home no more, till he should go in with his triumph and his justification in his hand. So he turned back once more towards the Uffizi colonnade, and again paced forwards and backwards under the now silent and deserted porticos.

But strangely enough, the result of the desperate stake he had played for, which had seemed to him so safe and certain an hour ago, while the "to be or not to be" was still in his own hands, began, now the fatal step was taken, and the irrevocable die cast, to appear less inaccessible to doubts as to the issue. It was one of those revulsions of feeling which the most compendious scheme of ethical philosophy loves to ascribe to the immediate action of the traitorous fiend; but which the students of mental phenomena would attribute to the sense of powerlessness which takes possession of us on the completion of an irrevocable deed, aided, in poor Laudadio's case, by the importunate reproaches of his conscience. It was in vain that he repeated again and again to himself that he was only doing far better for his child with her money than she could do for herself, in vain that he argued that as her father he had some right to act for her, and watch over her interests. The genuine utterances of the still small voice are less easily overborne and put down than the dictates of the intellectual powers. The old man might succeed in persuading himself that the numbers to be drawn from the lottery wheel on the morrow were revealed to him by his waking and sleeping dreams; but he could not for an instant bring his conscience to absolve him for the deed he had done. The great prize for which he had been hoping for so many years, was now, as he told himself again and again, as good as won: a greater prize, indeed than he had ever hoped for, for he had never before had the power of risking so large a sum at one time. Yet probably never in his life had Laudadio Vanni passed a more miserable hour than that which he spent in his midnight pacing under the colonnade of the Uffizi.

At length, wearied in body as well as in mind, he betook himself to the great "loggia" of the piazza. Every one who remembers Florence, remembers this magnificent structure by Orcagna, its wonderful noble arches, and the assemblage of masterpieces in marble and bronze collected beneath its lofty roof. At the back of the building a broad stone bench runs along the wall, and on that Laudadio stretched the long length of his gaunt and weary limbs to await the coming of the dawn. Many a worse sleeping chamber might be lighted on by a weary man than that masterpiece of architecture, proportion and beauty, all open as its vast arches are to the mild breeze of the Italian summer night. But no bed of down could have brought sleep that night to the old lottery gambler. The stake to be decided by the events of the morrow was too tremendous a one to him. For it will be readily understood that now—strangely inconsistent creatures as we are—the amount of money to be won was the least important part of the interest that for Laudadio hung on the dirty scrap of paper in his pocket.

At last, towards morning, he fell into a kind of uneasy doze, from which he was awakened soon after dawn by the workmen coming to erect the scaffolding for the ceremony of the drawing. The grand "loggia" of Orcagna, in the principal square of the city, is the spot chosen for this purpose, and the carpenters and upholsterers were come to make their preparations. Many a condemned man has been waked from his last earthly sleep by the noise of the erection of a scaffolding for a more terrible, though scarcely less pernicious purpose, and has met the coming day with more apathy than Laudadio felt at these preparations for his triumph or intolerable overthrow! How to get through the next six or seven hours? That was now the most immediate question. Remain quiet, he could not. Besides, he was too well known in Florence; and it would have been too strange, perfectly well as his devotion to the lottery was known to all the world, for him to have been found there at that hour of the morning. So he slunk away from the piazza, and passing through the obscure streets which lie at the back of the palazzo pubblico, reached the large square in front of the church of Santa Croce. The vast building was already open, and at a far altar in the transept a few old men and women were hearing, or rather looking at, a morning mass. Here a seat, silence and solitude, were to be had; and Laudadio entered the church and seated himself in a dark corner of the transept, opposite to that in which mass was being said. Here the deep silence of the place, and the fatigue of his sleepless night, gave him the advantage of a couple of hours of forgetfulness. It was nearly eight when he awoke; and he thought he might then venture to go and look at the preparations in the square. He found all there in readiness. There was the gaily decked raised platform, like a box at a theatre, with its seat for the magistrates, the lofty board prepared for the exhibition of the winning numbers, and the music desks for the band; and above all there was the wheel in the front of the box, looking like a large barrel-churn, only made of mahogany, and ornamented with brass mountings. In Naples, there would have been also a place for the priest, who, in that country, always attends on these occasions "to keep the devil from interfering with the numbers." But in less religious Tuscany this precaution is omitted. All was ready, but the hours, as it seemed to Laudadio, would not move on. He returned once again to Santa Croce, and finding it impossible to sit still, occupied himself with strolling about the immense church, and endeavoring to meet with the important numbers, that were so deeply engraved on his brain, in the many inscriptions on the walls and pavement of the building.

In the meantime, Laura had risen early to begin the various work of her busy day. The lamp which her father had left burning had burned itself out. But the unlocked and unbolted door, and the absence of the old man's hat from its accustomed peg, showed that he had gone out. There was nothing to surprise her much in this. She knew that he was apt to be restless on the morning when the lottery was about to be drawn in Florence, on which occasions he was always sure to play. She doubted not that when he had left them on the preceding evening, he had gone to buy a ticket with the few pauls he had in his pocket, and supposed that he had gone for a morning stroll to walk off his restlessness. Carlo was to be most part of the day at the custom-house, receiving and passing the goods from Paris, and she did not expect to see him till the evening. So she quietly set to work to arrange, inventory, and ticket a parcel of jewellery that had come in the day before.

Laudadio had firmly determined that he would not leave Santa Croce till the clock should strike the quarter to twelve. Never did hours appear so interminable to him. Yet as they were away, and the moment, big with fate, approached, he trembled at the nearness of the minute that was to decide his fate. He had found in the adjoining cloister the gravestone of some one who had died at the age of thirty-seven, on the twenty-fifth of the month, in the year eighteen twenty-eight. The combination thus met with appeared to him a wonderful confirmation of the justice of his expectations. He was much comforted and strengthened by it; and had several times wandered back into the cloister to gaze on the auspicious numbers. He was standing thus dreamily staring at them, when the long-expected quarter to twelve was tolled from the convent belfry. He started and the whole blood in his body seemed to rush back to his heart. It appeared to him that he would fain have yet had one of those hours which had passed so laggingly, interposed between him and the moment which now, at the last, he could not prevent himself from regarding with as much of sickening dread as of hope.

He left the church, however, at once, and walked with a quicker step than usual towards the café in the piazza, at which he had agreed to meet his faithful friend and admirer, Sestini. The placid little cavaliere was at his tryst, calmly sipping a glass of water into which he had poured the remaining third of his little cup of black coffee, after regaling himself with the other two-thirds neat and hot; a favorite mode with the Italians of spreading the enjoyment derivable from three half-penny-worth of coffee over as large space of time as possible. Sestini, little observant as he was, could not help noticing the excited manner, the haggard look, and the feverishly gleaming eye of his friend. It still wanted a few minutes of the hour, and Sestini tried to persuade the old man to take some refreshment before going out into the crowd with which the great square was by this time full. But he could not induce him even to sit down. So the two strongly contrasted old men went out to make their way through the crowd to the immediate front of the lustings prepared for the drawing. The figure and face of the old gambler, stooping with hoary age, yet expressing in every shaking movement and every restless glance an excess of highly-strung nervous excitement, might well have caused remark at any other time or place. But amid the crowd in front of the lottery wheel every one was too much occupied with self, and strangely-moved faces were too common to attract attention.

The band had already begun to play a noisy lively air; the three magistrates in their gowns and high round flat-topped cloth caps were in their places; and two little boys in gay fancy dresses were standing one on each side of that terrible wheel—the instrument of torment little less in amount and in intensity than that caused by the other instrument of the same name the express object of which was torture. And now began the tedious process of unfolding the little rolled-up scrolls containing the numbers, holding them up to the public view, calling them aloud, handing them from one to the other of the presiding functionaries, and finally dropping them one by one into the wheel. And once again Laudadio thought that the minutes went slowly, and that the preliminary formalities would never be completed.

But at length the whole tale from One to Ninety had been deposited in the wheel. The music sounds; the little boys churn away at the fateful churn; two or three turns have tumbled the numbers into a confusion sufficient to make—to all human ken—CHANCE the sole blind master of the position of them; and then, amid sudden and profound silence, the first number is drawn. The boy plunges his bared arm into the machine, brings out one rolled-up scroll between his finger and thumb, holds it up aloft, and passes it, always keeping his hand at arm's length, to one of the presiding trio. He unrolls it, proclaims aloud "EIGHTY-EIGHT," hands it to his colleague, who holds it up aloft open to the people, and passes it to the third officer, who affixes it to the conspicuous board provided for the purpose. Then out blare the trumpets again, and out bursts a tempest of tongues. Nothing is lost yet. Five numbers are to be drawn; and there is yet room for a terno to come up—and to spare. Those, indeed, who have betted that some other number would come up "first" (which is termed playing an "estratto determinato")—those, indeed, have already lost; but for all others "the game is still alive."

Again the music ceases, and again every voice is suddenly hushed. The same mode of operation is repeated, and this time "TWENTY-FIVE" is called aloud, and takes its place on the board by the side of its predecessor.

Again the music and the roar of voices burst forth.

"It's right!" said Laudadio to his sympathizing friend, in a faint and choking voice. "Oh, yes! it's all right. I have no doubt; none." And Sestini could feel the old man's arm shaking as if he had been struck by sudden paralysis.

Once again the ceremony is repeated, and "37" is the result.

"I knew it! I knew it!" cried the old man, trembling all over, while the big drops of perspiration started to his brows. "Oh! there could be no doubt. Of course I was certain of it." And drawing from his pocket with difficulty, so violently were his hands shaking, the ticket with his numbers, he showed them to his friend, carefully hiding with his lean hand the sum for which the ticket was made out.

"Ah, my dear friend," said the little cavaliere, "if you had only played for an ambo, you would have been all right." (The ambo is when two numbers are named to come up.) "An ambo makes a nice little bit of money. I wish it were an ambo."

"Why an ambo?" returned Laudadio, fiercely. "I tell you my terno is certain—certain!"

By this time all hope is over for the majority of the crowd, and the silence for the drawing of the fourth number is by no means so general. Now for it. "56."

A long deep breath came from the old gambler's chest with a sound almost of a groan, and he closed his eyes for a minute. "But it will be all right, I tell you," he said, angrily, as if his companion had maintained the reverse. "I tell you it is sure. It can't fail me now. It can't!"

And now for the last number—the cast of fortune that was to make all safe or all lost. It was a tremendous moment for the old man. The music and the voices sounded strangely in his ears, as if they were far off. Now, silence! Now!

"Twenty-NINE!" shouted the officer.

For one short moment, as the syllables "twenty" reached his ears, the unhappy old man had imagined that all was well with him. Then came with a roar, as it seemed to him, of a mighty tempest wind rushing through his ears, and crushing him to the earth, the fatal sound that hurled him from the summit of his hopes into an abyss of misery.

"What a pity it was not an ambo," said Sestini, not dreaming that the disappointment was a greater or more important one than the veteran gambler had a thousand times had to bear. But the revulsion was too terrible for old Laudadio's over-excited nervous system. After gazing for a moment with a fixed glassy stare into his companion's face, his long attenuated body swayed to and fro like a tall tree whose foot the axe has nearly severed, his gripe on the cavaliere's arm relaxed, and he fell in a dead swoon on th flag-stones of the piazza.

Poor little Sestini was extremely shocked and frightened. The crowd of course formed a ring round the prostrate figure of the old man, whose hat had fallen off, and whose long white locks were straggling over his livid face. For a moment they thought that he was dead. But the heaving of his chest soon indicated that he had but fainted. Many of those around knew old Laudadio Vanni, the jeweler on the Ponte Vecchio, and understood perfectly well the cause of his present trouble. "Poor fellow! he will have been playing high!" said one. "He's one that the Madonna owes a good terno to before he dies!" remarked another. And Sestini, with the aid of three or four of the nearest bystanders, proceeded to carry him to his house on the neighboring bridge. He probably had regained his consciousness before he reached his home. But his eyes remained closed, and he suffered himself to be carried by those who had picked him up. The fatal ticket remained clutched in his hand, and having been taken from it by Sestini, after those who carried him had placed him in his chair and departed, sufficed to tell very shortly the whole facts of the case.

And the remainder of our story may be told almost as compendiously.

Carlo took the matter very much more coolly than Laura had dared to hope. He said that such things were necessarily to be expected from lottery playing, and—that a new lock, to which he would see himself, must be put on the strong safe.

Sestini remarked that there were few heads in Italy, save that of his friend, who could have discovered within one the very numbers to be drawn for a terno. And Laudadio observed that loss in the lottery was number 90.

The marriage took place duly on the Sunday, despite the loss of Godpapa Sestini's dower. And the business-like Carlo and his artist wife have long since ceased to feel the need of such a sum.

Old Laudadio lived several years after the loss of his great stake. Did that miscarriage serve to open his eyes or cure him of his malady? Any one who is doubtful on such a point has happily little knowledge of the insanity in question.

The present writer has had an interview with Laudadio Vanni. It took place one bright and frosty moonlight night on the "Ponte Trinita." It was late, and there was no other person on the bridge. The striking but shabby-looking old man, courteously lifting his hat, addressed himself to the deponent, and stating that he had something of importance to communicate, proceeded to propose a partnership enterprise in the lottery; the conditions to be, that the deponent should furnish the funds for the purchase of a ticket, while he, Laudadio, would supply numbers dreamed of by him, and warranted to win.

The deponent, deeming the old man no better than a self-conscious and designing swindler, punished him by saying that he approved perfectly of the scheme, only that he would prefer to reverse the parts. But had he known the history, which he learned on mentioning his recontre to some Florentine friends, and which has been set forth in the preceding chapters, he might probably have treated the old lottery dreamer more gently.

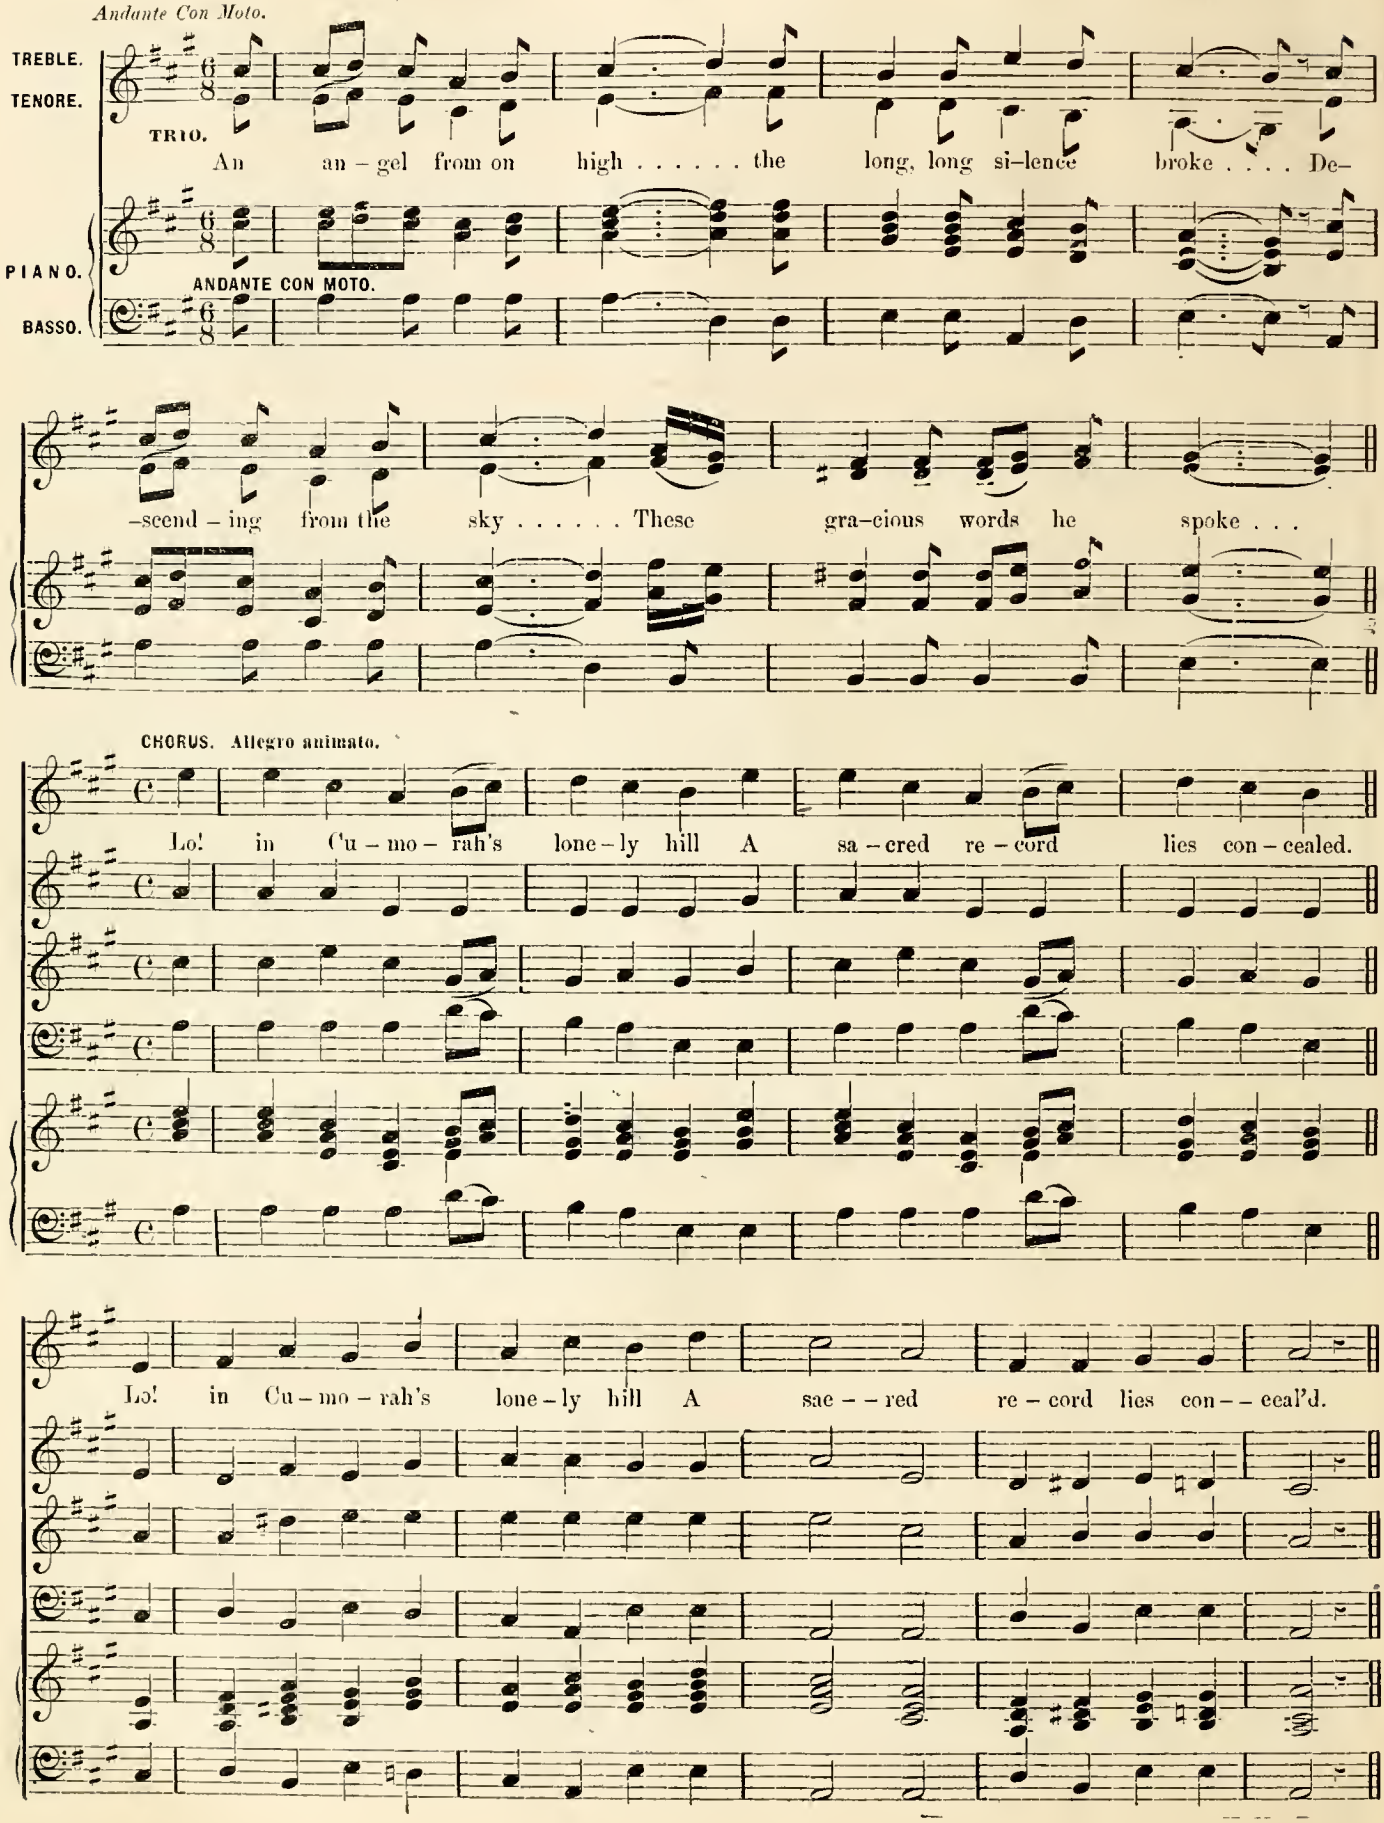
Andante Con Moto.



THE GRÆFENBERG MEDICINES ARE INVALUABLE. GODBE & CO. HAVE THEM.

PATENT

ARION PIANOFORTE

GRANDS AND GRAND SQUARES.

7⅓ OCTAVE

The "ARION" is the very best Piano for the Great West because it stands in tune longer than any other Piano. It requires no repairing or regulating; shipping any distance, or dampness does not affect them.

WHY?

It commences where the "First Premium" Makers stop, and upon the most improved Modern scale makes four patented improvements: which make the Arion more simple, yet stronger; increasing its volume and beauty of tone, while rendering the instrument more enduring.

WHAT THEY ARE.

First. The patent Arion Reversed Wooden Agraffe Bridge, which holds the tuning pins, is six thicknesses of hard maple, the grain of each layer runs in a different direction. The advantages are, the 20 tons strain of the strings cannot split our Arion wrest-plank, as frequently happens in other Pianos, and when people say "My Piano won't stand in tune," all other makers must use the single wrest plank with the grain running only one way.

The Arion Tuning-Pins have end wood to hold them on every side, while all other makers can have it only upon two sides of their pins.

Thirdly, The Patent Arion Diagonal Sustaining Bar, extending parallel with the steel strings under the over string Bass strings. The Arion is the only Piano wherein the enormous strain of the large steel strings is resisted in the natural place and direction. Using this bar renders the weakest part in all other over string Pianos the

STRONGEST IN THE ARION.

Fourthly, The Patent Arion Iron Frame concentrates all the metal in front of the tuning pin line, and its frame is let into, but not the front edge of the wooden wrest plank, thereby preventing the great strain of the strings upon it from splitting or moving it one particle. All other "Full Iron Frames" cover the entire wrest plank, and when it is split it cannot be seen, the wood of the Arion wrest plank is seen.

THE ARION STANDS UPON ITS OWN MERITS.

unsupported by either buncome, weak facts, or useless or complicated Patents. We append a few unbought opinions of those who

KNOW THE ARION.

The Musical Director of the New York Conservatory of Music, Edward Mollenhauer, says. "The Arion I bought of you is the best Piano I ever played on; that rolling bass and silvery treble, etc."

John H. Woods, Piano Dealer, Oswego, N. Y., says: "The tone is truly immense, and surpasses anything in the shape of a Piano we ever saw or heard of, etc."

Horace Greely said: "The Arion is the best Square Piano, superior for its clearness and brilliancy of tone," &c.

Louis Wagner, Fort Leavenworth, says: "My Piano arrived here in splendid order. Its tone fills my parlor with melody—it is the wonder and admiration of all who hear it. Miss ——, who is teaching the Piano desires me to order one for her." &c

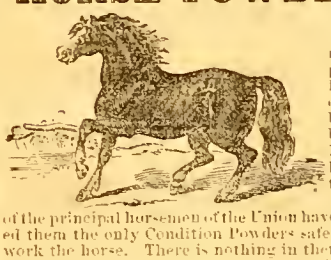
HARVELL'S

HORSE POWDERS.



These celebrated and renowned powders for horses and cattle have been tested by an intelligent public for sixteen years. Hundreds of the principal horsemen of the Union have pronounced them the only Condition Powders safe to use and work the horse. There is nothing in them to expose the animal, but, on the contrary, everything to improve their tone. The proprietors of horse railroads, omnibusses, and stage owners in all the principal cities use them: and their combined testimony stamps them one of the wonders of medical science. Letters sufficient to fill a small book are in our possession, testifying to their goodness. Merchants are requested to warrant them, and refund the purchase money should they fail to give satisfaction.

ALLCOCK'S POROUS STRENGTHENING PLASTERS.

ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS are the results of studies and experiments of Dr. Schecut, of South Carolina; of Dr. Wm. Wagstaff, now Baron Wagstaff, of Horace H. Day, the distinguished manufacturer of rubber goods; and of Thomas Allcock, Chemist and member of the College of Pharmacy of New York, now General Allcock, etc., etc.

Step by step this commodity has attained its unprecedented fame. They are universally approved. They support, strengthen, and aid the growth of muscles. They appear to have a peculiar effect upon the nerves, allaying irritability, while supplying warmth. They seem to accumulate electricity, and aid the circulation of the blood through the part where applied, by which healthy actions are induced.

Even in paralysis, where articulation was suspended, the use of the Porous Plasters to the spine restored the articulation, and materially reduced the paralysis. In fact, the patient could help herself, while before the Porous plaster was applied she was as helpless as a baby. We refer to Mrs. Sally Elliot, Springfield, Mass.

Dr. Myer, of Savannah, Ga., says they are the best mechanical supporters for weak muscles ever discovered; that by their warming properties they bring power and health, until the strength of the muscles are entirely restored. That he knows a case where Allcock's Plasters cured a gentleman of a weak spine. That he daily prescribes them in his practice with the happiest results, and desires us to refer to him.

Dr. Henderson, of Farnsville, Louisiana, says: "The counter-irritant effect of Allcock's Porous Plasters is produced in such a mild and gradual way, they so invigorate the circulation around the parts to which they are applied, and exert upon all nervous diseases such a great sedative influence, that I place them confidently at the head of every plaster now in use."

Dr. Johnson, of Hartford, says: "My daily experience confirms the very superior excellence of your Porous Plasters. At this moment of writing, a man applies for one, who, by entanglement in a shaft of machinery, had both his legs broken, spine severely injured, and was for nearly a year entirely helpless. This man found relief very soon by the application of a plaster to his spine. He was soon enabled to work, and now he labors as well as ever. He would cheerfully pay five dollars for a single plaster, if they could not be had at a lower rate. Surgeons should make use of these perforated plasters, to the exclusion of all others, as their flexibility and adhesiveness are greatly in advance of all other plasters with which I am acquainted, while the perforations peculiar to them render them greatly superior to all others for ordinary surgical uses. Knowing the plasters to be so useful, I have no scruples that my sentiments should be known.

J. W. JOHNSON, M. D."

Dr. Sterling's testimony: "For two years, I have been a great sufferer from neuralgia in the head, and found only temporary relief from all the various remedies that I have tried, until I applied one of Allcock's Porous Plasters. I cut it into three strips, placing one under each shoulder blade, and the other over the small of the back; and for the past three months, I have had scarcely a twinge of the old pain.

I advise all who suffer from nervous diseases to lose no time in making a trial of the wonderful Porous Plaster.

A. F. STERLING, Sec. Singer Mfg. Co.
New York, June 8, 1868.

MEDICINAL QUALITIES

—OF THE—

POROUS PLASTERS.

The Porous Plasters possess the soothing, warming and sustaining qualities of the combined plasters of the dispensatories. An Electrician, who has great experience of their effects in Local Rheumatism, in Tic Doloreux, and deep-seated nervous and other pains, and in affections of the kidneys, etc., etc., attributes all their sedative, stimulative and pain-relieving effects to their ELECTRIC qualities. He asserts that they restore the healthy electric condition (equilibrium) of the part, and that being restored pain and morbid action cease. He was amazed at the great number of beneficial indications produced by one of these plasters. He affirms that Head-ache is cured by one worn just below the breast-bone; that one placed over the navel will cure hysterics, as well as dysentery, and affections of the bowels.

MUSICAL DOINGS.—Since Mr. Waters gave up publishing sheet music, he has devoted his whole capital and attention to the manufacture and sale of Pianos and Melodeons. He has just issued a catalogue of his new instruments, giving a new scale of prices, which shows a marked reduction from former rates, and his Pianos have recently been awarded the First Premium at several Fairs. Many people of the present day, who are attracted, if not confused, with the flaming advertisements of rival piano houses, probably overlook the modest manufacturer like Mr. Waters; but we happen to know that his instruments earned him a good reputation long before $\frac{1}{2}$ positions and "honors" connected therewith were ever thought of; indeed, we have one of Mr. Waters' Piano-fortes now in our residence, (where it has stood for years,) of which any manufacturer in the world might be proud. We have always been delighted with it as a sweet-toned and powerful instrument, and there is no doubt of its durability; more than this, some of the best amateur players in the city, and several celebrated pianists, have performed on the said piano, and all pronounce it a superior and first-class Instrument. NEW MEDICAL DISCOVERY.

Dr. CADY'S CATARRH REMEDY.

A CERTAIN CURE FOR CATARRH AND ALL Maladies [illegible] the head, nose and throat

This is a Medicine never before used or known to the public. Dr. Cady, the discoverer, was a sufferer from this terrible disease for twenty years, and after testing all the remedies extant—without relief—his efforts to obtain a cure he discovered this UNEQUALLED REMEDY which cured him in the short space of eight weeks.

It has been thoroughly tested and has not failed in a single instance. Several of the most obstinate cases have been speedily cured by this remedy, after every other known remedy had failed. Every one who has tried it will testify to the truth of the above statement.

Every one afflicted with Catarrh should give it a trial and find out for himself whether it is a humbug. Price [illegible] sold by GODBE & Co. Salt Lake City.

Saratoga

WATER.

The Saratoga "A" Spring Water is probably the most effective mineral water found on either continent. It has ten per cent. greater mineral properties than the celebrated Congress Spring; four times that of Baden Baden of Austria; five times that of Aix La Chapelle in Prussia twice that of Vichy in France, nearly three times greater than the renowned Seltzer of Germany, and equally over the Spas of Bath, England, and Kissengen in Bavaria

The reputation of this water is based upon its effects in diseases of the stomach, liver, bowels, kidneys and spleen. It acts with wonderful benefit in cases of chronic dyspepsia, constipation, gravel, gout, Scrofula, cutaneous affections, general lethargy, soreness and prostration of the system.

THE GOLDEN SIDE.

There is many a rose in the road of life,
  Could we only stop to take it;
And many a tone from the better land,
  If the querulous heart would make it;
To the sunny soul that is full of hope,
  And whose beautiful trust ne'er faileth,
The grass is green and the flowers are bright
  Though the winter storm prevaileth.

Better to hope, though the clouds hang low,
  And to keep the eyes still lifted;
For the sweet blue sky will still peep through
  When the ominous clouds are lifted!
There was never a night without a day,
  Or an evening without a morning:
And the darkest hour, as the proverb goes,
  Is the hour before the dawning.

There is many a gem in the path of life,
  Which we pass in our idle pleasure,
That is richer far than the jeweled crown,
  Or the miser's hoarded treasure;
It may be the love of a little child,
  Or a mother's prayers to Heaven,
Or only a beggar's grateful thanks
  For a cup of water given.

Better to weave in the web of life
  A bright and golden filling,
And to do God's will with a ready heart,
  And hands that are ready and willing,
Than to snap the delicate minute threads
  Of our curious lives asunder,
And then blame Heaven for the tangled ends,
  And sit and grieve and wonder.

A TRAVELER'S TALE.

A STORY OF A ROADSIDE INN.

The diligence from Paris to Chalons stopped one evening, just after dark, some miles beyond the little town of Rouvray, to set down an English lady and her child at a lonely roadside auberge. Mrs. Martin expected to find a carriage ready to take her to the Chateau de Senart, a distance of some leagues, whither she was repairing on a visit; but was told that it had not yet arrived. The landlady, a tall, coarse-looking woman, who showed her into the vast hall that served at once as a sitting-room and kitchen, observed that the roads were so muddy and difficult at night that there was little chance of her friend arriving before the morning. "You had better, therefore," she said, "make up your mind to sleep here. We have a good room to offer you; and you will be much more comfortable between a pair of clean, warm sheets than knocking about in our rough country, especially as your dear child seems sickly."

Mrs. Martin, though much fatigued by her journey, hesitated. A good night's rest was certainly a tempting prospect; but she felt so confident that her friends would not neglect her, that after a moment she replied: "I thank you, madame, I will sit up for an hour or so—it is not late, and the carriage may come, after all. Should it not, I shall be glad of your room, which you may prepare for me at any rate."

The hostess, who seemed anxious that her guest should not remain in the great room, suggested that a fire might be made above; but Mrs. Martin found herself so comfortable where she was—a pile of faggots was blazing on the vast hearth—that she declined at first to move. Her daughter, about five years of age, soon went to sleep in her lap; and she herself found that whilst her ears were anxiously listening for the roll of carriage wheels, her eyes occasionally closed, and slumber began to make its insidious approaches.

In order to prevent herself from giving way, she endeavored to direct her attention to the objects around her. The apartment was vast, and lighted more by the glare of the fire than by the dirty candle, stuck into a dirty tin candlestick, that stood on one of the long tables. Two or three huge beams stretched across half-way up the walls, leaving a space filled with flitting shadows above. From these depended a rusty gun or two, a sword, several bags, hanks of onions, cooking utensils, etc. There were very few signs that the house was much visited, though a pile of empty wine bottles lay in a corner. The landlady sat at some distance from the fireplace, with her two sons, who laid their heads together and talked in whispers.

Mrs. Martin began to feel uneasy. The idea entered her mind that she had fallen into a resort of robbers; and the words, "C'est elle," (it is she)—which was all she heard of the whispered conversation, contributed to alarm her. The door leading into the road was left ajar; and for a moment she felt an inclination to start up and escape on foot. But she was far from any other habitation; and if the people of the house really entertained any evil designs, her attempt would only precipitate a catastrophe. So she resolved on patience; but listened attentively for the approach of her friends. All she heard, however, was the whistling of the wind, and the dashing of the rain, which had begun to fall just after her arrival.

About two hours passed in this uncomfortable way. At length the door was thrust open, and a man, dripping wet, came in. She breathed more freely; for this new-comer might frustrate the evil designs of her hosts, if they entertained any. He was a red-haired, jovial-faced looking man; and inspired her with confidence by the frankness and ease of his manners.

"A fine night for walking!" cried he, shaking himself like a dog who has scrambled out of a pond. "What have you to give me? Salut, messieurs et mesdames. I am wet to the skin. Hope I disturb nobody. Give me a bottle of wine."

The hostess, in a surly, sleepy tone, told her eldest son to serve the gentleman; and then addressing Mrs. Martin, said:

"You see your friends will not come; and you are keeping us up to no purpose. You had better go to bed."

"I will wait a little longer," was the reply; which elicited a kind of shrug of contempt.

The red-haired man finished off his bottle of wine, and then said:

"Show me a room, good woman—I shall sleep here to-night."

Mrs. Martin thought that, as he pronounced these words, he cast a protecting glance towards her; and she felt less repugnance at the idea of passing the night in that house. When, therefore, the red-haired man, after a polite bow, went up-stairs, she said that, as her friends had not arrived, they might as well show her to a bed-room.

"I thought it would come to that at last," said the landlady. "Pierre, take the lady's trunks up-stairs."

In a few minutes Mrs. Martin found herself alone in a spacious room, with a large fire burning on the hearth. Her first care, after putting the child to bed, was to examine the door. It was closed only by a latch. There was no bolt inside. She looked round for something to barricade it with, and perceived a heavy chest of drawers. Fear gave her strength. She half lifted, half pushed it against the door. Not content with this, she seized a table, to increase her defence. The leg was broken; and when she touched it, it fell with a crash to the ground. A long echo went sounding through the house, and she felt her heart sink within her. But the echo died away, and no one came; so she piled the fragments of the table upon the chest of drawers. Tolerably satisfied in this direction, she proceeded to examine the windows. They were all well protected with iron bars. The walls were papered, and, after careful examination, seemed to contain no signs of a secret door.

Mrs. Martin now sank down into a chair to reflect on her position. As was natural, after having taken all these precautions, the idea suggested itself that they might be superfluous, and she smiled at the thought of what her friends would say when she related to them the terrors of the night. Her child was sleeping tranquilly, his rosy cheeks half buried in the pillow. The fire had blazed up into a bright flame, whilst the unsnuffed candle burned dimly. The room was full of pale, trembling shadows; but she had no superstitious fears. Something positive could alone raise her alarms. She listened attentively, but could hear nothing save the howling of the wind over the roof, and the pattering of the rain against the window-panes. As her excitement diminished, the fatigue—which had been for a time forgotten—began again to make itself felt, and she resolved to undress and go to bed.

Her heart leaped into her throat. For a moment she seemed perfectly paralysed. She had undressed and put out the candle, when she accidently dropped her watch. Stooping to pick it up, her eyes involuntarily glanced towards the bed. A great mass of red hair, a hand, and a gleaming knife, were revealed by the light of the fire. After the first moment of terrible alarm, her presence of mind returned. She felt that she had herself cut off all means of escape by the door, and was left entirely to her own resources. Without uttering a cry, but trembling in every limb, the poor woman got into bed by the side of her child. An idea—a plan—had suggested itself. It had flashed through her brain like lightning. It was the only chance left.

Her bed was so disposed that the robber could only get out from beneath it by a narrow aperture at the head without making a noise; and it was probable that he would choose, from prudence, this means of exit. There were no curtains in the way, so Mrs. Martin, with terrible decision and noiseless energy, made a running knot in her silk scarf, and held it poised over the aperture by which her enemy was to make his appearance. She had resolved to strangle him in defence of her own life and that of her child.

The position was an awful one; and probably, had she been able to direct her attention to the surrounding circumstances, she might have given way to her fears, and endeavored to raise the house by screams. The fire on the hearth—unattended to—had fallen abroad, and now gave only a dull, sullen light, with an occasional bright gleam. Every object in the vast apartment showed dimly and uncertainly, and seemed to be endowed with a restless motion. Now and then a mouse advanced stealthily along the floor, but, startled by some movement under the bed, went scouring back in terror to its hole. The child breathed steadily in its unconscious repose; the mother endeavored also to imitate slumber, but the man under the bed, uneasy in his position, could not avoid occasionally making a slight noise.

Mrs. Martin was occupied only with two ideas. First, she reflected on the extraordinary delusion by which she had been led to see enemies in the people of the house and a friend in this red-haired man; and, secondly, it struck her that, as he could fear no resistance from a woman, he might push aside the chairs that were in his way, regardless of the noise, and thus avoid the snare that was laid for him. Once even she thought that, whilst her attention was strongly directed to one spot, he had made his exit, and was leaning over her; but she was deceived by a flickering shadow on the opposite wall. In reality there was no danger that he would compromise the success of his sanguinary enterprise; the shrieks of a victim, put on its guard, might alarm the house.

Have you ever stood, hour after hour, with your fishing-rod in hand, waiting with the ferocious patience of an angler for a nibble? If you have, you have some faint idea of the state of mind in which Mrs. Martin—with far other interests at stake—passed the time, until an old clock on the chimney-piece told one hour after midnight. Another source of anxiety now presented itself—the fire had nearly burnt out. Her dizzy eyes could scarcely see the floor, as she bent with fearful attention over the head of the bed—the terrible noose hanging, like the sword of Damocles, above the gloomy aperture. "What," she thought, "if he delay his appearance until the light has completely died away! Will it not then be impossible for me to adjust the scarf—to do the deed—to kill this assassin—to save myself and my child? Oh, God! deliver him into my hands!"

A cautious movement below—the dragging of hands and knees along the floor—a heavy, suppressed breathing—announced that the supreme moment was near at hand. Her white arms were bared to the shoulder; her hair fell wildly around her face, like the mane of a lioness about to leap upon its prey; the distended orbits of her eyes glared down upon the spot where the question of life and death was to be soon decided. Time seemed immeasurably lengthened out—every second assumed the proportions of an hour.

But at last, just as all lines and forms began to float before her sight through an indistinct medium of blended light and darkness, a black mass interposed between her eyes and the floor. Suspense being over, the time of action having arrived, everything seemed to pass with magical rapidity. The robber thrust his head cautiously forward. Mrs. Martin bent down. There was a half-choked cry—the sound of a knife falling on the floor—a convulsive struggle. Pull! pull! pull! Mrs. Martin heard nothing but the scarf passing over the head of the bed between her two naked feet. She had half thrown herself back, and, holding the scarf with both her hands, pulled with desperate energy for her life. The conflict had begun; and one or the other must perish. The robber was a powerful man, and made furious efforts to get loose; but in vain. Not a sound escaped from his lips—not a sound from hers. The dreadful tragedy was enacted in silence.

* * * * * *

"Well, Mother Guerard," cried a young man, leaping out of a carriage that stopped before the door of the auberge next morning; "what news have you for me? Has my mother arrived?"

"Is it your mother?" replied the landlady, who seemed quite good-humored after her night's rest. "There is a lady up-stairs waiting for some friends; but she does not speak French easily, and seemed unwilling to talk. We could scarcely persuade her to go to bed."

"Show me the room!" cried Arthur, running into the house.

They soon arrived before the door.

"Mother! mother!" cried he; but received no answer.

"The door is only latched; for we have no robbers in this part of the country," said the landlady.

But a formidable obstacle opposed their entrance. They became alarmed, especially when they heard the shrieks of the little girl, and burst open the door.

The first object that presented itself was the face of the robber, violently upturned from beneath the bed, and with protruding tongue and eye-balls; the next was the form of Mrs. Martin, in the position in which we left her. She was still pulling with both hands at the scarf, and glaring wildly towards the head of the bed. The child had thrown its arms round her neck, and was crying; but she paid no attention. The terror of that dreadful night had driven her mad.

EDITOR UTAH MAGAZINE:

Dear Sir:—In common with many others, I have read, with great care, your editorial in No. 24 of the MAGAZINE, on "The True Development of the Territory." While I cannot but agree, in the main, with the arguments adduced, for reasons which will be stated below, there is one short sentence which especially claimed my attention, and struck me as very liable to be construed to mean the opposite of what I think you designed to convey. Having been spoken with in reference to it by several parties who read the MAGAZINE with interest, I concluded to address you on the subject, so that whoever has misinterpreted your meaning may be set right. The sentence referred to occurs in the second paragraph, where you speak of the necessity for some internal developments that will produce money before factories for home manufacture can be successfully established, and reads thus: "To start them before we have, is to begin at the wrong end." In a subsequent paragraph you "heartily endorse the wise policy of our ecclesiastical leaders," which enables me, I think, correctly to interpret the former sentence to refer to extensive manufacturing establishments Standing, as the sentence does, in bold relief, it has attracted considerable attention, and considered—as some men do Scripture texts—without any reference to the context, has elicited much unfavorable criticism, as a tacit condemnation of past efforts at self sustenance.

The primal settlers of almost all new countries—perhaps particularly in the United States—have been obliged to depend, to a greater or less extent, upon their own labor and skill in producing and manufacturing the materials for their own clothing, and many other articles of convenience; and Utah has been no exception to the rule. I speak from personal knowledge when I say that, had it not been for the little care that has been bestowed upon the production of wool, flax, leather and other materials, and the simple methods of manufacturing them into the needed articles, hundreds of the people who inhabit these mountains, would have been in a deplorable condition. True, I have not yet learned of a single factory that, under existing circumstances, is a paying institution to its proprietors; but home manufacture has been a necessity to the people, from the fact that such products could be made by themselves or obtained by exchange of other home products, while imported articles, though much cheaper, could only be purchased with means beyond the reach of many. Unless I mistake, these are your views also.

I fully agree with you, that home manufactures, as a speculation for the investment of capital, have, so far as I know, generally proved a failure, and that it will be impossible to make them a success on a large scale without reducing our artisans and laborers to a level with the same classes in Europe. Neither do I see how cotton or woolen manufactories could be sustained under your hypothesis, for the extensive development of minerals would so raise the price of labor as to render it impossible to produce such articles for anythinglike the price they could be imported for. Unless we suppose that, under either circumstance, we are to be isolated from the rest of the world, which appears most improbable.

As to the discovery and development of our mineral resources, I have always understood, whether correctly or not, that President Young has asserted that the precious and other metals abounded in our Territory, and that, when the right time came, they would, under the guidance of Providence, be developed for the good of this people. Whether that time has come, subsequent facts only can prove. If it has, it will be useless to oppose it; because, as with the discovery of gold in California, a chain of events will bring it about that human power and wisdom will be unable to control. True, I can see no other specialty in which we can excel, and until we do obtain an abundance of something which will pay to export, the vast majority of the people must remain in deep poverty; but no such development exists to-day, and until it does, or some other avenue of wealth is opened up, we must do the best we can to sustain ourselves out of the elements and materials at our command, whether it "pays" or not.

I am aware there are two sides to this as to almost every other topic. But it appears to me, the true conclusion depends on the question, whether it is the design of God that we should be isolated and cut off from all intercourse with the rest of mankind, or be brought into closer contact and association with them. Whichever policy Divine wisdom deems best adapted to the accomplishment of the purposes of Heaven, the establishment of Zion, and the universal prevalence of the principles of righteousness, love and peace, I pray may prevail. W. H. SHEARMAN.

We have but room to say that Elder Shearman interprets us rightly. We will refer more fully to his letter in our next. ED.

NOTICE.

To insure personal responsibility etc. for every article that shall appear in the MAGAZINE hereafter—except where specially requested to the contrary—every writer, from the editor down, will have his name attached to his contributions.

We shall insert no correspondence unless the full name and address of the writer are given. This name we shall not publish without permission, but we specially request our contributors, always to allow us this privilege, as it presents greater evidence of fairness to the public; and fairness is what we are after.

We are on the eve of a great and an important crisis in our history, for the great question of conditional or "unconditional obedience" has to be decided. We shall open our columns only to such articles as are written in a spirit of kindness and moderation. No intemperate or personal article will be allowed to appear. In this way we hope to shame the efforts of those who attack by covert insinuations of a personal character. Let our weapons be those of reason and intelligence, and depend upon it truth will take care of itself. [ED.

THE QUESTION OF "UNCONDITIONAL OBEDIENCE."

BY E. L. T. HARRISON.

We propose in the following article to investigate the question of "Unconditional Obedience" to the Priesthood, believing that it can be easily demonstrated that such a doctrine has no foundation in reason or in the will of God. As there are many who have never thought of the extent to which unconditional obedience will lead, it is necessary for us to exhibit clearly what it means, and to what degree it will affect us as members of the Church.

By "unconditional obedience" we mean the total subjection of the will and the intellect to the dictates of the Priesthood—accepting all their requirements as the will of God.

As we understand it, the obedience required of us by our Priesthood is an unlimited one. There are no bounds to what it may require of us. We are expected to obey the Priesthood as unquestioningly as though God Himself, in all the plenitude of his power, were personally present and made the same requirements at our hands. It is understood that, if there is any ability or power, which physically or mentally we enjoy, or any means or influence we possess, that the Priesthood have not yet attempted to control, it is simply because our "weaknesses" will not permit the exercise of such authority for the present. The absolute and complete control of body and spirit—every faculty of the brain and every power of the hands—is, therefore, only a question of time. And the right to exercise this dictation is claimed in respect to the most trivial as well as to the most important matters, the President of the Church (as stated at our trial by one of the Twelve Apostles, in the presence of President Young, himself) being capable of dictating the people in everything—even to "the setting up of a stocking."

That this is what the doctrine of "unconditional obedience" means, and that our Priesthood intend to carry their claims fully to this extent, will be seen by what they already have done. Even now they claim to dictate what we shall eat and drink; where we shall buy and sell; at what we shall operate, and what we may ask for our labor; what we may read—and on all questions, as to perfect agreement with their measures, what we may think. So much for their present assumptions; and as to the future, President Young declared on the occasion above referred to, that the people had to be brought to that condition that they would place all they received for their labor before the Bishops, who would give them back what was deemed necessary for their support; and all who possess a true conception of the unlimited control which the Priesthood expect to wield, know that even this is but the opening wedge to the exercise of a power more absolute still.

Every man or woman in the Church—and members of the Priesthood as well as the rest—should settle in their minds the right or wrong of this principle of "unconditional obedience," because, to exercise an influence in opposition to any of the above requirements—while the Priesthood think as they now do—must be deemed apostacy, and will have to be followed by expulsion from the Church. We have been expelled for opposing the measures of the Priesthood for the reduction of wages and similar matters. On the same principle any person who shall, in time to come, differ with the Priesthood as to what trade or business he may follow; what he may charge for his labor, or how much of his wages he has a right to keep back for the support of his family; or upon any other of the thousand questions in which the Priesthood believe they have a right to interfere, must, if he refuses practical compliance with their requirements, be deemed an apostate and treated accordingly. We say the Priesthood must do this, for, no matter how good or well disposed they may be, as to intention, (and, there are as good men among them as the world can present,) they must, to be consistent with their ideas of Priesthood, act in this way. We are after principles and not men. We have no difficulty with the bulk of the members of our Priesthood. As a class they are unsurpassed in conscientiousness and fidelity to their ideas of right. We differ not with them but with the doctrine of "unconditional obedience" alone, because we deem it opposed to all true principles, and calculated to injure all concerned.

It is admitted by those who advocate such "unconditional obedience," that, while it is the right of all persons to use their judgment to the fullest extent in getting into the Church, it is their duty as soon as they are in, to lay aside judgment and intellect wherever it comes in conflict with the views of the Priesthood, and subject every thought and feeling to their dictation, whether it agrees with the light of God within the soul or not.

We have tried to conceive of some reason on account of which an intellectual man could accept such an absurd proposition as the above. The nearest justification for such a doctrine that we can think of, is the assumption that every person on getting into the Church, obtains a testimony that not only is every principle true that they have received up to that time, but that every principle or measure the Priesthood will ever after give, will, in every case, be also true; and that there can no error come through them, on any subject, financial or otherwise.

There is no logical way of showing why every measure of the Priesthood should be obeyed without thought or investigation, but on some supposition of this kind. But it is not true that any such testimony is given. So far as an experience of twenty years goes, we have never learned that the testimony of the Holy Spirit is thus given to all principles in advance. Principles are only certified to when they are given, or sometimes, a little before they come, so that they may be received. If there are any persons who have received a testimony that every principle or measure that the Priesthood ever have given, do give, or ever shall give, will inevitably be true, they are the proper persons to shut their eyes and obey unthinkingly. They have some reason for blind obedience. But neither in our own experience nor in that of our friends, has such testimony ever been received. The only witness we know anything about is simply, in the first place, a testimony to the divinity of the work as a whole, after which each principle is certified to as it comes along and not before. And it should be understood that the fact of God's causing a testimony to fill the bosom that the work as a whole is true, is no voucher that every measure of mortals acting in this Priesthood, will of necessity also be correct.

One of the strongest proofs that such a throwing away of the judgment and complete reliance upon the Priesthood, is an incorrect doctrine, is found in the fact that it destroys the individuality of men. It takes away the opportunities for a man's own mental development. It is only by launching out on one's own account and thinking fully and freely for one's self that we can obtain any increase of mental strength or judgment. For God to create a Church and give the members nothing to do but to accept His dictation—or that of His servants—would be to create a nation of mental dwarfs. Men must be thrown upon themselves, not once or twice but always, to develop them and make them truly men. Therefore, if any priesthood be truly God's Priesthood, the proposition of passive unthinking obedience is equally foolish. For God could not govern on such a principle without killing the intellect, life and energy of mankind.

It would reflect no wisdom on the part of the Creator to govern his creatures on such a principle, because it would only injure them and reduce Himself to the contemptible position of a mere manager of so much passive machinery, instead of a Deity presiding gloriously over beings all acting in intelligent concert with Himself. God, then, has no motive for governing mankind on this absolute, despotic principle.

Let us now come to the stronghold of the advocates of unquestioning obedience. Say they, God demands this kind of obedience in His Revelations. Said one person in the hearing of the writer,—"It is true that God offers the Gospel to all the world and that He gives everybody the right of thought, but He is going to damn two-thirds because they do not see fit to obey." This we deny. It is true that the Bible says, "Preach the Gospel, and he that believeth not shall be damned," and taking the words literally, and setting aside every principle we have ever heard taught in "Mormonism," it might look as though mankind were arbitrarily required to obey or be damned—whether they saw the propriety of the requirement or not. But every child in "Mormonism" ought to know that another principle comes in, which is not there stated but well understood by us all, and that is, that, Priesthood or no Priesthood, no one can be condemned for disobeying a requirement of the Gospel until the light of heaven has penetrated his mind and borne testimony to the divinity of the proposition.

To damn two-thirds of mankind, simply because some man, holding Priesthood (of which the poor wretches knew nothing beyond his mere assertion) required obedience to certain ordinances and principles, would be the work of a greater Devil than Lucifer has ever been described. The idea is false to every law of right, as well as to every one of the wise, just and merciful principles upon which the whole Gospel is based. It is an infallible truth, to which witness is borne in every bosom, that there can be no condemnation until light enters the soul and shows the truth of the requisition. And this is as true of the one-hundredth requirement of the Gospel or of the Priesthood, as it is of the first principles.

We will now turn to that great argument of the upholders of the unlimited control of the Priesthood, namely, that it is necessary for the sake of unity, and the building up of Zion. According to such persons, in order to produce unity, one mind must control and dictate everything. It is true that in this way—provided human beings could be brought to so far give up their individuality, which we by no means admit—unity of action could be brought about. But what would such unity be worth when obtained? There would be no glory or beauty about it. It would be but the unity of machines—the unity of automatons. Unity is a grand thing, provided it be intelligent unity. The unity of a score of people operating in concert, because they perceived the wisdom of every movement in which they were engaged, would be worth something, but the unity of a million, acting mechanically, would be despicable. There could be no Zion in it; for Zion's beauty and superiority can consist only in the fact of a great people voluntarily and intelligently acting together. And as to the temporal results of such a system, the houses, the streets, the gardens, the eating and drinking, the employments and pursuits of all the people, might be as uniform and perfect as possible, and even far more regular and orderly than could by any possibility be seen under any other conditions, but it would, to the truly intelligent mind, be a pitiable sight after all, because all the beauty and regularity would be obtained at the sacrifice of the individuality of the whole people. It would be a great piece of machinery without soul.

And as to the spirit and vitality of such a community, these inspiring qualities can only exist in fullness where unchecked but educated intelligence—or Deity in every man's soul—is allowed freely and fully to manifest itself. How many of us have felt, even to the small extent to which the present system of things has prevailed in this Territory, how lifeless and monotonous everything has been—how killing to the spirit and all its energies. Men holding greater or less positions in the Priesthood may not have felt this, because they have had a certain amount of thinking and directing to do, which has kept their energies alive. But all intelligent, enterprising men—not so situated—have, more or less, felt what a check and drag upon all enterprise the system of submitting every plan, project and purpose, to some personage has been. It has only been, and could only be yielded to for fear of displeasing God. And were this system of dictation carried out to its fullest extent, and members of the Priesthood invested with the absolute power proposed, we may imagine how confined, cabined and manacled we should feel. It is a proposition at war with nature and nature's God—one to which the spirit of man can never submit. It may look reasonable and fair as a theory at a distance, but we no sooner come up to it and put on the yoke than we are compelled to feel that it is as impossible as it is absurd.

We will now refer to an argument sometimes brought up to support the idea that the President of the Church must be obeyed as the voice of God Himself. It is stated in the Doctrine and Covenants that the Church are to receive the words of Joseph "as from mine own mouth," or words to that effect. It is, therefore, argued that the dictations of Joseph's successor are to be unhesitatingly accepted as though given by the Deity direct. Taking it for granted for a moment, that the present President of the Church stands in every respect in Joseph's place, the first question that arises is, on what principle are we required to receive commandments from God's "own mouth?" and the answer is we are only bound to receive them exactly in proportion to the divinity with which they are witnessed to the soul; for, was it possible for God to give a commandment in such a way that the receiver did not perfectly know that it came from Him, he could, of course, be under no obligation to receive or obey it. And this is all we claim. To the extent that we have a testimony of the truthfulness, wisdom or divinity of a measure, we contend that it should be obeyed, and to that extent alone. As we have already shown no one is under condemnation for not obeying words from God's "own mouth," even when coming through a Prophet, Seer and Revelator, unless the light of God within the soul has certified to their being divine. No matter what the Bible—or any other book—may seem to say to the contrary, this principle speaks for itself and must be true, for God is a God of justice, and it would be a monstrous perversion of all justice to condemn men on any other principle.

This much is all we could assert concerning the dictations of the present President of the Church, even did he actually stand in Joseph Smith's place. But he does not do this in every respect. He is his successor only so far as the Presidency of the Church is concerned. He does not succeed him as Prophet and Seer. President Young has, himself, publicly admitted this on several occasions; and did he not admit it we know, by the fact of his presenting no new Revelations, that it is so. A man cannot be ordained a Prophet or Seer any more than he can be ordained to be six feet high, or to have red hair. The faculty of Seership and the Prophetic quality are matters of personal organization, and must—as in Joseph Smith's case—be born with the man These natural qualities President Young—though gifted in other ways—does not possess, and he does not claim them. It is well understood that he is influenced simply by his impressions and the best light he can get. He is an inspirational man, but like all men who do not possess that power of direct communication with the invisible world possessed by such men as Joseph Smith, his impressions are liable to be colored or influenced by the natural leanings of his personal organization. Seership, we admit, is simply a natural quality, and Seers, as men, may possess far less of intelligence and heavenly qualities than men not so organized; but speaking of them simply as vehicles for communications from the Heavenly worlds they are far more reliable. On this account we are very differently situated to what we were in the days of Joseph.

Our present situation is simply this: it has pleased God to lead this Church for a time by a President instead of a Prophet and Seer. In the days of Joseph we had continuous Revelations and far more direct communications with heavenly beings. Principles were, consequently, dictated with a great degree of certainty. There was, therefore, some reason for saying that commandments were to be received as from "mine own mouth." But now the case is vastly different. Instead of this direct communion with angelic beings we are led by past revelations, and such light and intelligence as a man holding simply a Presidency over us can give. How great the difference as to fallibility or errors of judgment between then and now. That faith that could be claimed for the revelations of a Prophet and Seer cannot be demanded for the dictations of a presiding officer who does not possess his opportunities. No matter how intelligent or good he otherwise may be. No thinking man could demand that his ideas and judgment under such circumstances be received as from God's "own mouth." The argument, therefore, that such sayings, as those in the Doctrine and Covenants concerning Joseph Smith, apply to President Young, falls to the ground. But, as we have shown, were he a Prophet, Seer and Revelator, even then, that eternal and immutable proviso that no man can be condemned except so far as he receives light and rejects it, would leave things just where they were so far as unquestioning obedience was concerned. How much more then, seeing he makes no such claims is it unreasonable to ask the people of a whole Territory to lay aside their entire judgment and intellect and place it at the feet of a man—wise and desirous of doing right though he may be—who is led solely by impressions and his best conceptions?

The next point to which we shall refer is that vague notion which exists in many people's minds, that, some such absolute dictatorial power as now claimed by the members of our Priesthood, has been exercised in the Church in all ages. In answer to this idea let us say that there have been but two churches organized similarly to ours of which we have any distinct record, and it is easy enough to see how their Priesthood operated. These two consist of the one established by Jesus, recorded in the Bible, and the one spoken of in the Book of Mormon. It is true that we have a few fragmentary words which go to prove that there was a Church of Zion under Enoch, but we have no record of the peculiarities of its history, and can only assume how its priesthood acted. Again it may be said that Moses preached the Gospel to the Israelites before he introduced the law of carnal commandments. Supposing that he did we have no records of its organization, or of its methods of procedure. And, if Adam, or any other patriarch, had a similar organization to ours, we have even less description of their organization and of the claims of their Priesthood. Of course any persons can assume what they like concerning the systems of Enoch, Moses, or any other patriarch, and we cannot contradict them; but so far as history goes, we have a record of the organization and system of two churches only in our sacred books—and in neither of these cases is there one word to show that the Priesthood ever assumed to dictate, unquestioned, all the spiritual and temporal affairs of the people. We do not say that they did not occasionally give counsel and advice on temporal matters, but if they did, there is no evidence that they claimed to dictate or control, further than the light and inspiration of God bore witness to each individual of the truth of their counsels. It will be seen at once that such claims to absolute rule as are now put forth, are without a precedent in the past, and were never even heard of until our own times.

There is another way of testing this assumption of the right of the Priesthood to dictate in all things temporal and spiritual, and that is, by our experience in the past. When such claims to control us are made by our brethren, on the ground that they are guided by a wisdom superior to that of man's—in fact, by the wisdom of God Himself, we—who are required to obey—before committing ourselves and all we possess into their hands—certainly have a right to look at the results of their past efforts in the use of such powers, and see wherein a wisdom greater than man's has been manifested. Where God acts in nature we see proofs of his skill, before which man's ability is as nothing. And when it is asserted that God has directed and controlled certain financial affairs, we have also a right to look for evidences of such wisdom as shall throw the ordinary skill of men altogether into the shade. Now with all respect to the natural ability and judgment of the presiding Priesthood—which we think equal to that of most men—we must say we discern no manifestation of such superior wisdom. Let the reader allow his mind to pass over the list of the many temporal enterprises which the Priesthood have already controlled, from the Iron Works to the building of the New Tabernacle, and he will see that they have been followed by such failures and weaknesses as might be expected from the best human judgment of ordinary men. He will be forced to the conclusion that, judging by the result of such efforts, there is nothing to warrant us in the belief that God has specially appointed the Priesthood to direct such matters, or to encourage us in resigning our own judgment upon temporal matters entirely into their hands.

And now one point more before we close. We know that it will be asserted that mechanical obedience is not required by our Priesthood, but that it is the right of every man to know for himself that what he is counselled to do is right. A little examination will show that this is a mere theory with no practical meaning. For instance, it is said that it is our privilege to know that the counsels of the Priesthood are of God, but suppose, in answer to the sincere prayers of one or a thousand of us, we get no evidence to that effect, but a clear conviction that the measures are wrong, will the Priesthood permit us to act on our convictions and remain members of the Church? Certainly not! They will reply at once, that the fact of our having such an evidence is direct proof that such testimony did not come from God. What, then, is the use of our going to God for any testimony in such a case? Really and truly, the theory of our Priesthood amounts to this,—It is your privilege to have a testimony that the measures of the Priesthood are of God, but it is not your privilege to obtain a witness that they are not. If you do not obtain a knowledge that they are correct, it is because you are more or less corrupt. The measures of the Priesthood are right, and there can come no testimony from God that they are wrong. Who cannot see that, while the Priesthood take a position like this, all application to God on the subject is rendered useless? What is the use of the privilege of asking God concerning the measures of the Priesthood, when, virtually, you may only ask Him to prove to you that they are right? It will be seen that, first and last, we have to assume that the measures are of God. The exercise of our judgment or opinion is, therefore, useless to begin with. Any child can understand that, with such assumptions staring us in the face, there is no room left for anything but mechanical obedience, no matter what may be asserted to the contrary.

Thus far we have briefly examined the doctrine of unquestioning obedience to the Priesthood. We have shown that its tendency is to destroy the individuality of man, intellectually and spiritually and to impede his growth and progress.

We have seen that the statement that the Gospel is an arbitrary law, and a precedent for absolute requirements, is untrue. We have demonstrated that a Zion built up on the principle of unconditional obedience, would be bereft of its greatest glory—the voluntary and perfectly intelligent operation of its people; and that its unity would only be the unity of coercion—a unity yielding no glory or honor to God or benefit to man.

We have also seen that the exercise of such arbitrary rule is without a single precedent in the history of all Gospel Churches in the past; and finally, that there is no guarantee or proof of the divine investment of such authority to be found in the success of the temporal enterprises of the Priesthood in our own midst.

And we now leave the question with the members of our church, assured that the hour is near that will necessitate every one to consider the question; for the carrying out of the present programme of the Priesthood will compel all, sooner or later, to resign their freedom of thought and action, or to be treated as apostates. Every man must, therefore, decide this question for himself, and assert his gospel rights or for ever lay them down, without an intelligent reason for so doing. The Priesthood as an institution we revere as divine. It is because we know that such claims to absolute power form no part of that Divine institution, that we are opposed to them. Priesthood, itself, will live for ever and universally prevail, but its supremacy and influence will be found in its light, intelligence and heavenly influences, and not in authoritative rule. It is its destiny yet to control the temporalities of this earth, not, however, by coming down to their level, but by standing up above them as a great spiritual and intellectual power, and shedding down its influence upon them, and thus moulding them to its will. In this way will it yet govern or influence the whole earth, and fulfil the grand destiny which Prophets have foretold.

LETTER TO PRESIDENT BRIGHAM YOUNG.

Salt Lake City, Nov. 6th, 1869.

Prest. B. Young,

Dear Brother:—Endorsing, as I do with all my heart, most of the sentiments contained in the Utah Magazine, together with the policy, "Cards" and "Protest" of the Editors, I feel that it would be, in the highest degree reprehensible and hypocritical, to attempt to fulfil the mission lately assigned to me, without first frankly explaining my sentiments to you. I feel compelled, by every conviction of my soul, by my duty to God and to humanity, to sustain the policy and spirit of the Magazine; and, while reserving to myself the right to differ from any views that may be expressed therein, I must maintain and advocate what I consider to be right and truth, regardless of consequences to myself.

With sentiments of personal esteem, I remain

Your Brother,

W. H. Shearman.

THE NOBLE SOUL.

God bless the man—the noble soul—
Who lives to bless his fellow man,
Who lives the evil to control,
And bring to pass what good he can.

No narrow views his mind enthral,
No selfish aim his spirit knows,
His heart expands with love to all
The human race, both friends and foes.

Though oft of "mean and humble birth,"
Stranger to wealth and pomp and show,
He shapes the destiny of Earth,
He strikes, and tyrants feel the blow.

He speaks, and words of lightning fall,
Which lightens e'en the darkest mind,
And in their flame intense, though small,
He melts the shackles from mankind.

And yet—however strange—'tis true
That few accord the meed of praise,
While countless foes his pathway strew
With thorns where they should scatter bays.

Though hard his fate, he murmurs not,
Thus has it been since time began;
Yea, hard indeed has been the lot
Of every noble-minded man.

A few such men in every age,
Of almost every race and clime,
Have lived to brighten history's page,
Which, else, had been one blot of crime.

The blessings we most highly prize,
Were by these men full dearly bought
With toil and blood and sacrifice,
While scoffed, reviled and set at nought.

And though in life they seldom drew
Applause, or won a worldly name,
Their deeds succeeding ages knew,
And crowned them with undying fame.

G. W. Thurston.

THE SCHISM IN UTAH.

BY EDWARD W. TULLIDGE.

East and West, throughout this entire continent, the American press is publishing news of the "Great schism in Utah," while our contemporaries at home affect to treat the subject with contempt. Now, be the issues before us more or less important, we should all aim to treat the subject with impartial and serious deliberation. Not as partisans, but as tributes, ought we, who are the most deeply concerned in the matter, to sit in judgment now to examine all our situations; not with fierce hates, but in dispassionate friendship should we sound the present depths of our faith and look in fearless good-will at each other's views. Shall any so err in judgment or heart as to forget that, however much our difference, we should at least be men of justice and truth?

Friends abroad, brethren at home, THIS IS NO SCHISM. All who thus view it, will misconceive the problem, and will understand nothing of the solution which Providence will assuredly give it, until, like Mormonism in its entirety, it has become one of the great facts of the age. It is a result, not a split,—a result of the whole and not of a part. There is a condition in "Mormonism" to-day, and not a dissension. It is a condition of thought, of feeling, of sentiment and practical situations both social and religious. True, it has now assumed form, through the action of the Utah Priesthood, in High Council, upon certain of its members. But though this action has been brought about between the few who represent the UTAH MAGAZINE and the ruling authorities of the Church, it extends, in fact, to a defining of the situations of the whole, both priests and people. The situations of the authorities are very simple; their aims of government immense; but much better adapted to the conceptions and conditions of the world a thousand years ago, when such men as Charlemagne and the ruling Priesthood of the Catholic Church, were bringing the barbaric chaos of Europe into form; certainly not suited to the advanced thought of modern times, nor specially adapted to our conditions to-day, occupying, as we do, the geographical heart of the Pacific Territories. And thus it practically stands that the ruling Church authorities of Utah in the coming issue have defined not only the situations for their people but also the situations of the United States concerning this Territory. I grant there is integrity in the conception of our leaders from their point of viewing Priesthood, and a certain legitimacy in their position; but that position mankind never will again allow to be maintained, especially on this continent. The gist of all their situations and policy, both social and religious, is found in two words—THEOCRATIC ABSOLUTISM. But just at this point we have to pause, for there is now clearly defined for us a form of religious and social government, which the thousands of us understood not to be in the Mormon programme when we accepted it. Circumstances, then, are to-day bringing us to a reconsideration of ourselves and our stand-points. There is no more schism about the matter than there was in the world when we were baptized. Sooner or later the Mormon people throughout the world must determine for themselves how many of them have accepted, or how many in future will accept understandingly a theocratic absolutism as the true exposition of their faith and the genius of the Mormon work.

We have before us, near in the future, not a schism, but the very ISSUE of Mormondom. Five more years of determined administration of the authorities of this Church towards temporal and spiritual absolutisms, under the new circumstances of the coming times, will clearly show the character and genius of the Mormon people. If such movements as Coöperation and Consecration are pressed home with the settled purpose and concentrated might which have ever characterized the administration of President Young, then we shall perforce more fully understand ourselves, our intentions and our issues.

There never was a man who stood more firmly to his purposes and more consistently maintained his own conceptions of his mission, than Brigham Young. I cannot help doing justice to him who has led us for a quarter of a century; at the same time claiming my own views upon religion and social government. Judging, then, from all the past, the President will continue to the end of his life, to maintain all his positions and carry out all his purposes. He would give up a kingdom and become a private gentleman rather than renounce his policy. This I admire, touching the consistency of his character; but I also believe the policy of a theocratic absolutism to be detrimental to our commonwealth, destructive to individualism and personal enterprise, and in radical antagonism to the general rights of man.

Taking these views of the subject from various sides, it appears to me that the entire Mormon people and their movement are entering into an issue not a schism. This brings us to a consideration of the other side, which has always existed in the Mormon Church, though circumstances are now bringing that side into more determined prominence. It matters not what name you give it, for it is facts and conditions that we are tracing—the facts and conditions of all Mormondom, in its social and religious elements. Call one side, if it so please, the orthodox, and the other the heterodox; or, what would be much more just, the absolute and the exclusive, the liberal and universalian. Both are the outgrowths of the Mormon people.

Now this liberal side has its corresponding thoughts, genius, will and direction. The characteristics of these are towards individualism and self-manifestation, towards expansion rather than concentration.

The tens of thousands from the old countries embraced Mormonism because they believed it to be the broadest and most liberal system, socially and religiously, ever revealed from Heaven to man. They viewed it not as something destined to be narrowed down into an absolute rule and a state of isolation in a given locality, for, though they believed that Zion had gone up into the mountains for growth, they prophetically, beheld her coming down from the mountains and spreading over all the earth with healing medicine for the nations. It is true the Mormon system was understood to be a system of Divine government, but certainly not for that less fraught with good will for all mankind—not less general in its applications for human good in every part of the earth. Out of this grew the fact that we became a nation of missionaries, and in the fervor of a grand ambition, spread our marvellous religious enterprise over almost every land. Indeed, it was the mighty genius of a mission which impelled us through the nations, with our glad tidings that God once more had spoken to man and that the Heavens were opened, never to be closed again. As HE is my judge, I believe to this day that this was and is the truth. And this passing testimony leads me directly to another phase of what I have termed a condition of the whole and not a schism made by a few thinking men. The phase to which I now refer, is the spiritual phase of Mormonism and the Mormons. I think that no one will say that this phase constitutes a schism, when it once belonged to the entire people, from the Prophet to the last member baptized, and did in fact create the Mormon type of religion.

Here, then, we will start this line of our subject, with the statement that several thousand Mormon Elders have been impelled by the forceful spirit of a new dispensation, through the nations, especially of Europe, bearing witness that God had spoken to man again and that the Heavens were opened never more to be closed. This we all believed, and all even declared that they knew it to be true. That form of wording expressive of knowledge, became the peculiar distinction between the Mormons and the different sects, who affirmed that certainty was not possible in this world touching spiritual and eternal things, and that God would never open the Heavens to speak to man again till the day of judgment, when the whole world should be summoned to appear before the great Tribunal. But the Mormon Elders bore their strange testimony to the reverse of this in their own experience; they made, from first to last, above a quarter of a million converts, of whom nearly every man was ordained to preach and witness to the great spiritual condition and facts of the Mormon dispensation. And to the men let us add the sisters, who were not only brought into the same spiritual state, but who testified to it as earnestly as did the brethren, making, on their part of our missionary operations, almost as many converts. This, then, it will be perceived, formed the proper Mormon condition and experience, and out of this grew our UNITY which we have all dwelt upon so much and which has so astonished the world. Now this condition was one of unlimited free thought, free speech and individual manifestations of gifts and character. It made us, in fact, immensely republican in our genius, and our Elders were veritable image-smashers in beating down the conservatisms of religions, and the consolidations of ages in institutional forms. New thoughts, new ideas, new inspirations, were the very characteristics of the Mormon condition. We were not afraid of contact with the world, we courted not isolation for the growth of our faith, but sought a broad field and universal publicity. The clergymen of all denominations in England, Scotland and Wales, can bear testimony how little we feared to throw our thoughts down before them, and how many thousands of converts we took from under the pulpits of the most eloquent men of the age. This was in consequence of our spiritual power and the irresistible force of our testimony. It was not because we were masterly builders and administrators of temporal systems and government, for the majority of us were young and inexperienced, but it was because we were daring thinkers in new directions and God sent antagonists to all conservatisms. Our very missions taught us that conservatisms, whether in religions or in national polity, brought the world into spiritual and temporal bondage and hindered it from pursuing a progressive course; and we are now finding the same thing to be true in our experience in Utah. As nearly all the Scotch, English and Welsh Elders were very young men, we did not at first realize that conservatism and concentration of governmental power were sometimes necessary even to preserve the existence of a people, as we can now understand it, through the illustrations of President Young's personal mission in bringing the Saints into the Rocky Mountains and there consolidating them into a social and temporal power. What the Elders at first chiefly appreciated, was that they were as batteries of thought, charged with new ideas, fresh inspirations and bolder views of God and his intentions concerning mankind. Hence grew up among us men of strong individuality, marked character, and daring thought in new directions. For individualism and character take such men as Brigham Young and Heber C. Kimball; for thinkers and idealists, the two Pratts and Amasa Lyman. They were the legitimate outgrowths of Joseph Smith and his condition of the Mormon mission.

But Brigham's mission was as necessary as that of Joseph —the successor necessary even to preserve and continue the work of the founder.

After Joseph Smith, who was the Prophet of a new dispensation, and whose very character was that of a smasher-down of worn-out systems and all impediments to human progress, came Brigham Young, the Prophet of conservatism and organization—a very society-builder by nature. He led the people into the wilderness, away from a lawless mob who sought to destroy them; he organized and consolidated them into a community, representing perhaps the most clock-like piece of social machinery ever created in any part of the world. Indeed, its perfection in this feature of consolidation and centralization, is its present detriment. It is too much like clock-work machinery; for human society can never be reduced to mechanical conditions or mathematical laws. Much less can this be in such a work as Mormonism, the very genius of which was destined to charge not only its own society but the whole world with fresh impulses, ever coming, never ceasing. Human society can only be brought into a temporal and spiritual absolutism, mechanically thinking in the daily circles of one man's brain, by the Heavens being closed for a time, so that fresh thoughts and inspirations may cease to flow in their ten thousand channels to the masses.

And this has been the case. The President himself honestly confessed this, when he affirmed, at the High Council, that we had enough revelations on hand to last us for a thousand years. The fact is, then, that the Heavens have been closed while we have been building up our temporal power in the Rocky Mountains.

Thus we find two conditions belonging to the Mormon people, which are abundantly illustrated in their history: the temporal and the spiritual. The temporal is represented in the mission of Brigham Young, the spiritual in the mission of Joseph Smith. Both of these conditions are legitimate in their turn, and have grown out of the constituted authorities of the Church. No one will ever understand our Mormon problem in the past, much less in the future, who treats these two conditions as constituting a schism; yet all human experience proves that the temporal and the spiritual are always somewhat opposed, and sometimes marvellously so.

Let a community—as ours does now—go with heart and might to build up a temporal absolutism, extending to the very sum of the whole, and to such elaborate minuteness as to control the property, the enterprise, the actions, and even the thoughts of every man, woman and child,—then the temporal is in direct antagonism to the spiritual, and will destroy it. This, in fact, has been the case, but there must come the reaction—the issue of the whole, not the schism—and that is the part of the Mormon problem now before us. A temporal absolutism will in time explode itself. Every experienced thinker knows that this is a sound statement of social philosophy.

If this temporal absolutism explode, what, then, will become of Mormonism and the Mormons? Why, they will be expanded a hundred-fold. The spiritual condition, which is represented in Joseph Smith's mission, is not only the proper condition of the Church, but it is the oldest and most universal among the Saints. It has been the condition of the whole and not a part, and the return to it, instead of being a schism, will be a return to our proper state. We have nearly all left that state since we came to Utah, because circumstances naturally tended another way, and the very necessities of our existence as a community, in the first settling of society, threw us all into the direction of the special mission of our President, who has gone, with the Twelve and the leading authorities, so far out of the primitive condition of Joseph Smith's mission, that it is almost impossible for them to return. The people, however, will be restored to the spiritual condition from which they have departed. The very nature of things will bring this about by the law of reaction, as certainly as that the day succeeds the night.

That is our issue. We shall all return in time to Joseph Smith who founded us, and the spiritual condition of his work. The predominance of temporalities will pass away, and the very energy and executive ability of the President, the Twelve, and the Bishops, in attempting to reduce the community to an absolute temporal rule, will bring about the reaction. Co-operation must be continued; the "Order of Enoch" attempted, or else resigned; and, as before observed, the President never gives up his purposes.

The vision which we have heard so much about, will be fulfilled. The "hoops," which the Presidency and the Twelve are driving around the people, will burst by the very force of the present policy. Joseph Smith will again come uppermost; his name again ring through every nation. The genius of the mission of our great founder will redeem the people and bring about spiritual and mental freedom.

If this be not realized, Mormonism and the Mormons will die out of the world. The name of Brigham will live, but our work will enter into a new phase. The Saints are an inspirational people, and their return to a spiritual state will be most legitimate. The genius and mission of Joseph will revive in the hearts of his people. This is the solution of the whole Mormon problem. Cannot our friends abroad and our brethren at home understand, then, that this will be NO SCHISM?

WHO ARE THE CALLED?

BY ELI B. KELSEY.

And no man taketh this honor unto himself, but he that is called of God, as was Aaron.

PAUL.

There is, probably, no question of more interest to the faithful elder of Israel, than that of calling to the ministry of the word of God. The quotation from the sayings of Paul placed at the head of this article, has often been used in defence of the practice prevailing for many years past in this church, of calling men to the most arduous and responsible missions, by an effort of dictatorial power, without any reference or respect to their individual inspirations. Indeed, the right to exercise any agency or discretion on the subject by the individual most interested, has been so utterly ignored that the mere hesitancy of the person called to go upon a mission—no matter how much it may be against his own feelings, nor how destructive it may be to his personal affairs—would subject him to the severest ecclesiastical censure; and in some cases would be considered cause sufficient to justify his expulsion from the Church.

I have often heard Elders who were enthusiastically conservative in their views, quote and wind up with what they considered the most conclusive of arguments, Viz: "How was Aaron called? Why, he was called of God through Moses." I hope I shall not be considered too heterodox when I declare that Aaron was not called of God through Moses. In proof of this assertion I quote Exodus 4th chapter, 14th verse:

And the anger of the Lord was kindled against Moses, and He said, Is not Aaron, the Levite, thy brother? I know that he can speak well. And also, behold, he cometh forth to meet thee, and when he seeth thee he will be glad in his heart.

At this period, nearly forty years had passed away from the time of Moses' flight from Egypt, and since he had seen Aaron, and the opening of God's ministrations to him through the burning bush. We have no account of his having had any intercourse with his brethren in Egypt during all the time of his sojourn in the land of Midian. Who told Aaron to go out into the wilderness to meet his brother Moses? Who told Aaron that God had called his brother Moses? In answer to these questions, we quote Exodus 4th chapter, 27th verse:

And the Lord said to Aaron, go into the wilderness to meet Moses. And he went, and met him in the mount of God, and kissed him.

Aaron was prepared by the voice of revelation for the special part that he was to play in the great work he performed in behalf of Israel. The saying of God,—"I know that he can speak well,"—foreshadowed the character of Aaron's mission.

Aaron was rich in that wherein Moses was deficient—the power of speech. Moses, on the other hand, was rich in administrative qualities of mind—Aaron's utter want of administrative ability was rendered apparent during the forty days that he was left in charge, while Moses was in the "mount." Sidney Rigdon was not more unfortunate in his efforts to govern the people in Kirtland, than was Aaron, when, through his want of tact, the congregation broke loose from him and transferred their hope of leadership to a small golden image of a bull-calf.

Peter was left in charge of the church by Jesus Christ. Was Peter's presidency ignored when Jesus himself called Paul? Does not this show that the Lord calls whomsoever He will, through the authorities of the Church or otherwise?

Peter, by education and instinct, was Judaic in character. The field of observation of a fisherman on the Lake of Galilee, was narrow in the extreme. He knew but little of the world outside of the land of his fathers. All his conceptions of the grand and glorious in the work of redemption, were confined to the aggrandizement of the chosen seed. Many years passed away before he was even prepared for a thrice-repeated vision, which, coupled with the out pouring of the Holy Ghost upon Cornelius and his household, broke through the shell of his tradition, and taught him that the Gospel was broad enough for the salvation of the Greek as well as the Jew.

Paul was a man of another mould; through a more intellectual training, all that was cosmopolitan in a naturally generous nature was developed.

Paul could no more have confined his conception of the saving character of the Gospel of Christ to the elevation of the "chosen seed," than Peter could have at once overcome his iron bound Judaic prejudices, and extended his views of the area of salvation beyond the hills of Judea. If no man can take upon himself the honor of the ministry of the word of God, but he that is called of God as was Aaron, then individual inspiration is absolutely necessary to qualify a man to preach the Gospel in the power of the spirit. I do not wish to be understood that it is not lawful for those in authority to call whomsoever they will to go upon missions to preach the Gospel; but I do contend that unless the call so made shall meet with a response in the heart and mind of the individual called to perform a special work in the ministry, that the call is not made by the inspiration of God's spirit. For if the person selected is a worthy servant, it is his right that the Lord, in calling him through another, should speak loud enough for him to hear. If, on the other hand, he should be an unfaithful and slothful servant, he cannot have the answer and witness of the spirit, and is not worthy, nor will the Lord want him to go forth in the ministry—for such a man would only gather such souls as were of like character with himself.

I contend that no calling to the work of the ministry, let it be made by whomsoever it may, is of God unless the inspiration and witness of the spirit reach the heart and mind of the individual called. Unless this be the case, he is not "called of God as was Aaron."

Who among the elders of Israel does not know that for many years, the word "mission" has been used in very many cases as a terror to the (real or supposed) transgressor; and that "spite missions" are not unknown circumstances? What has dried up most of the missionary fields among the nations? Is it because the righteous element has been exhausted in those nations? By no means. But because the drunkard and the illicit dealer in cattle have, in some instances, been constituted the representatives of Zion, with the hope that they might find reforming influences abroad that they would not give heed to at home. It is also because many of the young, the careless and inexperienced have very often been sent forth as representatives of Zion—they going forth reluctantly, and fearfully, feeling no inspiration nor desire to take upon themselves the office of the ministry. They have gone because the finger of scorn would have been pointed at them had they not gone. A great part of those young men were of noble spirit, and of excellent parentage, and would, no doubt, in time have been called with the holiest of all callings, namely: through the inspiration of God witnessed in their own souls—CALLED OF GOD AS WAS AARON.

Many good and true men have been called by an inexorable spirit of power, to leave houses, lands, wives and children, and have all their industries broken up—the plans and labors of years destroyed. What for? For Christ's sake and the Gospel? No! but because of a private pique on the part of a Bishop—a President or influential enemy. They went not because they felt the inspirations of the spirit prompting them, as it did Aaron when he went out to meet his brother Moses. They went away grieved in spirit—their confidence and trust in their brethren injured. Through their prayers and faithfulness they were blessed in a measure and blessed others, but did they feel that Divine unction resting upon them that they would have felt had they gone because they had God's inspirations speaking to their own souls, and filling them with the noblest desires to be the bearers of the glad tidings of salvation to the honest in heart?

I think it is manifest to all that, beginning with the death of the Prophet Joseph, a gradual falling off in the spirituality of the work has been manifest, and that we have by almost insensible degrees developed in the course of years a most intense materiality.

Ancient Israel refused to have the Lord talk to them directly, but requested Moses to ask the Lord to talk only with him, and let him be a mouth-piece unto them. But do we want to go back to those days for light, or for all our precedents? If so, then let us go back to the laws of sacrifice—to the bloody Mosiac code as well.

If we have been made the blessed recipients of a higher and holier faith, let us strive for the highest developments of that faith. If the promise is to us that the Holy Ghost will take of the things of the Father and the Son and reveal them unto us, let us strive to cultivate an inspirational state or condition, that having ears and hearts, we can both hear and understand for ourselves the whispering of the "still, small voice of the spirit,"—then shall we always know "Who are the called."

Lives of great men all remind us,
We can make our lives sublime:
And, departing, leave behind us
Footprints on the sands of time.

Correspondence.

A CARD FROM JOHN TULLIDGE, JUN'R.

Having, at the trial before the High Council, endorsed the views and sentiments of Elders Harrison and Godbe, I beg to offer a few remarks through the UTAH MAGAZINE.

When the representatives of the Latter Day work came to us with their mission, they proclaimed truth and liberty to the children of men. Their programme was one of a grand and universalian character, marked not with those traits so generally observed in the various denominations of sectarianism. The mission of the Prophet came not to me as a narrow and dwarfish mission, seeking to divide mankind, creating in their bosoms petty differences and sectarian jealousy. I had no conception that, in embracing the Gospel, I was about to resign my manhood and become a slave to a priestly rule.

Indeed, I saw not man in the work, nor was the fear of man in my breast. The Gospel came as something grand and supremely liberal, and I received it with all my heart. I would not, even at that early age, have consented to renounce all that constituted a man—namely, reason, freedom of thought and action. We understood "Mormonism" to be characterized by a different spirit than that which seeks to coerce the human mind and subvert our manhood.

How often did we sing the favorite verse—

Freedom and reason make us men,
Take these away, what are we then,
Mere animals, and just as well,
The beasts may think of heaven or hell.

Now I respectfully beg the privilege of maintaining the faith once delivered to the saints. I believe in a spiritual work,—a broad, just and generous Gospel. Such I received in my boyhood, and I must be true to that to which I have given the devotion of a life. For seventeen years I have stood by my faith, and dare not APOSTATIZE from it now, to embrace a temporal and commercial Gospel. The faith once delivered to the Saints, is mine. Upon its platform let me stand, though the price for desiring to be a man, should be that which my brethren have already paid, for daring, in the UTAH MAGAZINE, to maintain the rights and conscience of men.

JOHN TULLIDGE JUN'R.

PROGRESSIVE THOUGHT.

A friend has called our attention to the following extracts from Herbert Spencer, one of the most advanced thinkers of the age.

"'Why,' it may be asked, 'if all creeds have an average fitness to their times and places, should we not rest satisfied with that to which we are born? If the established belief contains an essential truth—if the forms under which it presents this truth, though extrinsically bad, are intrinsically good—if the abolition of these forms would be at present detrimental to the great majority—nay, if there are scarcely any to whom the ultimate and most abstract belief can furnish an adequate rule of life; surely it is wrong, for the present at least, to propagate this ultimate and most abstract belief.'"

"The reply is, that though existing religious ideas and institutions have an average adaptation to the characters of the people who live under them, yet, as these characters are ever changing, the adaptation is ever becoming imperfect; and the ideas and institutions need remodelling with a frequency proportionate to the rapidity of the change. Hence, while it is requisite that free play should be given to conservative thought and action, progressive thought and action must also have free play. Without the agency of both, there can not be those continual re-adaptations which orderly progress demands."

Whoever hesitates to utter that which he thinks the highest truth, lest it should be too much in advance of the time, may reassure himself by looking at his acts from an impersonal point of view. Let him duly realize the fact, that opinion is the agency through which character adapts external arrangements to itself—that his opinion rightly forms part of this agency—is a unit of force, constituting, with other such units, the general power which works social changes; and he will perceive that he may properly give full utterance to his innermost conviction, leaving it to produce what effect it may. It is not for nothing that he has in him these sympathies with some principles and repugnance to others.

He, with all his capacities, and aspirations, and beliefs, is not an accident, but a product of the time. He must remember that while he is a descendent of the past, he is a parent of the future; and that his thoughts are as children born to him, which he may not carelessly let die. He, like every other man, may properly consider himself as one of the myriad agencies through whom works the Unknown Cause; and when the Unknown Cause produces in him a certain belief, he is thereby authorized to profess and act out that belief.

For, to render in their highest sense the words of the poet,

> —— Nature is made better by no mean,
> But Nature makes that mean; over that art
> Which you say adds to Nature, is an art
> That Nature makes.

Not as adventitious, therefore, will the wise man regard the faith that is in him.

The highest truth he sees he will fearlessly utter; knowing that, let what may come of it, he is thus playing his right part in the world, knowing that if he can effect the change he aims at—well; if not—well also; though not so well.

Renan, after premising that religions naturally construe as hostility, even the most respectful expression of difference and see enemies in all who exercise on them the simplest rights of reason, adds that "the harshest penalty which the man who has reached a life of reflection suffers, is doubtless that of seeing himself cut off from the best souls, and of thinking that the people with whom he would best love to dwell in moral communion, must perforce regard him as perverse. One must needs be very confident not to be troubled when women and children clasp their hands and exclaim: 'Think as we do!'" He closes with these noble sentiments, not inapplicable, I think, to the present crisis.

"While I am ready to receive with gratitude, to discuss, to adopt, if need be, all suggestions really scientific that may be addressed to me; I shall to the same degree persist in holding as impertinent the declamations of the sectarian spirit, and in avoiding at all cost the pitiful debate which too often, by substituting personal questions for the pure search for truth, make learning ridiculous. If people imagine that by insults, by false citations, by anonymous and cowardly slanders, by cunning equivocations designed to deceive the uninitiated, they can stay my adopted course of study and thought, they are mistaken. These studies early had for me a supreme interest; they will ever remain under a form more and more extended, the chief object of my investigations. Were I, like so many others, the slave of my desires, did interest or vanity guide me in the direction of my labors, people might, no doubt, by such measures force me to abandon studies, whose usual reward is abuse. But desiring only to be good—asking no recompense for study, but study itself—I am bold to declare that no human motive has power to make me utter one word more or less than I am determined to say. The liberty I demand being identical with that of science, cannot be refused me; if the seventeenth century had its Holland, mental restriction, however general, will hardly go so far in our day, that the corner of the world shall not be left where a man can think at his ease. Nothing, therefore, shall force me to deviate from the plan that I have marked out, and bold to be the line of my duty; inflexible search for the truth according to the measure of my ability, by all the means of legitimate investigation which are at the disposal of man; firm and frank expression of the results that seem to me probable or certain, wholly regardless of their bearing, and careless of conventional opinion; willingness to correct myself whenever the criticism of competent persons, or the advance of knowledge, brings me to it. As to the assaults of ignorance and fanaticism, they will afflict without staggering me when I think them sincere; when I cannot think them so, I hope through practice to reach a serenity that they will not ruffle by an emotion of sadness."

Pardon the liberty I have taken, and believe me the friend of free thought, whether it agrees with my own views or not.

THE TRAVELING POST-OFFICE.

Many years ago, and before this Line was so much as projected, I was engaged as a clerk in a Traveling Post-office running along the Line of railway from London to a town in the Midland Counties, which we will call Fazeley. My duties were to accompany the mail-train, which left Fazeley at 8.15 P. M., and arrived in London about midnight, and to return by the day mail leaving London at 10.30 the following morning, after which I had an unbroken night at Fazeley, while another clerk discharged the same round of work; and in this way each alternate evening I was on duty in the railway post-office van. At first I suffered a little from a hurry and tremor of nerve in pursuing my occupation while the train was crashing along under bridges and through tunnels at a speed which was then thought marvelous and perilous; but it was not long before my hands and eyes became accustomed to the motion of the carriage, and I could go through my business with the same despatch and ease as in the post-office of the country town where I had learned it, and from which I had been promoted by the influence of the surveyor of the district, Mr. Huntingdon. In fact, the work soon fell into a monotonous routine, which, night after night, was pursued in an unbroken course by myself and the junior clerk, who was my only assistant: the railway post-office work not having then attained the importance and magnitude it now possesses.

Our route lay through an agricultural district containing many small towns, which made up two or three bags only; one for London; another perhaps for the country town; a third for the railway post-office, to be opened by us, and the enclosures to be distributed according to their various addresses. The clerks in many of these small offices were women, as is very generally the case still, being the daughters and female relatives of the nominal postmaster, who transact most of the business of the office, and whose names are most frequently signed upon the bills accompanying the bags. I was a young man, and somewhat more curious in feminine handwriting than I am now. There was one family in particular, whom I had never seen, but with whose signatures I was perfectly familiar—clear, delicate, and educated, very unlike the miserable scrawl upon other letter-bills. One New Year's-eve, in a moment of sentiment, I tied a slip of paper among a bundle of letters for their office, upon which I had written, "A happy New Year to you all." The next evening brought me a return of my good wishes, as I guessed, by three sisters of the name of Clifton. From that day, every now and then, a sentence or two as brief as the one above, passed between us, and the feeling of acquaintance and friendship grew upon me, though I had never yet had an opportunity of seeing my fair unknown friends.

It was towards the close of the following October that it came under my notice that the then Premier of the ministry was paying an autumn visit to a nobleman, whose country seat was situated near a small village on our line of rail. The Premier's despatch box, containing, of course, all the despatches which it was necessary to send down to him, passed between him and the Secretary of State, and was, as usual, entrusted to the care of the post-office. The Continent was just then in a more than ordinarily critical state; we were thought to be upon the verge of an European war; and there were murmurs floating about, at the dispersion of the ministry up and down the country. These circumstances made the charge of the despatch-box the more interesting to me. It was very similar in size and shape to the old-fashioned workboxes used by ladies before boxes of polished and ornamental wood came into vogue, and, like them, it was covered with red morocco leather, and it fastened with a lock and key. The first time it came into my hands I took such special notice of it as might be expected. Upon the corner of the lid I detected a peculiar device scratched slightly upon it, most probably with the sharp point of a steel pen, in such a moment of preoccupation of mind as causes most of us to draw odd lines and caricatured faces upon any piece of paper which may lie under our hand. It was the old revolutionary device of a heart with a dagger piercing it; and I wondered whether it could be the Premier, or one of his secretaries, who had traced it upon the morocco.

The box had been traveling up and down for about ten days, and, as the village did not make up a bag for London, there being very few letters excepting those from the great house, the letter-bag from the house, and the despatch-box, were handed direct into our traveling post-office. But in compliment to the presence of the Premier in the neighborhood, the train, instead of slackening speed only, stopped altogether, in order that the Premier's trusty and confidential messenger might deliver the important box into my own hands, that its perfect safety might be ensured. I had an undefined suspicion that some person was also employed to accompany the train up to London, for three or four times I had met with a foreign-looking gentleman at Euston-square, standing at the door of the carriage nearest the post-office van, and eyeing the heavy bags as they were transferred from my care to the custody of the officials from the General Post-office. But though I felt amused and somewhat nettled at this needless precaution, I took no further notice of the man, except to observe that he had the swarthy aspect of a foreigner, and that he kept his face well away from the light of the lamps. Except for these things, and after the first time or two, the Premier's despatch-box interested me no more than any other part of my charge. My work had been doubly monotonous for some time past, and I began to think it time to get up some little entertainment with my unknown friends, the Cliftons. I was just thinking of it as the train stopped at the station about a mile from the town where they lived, and their postman, a gruff matter-of-fact fellow—you could see it in every line of his face—put in the letter-bags, and with them a letter addressed to me. It was in an official envelope, "On Her Majesty's Service," and the seal was an official seal. On the folded paper inside it (folded officially also) I read the following order: "Mr. Wilcox is requested to permit the bearer, the daughter of the post-master at Eaton, to see the working of the railway post-office during the up-journey." The writing I knew well as being that of one of the surveyor's clerks, and the signature was Mr. Huntingdon's. The bearer of the order presented herself at the door, the snorting of the engine gave notice of the instant departure of the train, I held out my hand, the young lady sprang lightly and deftly into the van, and we were off again on our midnight journey.

She was a small slight creature, one of those slender little girls one never thinks of as being a woman, dressed neatly and plainly in a dark dress, with a veil hanging a little over her face and tied under her chin: the most noticeable thing about her appearance being a great mass of light hair, almost yellow, which had got loose in some way, and fell down her neck in thick wavy tresses. She had a free pleasant way about her, not in the least bold or forward, which in a minute or two made her presence seem the most natural thing in the world. As she stood beside me before the row of boxes into which I was sorting my letters, she asked questions and I answered as if it were quite an every-day occurrence for us to be travelling up together in the night mail to Euston-square station. I blamed myself for an idiot that I had not sooner made an opportunity for visiting my unknown friends at Eaton.

"Then," I said, putting down the letter-bill from their own office before her, "may I ask which of the signatures I know so well, is yours? Is it A. Clifton, or M. Clifton, or S. Clifton? She hesitated a little, and blushed, and lifted up her frank childlike eyes to mine.

"I am A. Clifton," she answered.

"And your name?" I said.

"Anne;" then, as if anxious to give some explanation to me of her present position, she added, "I was going up to London on a visit, and I thought it would be so nice to travel in the post-office to see how the work was done, and Mr. Huntingdon came to survey our office, and he said he would send me an order,"

I felt somewhat surprised, for a stricter martinet than Mr. Huntingdon did not breathe; but I glanced down at the small innocent face at my side, and cordially approved of his departure from ordinary rules.

"Did you know you would travel with me?" I asked, in a lower voice; for Tom Morville, my junior, was at my other elbow.

"I knew I should travel with Mr. Wilcox," she answered, with a smile that made all my nerves tingle.

"You have not written me a word for ages," said I reproachfully.

"You had better not talk, or you'll be making mistakes," she replied, in an arch tone. It was quite true; for, a sudden confusion coming over me, I was sorting the letters at random.

We were just then approaching the small station where the letter-bag from the great house was taken up. The engine was slackening speed. Miss Clifton manifested some natural and becoming diffidence.

"It would look so odd," she said, "to any one on the platform, to see a girl in the post-office van! And they couldn't know I was a postman's daughter, and had an order from Mr. Huntingdon. Is there no dark corner to shelter me?"

I must explain to you in a word or two the construction of the van, which was much less efficiently fitted up than the traveling post-offices of the present day. It was a reversible van, with a door at each right-hand corner. At each door the letter-boxes were so arranged as to form a kind of screen about two feet in width, which prevented people from seeing all over the carriage at once. Thus the door at the far end of the van, the one not in use at the time, was thrown into deep shadow, and the screen before it turned it into a small niche, where a slight person like Miss Clifton was very well concealed from curious eyes. Before the train came within the light from the lamps on the platform, she ensconced herself in this shelter. No one but I could see her laughing face, as she stood there leaning cautiously forward with her finger pressed upon her rosy lips, peeping at the messenger who delivered into my own hands the Premier's despatch-box, while Tom Morville received the letter-bag of the great house.

"See," I said, when we were again in motion, and she had emerged from her concealment, "this is the Premier's despatch-box, going back to the Secretary of State. There are some state secrets for you, and ladies are fond of secrets."

"O! I know nothing about politics," she answered indifferently, "and we have had that box through our office a time or two."

"Did you ever notice this mark upon it," I asked—"a heart with a dagger through it?" and bending down my face to hers, I added a certain spooney remark which I do not care to repeat. Miss Clifton tossed her little head, and pouted her lips; but she took the box out of my hands, and carried it to the further end of the van, after which she put it down upon the counter close beside the screen, and I thought no more about it. The midnight ride was entertaining in the extreme, for the young girl was full of young life and sauciness and merry humor. I can safely aver that I have never been to an evening's so-called entertainment which, to me, was half so enjoyable. It added also to the zest and keen edge of the enjoyment to see her hasten to hide herself whenever I told her we were going to stop to take up the mails.

We had passed Watford, the last station at which we stopped, before I became alive to the recollection that our work was terribly behindhand. Miss Clifton also became grave, and sat at the end of the counter very quiet and subdued, as if her frolic was over, and it was possible she might find something to repent of in it. I told her we should stop no more until we reached Euston-square station, but to my surprise I felt our speed decreasing and our train coming to a stand-still. I looked out and called to the guard in the van behind, who told me he supposed there was something on the line before us, and that we should go on in a minute or two. I turned my head and gave this information to my fellow-clerk and Miss Clifton.

"Do you know where we are?" she asked in a frightened tone.

"At Camden-town," I replied. She sprang hastily from her seat, and came towards me.

"I am close to my friend's house here," she said, "so it is a lucky thing for me. It is not five minutes' walk from the station. I will say good-bye now, Mr. Wilcox, and I thank you a thousand times for your kindness."

She seemed flurried, and she held out both her little hands to me in an appealing kind of way, as if she were afraid of my detaining her against her will. I took them both into mine, pressing them with rather more ardor than was quite necessary.

"I do not like you to go alone at this hour," I said, "but there is no help for it. It has been a delightful time to me. Will you allow me to call upon you to-morrow morning early, for I leave London at 10.30; or on Wednesday, when I shall be in town again?"

"O," she answered, hanging her head, "I don't know. I'll write and tell mamma how good you have been, and, and—but I must go, Mr. Wilcox."

"I don't like your going alone," I repeated.

"O! I know the way perfectly," she said, in the same flurried manner, "perfectly, thank you. And it is close at hand. Good bye!"

She jumped lightly out of the carriage, and the train started on again at the same instant. We were busy enough, as you may suppose. In five minutes more we should be at Euston-square, and there was nearly fifteen minutes' work still to be done. Spite of the enjoyment he had afforded me, I mentally anathematised Mr. Huntingdon and his departure from ordinary rules, and, thrusting Miss Clifton forcibly out of my thoughts, I set to work with a will, gathered up the registered letters for London, tied them into a bundle with the paper bill, and then turned to the counter for the despatch-box.

You have guessed already my cursed misfortune. The Premier's despatch-box was not there. For the first minute or two I was in nowise alarmed, and merely looked round, upon the floor, under the bags, into the boxes, into any place into which it could have fallen or been deposited. We reached Euston-square while I was still searching, and losing more and more of my composure every instant. Tom Merville joined me in my quest, and felt every bag which had been made up and sealed. The box was no small article which could go into a small compass, it was certainly twelve inches long, and more than that in girth. But it turned up nowhere. I never felt nearer fainting than at that moment.

"Could Miss Clifton have carried it off?" suggested Tom Merville.

"No," I said indignantly but thoughtfully, "she couldn't have carried off such a bulky thing as that without our seeing it. It would not go into one of our pockets, Tom, and she wore a tight-fitting jacket that would not conceal anything."

"No, she can't have it," assented Tom; "then it must be somewhere about." We searched again and again, turning over everything in the van, but without success. The Premier's despatch-box was gone; and all we could do at first was to stand and stare at one another. Our trance of blank dismay was of short duration, for the van was assailed by the postmen from St. Martin's-le-Grand, who were waiting for our charge. In a stupor of bewilderment we completed our work, and delivered up the mails; then once more we confronted one another with pale faces, frightened out of our seven senses. All the scrapes we had ever been in (and we had had our usual share of errors and blunders) faded into utter insignificance compared with this. My eye fell upon Mr. Huntingdon's order lying among some scraps of waste paper on the floor, and I picked it up, and put it carefully, with its official envelope, into my pocket.

"We can't stay here," said Tom. The porters were looking in inquisitively; we were seldom so long in quitting our empty van.

"No," I replied, a sudden gleam of sense darting across the blank bewilderment of my brain; "no, we must go to head-quarters at once, and make a clean breast of it. This is no private business, Tom."

We made one more ineffectual search, and then we hailed a cab and drove as hard as we could to the General Post-office. The secretary of the Post-office was not there, of course, but we obtained the address of his residence in one of the suburbs, four or five miles from the City, and we told no one of our misfortune, my idea being that the fewer who were made acquainted with the loss the better. My judgment was in the right there.

We had to knock up the household of the secretary—a formidable personage with whom I had never been brought into contact before—and in a short time we were holding a strictly private and confidential interview with him, by the glimmer of a solitary candle, just serving to light up his severe face, which changed its expression several times, as I narrated the calamity. It was too stupendous for rebuke, and I fancied his eyes softened with something like commiseration as he gazed upon us. After a short interval of deliberation, he announced his intention of accompanying us to the residence of the Secretary of State; and in a few minutes we were driving back again to the opposite extremity of London. It was not far off the hour for the morning delivery of letters when we reached our destination; but the atmosphere was yellow with fog, and we could see nothing as we passed along in almost utter silence, for neither of us ventured to speak, and the secretary only made a brief remark now and then. We drove up to some dwelling enveloped in fog, and we were left in the cab for nearly half an hour, while our secretary went in. At the end of that time we were summoned to an apartment where there was seated at a large desk a small spare man, with a great head, and eyes deeply sunk under the brows. There was no form of introduction, of course, and we could only guess who he might be; but we were requested to repeat our statement, and a few shrewd questions were put to us by the stranger. We were eager to put him in possession of everything we knew, but that was little beyond the fact that the despatch-box was lost.

"That young person must have taken it," he said.

"She could not, sir," I answered positively, but deferentially. "She wore the tightest-fitting pelisse I ever saw, and she gave me both her hands when she said good-bye. She could not possibly have concealed it about her. It would not go into my pocket."

"How did she come to travel with you in the van, sir?" he asked severely.

I gave him for answer the order signed by Mr. Huntingdon. He and our secretary scanned it closely.

"It is Huntingdon's signature without doubt," said the latter; "I could swear to it anywhere. This is an extraordinary circumstance!"

It was an extraordinary circumstance. The two retired into an adjoining room, where they stayed for another half-hour, and when they returned to us their faces still bore an aspect of grave perplexity.

"Mr. Wilcox and Mr. Morville," said our secretary, "it is expedient that this affair should be kept secret. You must even be careful not to hint that you hold any secret. You did well not to announce your loss at the Post-office, and I shall cause it to be understood that you had directions to take the despatch-box direct to its destination. Your business now is to find the young woman and return with her not later than six o'clock this afternoon to my office at the General Post-office. What other steps we think it requisite to take you know nothing about; the less you know the better for yourselves."

Another gleam of commiseration in his official eye made our hearts sink within us. We departed promptly, and, with that instinct of wisdom which at times dictates infallibly what course we should pursue, we decided our line of action. Tom Morville was to go down to Camden-town, and inquire at every house for Miss Clifton, while I—there would be just time for it—was to run down to Eaton by train and obtain her exact address from her parents. We agreed to meet at the General Post-office at half-past five, if I could possibly reach it by that time; but in any case Tom was to report himself to the secretary, and account for my absence.

When I arrived at Eaton, I found that I had only forty-five minutes before the up-train went by; but I made all the haste I could to reach it. I was not surprised to find the post-office in connection with a bookseller's shop, and I saw a pleasant elderly lady seated behind the counter, while a dark-haired girl was sitting at some work a little out of sight. I introduced myself at once.

"I am Frank Wilcox, of the railway post-office, and I have just run down to Eaton to obtain some information from you."

"Certainly. We know you well by name," was the reply given in a cordial manner, which was particularly pleasant to me.

"Will you be so good to give me the address of Miss Anne Clifton in Camden-town?" I said.

"Miss Anne Clifton?" ejaculated the lady.

"Yes. Your daughter, I presume. Who went up to London last night,"

"I have no daughter Anne," she said; "I am Anne Clifton, and my daughters are named Mary and Susan. This is my daughter Mary."

The tall dark-haired girl had left her seat, and now stood beside her mother. Certainly she was very unlike the small golden-haired coquette who had traveled up to London with me as Anne Clifton.

"Madame," I said, scarcely able to speak, "is your other daughter a slender little creature, exactly the reverse of this young lady?"

"No," she answered, laughing, "Susan is both taller and darker than Mary. Call Susan, my dear."

"In a few seconds Miss Susan made her appearance, and I had the three before me—A. Clifton, S. Clifton, and M. Clifton. There was no other girl in the family; and when I described the young lady who had traveled under their name, they could not think of any one in the town—it was a small one—who answered my description, or who had gone on a visit to London. I had no time to spare, and I hurried back to the station, just catching the train as it left the platform. At the appointed hour I met Morville at the General Post-office, and threading the long passages of the secretary's offices, we at length found ourselves anxiously waiting in an ante-room, until we were called into his presence. Morville had discovered nothing, except that the porters and policemen at Camden-town station had seen a young lady pass out last night, attended by a swarthy man who looked like a foreigner, and carried a small black portmanteau.

I scarcely know how long we waited; it might have been years, for I was conscious of an ever-increasing difficulty in commanding my thoughts, or fixing them upon the subject which had engrossed them all day. I had not tasted food for twenty-four hours, nor closed my eyes for thirty-six, while, during the whole of the time, my nervous system had been on full strain.

Presently the summons came, and I was ushered, first, into the inner apartment. There sat five gentlemen round a table, which was strewed with a number of documents. There were the Secretary of State, whom we had seen in the morning, our secretary, and Mr. Huntingdon; the fourth was a fine-looking man, whom I afterwards knew to be the Premier; the fifth I recognised as our great chief, the Postmaster-General. It was an august assemblage to me, and I bowed low; but my head was dizzy, and my throat parched.

"Mr. Wilcox," said our secretary, "you will tell these gentlemen again, the circumstances of the loss you reported to me this morning."

I laid my hand upon the back of a chair to steady myself, and went through the narration for the third time, passing over sundry remarks made by myself to the young lady. That done, I added the account of my expedition to Eaton, and the certainty at which I had arrived that my fellow-traveler was not the person she represented herself to be. After which, I inquired with indescribable anxiety if Mr. Huntingdon's order were a forgery?

"I cannot tell, Mr. Wilcox," said that gentleman, taking the order into his hands, and regarding it with an air of extreme perplexity. "I could have sworn it was mine, had it been attached to any other document. I think Forbes's handwriting is not so well imitated. But it is the very ink I use, and mine is a peculiar signature."

It was a very peculiar and old-fashioned signature, with a flourish underneath it not unlike a whip-handle, with the lash canght round it in the middle; but that did not make it the more difficult to forge, as I humbly suggested. Mr. Huntingdon wrote his name upon a paper, and two or three of the gentlemen tried to imitate the flourish, but vainly. They gave it up with a smile upon their grave faces.

"You have been careful not to let a hint of this matter drop from you, Mr. Wilcox?" said the Postmaster-General.

"Not a syllable, my lord," I answered.

"It is imperatively necessary that the secret should be kept. You would be removed from the temptation of telling it, if you had an appointment in some office abroad. The packet-agency at Alexandria is vacant, and I will have you appointed to it at once."

It would be a good advance from my present situation, and would doubtless prove a stepping-stone to other and better appointments; but I had a mother living at Fazeley, bed-ridden and paralytic, who had no pleasure in existence except having me to dwell under the same roof with her. My head was growing more and more dizzy, and a strange vagueness was creeping over me.

"Gentlemen," I muttered "I have a bed-ridden mother whom I cannot leave. I was not to blame, gentlemen." I fancied there was a stir and a movement at the table, but my eyes were dim, and in another moment I had lost consciousness.

When I came to myself, in two or three minutes, I found that Mr. Huntingdon was kneeling on the floor beside me, supporting my head, while our secretary held a glass of wine to my lips. I rallied as quickly as possible and staggered to my feet; but the two gentlemen placed me in the chair against which I had been leaning, and insisted on my finishing the wine before I spoke.

"I have not tasted food all day," I said faintly.

"Then, my good fellow, you shall go home immediately," said the Postmaster-General; "but be on your guard! Not a word of this must escape you. Are you a married man?"

"No, my lord," I answered.

"So much the better," he added, smiling. "You can keep a secret from your mother, I dare say. We rely upon your honor."

The secretary then rang a bell, and I was committed to the charge of the messenger who answered it; and in a few minutes I was being conveyed in a cab to my London lodgings. A week afterwards, Tom Morville was sent out to a post-office in Canada, where he settled down, married, and is still living, perfectly satisfied with his position, as he occasionally informs me by letter. For myself, I remained as I desired, in my old post as traveling-clerk until the death of my mother, which occurred some ten or twelve months afterwards. I was then promoted to an appointment as a clerk in charge, upon the first vacancy.

The business of the clerks in charge is to take possession of any post-office in the kingdom, upon the death or resignation of the post-master, or when circumstances of suspicion cause his suspension from office. My new duties carried me three or four times into Mr. Huntingdon's district. Though that gentleman and I never exchanged a word with regard to the mysterious loss in which we had both had an innocent share, he distinguished me with peculiar favor, and more than once invited me to visit him at his own house. He lived alone, having but one daughter, who had married, somewhat against his will, one of his clerks: the Mr. Forbes whose handwriting had been so successfully imitated in the official order presented to me by the self-styled Miss Anne Clifton. (By the way, I may here mention, though it has nothing to do with my story, that my acquaintance with the Cliftons had ripened into an intimacy, which resulted in my engagement and marriage to Mary.)

It would be beside my purpose to specify the precise number of years which elapsed before I was once again summoned to the secretary's private apartment, where I found him closeted with Mr. Huntingdon. Mr. Huntingdon shook hands with unofficial cordiality; and then the secretary proceeded to state the business on hand.

"Mr. Wilcox, you remember our offer to place you in office in Alexandria?" he said.

"Certainly, sir," I answered.

"It has been a troublesome office," he continued, almost pettishly. "We sent out Mr. Forbes only six months ago, on account of his health, which required a warmer climate, and now his medical man reports that his life is not worth three weeks' purchase."

Upon Mr. Huntingdon's face there rested an expression of profound anxiety; and as the secretary paused he addressed himself to me.

"Mr. Wilcox," he said, "I have been soliciting, as a personal favor, that you should be sent out to take charge of the packet agency, in order that my daughter may have some one at hand to befriend her, and manage her business affairs for her. You are not personally acquainted with her, but I know I can trust her with you."

"You may, Mr. Huntingdon," I said, warmly. "I will do anything I can to aid Mrs. Forbes. When do you wish me to start?"

"How soon can you be ready?" was the rejoinder.

"To-morrow morning."

Upon arriving I found that all the postal arrangements had fallen into considerable irregularity and confusion; for, as I was informed immediately on my arrival, Mr. Forbes had been in a dying condition for the last week, and of course the absence of a master had borne the usual results. I took formal possession of the office, and then, conducted by one of the clerks, I proceeded to the dwelling of the unfortunate postmaster and his no less unfortunate wife. It would be out of place in this narrative to indulge in any traveler's tales about the strange place where I was so unexpectedly located. Suffice it to say, that the darkened sultry room into which I was shown, on inquiring for Mrs. Forbes, was bare of furniture, and destitute of all those little tokens of refinement and taste which make our English parlors so pleasant to the eye. There was, however, a piano in one of the dark corners of the room, open, and with a sheet of music on it. While I waited for Mrs. Forbes's appearance, I strolled idly up to the piano to see what music it might be. The next moment my eye fell upon an antique red morocco workbox standing on the top of the piano—a workbox evidently, for the lid was not closely shut, and a few threads of silk and cotton were hanging out of it. In a kind of dream—for it was difficult to believe that the occurrence was a fact—I carried the box to the darkened window, and there, plain in my sight, was the device scratched upon the leather: the revolutionary symbol of a heart with a dagger through it. I had found the Premier's despatch-box in the parlor of the packet-agent of Alexandria!

I stood for some minutes with that dream-like feeling upon me, gazing at the box in the dim obscure light. It could not be real! My fancy must be playing a trick upon me! But the sound of a light step—for, light as it was, I heard it distinctly as it approached the room—broke my trance, and I hastened to replace the box on the piano, and to stoop down as if examining the music before the door opened. I had not sent in my name to Mrs. Forbes, for I did not suppose that she was acquainted with it, nor could she see me distinctly, as I stood in the gloom. But I could see her. She had the slight slender figure, the childlike face, and the fair hair of Miss Anne Clifton. She came quickly across the room, holding out both her hands in a childish appealing manner.

"O!" she wailed, in a tone that went straight to my heart, "he is dead! He has just died!"

It was no time then to speak about the red morocco workbox. This little childish creature, who did not look a day older than when I had seen her in my traveling post-office, was a widow in a strange land, far away from any friend save myself. I had brought her a letter from her father. The first duties that devolved upon me were those of her husband's interment, which had to take place immediately. Three or four weeks elapsed before I could, with any humanity, enter upon the investigation of her mysterious complicity in the daring theft practised on the government and the post-office.

I did not see the despatch-box again. In the midst of her new and vehement grief, Mrs. Forbes had the precaution to remove it before I was ushered again into the room where I had discovered it. I was at some trouble to hit upon any plan by which to gain a second sight of it; but I was resolved that Mrs. Forbes should not leave Alexandria without giving me a full explanation. We were waiting for remittances and instructions from England, and in the mean time the violence of her grief abated, and she recovered a good share of her old buoyancy and loveliness, which had so delighted me on my first acquaintance with her. As her demands upon my sympathy weakened, my curiosity grew stronger, and at last mastered me. I carried with me a netted purse which required mending, and I asked her to catch up the broken meshes while I waited for it.

"I will tell your maid to bring your workbox," I said, going to the door and calling the servant. "Your mistress has a red morocco workbox," I said to the girl when she answered my summons.

"Yes, sir," she replied.

"Where is it?"

"In her bedroom," she said.

"Mrs. Forbes wishes it brought here." I turned back into the room. Mrs. Forbes turned deadly pale, but her eyes looked sullen, and her teeth were clinched under her lips with an expression of stubbornness. The maid brought the workbox. I walked, with it in my hands, up to the sofa where she was seated.

"You remember this mark?" I asked; "I think neither of us can forget it?"

She did not answer by word, but there was a very intelligent gleam in her blue eyes.

"Now," I continued softly, "I promised your father to befriend you, and I am not a man to forget a promise. But you must tell me the whole simple truth."

I was compelled to reason with her, and to urge her for some time. I confess I went so far as to remind her that there was an English consul at Alexandria, to whom I could resort. At last she openened her stubborn lips, and the whole story came out, mingled with sobs and showers of tears.

She had been in love with Alfred, she said, and they were too poor to marry, and papa would not hear of such a thing. She was always in want of money, she was kept so short; and they promised to give her such a great sum—a vast sum—five hundred pounds.

"But who bribed you?" I enquired.

A foreign gentleman whom she had met in London, Monsieur Bonnard. It was a French name, but she was not snre that he was a Frenchman. He talked to her about her father being a surveyor in the post-office, and aked her a great number of questions. A few weeks after, she met him in their own town by accident, she and Mr. Forbes; and Alfred had a long private talk with him, and they came to her, and told her she could help them very much. They asked her if she could be brave enough to carry off a little red box out of the traveling post-office, containing nothing but papers. After a while she consented. When she had confessed so much under compulsion, Mrs. Forbes seemed to take a pleasnre in the narrative, and went on fluently.

"We required papa's signature to the order, and we did not know how to get it. Luckily he had a fit of the gout, and was very peevish; and I had to read over a lot of official papers to him, and then he signed them. One of the papers I read twice, and slipped the order into its place after the second reading. I thought I should have died with fright; but just then he was in great pain, and glad to get his work over. I made an excuse that I was going to visit my aunt at Beckby, but instead of going there direct, we contrived to be at the station at Eaton a minute or two before the mail train came up. I kept outside the station door till we heard the whistle, and just then the postman came running down the road, and I followed him straight through the booking-office, and asked him to give you the order, which I put into his hand. He scarcely saw me. I just caught a glimpse of Monsieur Bonnard's face through the window of the compartment next the van, when Alfred had gone. They had promised me that the train should stop at Camden-town, if I could only keep your attention engaged until then. You know how I succeeded."

"But how did you dispose of the box?" I asked. "You could not have concealed it about you; that I am sure of."

"Ah!" she said, "nothing was easier. Monsieur Bonnard had described the van to me, and you remember I put the box down at the end of the counter, close to the corner where I hid myself at every station. There was a door with a window in it, and I asked if I might have the window open, as the van was too warm for me. I believe Monsieur Bonnard could have taken it from me by leaning through his window, but he preferred stepping out and taking it from my hand, just as the train was leaving Watford—on the far side of the carriages, you understand. It was the last station, and the train came to a stand at Camden-town. After all, the box was not out of your sight more than twenty minutes when you missed it. Monsieur Bonnard and I hurried out of the station, and Alfred followed us. The box was forced open—the lock has never been mended, for it was a peculiar one—and Monsieur Bonnard took possession of the papers. He left the box with me, after putting inside it a roll of notes. Alfred and I were married next morning, and I went back to my aunt's but we did not tell papa of our marriage for three or four months. That is the story of my red morrocco workbox."

She smiled with the provoking mirthfulness of a mischievous child. There was one point still on which my curiosity was unsatisfied.

"Did you know what the dispatches were about?" I asked.

"O no!" she answered; "I never understood politics in the least. I knew nothing about them. Monsieur did not say a word; he did not even look at the papers while we were by. I would never, never, have taken a registered letter, or anything with money in it, you know. But all those papers could be written again quite easily. You must not think me a thief, Mr. Wilcox; there was nothing worth money among the papers."

"They were worth five hundred pounds to you," I said. "Did you ever see Bonnard again?"

"Never again," she replied. "He said he was going to return to his native country. I don't think Bonnard was his real name."

Most likely not, I thought, but I said no more to Mrs. Forbes. Once again I was involved in a great perplexity about this affair. It was clearly my duty to report the discovery at head-quarters, but I shrank from doing so. One of the chief culprits was already gone to another judgment than that of man; several years had obliterated all traces of Monsieur Bonnard; and the only victim of justice would be this poor little dupe of the two greater criminals. At last I came to the conclusion to send the whole of the particulars to Mr. Huntingdon himself; and I wrote them to him without remark or comment.

The answer that came to Mrs. Forbes and me in Alexandria was the announcement of Mr Huntingdon's sudden death of some disease of the heart, on the day which I calculated would put him in possession of my communication. Mrs. Forbes was again overwhelmed with apparently heart-rending sorrow and remorse. The income left to her was something less than one hundred pounds a year. The secretary of the post-office, who had been a personal friend of the deceased gentleman, was his sole executor; and I received a letter from him containing one to Mrs. Forbes, which recommended her, in terms not to be misunderstood, to fix upon some residence abroad, and not to return to England. She fancied she would like the seclusion and quiet of a convent; and I made arrangements for her to enter one at Malta, where she would still be under British protection. I left Alexandria myself on the arrival of another packet-agent; and on my return to London I had a private interview with the secretary. I found that there was no need to inform him of the circumstances I have related to you, as he had taken posssession of all Mr. Huntingdon's papers. In consideration of his ancient friendship, and of the escape of those who most merited punishment, he had come to the conclusion to let bygones be bygones.

At the conclusion of the interview I delivered a message which Mrs. Forbes had emphatically entrusted to me.

"Mrs. Forbes wished me to impress upon your mind," I said, "that neither she nor Mr. Forbes would have been guilty of this misdemeanor if they had not been so much in love with one another, and very much in want of money."

"Ah," replied the secretary, with a smile, "if Cleopatra's nose had been shorter, the fate of the world would have been different."

I'VE BEEN THINKING.

I've been thinking, I've been thinking,
What a glorious world were this,
Did folks mind their business more,
And mind their neighbor's less.
For instance, you and I, my friend,
Are sadly prone to talk
Of matters that concern us not,
And others' follies mock.

I've been thinking, if we'd begin
To mind our own affairs,
That possibly our neighbors might
Contrive to manage theirs.
We've faults enough at home to mend—
It may be so with others;
It would seem strange if it were not,
Since all mankind are brothers.

Oh! would that we had charity
For every man and woman;
Forgiveness is the mark of those Who know to "err is human."
Then let us banish jealousy—
Let's lift our fallen brother;
And as we journey down life's road,
Do good to one another.

PATENT
ARION PIANOFORTE

GRANDS AND GRAND SQUARES.

7⅓ OCTAVES

The "ARION" is the very best Piano for the Great West, because it stands in tune longer than any other Piano. It requires no repairing or regulating; shipping any distance, or dampness does not affect them.

WHY?

It commences where the "First Premium" Makers stop, and upon the most improved Modern scale makes four patented improvements; which make the Arion more simple, yet stronger; increasing its volume and beauty of tone, while rendering the instrument more enduring.

WHAT THEY ARE.

First. The patent Arion Reversed Wooden Agraffe Bridge, which retains all the purity of tone only found in a wooden bridge (the rest whereon the strings lay), and obtains all the solid prolonged strength of tone of the metal Agraffe, without that acute metalic noise which the metal Agraffe develops by use.

Secondly. The Patent Arion Compound Wrest-Plank, which holds the tuning pins in six thicknesses of hard maple, the grain of each layer runs in a different direction. The advantages are, the 20 tons strain of the strings cannot split our Arion wrest-plank, as frequently happens in other Pianos, and when people say "My Piano won't stand in tune," all other makers must use the single wrest plank with the grain running only one way.

The Arion Tuning-Pins have end wood to hold them on every side, while all other makers can have it only upon two sides of their pins.

Thirdly. The Patent Arion Diagonal Sustaining Bar, extending parellel with the steel strings under the over-strung Bass strings. The Arion is the only Piano wherein the enormous strain of the large steel strings is resisted in the natural place and direction. Using this bar renders the weakest part in all other over strung Pianos the

STRONGEST IN THE ARION.

Fourthly, The Patent Arion Iron Frame concentrates all the metal in front of the tuning pin line, and its frame is let into (notted) the front edge of the wooden wrest plank, thereby preventing the great strain of the strings upon it from splitting or moving it one particle. All other "Full Iron Frames" cover the entire wrest plank, and when it is split it cannot be seen, the wood of the Arion wrest plank is seen.

THE ARION STANDS UPON ITS OWN MERITS.

unsupported by either lumcome, weak facts, or useless or complicated Patents. We append a few unbought opinions of those who

KNOW THE ARION.

The Musical Director of the New York Conservatory of Music, Edward Mollenhauer, says. "The Arion I thought of you is the best Piano I ever played on; that rolling bass and silvery treble, etc."

John H. Woods, Piano Dealer, Oswego, N. Y., says: "The tone is truly immense, and surpasses anything in the shape of a Piano we ever have heard of, etc."

Horace Greely said: "The Arion is the best Square Piano, superior for its clearness and brilliancy of tone," &c.

Louis Wagner, Fort Leavenworth, says: "My Piano arrived here in splendid order. Its tone fills my parlor with melody—it is the wonder and admiration of all who hear it. Miss ——, who is teaching the Piano desires me to order one for her," &c

Hair Vigor,

For restoring Grey Hair to its natural Vitality and Color.

A dressing which is at once agreeable, healthy, and effectual for preserving the hair. Faded or gray hair is soon restored to its original color with the gloss and freshness of youth. Thin hair is thickened, falling hair is checked, and baldness often, though not always, cured by its use. Nothing can restore the hair where the follicles are destroyed, or the glands atrophied and decayed. But such as remain can be saved for usefulness by this application. Instead of fouling the hair with a pasty sediment it will keep it clean and vigorous. Its occasional use will prevent the hair from turning gray or falling off, and consequently prevent baldness. Free from those deleterious substances which make some preparations dangerous and injurious to the hair, the Vigor can only benefit but not harm it. If wanted merely for a

Waters' Pianos and Melodeons challenge comparison with the finest made anywhere.—Home Journal.

Horace Waters, 481 Broadway, is famed for the excellence of his Pianos and Organs.—Evening Post.

The Waters Piano ranks with the best manufactured in America.—The Independent, N. Y.

Our friends will find at Mr. Waters' store the very best assortment of Pianos, Melodeons and Organs to be found in the United States.—Graham's Magazine

MUSICAL DOINGS.—Since Mr. Waters gave up publishing sheet music, he has devoted his whole capital and attention to the manufacture and sale of Pianos and Melodeons. He has just issued a catalogue of his new instruments, giving a new scale of prices, which shows a marked reduction from former rates, and his Pianos have recently been awarded the First Premium at several Fairs. Many people of the present day, who are attracted, if not confused, with the flaming advertisements of rival piano houses, probably overlook the modest manufacturer like Mr. Waters; but we happen to know that his instruments earned him a good reputation long before these positions and "honors" connected therewith were ever thought of; indeed, we have one of Mr. Waters' piano-fortes now in our residence, (where it has stood for years,) of which any manufacturer in the world might be proud. We have always been delighted with it as a sweet-toned and powerful instrument, and there is no doubt of its durability; more than this, some of the best amateur players in the city, and several celebrated pianists, have performed on the said piano, and all pronounce it a superior and first-class Instrument. Stronger indorsement we could not give.—Home Journal.

THE LOTUS PLANTER.

BY THEO. TILTON.

A Brahmin on a lotus-pod
Once wrote the holy name of God.

Then, planting it, he asked in prayer
For some new fruit, unknown and fair.

A slave near by, who bore a load,
Fell fainting on the dusty road.

The Brahmin, pitying, straightway ran
And lifted up the fallen man.

The deed scarce done, he looked aghast
At touching one beneath his caste.

"Behold!" he cried, "I stand unclean:
My hands have clasped the vile and mean!"

God saw the shadow on his face,
And wrought a miracle of grace.

The buried seed arose from death,
And bloomed and fruited at his breath.

The stalk bore up a leaf of green,
Whereon these mystic words were seen:

First count men all of equal caste,
Then count thyself the least and last.

The Brahmin with bewildered brain,
Beheld the will of God writ plain!

Transfigured in a sudden light,
The slave stood sacred in his sight.

Thenceforth within the Brahmin's mind
Abode good will for all mankind.

MISTRESS BARBARA.

The rain beat against the round green window-panes, and the winds whistled about the angles of the house, but in the room within all was quiet.

In this room, at the head of the great table, which filled almost the whole space between the fireplace and the door, sat the Master-miner, Christopher Uttmann and his wife Barbara, with their stalwart sons and fair daughters. Below them, on either side, sat Uttmann's workmen and maids, stout miners with their wives and daughters, and also farmers and other town folk. For whoever in Annaberg, on Saturday night, had a mind to go up to Master Uttmann's house, was sure of a hearty welcome. At such times the bowl passed quickly from hand to hand, quaint stories of horned Siegfried and the fair Magelone were told, and jovial glees and moving ballads sung; while the spinning-wheels buzzed merrily, and the lads jested and flirted with the maidens. Often it was late in the night before the meetings broke up and the light-hearted guests went home. But on this evening—the 15th of May, 1561, it stood in the calendar—it was so quiet about the oaken table that one could plainly hear without the monotonous music of the rain. Master Christopher, with arms crossed over his chest, sat lost in thought. A tear trembled on the good wife Barbara's eyelash. The men hung their heads, the women's hands lay in their laps, no wheel hummed, no one thought of telling a story or singing a song.

Of a sudden, Master Christopher roused himself. "Children, we are letting our spirits droop. That will never do. I am heartily ashamed to have to own that I too have caught myself giving way to gloomy thoughts."

"Master, how can one be gay, with misery at the door?" said the gray-haired miner, Ohlentrud. "But you do not speak as you feel at heart. You only seek to divert our thoughts."

"Good father," rejoined the Master, "do you despair because one learned man from Dresden has failed to find what we wish? With God's grace, the second for whom I have sent our Klaus, will find next week a new vein of silver, or cobalt. Annie Marie, sing a ballad for us, that one about mighty faith."

Anne Marie, Ohlentrud's daughter, who on account of her pleasant voice was the chief songstress of the little circle, yielded this time, but unwillingly, to the Master's wish. How could she sing gayly, with want and sorrow drawing nigh to the hearthstone? But the good Master wished it; so she began singing:—

"There once did live a goodly youth
Who held his true love dear;
Full seven years his love forsooth
Was proof 'gainst doubt and fear.

"This youth—"

"Well, why do you stop before you have well begun? What, weeping, too?"

But her father spoke up for her. "It will not do, Master. The maiden is in no tune for song to-night. How could she be? The mines will yield no more, and with a short harvest, and plague among the cattle, we have but a dreary prospect before us?"

The gloomy looks of all showed what a sad echo his words had found in their breasts. Mistress Barbara covered her face with both hands, and Master Christopher rejoined, but with a trembling voice: "Let us only hope that the other learned man from Dr. sden will find new mines."

But the rest doubtfully shook their heads.

In truth, it was a sad time, and no wonder that the brave Annabergers lost courage day by day. What was to become of them, if the mines were really worked out? There was nothing left but to starve, for up among the mountains there, they had no other employment.

And next week came Klaus from Dresden with the second learned doctor. He went first into one shaft and then into another, and hammered at the rocks, measured to the right and to the left, then up and down, and talked a great deal of Latin, but nothing did he find. So he gave it up, shook his white head and went away with a roll of silver gulden, out of the money-bags of Master Christopher.

Then the poor people gave up all hope. Their hammers and drills rusted, the sheds and workshops stood empty, and over and above all, a period of grim, dreary storms set in. At last, even Master Christopher lost heart, and the cheerful looks vanished, which he had worn all along for the sake of his poor people.

It happened one day about this time, that a poor woman with three hungry children knocked at the door of Master Uttmann's house. She was a stranger, had come from a long distance, and begged in charity a bit of bread, and rest and shelter for a short time.

Mistress Bertha received the poor thing with cheering words as was her wont, brought her into the house, and refreshed her as best she might with food and drink. Then she established the helpless wanderers in a comfortable chamber, and rejoiced most heartily at the rest which they found there for their weary limbs.

She had not asked the stranger whence she came, nor whither she was going. She was poor and needed her aid, that was enough. After a little time the woman came out from the sleeping-room, seated herself, at Barbara's request, beside her at the table, and began, without being asked, to tell of her home, her flight, and her wanderings. And while talking, in order not to be sitting idle, she took from her pocket a little package. This contained short woollen needles, which ended in little hooks of iron wire, a ball of linen thread, and a paper with a pattern drawn upon it. This pattern the woman spread out upon the table, loosed an end of thread from the ball, and caught it upon one of the little hooks. Had Barbara paid attention, she must have been astonished at the dexterity with which the stranger at one time crossed her needles, at another twisted the thread abouts the hooks, and then again tied such wonderful and complicated knots. But she looked only at the face of the woman, whose story excited her deepest sympathy.

She was from Brabant. She had lived happily with her family until the time when the Duke of Alva was sent to the Netherlands as Governor by King Philip of Spain. Hardly arrived in Flanders, he had set up a tribunal of blood, by which all, whose opinions excited suspicion, were tried. Harrowing, indeed, was the description which the poor woman gave of the evening on which Alva's creatures came at last to their peaceful home; how her husband made useless resistance and fell before her eyes, how fire was set to the roof over their heads; but a few minutes and nothing remained of their home but smoke and ashes. "Thus," said she, "in a short hour I had lost my husband and my home, and was compelled to go into the world as a houseless wanderer, like thousands of other families who made their way, some to England, some hither to Germany. My work and instruments," she continued, pointing to the needles and the thread, "I found in my pocket when I awoke next day from my stupor. Thanks be to God! so long as I have these I shall not need to beg. Then we wandered from place to place, and when we rested I worked; everywhere my lace was gladly taken for money. But far from here my strength gave out, I could move neither hand nor foot, and when the last of my laces were gone the door was shut in our faces, for I had nothing more to offer. Sick and wearied almost to death, we reached this house, and had you, Mistress, not succored us—"

Overcome by her emotions, the grateful woman could say no more. When after a while she was able to command herself and began eagerly to pour forth her thanks to her benefactress, Barbara, who was no friend to such demonstrations, quickly interrupted her by the question, "So you have been making lace? I had not noticed what you were doing." The Brabant woman laid the ball of thread and the needles with the work upon them before Barbara on the table, and said "It is not such as you would wear, Mistress. You have there on your kerchief, silken lace, such as can only be made in Brussels, and which is fitting for a lady of your rank. But the wives of the tradesmen love ornament also, and for them we make this linen lace of ours."

"True," said Barbara, "when I bethink me of how it is at my home, in Nuremberg, I must allow that you are right. No woman of rank would condescend to wear linen lace. But if, as you say, this can only be made in Brussels, they must be poorly off in the Netherland provinces. How little you must be able to make by your linen laces! the people who buy them cannot surely pay much for them."

"That depends upon how you look at it, Mistress. This work supported us in Wayre, from childhood; we knew not want, but were contented and happy. Nor, believe me, did we live from hand to mouth only. Not my husband alone, every one in Wayre used each year to put aside a little money for hard times. And when once half the place was burned, and another time again, the lightning struck our tower, and it was burned from top to bottom, we were not only able to build it all up again with our savings, but had something left besides, though all of that, alas! Alva's men have taken now. The people in Brussels, to be sure, do not know what to do with all their money, but we poor linen lace-makers have never envied them of their riches. And then, what an advantage our work has! To make the silken lace, one needs long practice, and a great deal of skill, but a child can learn to make our linen work. Children of five years old make lace in Wayre. See, only! what can be easier than this? First I look at the pattern,—then loop the thread around one of the needles, next cross one needle over another, thus,—and the thread loops of itself about the hook, and—look, there is a beautiful mesh made already! But you are weeping, Mistress! what grieves you?"

Her hands folded above her heaving breast, her eyes raised toward Heaven, Barbara stood, and, with tears of thankfulness and joy cried, "Yes, Heavenly Father, as thou wilt! In thy mercy have I trusted, and thou hast sent this poor woman that our sadness may be turned to rejoicing, and happiness may return into our house, nay, into every home in this hamlet! Remain with us, dear woman. I will be to you and your children, friend, sister, mother! See, sorrow reigns in this place. The miners' hammers rust, the cattle are dying, the fields lie barren. My husband gives all that he can, but what avail are the gifts of one, when so many need? Teach us how to make this lace. We will work night and day, and send the strongest through the land with our laces, and so perhaps once more prosperity and joy may return to us; please God, we too, as did you in Wayre, may be able to lay up a little against the time of trouble shall come upon us again,—say that you will stay with us, good woman, and teach us!

The stranger grasped the hand extended to her with both her own. Though she had but half understood Barbara's words, she could not fail to comprehend their friendly meaning.

Next morning all the people of the little hamlet,—only children younger than five years were left behind,—came together at Master Uttmann's request. The miner, who had acquiesced in his wife's scheme without a scruple, communicated to them Barbara's plans. They were received with astonishment and doubt, and looks of incredulity and suspicion were cast upon the Brabant woman and her children. To this, however, the worthy pair paid no attention. Needles were prepared, which the smith provided with hooks, and Klaus was sent to Dresden to buy thread. An artist, too, came thence to draw the patterns, and the lessons began. What amusement and comfort the poor people found in learning this, to them, new art! How many cares were forgotten, for every day their doubts became less, and their hope greater. Light-hearted jests, and now and then a jovial song began to be heard again. And then, when two months had past, the shout of triumph which went up throughout Annaberg! For the two messengers who had been sent out with the laces made, returned with empty knapsacks, but with pockets so full, that it seemed as if the wealth could never be exhausted.

But their Brabant guest could not share this joy with them. Not far from the great linden-tree which still stands in the middle of the churchyard, she had been buried a few days before. Grief for the loss of her husband, and all the the fearful hardships through which she had passed, had sown fatal seeds in her heart; poor heart, it could break more peacefully now, for she saw her children within Barbara's motherly arms. All praise be to Mistress Barbara! From sunrise to sunset she busily plied her lace needles, the best spur to industry and perseverence which her people could have. And with their joy and hope, the stores of lace grew greater and greater, though the strongest of their men were ever setting forth with the delicate wares, with which they went to and fro, through the whole of Saxony and Bohemia. Not until the severe winter set in did their travels cease.

When spring and summer came again, there was indeed a contrast with the former year: strong, healthy cattle in stable and meadow, smiling fields, and happy men. For the learned man, who had come at Master Uttman's request, from Cologne on the Spree, to make another examination of the mines, had gone away, after speaking pretty plainly his opinion of the wisdom of his colleagues in Dresden. The mines in the Schrecken and Schottenberg were not exhausted. It only needed to understand the right way to open them. So the clever man from Cologne brought up some of the black powder, of which the Annabergers had as yet no idea, and hey! what a crash and noise! How the rocky walls burst asunder, and rich veins of silver and cobalt were exposed in countless numbers!

It was this summer also that Barbara, accompanied by Marie Oblentrud, undertook the long journey to Brussels. The cruelties of the Spaniards in the Netherlands did not deter her. It was her plan to bring new artists and workmen to Annaberg, so as to teach her people to make the Brussels lace also, and we all know how well it succeeded. Manufactory after manufactory, loom upon loom, there seems to be no end now-a-days, in Annaberg, of laces and ribbons.

And all this was the work of Barbara and Christopher Uttmann. When Barbara came back from Brussels she found her husband on a bed of sickness, from which he never rose again. What could better console her sorrow than the peace and happiness which she saw on every side? So long as her heart beat, it beat for her children,—for the children of the Brabant wanderer,—and for all who lived within the circuit of Annaberg. When she died, they buried her one spring day by the side of Christopher and the stranger. Thousands of birds warble among the limbs of the great linden which overhangs the stone at the head of the three mounds; and in the evening, when the rays of the setting sun gild the steeples of Annaberg, the workpeople leave the shops and factories and mines, and gather about the linden, talking, perhaps, of those who sleep beneath,—of the Brabant mother, of Christopher, and of Barbara Uttmann, the benefactress of the Erzebirge.—Every Saturday.

W. H. SHEARMAN'S CORRESPONDENCE.

Lack of space last week prevented our referring more fully to friend Shearman's correspondence on the subject of factories and minerals, etc. We now wish to say that we heartily endorse his understanding of our article. Our meaning in reference to home factories was simply, that to start with them as our principal means for getting capital into the country, while we had something in which we could far better compete with the outside world untouched, was to "begin at the wrong end."

By a perusal of his letter it will be seen that brother Shearman sees with us that home factories, under existing circumstances, do not and cannot pay. This shows they should not be largely gone into. If they will not pay, they cannot be kept going; and if they cannot be kept going, it matters not whether they are useful and needed or not, we cannot have them any way.

On the other hand, we fully endorse the wisdom of our personal and local manufacturing in the past, under such circumstances as he refers to, such as where many of our people would have had to have gone without, through lack of cash to purchase imported goods. It will be seen, however, that manufacturing to meet our personal necessities as a people, and trying to start "extensive manufacturing establishments" to compete with the world who have far greater facilities, are two different things. Ed.

ON LEAVING A FRIEND.

Thy form still seems as lovely yet,
As when I left my native land;
That day, that time, I'll ne'er forget,
When last we gave the parting hand.

My saddened heart could scarce endure,
Nor could I hide the trickling tear;
While parting words fell soft and pure,
From one I hold in memory dear.

Thy voice still lingers on my ear,
Thy smiles I see so clear and bland;
E'en while I pen my verses here,
I seem to feel thy clasping hand.

Ofttimes in silent midnight dreams,
On fancy's wings to thee I fly;
But when I 'wake, alas! it seems,
Between us still broad rivers lie.

Now should cold Death lay Samuel low,
No more on earth thy face shall see;
Pure as yon white-capped mountain snow,
So is my friendship still to thee.

From whence, I ask thee, doth proceed
This kind impulsive, ardent love;
I answer, God's the fountain head,
The Great I Am, who rules above.

Then may our love to God extend,
That when our days on earth are o'er;
So we may meet in heaven, dear friend,
And give the parting hand no more.

DIVINE AUTHORITY.

BY W. S. GODBE.

Divine authority, in the most extended sense, may be defined as comprising authority from all good sources; and, inasmuch as every benevolent desire, noble aspiration and generous impulse, every prompting of the soul to do good in any conceivable way, must come from a good source, it follows that—in this extended sense—all actions resulting therefrom are performed by Divine authority.

In this general view of the case, it certainly requires no special delegation of power from on high for one to act under its dictation, and do "what conscience dictates to be done." whether it leads to the acting the part of a Luther, a Wesley, a Father Mathew, or a Father Hyacinthe.

Such men find their authority in the inborn love of humanity that ceaselessly wells up from the depths of their big souls, and the lofty inspirations by which they are led to battle for the right, regardless of consequences to themselves.

But while these are propositions that none can reasonably question, we as a people, entertain certain ideas of Divine Authority in regard to Priesthood that have their origin in what we have learned of the order observed in the Heavens, in relation to the appointments and functions of this Holy Institution. And it is with reference to Divine Authority, in this special and important sense, that I am now desirous of expressing some of my thoughts.

Priesthood is an eternal order "without beginning of days or end of years," and is as illimitable as the universe itself. A portion of its authority has been delegated to this planet, to assist its inhabitants in their progress during their brief probation on its face, as also in their higher conditions beyond.

Jesus was the Great High Priest of this Holy order, and was the instrument through which lofty and beautiful truths were revealed to man. Joseph Smith was ordained to this Priesthood by angelic beings from the celestial world. Their object was not so much to reveal at that time very advanced ideas—for the world still possessed the glorious principles already made precious by the blood of Jesus—as to authorize him to organize a Church upon the earth, corresponding in its external form with Heavenly systems above; having for its governing power the same Divine Priesthood, the presiding portion of which was to be in constant communion with the Priesthood behind the veil, from whom light was to be obtained and dispensed for the guidance of its members for all coming time. Nothing of a coercive or compulsory character was to be in the least degree admissible in this Church. For Joseph Smith, its great founder, expressly says: "No power or influence can or ought to be maintained by virtue of the Priesthood, only by persuasion, by long suffering, by gentleness, by meekness and by love unfeigned." (Times and Seasons, vol i, page 131.)

To Him who sees the end from the beginning, it was known that those, to whom were committed this power, would not, or rather, could not, in the nature of things, use it perfectly at first,—no matter how earnestly they might desire to do so, or how essentially good they might be as men. Surrounding circumstances, the condition of their brethren as well as their own, would render a perfect exercise of this authority, in all respects impossible. Hence, God in His wisdom has placed limits and restrictions upon it, beyond which no man can go, and have his actions sanctioned by Him. For the same high authority (Joseph Smith) tells us, in speaking of certain ambitious men in the Priesthood, that "they do not learn that the rights of the Priesthood are inseparably connected with the powers of Heaven, and that the powers of Heaven cannot be controlled nor handled, only upon the principles of righteousness; that the powers of the Priesthood may be conferred upon us it is true; but when we undertake to cover our sins, to gratify our pride or vain ambition, or to exercise DOMINION or COMPULSION over the souls of the children of men in any degree of unrighteousness, behold the Heavens withdraw themselves, the spirit of the Lord is grieved. Then amen to the Priesthood or authority of that man."

This proves most conclusively that the Priesthood is liable to exercise its authority beyond its true limits, and assume prerogatives that do not belong to it. Where, otherwise, would be the necessity for this emphatic protest against the spirit of compulsion—Where the necessity for this clear statement, that the Heavens will endorse the acts of their representatives upon the earth, only so far as they are in perfect accord with the spirit that prevails, where the God of love alone rules supreme?

But it is claimed by some that while this fallibility may be looked for in individual members, it does not apply to the Priesthood, as a whole, neither does it apply to him who stands at the head of the Church on earth, whose voice they are taught to believe is the voice of God to them.

In answer to this I will simply say that although I have searched diligently, I have failed to discover evidence in history or revelation to justify such a belief, but, on the contrary, have found the most abundant evidence that such a belief is erroneous.

I find further that in many cases men who have been specially called of God to fulfil Divine missions, have gone more or less astray from the straight path. It does not appear that they were bad at heart—in fact, quite to the contrary. Why then, I ask, should we expect more to-day of frail human nature than yesterday? Does not history repeat itself only in milder forms?

Seeing then that there is not only a possibility, but a probability—judging from what has been—of men, holding the highest positions in the Priesthood, exercising an undue authority "over the souls of the children of men," when it does take place, by what means shall the evils resulting be corrected? Through whose agency shall the then needed reformation be effected?

All men agree that it should not come from without the Church. A system must be weak indeed that cannot, in the time of need, purify itself from its own imperfections. It is also no less clear that it cannot come through the instrumentality of those by whom the evils originated, and the very existence of which rendered the reformation necessary.

Would it not be unreasonable to suppose that the Lord would let His servants exercise undue authority if He saw fit, or could prevent it in the first place? And still more unreasonable to believe that after they had done so, He should be compelled to call upon the very men who had thus erred—perhaps unintentionally, or owing to the peculiar organization of their minds or natures—to reform the very evils they committed? What reason can be shown that God should be thus restricted by the ideas of finite man in His appointments? Surely He is no respecter of persons, nor has He more care for one of His children than another. Depend upon it, He is guilty of no favoritism. He operates through whom he will, because of their fitness for such work. And when it becomes necessary, in the interests of the progress of His Church or humanity, He raises up others for His work. Common sense should teach, and history proves, that He reserves to Himself the right so to do, He acting of course always in harmony with the divine order of which He is the great originator.

The Lord did not not call upon Eli to correct his own faults, but revealed Himself to the then obscure boy Samuel, and told him what He had against Eli, Israel's High Priest.

Neither did the Lord require Saul, His anointed, to correct his own evils, but called upon the herd-boy, David, and through him inaugurated a better state of things in Israel. All history, biblical and profane, abounds with instances, more or less analogous to these.

And, as in governments political, evils are permitted to grow until they produce the reactions by which they are cured, so in governments ecclesiastical do encroachments upon the rights of conscience, liberty of thought and freedom of utterance, increase until they become so oppresive as to be no longer endured. And then the man or the men are always found to lead the van, and aid the people to remove the evils that distress them and free themselves.

It is thus in history we see the finger of God showing us the way man struggles onward and upward, painfully slowly, but steadily, in the rugged path of human progress.

Let us see whether the facts, to which I have called attention, can have any just application to ourselves as a community as we are to-day.

In entering upon this part of the subject I find myself under the painful necessity of calling attention to the present Authorities of our Church, and of charging them with assuming—not wickedly, but ignorantly, to say the least—dictatorial control, and exercising prerogatives that do not rightly belong to them, and that are not connected with the powers of Heaven.

Do not be startled at this unequivocal statement against the assumption of the powers exercised by those, towards whom we are bound by so many lofty considerations and fraternal ties. If I am wrong in my opinion, or unfounded in my allegation, it will fall as harmless on all except him who gave it expression, as is a summer's breeze to disturb the mighty ocean in its deep foundations. But if what I have dared to assert be true, then all efforts to refute it or avoid the consequences to which it will give birth, will be as futile and unavailing as resistance must ever be to all-prevailing truth. For truth will press calmly, steadily, grandly on, regardless alike of obstacles or opposition. And great as is the moral courage sometimes necessary to the honest man, to speak the truth,—a far greater amount is necessary to speak falsely, or to be silent when God requires that the truth be spoken.

What I have said has been considered with deliberation and uttered not in the fear of the creature, but the Creator, and with the fullest appreciation of the great responsibility that has been assumed thereby. It is not my purpose in this article to adduce further evidence in support of my assertion, nor do I consider it essential, for there are many thousands in this Territory, who, through painful experiences have been made to realize its truth—and it is more particularly to such that I now address myself. How often have I heard men, not false, nor weak in the faith of the Gospel, but men good and true, deplore the condition of things as they now exist, and wonder how much longer the Lord will require the people to submit—and to acquiesce in an order of things that they feel is steadily increasing in rigor and severity, and that will inevitably, if persisted in, result in the overthrow of our religion and the blasting of all our most cherished hopes. They feel that a radical change must take place, and that speedily, but when or how they cannot tell. Some who have been anticipating, somewhat in advance of the times, have become through hope deferred faint at heart, for they have seen no gleam in the horizon that betokened the coming dawn; no ray of hope to strengthen and encourage them on their plodding, weary way. How often have we heard it said by our most faithful men, while discussing the situation,—"Be patient, brother, things cannot continue in this way long, but we must endure it until a change comes, so in the meantime let us stand still and see the salvation of God."

What does this indicate—this deep half-suppressed feeling of dissatisfaction. What does it foreshadow? It means most unmistakably that all things are not as they should be, that a change will come, and that such men will not "stand still" awaiting "the salvation of God" in vain; for it will come —nay, is at our very doors.

But how shall the change be effected? By whose instrumentality shall it be brought about? Must it not come through the legitimate channel? These queries, more or less varied in form, are in the mouths of hundreds, and in the minds of thousands. They must be satisfactorily met. It will not do to tell them them "they are in the dark, and have got the spirit of apostacy," for they know better; they know they love the truth, and will hold fast to it, and cling to Zion, and are willing, if necessary, to sacrifice all they possess to promote her cause. To all such, I say that help will come, and that, too, in a legitimate channel. This brings me to the all-important question of Divine Authority in the special sense referred to.

As in the cases of Eli and Samuel, David and Saul, so in the present instance will God, in His own due time, call upon such person or persons as will be willing instruments to do His holy bidding, and proclaim to the Latter-Day Saints the glad tidings that the dawning of a brighter day has come, and that its growing light will soon dispel the dark clouds that now obsure their spiritual vision, to shine with ever increasing effulgence in all coming time.

When God begins a work, evidences in support of its truth are never wanting. Its testimony will be found in the advanced character of the principles presented—principles that will appeal for their acceptance, directly to reason, which is the light of Deity within the soul, and point to the God of truth and love as the only Being in whom all faith should center, instead of any earthly representative.

Evidences of the authority of such a movement will also be found in its great success. It will also be manifested to many by Dreams, Visions, and by the "still small voice" of the spirit, that will find sure access to their souls; by sweet impressions and angelic influences that will warm the heart with celestial fire, and impart a heavenly peace to the whole being; by a deep feeling of love and charity for all mankind, and the presence most sensibly felt of the spirit of Him who died to save humanity. In due time such a spirit as this will burst asunder the bonds of priestcraft, and melt the shackles that so long have bound the souls of men in slavish ignorance and fear. The light of Zion shall shine forth purely and brightly throughout this and all nations, until, by the breadth and depth of her principles, all parties and isms shall be absorbed, and bigotry and superstition known only as things of the past.

In that day the great and mighty CHURCH OF ZION that Isaiah saw, shall be established on the earth in power and great glory; for purity of life, humility and self-abnegation, shall be the offspring of her spirit, and her genius and controlling power shall be LOVE.

FORTHCOMING MANIFESTO.

In our next week's issue we shall give a full exposition of our views and sentiments concerning the past and future of Mormonism, with a statement of the causes which have led to our present relation to the Church. All who are anxious to understand fully the motives which have prompted our action, should read this announcement and distribute it largely among their friends.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

It has been with feelings of no ordinary character that I have placed my name among the supporters of the principles and policy advocated in this Magazine. My associations with my brethren and sisters in this Church, during the past fifteen years, have been of the most pleasurable character; and it has been a source of inexpressible pain to me, that the necessity should exist for dissenting from any part of the policy or sentiments of our leaders.

But, bitter as it is to be in the smallest degree dissevered from the friends and associations of the past, Truth is dearer than reputation or the ties of friendship and kindred; and if it become impossible to retain both, the latter must be relinquished. I cannot give them up without regret, but I can without hesitation. It is this love of truth, and this alone, that has impelled me to my present course. It is apparent, there is nothing of a temporal nature to be gained by it; on the contrary, an almost certain prospect, humanly speaking, of loss in every respect.

My position is most easily and comprehensively defined by stating that I heartily endorse the sentiments contained in the articles published in this Magazine entitled, "The Josephite Platform," "We are nothing if not Spiritual," "Unconditional Obedience," "Plural Marriage," "The Limits of the Priesthood," the "Cards," and "Protest," of the editors.

In embracing "Mormonism" I did not discard any truths which I before understood, neither do I renounce a single truth to-day that I have ever accepted. I am simply following, as I believe, the increasing light of the spirit of truth within me, and obeying its dictates. My faith in the divinity and ultimate triumph of the sublime principles of the Gospel, is undiminished, and I desire to forsake nothing but the errors —which, through human incapacity, have been more or less associated with our divine system.

It has been urged that all persons have the privilege of entertaining what views they please, and may still retain their membership in the Church, provided they will not make public any sentiments opposed to the views of the authorities thereof. But this is no liberty at all. It is simply what no power on earth can either give or take away. Every individual is required to obey, irrespective of his own convictions, or eventually lose his standing in the Church. It would, therefore, be far more consistent to prohibit thought, were it possible, than to deny the free but respectful expression of that thought. I am aware it is said that even this right is granted at the proper time and place; but the ridicule, and charges of darkness and apostacy, which have ever been heaped on the unfortunate individual who has attempted to exercise it, have more effectually closed mens' mouths than any Imperial edicts have ever been able to do. There are but two paths left open for all who differ from any Church measures: hypocritical submission, or an open avowal of one's belief, with a liability to excommunication. I prefer the latter, with all its consequences, to the course of hundreds who feel as I do, but who, owing to their peculiar position, dare not give utterance to their sentiments.

The exercise of the "one-man power," as now claimed for the President of this Church—whether Brigham Young or anybody else—is, I feel, an assumption unauthorized by God and in direct opposition to the spirit of the age and the genius of the Gospel. However innocent, or even beneficial, its advocates may claim the exercise of such power to be at present, it would inevitably result, if continued, in the most tremendous and oppressive temporal and spiritual despotism the world has ever seen, and reduce mankind to the condition of mere machines. Such a system is an attempt—however much it may be disclaimed by some—to force upon the intelligence of the nineteenth century the long-since exploded doctrine of Popish infallibility—not that "infallibility" is claimed, but it is practically enforced. All who feel such a government to be in harmony with their nature, should, of course, be allowed to enjoy it; but I feel it an imperative duty to express my dissent therefrom.

In conclusion I will say,—The cause of truth is dearer to me than ever. I am full of the joyful assurance that every divine prediction in regard to Zion will be fulfilled, and that the time is not far distant when she will arise in her splendor, put on her beautiful garments, and become the center of heavenly light, intelligence and joy to the whole earth. Then, if not before, I expect to enjoy the confidence and approbation of those who may now feel it necessary to withdraw their fellowship and friendship from me.

DO WE FEAR CIVILIZATION?

BY EDWARD W. TULLIDGE.

When writing my series of papers on the Mormons and their Commonwealth, for the New York "Galaxy", I said, "Let America come up to us with all her agencies of civilization, and in grateful return we will send her down a host of Mormon missionaries." Mr. Bowles, in reviewing those papers, held to the opinion that no genuine Mormon elder would have written them, and believed that the "Galaxy" had been "hoaxed by a clever writer," who had palmed himself upon the editors as a Mormon elder. I note this because we are just upon this point that "genuine" Mormon elders do not fear civilization. Mr. Bowles, Mr. Colfax and the nation generally, are about to have a timely lesson, and, on the other side, ruling authorities of Utah, who have cut "genuine" Mormon elders off because they did not fear civilization, a very severe one.

But our illustrious visitors had seen the ruling and conservative few, whose policy leads to absolutism, and whose tendencies are anti-progressive. Hence the inference that Mormondom will be exploded by the American nation coming up to Utah with her civilization and destiny, bringing with her the age of railroads. They presumed that the Mormons could not endure contact with society, and that the society of progressive, resistless Republican America. They readily saw that absolutism and a one-man rule would be destroyed, that it could only flourish in this age in isolation, and that, therefore, isolation was courted. They believed that Mormonism could not stand the fire of thought, and that it produced no daring thinkers, and that there were no Mormon elders prepared to enter into the battle-field for human rights, or bold enough to make their declaration of independence. Undoubtedly they also believed that a free press and free speech on the public platform, representing the people's cause, would explode the Mormon faith and sweep its priesthood from the earth. Do not these conclusions of the statesmen and representative intellect of America, form a lesson worthy to be read by the authorities of Utah! And is it not a seathing reproach to them, when it can be said that the men who invite civilization to their borders, have free thoughts, and resolve to maintain a free press, are not genuine Mormon elders? Now these conclusions, so far as they went into our situation, were sound. They are the identical conclusions of the ruling Priesthood of Utah, as manifested by the action of the High Council and the Quorums and Wards upon my my brethren and myself. Men are cut off for not being "genuine Mormon elders," because they hold to the opinion that our faith will stand the fire of free thought, and that a free press should be maintained to discuss the people's rights and defend the people's cause.

As set forth in my last article, on the schism in Utah, there are two conditions of mind, and two sides of religious faith and social views, among the Mormons to-day, which are about to be brought into bold relief. There is the side which desires the absolute and unquestioned rule of the few, and which would reduce the entire people to a temporal and spiritual bondage. Now it will in the sequel be found that it is the few and not the mass, who are on this absolute side, which inclines to the absorption of the whole commonwealth of the people. The mass, always in every nation, incline to liberalism and freedom of thought and action; and there is just as natural a tendency in the people to individualism, personal enterprise, and personal property, as there is always in irresponsible rulers a tendency to absolute power, centralization and absorption of the commonwealth. But the millions ever imagine that they are the few and the weak, until the course of events forces them to a maintenance of their rights, and the integrity of their religious faith, proving, in some marked revolution of their times, that they are the power of the nation. But their long respect for authorities, and the natural repugnance of men to overthrow the existing state of things, no matter how oppressive, make them blind even to their own condition. They do not understand themselves, their thoughts, their desires and their settled intentions. But by-and bye circumstances come round which suddenly reveal themselves, and then they realize how much they are on the other side of absolute power, and how much man by nature is self-assertive and inclined to individual manifestation. In the meantime they hope for the better state of things in the future, and that hope is the sure sign that they are preparing for a change. Now that is the exact condition of the people of Utah to day. They are waiting for some bright out come of their religious and social circumstances.

The fact is that the thousands of English, Scotch and Welsh elders who created the Mormon kingdom in Great Britain, do not fear contact with the outside world. They do not fear free thought and a free press. Their secret desire is for isolation to pass away, and for all the great and good to come up to them. They believe that their religion can stand the pressure of other men's thoughts—can run side by side with the progressive tendencies of the age. But those thousands of elders, who represent the intellect, force and prime of Mormondom, those elders who shook Europe with their missionary operations, and astounded the clergy with their bold thoughts and daring innovations, since they came to Utah, have settled down in apathy and resigned their manhood. But depend upon it, these men are all here. Be not afraid of their future results. They must of necessity re-assert themselves, and inevitable circumstances are coming round to force them out even in spite of themselves. They will return to their former force of character and maintain the integrity of their religion, in all the grand conceptions of former days. From those conceptions and the great aims of their life, those thousands of missionaries have almost entirely departed, and returned every man to his fishing-nets, saying, "I thought he had come who was to bring deliverance to Israel, but our hope has departed." But, brethren, he has come and now stands knocking at the door.

Let Vice-President Colfax, Mr. Bowles and the entire nation be assured that there are "genuine" Mormon elders, who do not fear civilization, railroads and the liberalizing genius of the American people. If we have invited such to come up to us, it was because we understood ourselves and possessed an invincible faith in Mormonism and its destiny. We have been cut off the Church, but still do we believe in that destiny—ay, more than ever believe in it now. Mormon elders have resolved to maintain henceforth and forever in Utah a free press, free thought and a platform of human rights. The press never fears civilization, thought, progress and individuality. They are in its own line, and are its capital. The same is true of the merchant-class; for Commerce is the natural enemy of despotic rule, both in Church and State. There is no fanaticism or servility in commerce. Hence, you find to-day on the side of liberty and expansion some of the most enterprising merchants of Utah. They are with the press; and the thousands of English, Scotch and Welsh elders who shook Europe, will yet find a hundred platforms to shake Utah with their free, manly speech. They will do it in the might of that prophetic spirit which moved Joseph Smith to his great work.

The world has seen the past, it sees the present, and it has now to see the future of the Mormons. Statesmen and thinkers shall behold a strange solution to a strange problem. All they deemed us not they will find we are. They will find us genuine, and our faith potent. That which belongs not to us and the genius of Joseph Smith's mission, will pass away, and most certainly absolutism and mental bondage belong not thereto. We have thought with the best thinkers of the age, and there is much of the daring character of heterodox minds blended with the grand fanaticism of apostles of a new and prophetic dispensation. It is a strange mixture, but it is in us. The one gives the self-reliance and the other the mighty fervor. The truth has made us free.

We do not fear civilization, then, for we have come from the most civilized nations; we do not fear railroads, for we have ridden upon them a thousand times; we do not fear other men's thoughts, for we are a nation of missionaries who have stood upon the platform with the clergy of the day, and taken from them a hundred thousand converts in Great Britain alone. We can solve our own problems and change into whatsoever forms best please us and suit our coming times. We are forty years of age, as the rule, and have another forty years to fill in the great Mormon programme which will give immortality to Brigham Young as well as to Joseph Smith. We are not opposed to Brigham's destiny, but simply to some of his policies and positions.

But we have been cut off from a small portion of God's family, and now we belong to the whole world. We acknowledge the great and the good everywhere as our brethren. They shall see the Mormon Elders their equals and they shall give to them respect. Brethren of humanity's great church everywhere, think with all the intellect and light of the age, and we will think and speak from your own lofty platforms. Do you not see that we are coming out of our isolation to give you greeting in God and humanity's cause? Do you not see that Mormon Elders are opening their hearts to all mankind? We will be no longer a sect, but a world. They shall be our Prophets who reveal to us most light, and they our brethren who least fear civilization. "Genuine" Mormon Elders do not fear it. Will Mr. Bowles and President Colfax take our word for this, or will they wait for further proof? They shall have that proof, until all the world know WHETHER THE MORMON ELDERS FEAR CIVILIZATION.

KINGS AND PRIESTHOODS; OR, THE TRUE DIVISION OF POWER.

BY ELI B. KELSEY.

The world's progress is constantly developing forms of government that are better and better adjusted in all their parts. The "head of gold," spoken of by Daniel, represented the old Babylonian monarchy, which was absolute in all its characteristics. The will of the monarch was the only law; and as the will of the individual was subject to change with every passing influence, the law was unstable as water; indeed, it can be said, that there was no law. All there was of law, lay quiescent in the brain of the king. A dream forgotten, brought additional requirements. A crowd of soothsayers could easily interpret a dream, but it was out of their line to reproduce the mental condition of the king, and "tell the dream when the dreamer himself could not remember it." Death was the new penalty for this unheard-of condition of things. The law that enforced the death penalty —for such a cause had never existed before—was the unwritten law of the king's mind. The "king could do no wrong"—the throne was infallible. However fallible the prince might be as a prince,as soon as he ascended the throne he was infallible; hence it was the throne, not the man, that was infallible. What security for life or property could exist, where all the usages and custom of ages could be set aside, or annihilated by a sudedn impulse of the unwritten law?

The Babylonian monarchy was overthrown by the Medo-Persian power. Now mark the advance made in the order of government; although the unwritten law of the king's mind was too precious a relic of the past to be utterly abolished. A "Senatus Consultum," composed of the governors of the one hundred and twenty-seven provinces, was formed, with three presidents at its head. This "Senatus Consultum" was governed by a written copy of ordinances, dictated by the king. All cases that were not of sufficient importance to be brought to the king's notice, were adjudicated by this first parliament that the history of the world gives any account of.

No power had been conferred by the king upon this parliament to depose or try its president. The conspirators against Daniel had to appeal to the unwritten law of the king's mind for a decree to suit the case. By the force of that decree Daniel was thrown into the lion's den; but the crafty conspirators had roused a lion more fierce than any in the den—namely, the unwritten law of the king's mind. This law was and is "ex post facto" in all its chacteristics. By its operations the crime already committed against Daniel was punished by a law ordained after the commission of the crime.

The Medo-Persian Empire was overthrown by the Grecians. Now mark again, the still greater advance made in the science of human government.

Alexander, although absolute sovereign, and powerfully imbued with the idea that the "king could do no wrong," and that the law of his mind was in force by heritage from his fathers, yet could not enforce that law but by the dagger and the bowl of the assassin. Philotas could only be brought to the block by the judgment of his peers. Parmenio could only be put to death by the dagger of the assassin. The parliament of the camp was too strong. The unwritten law could not be openly enforced. Although, perhaps, the sovereign never reigned who was more beloved by his people than was Alexander, yet, so profound were the convictions of the great minds of his court of the evils arising from the operations of the unwritten "ex post facto" law of the mind, that they would not tolerate its exercise.

We come now to the fourth great power of the earth.

Observe, that in the Roman jurisprudence the unwritten "ex post facto" law of the mind was utterly abolished; never more to raise its head openly—in a political point of view at least—while time shall endure.

The love of power is an ardent love in almost every mind. Sovereignty has never acknowledged the extinction of the unwritten law. It is only by checks thrown around sovereignty by the good sense of ages, past and present, that "ex post facto" law has been abolished; until, in all political organizations, the mere proposition for its revival by some old fogy, would meet with the derision of the whole civilized world.

When the unwritten law was driven out of political circles, by the good sense of the people, the Cassock and the Cowl adopted it. The daring assumptions of priestcraft were necessary to prolong the existence of a fossilized idea—a relic of the ages of darkness, ignorance and superstition; an idea no more in harmony with the instincts of developed humanity, than are the fossil remains of the Mollusk,of primeval formations, in harmony with the grand developments of organic life now glorifying the earth.

Catholicism has labored hard to impress this dogma of the past on the world, but the good sense of the lesser powers of the priesthood and the laity has for ages been surrounding this unspoken law of the Pope's mind with checks and ecclesiastical guarantees, until, in the nineteenth century, a mighty champion of the higher elements of Catholicism comes out boldly, and manfully denounces this unwritten law as absurd, and subversive of all order and stability in church government.

Father Hyacinthe is not an enemy of Papacy, nor the subverter of Catholic institutions, as was Luther, Calvin and others. He is of the Catholic body, and is Catholic in principle. Father Hyacinthe is only intent upon purifying Catholicism from the mass of superstition and ignorance—the accumulation of ages of misrule through the unwritten law.

The tables of stone were engraven with a written law. The revelations given to Moses form a written code of ecclesiastical jurisprudence. The words and teachings of Jesus were compiled by four of his disciples. The letters and doctrinal epistles of the twelve apostles contain written rules for our faith, which—coupled with the words and teachings of Jesus—form a written compendium of religious rules and doctrine, that has fed and comforted hundreds of millions of God's children for over eighteen centuries.

The revelations given of God to Joseph Smith form a written code of doctrine and covenants for the instruction and comfort of all Saints. I do not believe, with a great church authority, "that we have revelations sufficient for us for the next thousand years." If such be the case, then the canon of scripture is full for one thousand years at least, which would be the same to me and my children and children's children, as if God should never speak to man again. Rather give me the faith that God—as he sees his children improving, developing and rising to higher and still higher planes of thought—will give revelations to his servants the prophets, that shall be written for their instruction, guidance and control.

A great deal is said about obeying the Priesthood. Let us enquire who compose the Priesthood? Is it one man, three men,—or twelve men, or twenty? Call up the five thousand Seventies, the thousands of High Priests, Elders, Priests, Teachers and Deacons, and add them to the Presidency, the Twelve and Bishopric, and you have the Priesthood. If the Priesthood of one man, or of three men, or twelve, is worth all and everything, how much is the Priesthood of the ten thousand Seventies, High Priests, Elders, Priests, Teachers and Deacons of Utah worth?

If the Priesthood of the three High Priests forming the quorum of the First Presidency, renders that quorum infallible, is not a quorum of twelve High Priests infallible? If this be true, who will dispute the infallibility of thirteen or fifteen High Priests sitting as a High Council? Who will dare to doubt the infallible character of the decisions of a quorum of apostles of the Seventies?

In illustration of the subject, I here quote a part of the Revelation on Priesthood, Sec. 3, par. 11, Doctrine and Covenants:

> Of necessity there are presidents, or presiding offices growing out of, or appointed of or from among those who are ordained to the several offices in these two Priesthoods.
> Of the Melchisedek priesthood, three presiding High Priests, chosen by the body, appointed and ordained to that office, and upheld by the confidence, faith, and prayer of the Church, form a quorum of the Presidency of the Church.
> The twelve traveling counsellors are called to be the twelve apostles, or special witnesses of the name of Christ in all the world; thus differing from other officers in the Church in the duties of their calling. And they form a quorum, EQUAL in authority and power to the three presidents previously mentioned.
> The seventy are also called to preach the Gospel, and to be special witnesses unto the Gentiles and in all the world; thus differing from other officers in the Church in the duties of their calling; and they form a quorum EQUAL in authority to that of the twelve special witnesses or apostles just named. * * *
> The decisions of these quorums, or either of them, are to be made in all righteousness, in holiness, and lowliness of heart, meekness and long suffering, and in faith, and virtue, and knowledge, temperance, patience, godliness, brotherly kindness and charity: because the promise is, IF these things abound in them, they shall not be unfruitful in the knowledge of the Lord. And in case that any decision of these quorums is made in unrighteousness, it may be brought before a general assembly of the several quorums, which constitute the spiritual authorities of the Church; otherwise there can be no appeal from their decision.

I appeal to the judgment of every sensible man or woman in Israel, and ask them if they can find one word in the revelations given for the establishment of this Church, wherein infallibility in any of the quorums or authorities of the Church finds the least support?

On the contrary—as seen in the above quotation—abundant provisions are made against aggression on the part of either of the quorums. The quorum of the Twelve, and the quorum of Seventies, are armed with power equal with that of the First Presidency, to serve as a check upon any attempt at absorption of power by that quorum.

Ample provision is made for the protection of the weakest member from encroachment by even the highest quorum. In case that any decision of any one of those quorums should be made in folly or unrighteousness, an appeal can be had to a general assembly of the several quorums growing out of the organizations of the Priesthood of Melchisedek.

We shall have more to say upon this subject hereafter. We have given, however, sufficient to show that power was intended to be distributed by checks and counter-checks among our whole body, so that no quorum, first or last, should assume to itself a dictating power to which all others should unquestioningly bow.

HOW SHALL WE BECOME UNITED?

BY W. H. SHEARMAN.

The value of union, whether considered in a religious, social or political point of view, is inestimable. This is a proposition which does not need sustaining by argument; all experience proves it. We all agree that our success, even our very existence as a people, depends upon it. The only question is in regard to the best means of promoting it. Persuasion and coercion both have their advocates; but their respective merits must be decided by their effects. The fruits of the first were exemplified through the life and teachings of Jesus; the hearts of his disciples were united in the bonds of love. The results of the second may be seen in the Reformation of the 16th Century, and in the establishment of the Government of the United States.

The Romish hierarchy endeavored to preserve the unity of the Church by crushing out freedom of thought and expression. Those who dared to speak or write against any of its, or rather, their dogmas, were pursued with the most vindictive bitterness, and, so far as their power extended, were destroyed by the most violent and cruel means. But this only increased thought, widened the breach, and ultimated in a grand division, which timely concessions might have postponed.

The British Government undertook to force the American colonies into union with and submission to all its measures and dictates. Posterity has reason to be thankful for the experiment, but it proved fatal to the power of those who tried it. Love flourishes in the atmosphere of freedom, but withers the moment it is bound by the chains of coercion. So the British Ministry found it with their colonial fellow-subjects. The attempt to control them by arbitrary power, changed their devoted loyalty into a noble resistance, which resulted in the dismemberment of the empire and the establishment of the most liberal government the world has ever seen.

Union, to be of any value, must be not only apparent but real. External appearances are not always correct indications of internal conditions. Insolvents are notorious for maintaining an outside show of great prosperity, until the crisis arrives which reveals the hollowness of their pretensions. It is a grand mistake to suppose that union is best promoted by insisting on a real or pretended agreement in regard to all matters of faith or policy. It is a chimera which can never be realized; and to-day, as in all past ages, the attempt to enforce it must result in signal failure.

There are as many different degrees of union as there are of development. Men can only be truly united upon that which they equally understand. One class of minds is only prepared to receive just so many truths; another can comprehend these and a few more; while still another can receive more than both, and so on ad infinitum. The members of each of these distinct classes will be agreed among themselves, while they may not, as bodies, coincide with each other. At the same time there may be grand and comprehensive truths which they all believe, producing greater harmony of feeling and concert of action, and resulting in far greater good, than any attempt to coerce them into a closer and unnatural union could possibly effect.

This is what the world needs to-day. Not priestly coercion or threats of Divine vengeance; but a broad and liberal creed—a Religious Constitution, as it were—which shall take men where and as they are, destroy their enmity by uniting them upon the basis of some universally accepted principles, and still leave every one free to drink at the great fountain of truth and to progress to higher spheres of knowledge so fast as his capacity will enable him.

This is what we understood the Gospel, as revealed through Joseph Smith, was to, and still believe it will, accomplish. It embraces all mankind in the arms of its love. Its proclamation is:

"Come, ye Christian sects, and Pagan,
Indian, Moslem, Greek or Jew;
Worshippers of God or Dagon,
Freedom's banner waves for you.

Freedom, peace and full salvation,
Are the blessings guaranteed;
Liberty to every nation,
Ev'ry tongue and every creed."

It recognizes all mankind as brothers and sisters of one family—as the children of one all-wise and all-merciful Father. Its divinely appointed and inspired Apostles come not as the rulers, but as the teachers of mankind, with blessings in their hearts and upon their lips, to reclaim the erring, to comfort the afflicted, strengthen the weak and instruct the ignorant.

This Gospel accords to all mankind the fullest liberty of thought, word and action, consistent with the same rights in others. It requires men to receive truths only so fast as they are able to comprehend them. It says to them, Believe as you like, worship what you please, only allow others the same privilege unmolested; live up to the light within you, and you shall gradually be guided into all truth.

Such a system as this cannot fail to bring about universal harmony and peace.

SPIRITUALISM AND PRIESTHOOD.

As exhibiting our views on Spiritualism, we reprint an article published some time since, but which most of our present readers have not seen.

"For ourselves, while, for reasons which we shall briefly adduce, we have no faith in Spiritualism as a teacher or a reliable source of enlightenment, we consider the evidence of millions of people worth a great deal as to the truth of the phenomenon itself. Whenever multitudes persistently affirm a fact through so many years as Spiritualism has existed —no matter to what extent imposture may be intermixed with the system—there must be a truth and a grand fact underlying the whole.

The weak point in Spiritualism we believe to be, that while its phenomena are in most cases true, it is—except so far as it demonstrates the truth of a future life—comparatively a valueless system for the propagation of truth, when that fact is admitted.

Years ago, the earthly founder of Mormonism—Joseph Smith, struck out an idea which to our minds went deeper than Spiritualism ever ventured. He admitted in the main, the truth of spirit manifestations, but pointed to the fact of the untellable millions of spiritual intelligences appertaining to the earth, "behind the veil," and filling the innumerable worlds of space, needing some grand Godlike system for the preservation of order, and the correct transmission of truth. He pointed repeatedly to the fact, admitted by Spiritualists themselves, that John Jones, or Daniel Webster dying was John Jones and Daniel Webster still, with the precise ignorance or enlightenment with which each laid the earthly body aside. And that spirits revealing—no matter how sincere—could but reveal what they knew. It was clear to our minds then, as now, that in such a grand Universe of law and order as this, no such tremendous gap was left in the provisions of God for its beauty and progress, as the lack of some channel through which truth from the highest sources could be correctly transmitted, and by which, amidst the multitudinous sentiments of conflicting millions, it might be correctly determined and preserved. It was clear to us that a God who left himself without such a grand method of furthering His movements, as some organized system for the transmission of His will, was destitute of the simple skill of the commonest organizing human mind; and, therefore, to our judgment, evidently not the God who has inbreathed into intelligent man's composition throughout the world such a passion for organization. Here "Mormonism," to our view, then, as to-day, exceeded Spiritualism—in the grandeur of its proportions concerning humanity; and therefore, we consider that though Spiritualism—which is an unorganized, as well as unauthorized, system of revelation—doubtless imparts some truths and facts, there is one greater truth yet than all for its advocates yet to learn, and that is that there is, and must be, a divine system for the transmission of intelligence—a priesthood in fact—not a system of priestly control over the intelligence of mankind, but a system designed—however imperfectly developed at present in these its early days—to further and bless all intelligence and all free thought. A system without which the universe would be a desolation, and progress shorn of its mightiest wings. On this account spirits, both in and out of the flesh, who work out of this system, are incapable for their own or their fellow's fullest aid. They can but reflect weak glintlings of the sun of truth. They stand on the steps of the palace of Humanity—they hear the echoing voices within the doors, but they do not enter in.

It has long been a standing complaint with Spiritualists that they never could perfect an organization. How could they? Directed by ever-varying and uneducated intelligences, they must eternally differ, and differing, waste that strength and force, which they might converge for the blessing of mankind; and this we predict they will continue to do until the day comes when the Priesthood, with its greater enlightenment, shall sweep them within its ample folds.

MUSIC IN THE SETTLEMENTS.

BY PROFESSOR J. TULLIDGE.

Fishburn's Choir, Brigham City, concluded.

In the eighth paragraph of "Music in the Settlements," in No. 27, read "by way of instruction" instead of introduction.

In closing my last article, I spoke of systematic breathing in training the voice for sustaining sounds for several bars, and which should be the first point of practice for the vocal student. In order to accomplish this essential point with perfect ease and freedom, the lungs should be well inflated by pulling up the diaphragm before commencing to sustain the note, which means full breathing.

Some persons have an idea that it is very simple to produce natural breathing; and so it would be, were we not so fashionably artificial, and that is why it is necessary in music to adopt systematic voice-training in order to bring us back to nature, before we can deliver correct intonation or perfect declamation.

In speaking of easy breathing, I can in all truth say, that I have had pupils to instruct in voice-exercises who could not—when they began the systematic use of the diaphragm, or nature's bellows—sustain a note more than five seconds, and, at the expiration of three months' persevering practice, could retain the sound for twenty-five, with greater ease than when they began the training.

When the pupil has acquired the art of sustaining notes, the next point to be observed is the method of half-breathing. This is accomplished by short inflations before the wind chest is empty. By proper attention to this mode of practice, the pupil will obtain what is termed the sotto voce, which will enable him to produce the effective, soft-whispering pianos, and the voluminous, full-chest fortissimos, and, in fact, bring out all the lights and shades of musical beauties.

The above explanations are my experience on the artistic requirements of the finished solo, and choral vocalist.

However, to truly interpret the poet and musician, more than the artistic display is required, namely, the espressivo declamation.

The effect of the most beautiful modulatory delivery of the orator, or the artistic sotto voce display, and rouladial execution of the finished singer, would be to reach the ear only. To touch the heart we must be in earnest, and render that expression to the words that will unite the poet and musician.

Many years ago I heard the great tenor vocalist, Mr. John Braham, on several occasions give his interpretation of that master-piece of recitativo, "Deeper and deeper still," from Handel's Oratorio of "Jeptha." This piece is a true description of Jeptha's horror in sacrificing his only daughter, "so dear a child," to fulfil the rash vow he had made. Mr. Braham knew the difficulty of retaining the artistic requirements of the vocalist, when led away by the expression so necessary for the perfect rendition of this great composition, and for this reason he devoted three years to its study before he sang it in public.

The result of Braham's careful practice of this piece caused him to be unrivalled in its delivery.

In describing the effect of his rendering this difficult recitativo on himself and his audience, I can only say that I have seen the big tears rolling down his cheeks, and the twenty thousand who were listening to him, at the Cathedral Church at York, could scarcely breathe, so silent were they, until he had completed the recitativo. No one who has heard his effective interpretation of this composition will ever forget it.

I will relate, by way of illustration, another instance of the effect of the combination of the artistic with the espressivo declamation.

About the year 1849, the Rainer family visited England, and gave a series of concerts in London and in the provinces.

Their astounding espressivo and artistic rendition of compositions, drew thousands of professional and amateur musicians to hear them.

The extraordinary effect produced in amalgamating the voices, coupled with the lights and shades of the piano forte, crescendo and decrescendo, obtained by the perfection of the sotto voce and full chest voice, combined with the espressivo, enchanted all who heard them. Their engagements at the Nobilities' concerts were numerous, and Victoria, England's Queen, who is one of the best lady amateur musicians in the British dominions, engaged them frequently at Buckingham palace.

This is the wonderful effect produced by the vocal powers when we sing with the heart and understanding also. The artistic accomplishments are there, and the soul-stirring expression is there also.

In closing this article, I will again repeat that my hints are not personally critical, but are meant to be instructive.

I will here observe, that notwithstanding my respect for Mr. Fishburn and his choir, I must in honesty advise him to endeavor to be more expressive in the performance of energetic compositions.

The music and words also of Miss Eliza Flower's "Now pray we for our country," are full of the animato espressivo. It contains the true expression of prayer, and should be delivered in a pleading and fervent style.

In this composition Mr Fishburn's attention was more directed to the artistic—or ear effect—than to the espressivo or soul-stirring feeling.

"Sound the loud timbrel," is a piece filled with jubilant expressions, which were not perfectly rendered by his choir. I discovered also, in the harmonic arrangement of the piece, many false progressions, and I should advise all conductors to be particular in selecting compositions that are euphonically arranged.

FORE-KNOWING.

Mr. Editor:—As you consider the question of fore-knowing still open, I desire to present for your columns a solution of it from the standpoint of an extensive personal experience.

Some years since, while living on a farm in New Jersey, when my infirm father had been a cripple for some years (a part of the time not able to get about even on crutches), I had the following vision:

One cloudless day, after the noon repast, while sitting within doors, reading a book, it suddenly appeared to me that I was sitting outside the door, in the open porch, reading a newspaper, and that having a glimpse of some one, I looked, and seeing father coming from the wagon-house without his crutches, I said, "Father, where are your crutches?" and that, answering, he said, "Samuel, I have forgotten them, and left them at the wagon-house—I will go back and get them;" and it appeared that he did so.

At that time my father was in New York city. When there a few days afterward, I told the vision to him and others, and predicted from it that he would recover from his lameness; for with the vision came the impression that he would recover; and so strong was this impression, that I would without hesitation have risked my life on it; and I repeatedly asserted that he certainly would recover and go without his crutches before he died. To this he replied: "Don't say it again, it is impossible. Here I am, an old man, ready to step into my grave, and have been a cripple for more than nine years. It seems like blasphemy for you to talk so."

In less than a month after the vision occurred, he came to my house for a few months' stay, and before he had passed a month there, the vision was fulfilled in every particular, even to the words spoken, and he soon ceased entirely and forever to use his crutches.

My solution of the problem presented by the phenomena in question can now be given in a few words.

Unseen, ever-watchful intelligences, in their kind providence, planned the cure, and knowing their ability to perform it, made known the coming event by a psychological impression of the event on my brain, without the media of the external organs of sight or hearing; and so it is with all visions of this class—all ghost-seeing and similar appearances.—Phrenological Journal.

A noble heart doth teach a virtuous scorn,—
To scorn to owe a duty over long;
To scorn to be for benefits forborne:
To scorn to lie, to scorn to do a wrong.
To scorn to bear an injury in mind;
To scorn a free-born heart slave-like to bind.

Lady Elizabeth Carew (1613.)

THE DUCHESNE ESTATE.

We have before us one of the large, smooth, prairie-like landscapes of the Opelousas country in Western Louisiana. As we are in the times before the rebellion, in the times when this prairie had been tamed by the hand of agriculture, and not yet driven wild again by the hand of war, the view is one of canefields and cornfields and fruit orchards, of abundant and monotonous fertility, of verdure and beyond verdure.

Miles away from the spires of a considerable village, and yet, so even is that oceanic land, within sight of them, stands a plantation mansion, a building which seems of Europe rather than of America, so plain and large and solid is it, a mass of stone clothed in mortar. Under the heavily-arched piazza which covers the front of this mansion, sits a lady alone, her eyes fixed on another plantation residence similiar to this, except that it is larger. The lady is Miss Ninette Rambeau, and she is looking at the Duchesne place.

Of a sudden—"Hullo! Wah, wah, wah! He, Miss Ninette? Jumboloro tell you fust. He come, Miss Ninette; Mas'r Henry Vincent come. Wah, wah, wah!"

Across the yard which separates the house from the road rampaged one of the antiques and curiosities of the African race, a negro who had not yet ceased to be fractionally monkey, a little less than primitive man, a tamed monster. Hat off, tufts of white wool jigging about his black scalp, legs and arms of different lengths flying in all directions, a huge cane or stick joining erratically in the movement, a whirlwind of tattered clothing circling and shaking around him, his appearance and locomotion were alike amazing. He was lame: one leg was much longer than the other; he used the short leg as a pivot and a means of propulsion; he swung around on it, and tumbled ahead of it. His cane was incessantly busy; he seemed to walk on it and to fly with it; it was a crutch, and it was a wing; moreover it made gestures. As he scratched and tumbled and punched along, his twisted mouth gave forth a congregation of shouts, a clamor as of various voices. He laughed and talked at once: when he laughed he squeaked; when he talked he bellowed. It was squeak and bellow, bellow and squeak, all across the yard.

"Hi! H o-o-o! He done come. Jumboloro tell you fust. Wah, wah, wah! Mas'r Henry Vincent. He done come, Miss Ninette. He over to Duchesne House. H-o-o-o!"

The young lady had sprung to her feet, her face a rose and her eyes diamonds. "Has he really come?" she asked, leaning over the railing of the piazza and gazing eagerly at the ancient nondescript. "Did you see him?"

"No. Didn' see um. Aunt Chloe say he come. Wah, wah, wah. Tell Jumboloro so. H-o-o-o! Jumboloro hop into wagon; git right along to tell Miss Ninette; wah, wah, wah! Guess you glad. Guess Missus Rambeau glad. Guess everybody on the ole place glad. Wah, wah, wah! A-o-o-o!"

Having squeaked and bellowed himself the merest trifle blacker—no, lighter—in the face than usual, this venerrble man-monkey collapsed upon the ground and wrestled for breath, meanwhile grinning with a forty-skeleton power.

"Oh, I am so glad!" exclaimed Ninette Rambeau. "Thank you, Jumboloro. Now, here," taking out her portmonnaie, "here is your five-dollar piece. I didn't think it would be you who would get it. Don't spend it all in rum and make a brute of yourself."

"No, no," squeaked the primitive man, rising to his feet with as much labor as if he were climbing a tree, and commencing a dance which seemed like the orgie of a scarecrow. If a loom, a washing machine and a possessed planchette had been working all together inside his raiment, they could not have flung about its tags and bobtails of cotton sacking with greater extravagance. It might have been the pre-adamite dance, the hornpipe of the lake-dwellers of Switzerland, with a reminiscence of gorilla caperings.

"Jus' buy one leetle drop," he bellowed. "One drop to drink your health—drink health of Missus Rambeau—drink health of Mas'r Vincent—drink health of wedding—"

And so he went on, imagining toasts enough to lay forty men-monkeys under their tables, if so be they should possess such furniture.

Ninette rushed into the house, sent one African after her horse, another after her riding-whip, another after her bootees, another to see what had become of the first, until it seemed as if a whole Gold Coast were in commission. "Tell mamma, as soon as she comes in," she said, mounting her saddle, "tell her Mr. Vincent has come, and I will bring him to dinner." She was glowing with excitement and joy; you might easily admit her mother's claim that she was the handsomest girl in the parish; one seldom sees a more dazzling brunette than she was at the moment. In less than ten minutes she had cantered two miles, and was prancing up the great yard of the Duchesne mansion. The house was a huge pile of brick, daubed with coarse, yellowish, weather-stained plaster, which made no pretence of being granite or marble. The facade was a two-storied veranda, the lower story supported by heavy arches, the upper one by pillars of masonry. In the rear was a double row of negro houses facing each other, some thirty in number, solid and comfortable dwellings, also of brick and plaster. The grounds were grassless, of course; nothing deserving the name of turf can be raised in that southern region; but there was a paradise of orange trees, of rare shrubs and of flowers; the senses were mastered by rich tints and strong perfumes. Around, over thousands of acres, stretched the high, grey cypress fences and the well-tilled fields of the Duchesne estate.

Notwithstanding coarse material and a prison-like plainness of architecture, the house showed signs of a barbaric sumptuousness. The door-knob and bell-handle were of solid silver; the name Duchesne was let into the marble door-step in large silver letters; through the open windows were visible pictures and ponderous mahogony furniture. Clearly enough, this had been the residence of a man who did not quite know what to do with all his money. A woman would have handled treasures to better advantage in the way of decoration.

As Ninette pulled up at the front door, a negro in soiled livery appeared and took her bridle.

"Ah, Tom!" she said, gaily, as she dismounted; "I have come to call on the new master. Do you think he will see me?"

Tom, it appeared, was a stutterer; he evidently had something to say; but he could not begin on it; and before he had cracked the first syllable between his laboring jaws, Ninette was in the house. Gathering her riding dress out of the way of her eager little bootees, she whisked through a broad hall and rustled into a monstrous parlor.

"There—embarras de richesse—were two men, and neither of them the man she sought! The sparkle of her eye went out like a falling star, and her mouth made a little pouting, pitiful grimace, such as one might expect from a disappointed rose.

The two men sat at a table, on which were two bottles of the Duchesne madeira, a platter of cold fowl, and a bowl of salad. One of them, the one who had the most confidence and ownership in his port, the one who, at first sight, could be distinguished as the autocrat of the festivity, was a short, paunchy, light-haired, blue-eyed young fellow, well dressed, in regard to material, but with a slatternly, untied, unbuttoned air, as though his clothes were intoxicated. His round and shiny face, quick-glancing eyes, and quirking mouth expressed a combination of smartness, slyness, impudence, and vice, slightly relieved by glimpses of jollity and coarse goodfellowship.

He carried his bullet head over his right shoulder, and his shining beaver on his left temple. One eye was closely shut, and the other ostentatiously wide upon. The bridge of his nose was barked or blazed, as though some hewer of human countenances had lately been that way, and had marked out his road for a return. His upper lip, too, was clumsily cut, after the manner of knuckles in cutting; and his whole countenance had a swollen look, which made the humane soul desire to bandage it. In fine, he had the air of a New York rough, or a Baltimore plug lately out of a fight.

His companion was, apparently, a low-bred Southerner, of the cross-roads' grocery type; middle-aged, with long, unkempt, greasy hair, and whitish eyes; a face so cadaverously pale and unwholesomely flabby that it would have deterred a Maori from eating him; the sloppiest and seediest of black clothing; and a meeching, unsteady demeanor. A man who frequently saw his betters; a man much bullied by his own consciousness; a man who "had no use" for a sheriff, a shamefaced, played-out "dead beat."

As Ninnette faced them, both rose to their feet, the younger with an expression of impudent courtesy, the elder with sheepish respect. She was so far from being pleased with their appearance that her first impulse was to turn her back on them without a word and go on searching for the one person whom she wanted. Nevertheless, they were white men: and in those Dixie days, all white people owed civility to all other white people; for were they not all alike members of the great, natural, Caucasian aristocracy? So Ninette made a slight bow, and said, "I expected to see Mr. Henry Vincent."

"Have a seat, ma'am," responded the bullet-headed youth, firing a shot of admiration at her with his open eye. "Very happy to see you here. Let me offer you a glass of madeira—some of the old Duchesne tap—first-rate article, ma'am."

As he turned to fill a glass, he gave his blubbering comrade the wink of a Five-points Lothario.

"Is Mr. Henry Vincent here?" demanded Ninette, without stirring from her position.

"Can't say he is, just at present," admitted the plug, slightly quelled by her dignified tone.

"When is he coming?"

"Don't know nary such person."

"Is it possible?" exclaimed Ninette, frankly staring her astonishment. "I heard that the heir of this estate had arrived."

"All right. Here he is—quite at your service," grinned the fellow, tapping his waistcoat respectfully, as though it now belonged to his betters.

"You the heir!"

Ninette flushed with downright anger; what did the impudent creature mean?

"I am. So they say. That's the will." These short sentences were uttered at intervals, with an accent which was meant to be impressive, and which might have been considered impressive at Jones' Wood.

"Who did you say you thought was the heir?" he suddenly added, with an expression of hard-drinking slyness.

"Mr. Henry Vincent, a friend of Mr. Duchesne's. It was so understood here."

The plug turned to his comrade; he opened his right eye and shut the left. To this speechless succession of queries the blubber-faced man responded by an imbecile stare, unilluminated by a wink or a grimace.

"This is very singular," stammered Ninette, preparing to go. "I don't comprehend it."

"Can't say but what I'm slightly mixed myself," broke in the youngster, evidently anxious to detain her. "I knew Duchesne; I may say I done lots of business with him at my place in Carrollton; he used to booze there. I kep' a licker store—very best brands and taps, you bet; and Duchesne knew what to call for. But as to making me his heir, that beats me. I own beat on it. However, he done it. I've seen the will, and that's the way it spells. 'All my estate to Edward Roland, of Carrollton,' or words to that effect. Now, I'm Edward Roland, of Carrollton. I'm Edward Roland, and this is my friend and faithful bar-keeper, Jake Philpot. Jake, make the lady a bow."

Ninette began to fear lest the man spoke the truth about the will. Her color, which a moment ago had been crimson, now sank to a lily-like pallor. She was tremulous from head to foot, and could scarcely conceal her emotion.

"Good morning, sir," she said. "Excuse my intrusion. I had expected to meet an old friend."

"Young man, this Mr. Vincent?" inquired Mr. Roland, with a gleam of fresh interest. With one watery eye settled on her face, and the other quizzically closed, he looked outrageously impudent.

Ninette glanced at him angrily. He seemed to be peering into her feelings toward Henry Vincent; his squint had the insolence of a leer. Suppressing a desire to strike him across the face with her riding whip, she marched superbly out of the room.

"I say, what name?" called Roland, stumbling after her.

His companion caught him by the coat skirt, muttering, "God's sake, let her 'lone. She's one of the high-toned sort. Git yerself into a big fight."

"All right," answered Roland. "Let's have lunch. Here's to her health. Devilish splendid gal. I'll bring her round yet. Women ain't a goin' to sour on a young fellow, peart and healthy, and pooty good lookin' who owns the Duchesne estate."

Having winked at Philpot, right eye and left eye alternately, twelve or fourteen times, he opened his sore mouth with a grimace for a piece of cold fowl.

Meantime, Ninette rode homeward as fast as she came. At the gate, she met Jumboloro, his tufts of white wool jigging and horn-piping with delight, his "human evasions" of limbs performing unearthly capers, his flags and streamers of raiment waving in a fashion to scare all the crows in North America.

"Ho-o-o!" he bellowed, and then squeaked, "Wah, wah, wah. You see him? Aha! What Jumboloro tell you? Jumboloro tell you fust. Mas'r Henry Vincent. Pretty soon Missus Henry Vincent. Wah, wah, wah."

"Jumboloro, what did you deceive me so for?" answered Ninette, with irritation. "Mr. Vincent is not there."

"Wah, wah, wah," squealed the man-monkey, tears of laughter rolling down his leathery cheeks, folded like the skin of a rhinoceros, "Oh yes, he be. You seen him. Now you want to plague Jumboloro. Aunt Chloe tell me the young man come what own the 'state. Wah, wah." Here he went into a new paroxysm of delighted gambols and squeaks, as if he were a young raccoon who had just pulled some other raccoon's tail.

"You old simpleton!" exclaimed Ninette, as she dashed on toward the house. In the veranda she was met by her mother, a dark, tall, full-formed, dignified and yet politic-looking woman, between the ages of forty and fifty.

"Ah, you bad subject!" said Madame Rambeau, with a smile. "What sort of behaviour is this in a young lady! Running off to see young men alone, even if they are betrothed lovers—it won't do, Ninette. Such things make talk. Well," she added with an air of satisfaction, "is Mr. Vincent coming to dinner?"

"I haven't seen him," answered the girl, ready to cry with vexation and disappointment.

"Haven't seen him! Why, Jumboloro told me—"

Then came Ninette's story as to whom she had seen and what she had heard in the Duchesne mansion. Madame Rambeau listened with a flush of astonishment, which at last changed into the paleness of alarm and anger.

"Is it possible that the man deceived us!" she exclaimed, "Is it possible that Duchesne was a liar and scoundrel!"

"Oh, mamma!—I should have taken Henry all the same."

Madame responded by a look which appeared to say, "I might not have let you."

Then ensued a long conversation concerning the deceased planter, from which we will draw such items of information as seem important, adding to them gossip derived from other sources.

Tillet Duchesne had been one of the richest landed proprietors of Louisiana. An only and spoiled child, he had grown up, not only with tastes for coarse revelry, but so ignorant that he could not write the shortest note without faults of spelling. What means were there of driving learning into a youngster whose father was dead, whose mother humored all his whims, who used his tutors as butts for practical jokes, and who had drawn a knife on more than one of them? His whole manhood was spent in hunting, in eating and drinking, in gambling and low frolics. Sometimes he passed weeks in the purlieus of New Orleans, carousing with rowdies and even with criminals. He never went to the North or to Europe; conscious of his educational and moral deficiences, he did not care to exhibit them to strangers: he was at ease only among the boon companions of his youth or the roughs whom he encountered by hazard; his life was a round of stupid, unvaried, commonplace, provincial debauchery.

At the age of sixty, three years before his death, the physical inability to carouse longer had wrought in him a species of reformation. He was now a gaunt, haggard man; his tall, stooping figure crawling painfully on crutches, his yellow and wrinkled face distorted with pain, his eyes red and watery from sleeplessness, his swollen feet swathed in flannel. His temper, always peevish and often fantastically violent, made him a terror to his dependents. Happily he was a bachelor and without relatives. His cruelties, if he committed any, were borne by the speechless carcass of slavery, and no echo has come down to annoy us.

In these woful latter years, limited by his digestion to one cigar a day, unable to drink three glasses of wine without passing the night in purgatory, debarred from playing the flute (his only accomplishment) by the stiffness of his chalky fingers, he became an object of pity to people from whom his wealth had only been able to extort endurance.

Among those who now treated him with consideration were the Rambeau ladies. Madame Rambeau had once refused Duchesne; perhaps her heart relented toward an ancient lover; so it is often with women. As she was a widow and reputed to be politic, envious people of course charged her with designs upon the old bachelor's estate. When a couple of years had worn this suspicion threadbare, and when Ninette, having grown up to attractive womanhood, had refused two or three eligible offers, the whisper arose that the mother was seeking to catch Duchesne for the daughter.

We cannot say how it was; there is no denying that Madame Rambeau was artful and ambitious; and such a mother is sometimes her child's deadliest enemy. But nothing happened between the old man and the girl beyond an intimacy in which the former was always a patient and the latter a nurse. She found it hard work to amuse him; it was wearisome to be always at cards, chess and backgammon, but at last, as if favored with a new childhood, he took a fancy to books. After she had repeatedly offered to read to him, and after he had as often refused with a grimace, he allowed her to try him with "Ivanhoe." In half an hour he became furiously interested, and henceforward he bought and heard fictions by the dozen.

We mention this subject because it leads us to a strange gleam of light upon a darkened nature. As Ninette read to the broken-down and little less than dying old debauchee the plea of Jeanie Deans for her sister, she observed that her listener repeatedly wiped his eyes with his fingers.

"Does the light trouble you, Mr. Duchesne?" she asked.

"No, no, go on," he answered, turning slightly away from her.

The reading proceeded; he took out his handkerchief and covered his face with it; she rose and said, "I will draw the curtain, Mr. Duchesne."

"No, no, my dear," he answered, dropping his handkerchief and exposing his wet face. "The truth is I am snivelling over a novel."

Ninette's feeling, already much moved by the pathetic narrative, gave way entirely before this confession, and she burst frankly into tears.

"My dear," said the old roue, "you are a good girl, and I have been a bad man. I am honored and bettered by sharing your feelings."

Presently followed another romance of more importance to Ninette. Enter a tall and handsome young man, somewhat too much of the Lara type for mature Puritan taste, but quite fitted to win the admiration of a young lady. Duchesne introduced him as Henry Vincent, the son of an old friend in Mobile. The two young people met constantly; the natural result was a love affair; should it be an engagement?

"You need not inquire about the boy," said Duchesne to Madame Rambeau. "I will guarantee him. A little wild, but good stuff, not like me. As to property, I will leave him my whole estate, if you will consent to the match, and he will take my name. I owe him something. His father saved my life in a rencontre. Besides, I like the young fellow. Besides, I like Ninette."

Well, the will had been made; the engagement had taken place; the young man had been sent off on business, during his absence the old man had died. Meanwhile Vincent's letters to Ninette had strangely ceased; and at last instead of him, arrived this other claimant, Edward Roland.

Such are the events which bring us down to the commencement of our narrative.

"It does not seem possible that Duchesne deceived us," murmured Madame Rambeau. "What motive? unless he was insane?"

"He drew, or at least he re-wrote his will," said Ninette. "He spelled so horribly, you know; he may have made some blunder."

"And where is Vincent?" demanded Madame, with irritation "Why isn't he here to attend to his business?"

Ninette burst into tears. The mother looked at her almost angrily. The child, she knew, was not crying about this lost estate, but about that missing lover. What fools girls were, to be sure! Madame was so furious about the imperilled property that she could not find a gentle word for the bleeding heart. Merely saying, "Ninette, don't be a baby," she fell into a solemn reflection. If Vincent did not come back, or if he came back and did not get the Duchesne estate, it would be her duty, she felt, to make a new arrangement for her daughter. Would this Edward Roland do? It is clear enough that Madame had abundant matter for meditation. At last she decided on a double plan; she would follow out one of her proposed roads for a while; then, if it seemed best, she would shift to the other. Leaving her in this forked bewilderment, we will take a glance at the Messrs. Roland and Philpot, much occupied all this while with the Duchesne pullets and madiera, although the estate is not yet settled.

THE SCORPION AND ITS ANTAGONIST.

A few mornings since I received by post a small box. On account of the holes pricked in the cover I suspected it might contain something alive, therefore refrained from opening it until I had read my letters. It was fortunate I did so, for from one of the letters I learned that the box contained two live scorpions, a present from my friend J. K. Lord, who caught them under a stone at Heliopolis, in Egypt, and had sent them off at once. On opening the box carefully I saw two scorpions sitting in it, with their tails turned over their backs. They were divided from each other by a partition, and were very quiet; but on seeing the light they immediately began to move, so that I had to be careful not to let them escape into the room Sending for a glass fish-globe, I turned the box suddenly over; and with a tap at the bottom shook them out into it. For a moment the scorpions remained quiet at the bottom; then, waking up, they suddenly rushed at each other, and began fighting and wrestling, claw to claw, like two bull-dogs. I had great trouble to separate them, and get one of them out of the globe. At last I succeeded, by using two paper-knives and a long pair of forceps. I wonder they did not poison each other or myself. In the course of the morning it was announced that a mouse had been caught in a trap. I immediately thought of testing the poison of the scorpion upon the mouse. The reader must know that my scorpion is a little beast with a body the size of a large black-beetle. He has small legs on each side like the legs of a lobster, and also two nipping-claws. At the end of the body is a tail, nearly two inches long, consisting of five joints, strung together like a bead necklace. At the end of the last joint is the sting, which consists of a horny bag the shape of an apple-pip, and armed with a brown-colored sting having the curve of a bramble-thorn. The point of the sting is exceedingly sharp. The general color of the scorpion is a horrid-looking waxy brown. The eyes of the scorpion—little black shining points—are situated at the top of his head. When preparing to fight he carries his tail in a curve over his back, and brandishes his sting with immense rapidity. He aims his blows directly forward as a soldier gives a bayonet-thrust.

The scorpion was lying quietly at the bottom of the globe when I shook the mouse from the trap into it, but the sudden arrival of a stranger into his private apartments woke him up directly. He hoisted his sting, and began brandishing it about. The mouse shortly crossed his path; the scorpion instantly lunged his sting into him. This in turn woke up the mouse, who began to jump up and down like a jack-in-the-box. When he became quiet the scorpion again attacked the enemy, with his claws extended, like the pictures of the scorpion in the signs of the zodiac: he made another shot at the mouse, but missed him. I then called "Time," to give both combatants a rest. When the mouse had got his wind, I stirred up the scorpion once more, and, as "the fancy" say, he "came up smiling." The mouse during the interval had evidently made up his mind that he would have to fight, and not strike his colors to a scorpion as he would to a cat. When, therefore, the scorpion came within range, the mouse gave a squeak, and bit him on the back; the scorpion at the same moment planted his sting well between the mouse's ears on the top of his head.

The scorpion then tried to retreat, but could not, for one claw had got entangled in the fur of the mouse; and then came one of the most ludicrous scenes I ever beheld. Mouse and scorpion "closed," and both rolled over and over together, like two cats fighting. The scorpion continued stabbing the mouse with his sting, his tail going with the velocity and swift spring of a needle in a sewing-machine; in fact, the scorpion had the mouse, as pugnacious schoolboys used to say, "in chancery." The moment the scorpion got tired, and the lunges of his tail became less frequent, the mouse got hold of the last joint of his adversary's tail with his paw, and gave the sting a sharp nip with his teeth (it was most interesting to notice that the mouse used his paw). The scorpion at once tried to make his retreat, but he couldn't get away, as his claws were entangled in the fur. The mouse seized this opportunity, and deliberately bit two of the scorpion's side legs off. He then retired to the corner, and began to wash his face and comb his fur. I took out my watch to note how long it would be before the poison of the scorpion took effect. I waited minute after minute, and nothing happened, the mouse seemed a little tired, and that was all. When ten minutes had passed I shook the scorpion up to the place where the mouse was sitting. The scorpion was a plucky "arachnoid," for he tried to come up to the scratch once more; but as a ship is disabled when she has lost her mainmast by a shot, so "Scorpio formidolosus," as Horace calls him, was crippled for further encounter. He tried to hoist his sting, but the bite from the mouse had injured his tail, so that he could not strike straight with it, and it had lost its spring from the wound. Seeing that the scorpion was "lying under bare poles," the mouse sat himself down and began deliberately to eat the scorpion's legs up one after the other. I was at this time obliged to go away to my work, and when, in about six hours, my secretary came down to my office, he reported that the mouse had shown no symptom whatever of poisoning. When I came back in the evening I went at once to the globe to see what had happened; instead of finding a dead mouse I found about half a dead scorpion, and a live mouse. The mouse had, in fact, made a good meal of his enemy. Some bread had been placed in the globe; the mouse had eaten this also, so I hope he had enjoyed his meal of bread and scorpion. The battle therefore was decided in favor of the mouse, and the backers of the scorpion had to "throw up the sponge," while, as a reward for his courage, the mouse, after a parting supper of toasted cheese and milk, was let free in a place where the cat was not likely to find him. The friends of the scorpion have lodged a protest, inasmuch as the scorpion was not "in training," and the mouse was not a "fair mouse," being too large and too heavy. For my own part, I think the fight was hardly fair, as the scorpion had just come off a long, cold journey, and had not eaten any thing. The mouse, on the contrary, was just caught, and in good condition.

The following extract from a letter to one of our compositors will speak for itself.

LOGAN, Oct. 31, 1869.

Dear Brother: I thought I would just drop a line to you to let you know that many of the people are in high glee to think we have some few noble-minded men in our midst who are not afraid of the truth of the Gospel, neither are they scared to publish it to the Saints and the world. Every thinking man has been waiting with calmness, and constantly watching for those very sentiments expressed in your Magazine. Quite a number of men, and women too, are talking of sending down their subscriptions for the Magazine at an early day. That piece, "We are nothing if not Spiritual," is talked of by everybody as one of the best pieces ever written in the Territory; and if some people are afraid of truths like these, "driving the Priesthood from the earth," the sooner it is driven the better, and let all the people say Amen. I think such men cannot have much faith in the word of the Lord, through Joseph, where he said the Priesthood shall NEVER again be taken from the earth, until the sons of Levi should offer unto the Lord an offering in righteousness. What folly to talk of the truth "driving" the power of God from the earth!

Your old friend,

A—— B——.

EDITOR UTAH MAGAZINE.

We need not be surprised at anything!

When men of tried virtue and worth, can, for a simple difference of opinion, be severed from a church to which they have given the best years of their lives, their hearts' deepest interest, and their untiring energy for the advancement of its cause, the thinking person will exclaim, "I shall not be surprised at anything."

Were it in the power of man to take from us our blessings, our hearts would be sad indeed, for we have seen the short-sightedness, the injustice, with which he exercises that power. But we question the authority of any man to sever his brother from the companionship of congenial associates here, much less, to cut him off from communion with God and angels, or hopes of salvation hereafter.

We know God is still guiding and guarding the ship of Zion. Even when we see the helmsman steering toward the rocks, we still know there is a mighty power which can say, thus far, my servant goest thou, but no farther.

We have been told frequently to seek for the spirit of God, and inspirations from Heaven; that it was our right to obtain knowledge concerning ourselves by this means. But when we have sought, and through the earnestness of our souls, have wrung from high Heaven that knowledge which fills us with joy, we are coldly told it did not come through the proper channel, hence it must be wrong, and the light thus obtained must be darkness.

It is impossible for some to believe, upon the simple testimony of another; they must know for themselves. Not that they would wish to direct others, it is for themselves they claim the right to obtain knowledge; and it is for themselves also that they claim difference of opinion where that knowledge substantiated by reason, tells them there is an error.

How much more valuable to a community, and society, are intelligent adherents, those who believe through the investigation of their reason, not through coercion or fear of displeasing.

That which one's reason cannot accept, to that one is untrue: to another it might be true, the same rule proving it.

Some natures are more enlarged, can grasp greater truths, while others can hardly entertain the faintest conception of them.

How many of us of late, have said within ourselves, a change must come, our faith in man is weakening, for our religion seems to be settling down upon a foundation of dollars and cents, and he who has most of these, is the best and the mightiest man.

"Human learning, with the blessing of God upon it, introduces us to Divine wisdom, and while we study the works of nature, the God of nature will manifest himself to us, since, to a well-tutored mind, the heavens, without a miracle, declare His glory, and the firmament showeth His handiwork."

It has been said, who by reasoning ever found out God? We do not need to reason to find Him out, we only want to use our reason in accepting what purports to emanate from Him. We cannot accept what our conscience and reason deny, even though its pretensions are Divine.

I am aware that those who use their reason will in the present issue be charged with corruption, but let people's past lives speak for them. They cannot be honorable, upright and thoroughly good to-day, and the opposite of all this to-morrow. Naturally, good people increase in goodness, unless they get into the dark. Admitted; but people in darkness shed their gloom upon all who come in contact with them; this is a proof of their state.

There is a difference in apostatizing from a creed, and in being summarily dismissed against your earnest protest. The question then arises, does God empower one man to dismiss another from his Church? Revelation says, No! The true Latter-Day Saint is as firmly fixed in his faith to-day as yesterday, despite the action of man upon his case. If this policy is pursued by the Church, then, the salt, or some of it, will be washed out of the Church, for the time has come when men and women must think for themselves —for their salvation depends upon it—and if they think, they will speak, but let it be in candor, in honor, and in kindness, free from the petty spirit of revenge and malice.

Let parties be lost in principles. He whose principle, and practice, is sound and just, cannot long sit in darkness.

May the spirit of inspiration illumine the hearts of all such, continually, is the prayer of a

DAUGHTER OF ZION.

PROPRIETORS OF UTAH MAGAZINE.

Dear Brethren: (for such I must still call you,) In order to present myself as I am before my friends, I write you the following for publication. On the morning of the trial of Bros. Harrison and Godbe before the High Council, I left my home in the 11th Ward, not having the least idea of being present at that trial, for I did not then know that such a privilege would be granted me, but soon after arriving at my place of business I was told by some one that any member of the Church would be allowed to be present, I consequently, at the hour appointed, sought admittance, but was refused, on the ground that the room was already full, although dozens were admitted afterwards, as I saw with my own eyes, as I was afterwards permitted, through your influence, to be present. I conscientiously voted in the opposition, and of course was called upon to explain the cause of my so voting. I said, "that for a number of years I had endeavored to sustain the truth, and still wished to do so, no matter whether it came from Bro. Harrison, Bro. Godbe, President B. Young or any one else." The question was then put to me by President B. Young,—"Do you wish to sustain Harrison and Godbe?" To which I replied,—"Brethren, in answer to the question put to me by President B. Young, I simply say that I wish to sustain the truth."

For thus expressing myself I was summoned to attend a council of my Ward, and although I notified the summoner that I could not conveniently attend, but would some other time, I was then and there without further ceremony severed from the Church. Since my excommunication I have been offered a hearing, but knowing well that my case was prejudged, and considering the whole of such treatment child's-play, and illegal from beginning to end, I have not attended.

As I said to President Young, I shall still "stick by the truth no matter through whom it or any portion of it may come." I do not follow men but principles.

Respectfully yours,

JOSEPH SILVER.

PATENT
ARION PIANOFORTE

GRANDS AND GRAND SQUARES,

7⅓ OCTAVES

The "ARION" is the very best Piano for the Great West because it stands in tune longer than any other Piano. It requires no repairing or regulating: shipping any distance, or dampness does not affect them.

WHY?

It commences where the "First Premium" Makers stop, and upon the most improved Modern scale makes four patented improvements: which make the Arion more simple, yet stronger: increasing its volume and beauty of tone, while rendering the instrument more enduring.

WHAT THEY ARE.

First. The patent Arion Reversed Wooden Agraffe Bridge, which retains all the purity of tone only found in a wooden bridge of the rest whereon the strings lays, and obtains all the solid prolonged strength of tone of the metal Agraffe, without that acute metallic noise which the metal Agraffe develops by use.

Secondly. The Patent Arion Compound Wrest-Plank, which holds the tuning pins, is six thicknesses of hard maple, the grain of each layer runs in a different direction. The advantages are, the 20 tons strain of the strings cannot split our Arion wrest-plank, as frequently happens in other Pianos, and when people say "My Piano won't stand in tune," all other makers must use the single wrest plank with the grain running only one way.

The Arion Tuning-Pins have end wood to hold them on every side, while all other makers can have it only upon two sides of their pins.

Thirdly. The Patent Arion Diagonal Sustaining Bar, extending parallel with the steel strings under the over strung Bass strings. The Arion is the only Piano wherein the enormous strain of the large steel strings is resisted in the natural place and direction. Using this bar renders the weakest part in all other over strung Pianos the

STRONGEST IN THE ARION.

Fourthly, The Patent Arion Iron Frame concentrates all the metal in front of the tuning pin line, and its frame is let in and mortised the front edge of the wooden wrest plank, thereby preventing the great strain of the strings upon it from splitting or moving it one particle. All other "Full Iron Frames," cover the entire wrest plank, and when it is split it cannot be seen the wood of the Arion wrest plank is seen.

THE ARION STANDS UPON ITS OWN MERITS.

unsupported by either buncome, weak facts, or useless or complicated Patents. We append a few unbought opinions of those who

KNOW THE ARION.

The Musical Director of the New York Conservatory of Music, Edward Mollenhauer, says: "The Arion I bought of you is the best Piano I ever played on; that rolling bass and silvery treble, etc."

John H. Woods, Piano Dealer, Oswego, N. Y., says: "The tone is truly immense, and surpasses anything in the shape of a Piano we ever saw or heard of, etc."

Horace Greely said: "The Arion is the best Square Piano, superior for its evenness and brilliancy of tone," &c.

Louis Wagner, Fort Leavenworth, says: "My Piano arrived here in splendid order. Its tone fills my parlor with melody—it is the wonder and admiration of all who hear it. Miss ——, who is teaching the Piano desires me to order one for her," &c

Hair Vigor,
For restoring Grey Hair to its natural Vitality and Color.

A dressing which is at once agreeable, healthy, and effectual for preserving the hair. Faded or gray hair is soon restored to its original color with the gloss and freshness of youth. Thin hair is thickened, falling hair is checked, and baldness often, though not always, cured by its use. Nothing can restore the hair where the follicles are destroyed, or the glands atrophied and decayed. But such as remain can be saved for usefulness by this application. Instead of fouling the hair with a pasty sediment it will keep it clean and vigorous. Its occasional use will prevent the hair from turning gray or falling off, and consequently prevent baldness. Free from those deleterious substances which make some preparations dangerous and injurious to the hair, the Vigor can only benefit but not harm it. If wanted merely for a nothing else can be found so desirable. Containing neither oil nor dye, it does not soil white cambric, and yet lasts long on the hair, giving it a rich glossy lustre, and a grateful perfume.

MUSICAL DOINGS.—Since Mr. Waters gave up publishing sheet music, he has devoted his whole capital and attention to the manufacture and sale of Pianos and Melodeons. He has just issued a catalogue of his new instruments, giving a new scale of prices, which shows a marked reduction from former rates, and his Pianos have recently been awarded the First Premium at several Fairs. Many people of the present day, who are attracted, if not confused, with the flaming advertisements of rival piano houses, probably overlook the modest manufacturer like Mr. Waters; but we happen to know that his instruments earned him a good reputation long before these positions and "honors" connected therewith were ever thought of; indeed, we have one of Mr. Waters' Piano-fortes now in our residence, (where it has stood for years,) of which any manufacturer in the world might be proud. We have always been delighted with its full sweet-toned and powerful instrument, and there is no doubt of its durability; more than this, some of the best amateur players in the city, and several celebrated pianists, have performed on the said piano, and all pronounce it a superior and first-class Instrument. Stronger indorsement we could not give.—Home Journal,

We can speak of the merits of the Waters' Pianos from personal knowledge as being of the very best quality.—Christian Intelligencer.

The Waters' Pianos are built of the best and most thoroughly seasoned material.—Advocate and Journal.

Waters' Pianos and Melodeons challenge comparison with the finest made anywhere.—Home Journal.

Horace Waters, 481 Broadway, is famed for the excellence of his Pianos and Organs.—Evening Post.

The Waters Piano ranks with the best manufactured in America.—The Independent, N. Y.

Our friends will find at Mr. Waters' store the very best assortment of Pianos, Melodeons and Organs to be found in the United States.—Graham's Magazine

MUSICAL DOINGS.—Since Mr. Waters gave up publishing sheet music, he has devoted his whole capital and attention to the manufacture and sale of Pianos and Melodeons. He has just issued a catalogue of his new instruments, giving a new scale of prices, which shows a marked reduction from former rates, and his Pianos have recently been awarded the First Premium at several Fairs. Many people of the present day, who are attracted, if not confused, with the flaming advertisements of rival piano houses, probably overlook the modest manufacturer like Mr. Waters; but we happen to know that his instruments earned him a good reputation long before positions and "honors" connected therewith were ever thought of; indeed, we have one of Mr. Waters' Piano-fortes now in our residence, (where it has stood for years,) of which any manufacturer in the world might be proud. We have always been delighted with it as a sweet-toned and powerful instrument, and there is no doubt of its durability; more than this, some of the best amateur players in the city, and several celebrated pianists, have performed on the said piano, and all pronounce it a superior and first-class instrument. Stronger indorsement we could not give.—Home Journal,

NEW MEDICAL DISCOVERY.

Dr. CADY'S CATARRH REMEDY.

A CERTAIN CURE FOR CATARRH AND ALL Mucous Diseases of the head, nose and throat.

This is a Medicine never before used or known to the public. Dr. Cady, the discoverer, was a sufferer from this terrible disease for twenty years, and after testing all the remedies extant—without relief—in his efforts to obtain a cure he discovered this UNEQUALLED REMEDY, which cured him in the short space of eight weeks.

It has been thoroughly tested and has not failed in a single instance. Several of the most obstinate cases have been thoroughly cured by this remedy, after every other known medicine had failed. Every one who has used it will testify to the truth of the above statement.

Every one afflicted with Catarrh should give it a trial and find out for himself whether it is a humbug.

THE BATTLE-FIELD.

BY WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT.

Once this soft turf, this rivulet's sands,
Were trampled by a hurrying crowd,
And fiery hearts and armèd hands,
Encountered in the battle cloud.

Ah! never shall the land forget
How gushed the life-blood of her brave—
Gushed, warm with hope and courage yet,
Upon the soil they fought to save.

Now all is calm, and fresh, and still,
Alone the chirp of flitting bird,
And talk of children on the hill,
And bell of wandering kine are heard.

No solemn host goes trailing by
The black-mouthed gun and staggering wain;
Men start not at the battle-cry;
Oh, be it never heard again!

Soon rested those who fought; but thou,
Who minglest in the harder strife,
For truths which men receive not now,
Thy warfare only ends with life.

A friendless warfare! lingering long,
Through weary day and weary year;
A wild and many-weaponed throng
Hang on thy front, and flank, and rear.

Yet nerve thy spirit to the proof,
And blench not at thy chosen lot;
The timid good may stand aloof,
The sage may frown—yet faint thou not.

Nor heed the shaft too surely cast,
The foul and hissing bolt of scorn;
For with thy side shall dwell, at last,
The victory of endurance born.

Truth crushed to earth shall rise again;
The eternal years of God are hers;
But Error wounded, writhes in pain,
And dies among his worshippers.

Yea, though thou lie upon the dust,
When they who helped thee flee in fear,
Die full of hope and manly trust,
Like those who fell in battle here.

Another hand the sword shall wield,
Another hand the standard wave,
Till from the trumpet's mouth is pealed,
The blast of triumph o'er thy grave.

KATIE MURDOCK'S WARNING.

BY FLY LEAF.

Katie was the light of her home. A very humble one it was, only a story and a half cottage, and a lean-to at the back; but it needed light all the more for that, you know, and none the less for the fact that Katie's mother was the sole human occupant beside herself. I say human, because Katie's bird must be taken into account, small as he was, for he flitted about in his little wire cage, like a golden flame, as if he was trying to help Katie in lighting up the home. Katie hated awfully to keep him in prison; but his full-voiced song, and pert little ways, made him so dear that she never could let him go. I meant spiritual light of course, for the temporal light flooded in through two square windows, placed circumspectly, one each side of the door, when the sun came up over the eastern hills, across the river, and looked down into Katie's garden to wake up the roses and lilacs, and set the birds singing at the top of their voices in the orchard, back of the house. But it was not summer now; oh, no; but towards the close of a long, cold winter; and the snow lay thick o'er hill and dale, and in great drifts along the fence, and among the shrubbery in the yard, though the winds had swept the icy bridge over the narrow, deep stream quite bare, and the farmers of the country had used this bridge of ice without fear all winterlong. It was getting warmer now, and the warm, generous influences of approaching spring were at work almost unnoticed, but not unfelt, for Katie's house plants in the windows were putting on new life and freshness, and the bird was singing cheerily every moment he could spare from shelling hemp seed. Mrs. Murdock was doing up the last bundle of neighbor Brown's spinning, for these two women were brave and true, and took in whatever work of neatness and skill they could get: and so, with what came off from the homestead, they managed to keep the larder and their raiment in good order. Right skilfully she drew the long threads through her wrinkled, brown hand, from the snowy rolls, for she was a spry shapely old lady (though she seldom got credit for being old) dressed in purple calico, with ample apron, and a great white kerchief about her neck, over whose folds peeped a string of gold beads, and about her cheerful face, was tied a warm colored zephyr wool headdress, that only half hid a profusion of dark hair, plentifully striped with grey. Her eyes were kind and grey, and she moved about her work with energetic bustle, quite characteristic of the little old lady. Katie was busy with some finer work—a rich dark brown garment, half cloak, half sacque, for the spring wear of some of their richer neighbors. One would have noted that her hands were shapely, and they moved about their work firmly and swiftly. She was just then holding a sort of musical conversation with her bird, and her voice was clear and sweet rather than loud; in fact, there was nothing striking about Katie, who was one of those we scarcely notice at first, but whom, on closer acquaintance, we find invaluable as friends, helps, or companions. She had just attained her eighteenth year, and her active, busy life had given her a full, healthy and pure development.

Suddenly their music was interrupted by a knock at the door. The young girl arose, and the brown mantle slid down upon the home-made rug, as she crossed the room, not without some little confusion and smoothing of brown hair, and casting about of clear brown eyes, to see if all would admit of the entrance of the neighbor. Her survey being satisfactorily completed, she opened the door and admitted, but glided back to her chair and work, leaving her mother to entertain the visitor. He was a tall, broad-shouldered young man, dressed in plain, substantial cloths, woolen mittens on his hands, a basket on one arm and a pair of skates on the other. At the widow's solicitation he drew up to the fire and sat down, removing his fur cap and a great rainbow-colored comforter from about his throat, revealing a broad, white, intellectual forehead, sunny blue eyes, and a straight, well-developed nose, that pride of a manly face. His cheeks were tawny with sun and exposure; his hair was dark, but the lower part of his face was hid in a mass of light brown beard; but when he smiled he showed a mouth full of even white teeth, a joy to look upon. The mother had never seen this man before, but Katie had, and she bent low over her work, and the roses bloomed out on her olive cheeks as she remembered how she had met him when returning from an errand to the settlement, loaded with parcels; how he had taken her gracefully up and gently put her down on the safe side of an almost impassable mud-hole that blocked the road; also, how she had hurried off, and in her embarrassment had forgotten to thank him. He introduced himself as Cobert Allen, and stated that the basket contained work, sewing, for Mrs. M. and her daughter, sent by his employers, farmers, who lived just back of the hills, on the east side of the river. At this he opened the basket, and they drew near to receive instructions in regard to the work. Before either were aware they were engaged in an earnest conversation, which lasted until the work was put away, and then as suddenly ceased. The young man had been highly amused at the old lady's quaint Scotch dialect, for she came from old Scotia, and "did na care wha kenned it either." He also marked that Katie's talk was entirely free from it, and mentally decided that she had been schooled in this country. He had been trying to find an excuse to see this girl ever since he met her in the road that day, but had failed so far, until his employers had sent him right here to her with the basket of work. He remembered that he was staying too long, and rising with stammering apologies, was gone before they could ask him to stay to supper, or come again. This set Katie off in a merry peal of laughter, which she as suddenly smothered again, as he put his head in at the door, and told them the work when done was to be brought across the river to him, where he was cutting wood, and he would take it home and bring the money to them. This time they asked him to come again, an invitation he accepted with thanks, and was gone again. Katie stopped laughing this time, to watch him through the window glide away over the glare ice, like a swift bird of strength, his rainbow-colored scarf fluttering behind him in the air. Out of these rainbow colors she began to weave a little happy dream, then fearing her mother's notice, she gathered up her work and began preparations for supper, chatting loquaciously about roast turkey and oysters and cream cake, while it was only boiled ham and bread and butter, winding up with some saucy speech about expecting her mother's beaux. After supper, when the velvet darkness shut down round their peaceful little home, lights and books were brought out, for these friends had the good sense after toiling all day, to feed their minds with spiritual, intellectual food, during the sweet hours of evening. A chapter of history, a gem from the poets, and a few words from sacred pages claimed their attention, not only reading but talking freely on what they read. A sketch from the magazine, which was the puzzle of their lives to tell who sent it to them so constantly. Then there was some music to entone, and dainty canary to cover up, the great snow-white cat, with its black ear, to put under the floor to her nest, the flowers to remove nearer the fireplace. This done they drew up to the fire to enjoy its warmth a moment; and it was then, while her mother sat dozing in her easy chair, and Katie sat looking down into the bed of glowing embers, amidst all this peace and beauty, this warm nestling quiet of home, that the weird unearthly warning spoke out to Katie, and all but smote her into stone, as of a dumb spirit trying to make known some coming danger. A crash as of breaking glass, then a trembling, splintering sound, as if the air was splitting into crystals, dying away with a slivering cadence, that sent the blood to her heart. A dead silence, with a sense of utter loss and lowliness, closed down over her. She sprang to her feet with a sharp cry; her mother sat up straight, with eyes wide open. "Why, bairn, what's a' the clatter?" "Mother, did you hear that noise?" "No, but I did na, and yet I thought I heerd something; what was it like!" "Breaking glass," said Katie. "Likely the cat's thrown doon the fruit dish." Katie took a step across the floor, but stopped suddenly, white as paper. "Mother, the cat is under the floor." "Then it could na ha been her." They took the lamp, but search was vain to develope any cause for the sudden noise. Finally, concluding it to be the freezing of the ground without, or the timbers of the cottage, they sought their rest. Poor souls, they did not realize that it was thawing, within and without, instead of freezing. Katie lay long awake in vague fear, but at last fell into a deep sleep, and all was still.

ITS FULFILMENT.

The two ladies busied themselves the next two days working at the articles brought them by the young man. They could hear the strokes of his axe across the river, among the heavy timber on the other shore. It sounded quite like company, and Katie's mother, turning the tables, tormented her not a little about young Cobert. Katie replied in the same gay humor, that he was a likely looking young man at all events. It was their fashion to run upon one another in this style, and they seldom, though much alone, were very lonely—keeping up a constant skirmish of jokes, or holding long arguments on more worthy subjects.

The morning of the third day the work was completed, and Katie resumed her trimming of the cinnamon-colored cloak. Mrs. M. folded up the work and put it carefully in the basket, tied down the lid, and going up-stairs, returned with a large black and red shawl about her trim figure, and a black silk hood in her hand.

Katie rose quietly, threw down her work and stood in her mother's way. "Now, mother, I know you want to take that work over to see that young man, but you are not going; you will slip down on the ice, and break your neck." In reply to this, her mother stepped back, and making a mock bow, put out her foot, which, by the way, she was quite fond of, showing that she had buckled on a pair of creepers, half soles of iron, full of short spikes, for walking on ice. "Well, you are all right as to slipping; but its too much of a walk." At this her mother tossed her head, and said, "Ye ken weel enough that I can walk six times as fur. Ye are no' ganging near this young man. If ye see him, he maun come to ye, d'ye mind." At this Katie tied her mother's hood on, under her fat double chin, and kissing her on either cheek, stepped aside and let her pass. The old lady picked up the basket and passed briskly out, shutting the door.

Katie resumed her work, but after a few stitches, a sudden impulse came over her, and she sprang up, determined to call her mother back; but she was already outside the gate and half way down the bank, so Katie stood there in the door, with the brown mantle round her head, stitching away at one corner, watching her mother, who stepped boldly on to the ice, and struck out straight for the other shore, where she heard Cobert's ax among the trees. The air was wonderfully clear and still, and she could hear her mother's footsteps on the ice. There were some men down near the river talking, hidden by the swell of the bank. A dog ran out into the road, and putting his head up, howled dismally. Katie kept on stitching, looking down, suddenly the same crashing, shivering, splintering sound filled the air that she had heard the night of the warning, and looking up, she saw in the middle of the stream where her mother had been, a great hole in the ice, with fissures radiating round it, and the black, cold water dancing up and down in the center. The men had heard the sound and were running across the ice, four or five of them, and she saw a figure approaching the hole from the other shore. All this she comprehended as she was flying down the garden, and over the bank; for she did not cry out nor faint, in fact, she did not yet comprehend the fullness of the tragedy, nor awaken to the depth of her sudden grief. It was not until about half way to the broken place, that she understood that her mother had gone down into the swift current, and been swept far under the ice in a second. Then she grew deadly white and sank down on the ice insensible. Some of the quickly-gathered crowd carried her back to the cottage. Well was it for the poor stricken girl that her system had previously been prepared by the awful warning, that, although not fully, yet opened her mind to the sense of some impending blow, or her young life had gone out in the sudden darkness. Of course every effort was made by the generous neighbors for the recovery of Mrs. M. from the treacherous stream, but all in vain. She had gone across the weakest portion of the ice, that had been imperceptibly thawing for days. Her basket came up in an air-hole a quarter of a mile below, but no farther trace of the beloved little lady could be found, although they cleared the stream of ice, and dragged the bottom for a mile.

It was Cobert who directed the search, and he seemed the only one who could have any effect with Katie, for she went about or sat stone still, like one in a trance; with that piteous, silent, immovable expression of countenance that showed the poignancy of grief more effectually than the loudest weeping or lamentation. It was he that first brought the tears to her eyes, murmuring broken words about her mother's tender care, and that she would be without it hereafter in this world. Some of the unwise thought it cruel to talk so to her; but it was right, for the copious tears quenched the power of the dumb grief and gave her strength for life at least. In a day or two, by more thawing and breaking, the ice moved out of the stream, leaving it darkly clear, as if grieving for the sorrow it had caused. The neighbors, one by one, fell off from search and went home, trusting to chance to find the body. Cobert alone continued wandering up and down in his light boat, scanning the dark waters for some signs of the poor lady who had passed so quickly to the world beyond. Toward the afternoon of the third day he became disheartened, and suffered his boat to drift down the stream and whirl into an eddy that bore it slowly up along the shore. Thus, while looking over the side of the boat into the still depths, he saw, standing almost upright upon the bottom,—Mrs. Murdock, her purple dress caught in the sunken root of a tree, her hands spread out before her, her face half upturned, her clothing in order, and all the same, save the absence of the basket, as she had walked forth that sad morning. For an instant he was breathless, then turning the boat, he put down a long pole with a hook on the end, and took hold of her shawl. She came up through the water as if she were ascending into heaven. So placid did she look that he had no terror, but lifted her gently from the water, with her wet garments clinging to her and placed her in the stern of the boat, pressing down her hands across her breast.

Pulling the boat to shore, he went and informed the neighbors, who took Katie away from the cottage on pretence of change of scene, while they brought her mother home and arrayed her in clean purple robes and placed the soft, white kerchief about her throat, and placed a snowy lace headdress over her smooth hair, tied with white silken ribbons. Her toil-worn hands, now in sweet, sweet rest, clasped gently on her bosom a little gilt Bible and a spray of fragrant house-plant from the window. Then they broke the news carefully to Katie, whose face lightened with thankfulness that her mother was recovered from the cold wave. They led her to her dead, trembling like an aspen. She bowed her stricken young head upon the friendly, motherly bosom and wept long and passionately.

THE ROSE THAT BLOOMED ON HER GRAVE.

The Spring and Summer hastened to join the innumerable company of past seasons—the silent years that are gathered home. The orchard had put on its extravagant May bloom, had again shaken off in snow-like showers, and the red and yellow fruit was ripening among the boughs.

All this time Katie had been away from the cottage living with the Browns, who had made a pretence of getting her to work for them, to draw her away from the scenes where familiar objects would call up the face of the departed. At first they decided that she should rest a season, so they denied her work of any kind, but she drooped around silent and melancholy, until Cobert told them that this was wrong, then they gave her employment. She went to work silently with a little more cheer, but her old vivacity seemed gone. She seemed devoid of ambition, that spring of life. He came often to see her, and she made frequent visits to the grave on the sunny slope above the orchard, and Cobert always seemed to know when she went and came, and led her away when she had stayed long enough. Now that the right time had come, he endeavored to console her. Many were the comforting passages of scripture that he brought to her mind, picturing the purity of the home where her mother had gone.

He had made a rustic fence of oaken boughs, with the bark on, trimming them, and weaving and nailing them into pretty patterns in panels about the grave, enclosing a maple tree that grew near in the square. This pleased Katie's chaste judgment much better than a painted, white, ghost-like fence of pine would have done. It had a harmonious natural appearance, as if it had stood for years, and removed the newness and sharpness of her grief thereby. At the head they had placed a plain white slab of marble, with the sweet word "Mother" on one side, and the usual dates and a passage of scripture on the other; on one side of this stone a perpetual rose-tree, and a white lilac for an opposite. The narrow mound was all aglow with fall and summer flowers, pinks, petunias, amaranths; purple, white, and pink astors; with great, passionate pansies. Under the tree was placed a rustic sofa of the same unbarked material as the fence, and when the morning-glories had clambered over the fence in luxuriant confusion, there was no sweeter resting-place for the tired heart than the grave of Katie's mother. About the grave was a graveled walk, the rest of the enclosure was neatly sodded; the work of Cobert's kind, strong hand. One day Katie sat working some needless trifle for Mrs. Brown and sadly thinking; unused to dwelling among strangers her sensitive heart could detect that her summer friends were getting weary of her; they expected her to recover from her grief sooner than her nature would admit of her doing so. These sad thoughts were not lightened by the fact that Mrs. Brown entered and sat down just before her with an anxious expression of countenance.

"Katie," she said, "it is time you livened up a bit. The young people are going to a dance to night, my son is as likely a young man as you know, why not trim up and go with him? I'll coax him to take you."

Katie rose to her feet, the swift scarlet dying her cheeks. The proposition was so contrary to her sense of right. In the first place she could not join the gay festival just yet, and then she did not like at all the somewhat foppish young Brown; besides, her pride revolted at the idea of his being coaxed to take her. She stammered out some excuse, thanking the lady for her great kindness, and passed from the room.

Throwing the old familiar black and red shawl about her, she glided down the road to the cottage gate; passing up the garden among the dear objects of her former care, she went round the corner of the house up through the orchard, whose boughs seemed to thrill with delight at her coming. Cobert was in the orchard, for he had volunteered to gather and sell the fruit for her, she did not see him but hurried on to the little enclosure, entering the pretty gate. She knelt softly down on the white grave and laid her forehead against the cold stone, just over the dear word "Mother." There Cobert found her, when, after a little, he dared to come, and lifting her up gently, he led her to the seat beneath the maple, and begged to know her grief. She told him all, winding up with the declaration that she must seek a new home. Then he grew bold and slipped his strong arm about her and told her the old, old story ever new, begging the privilege of standing between her and the world's bitter storms, asking to be her nearest friend, to stand in the place of mother, father and all earthly friends. For answer she leaned her head, crowned with its sunny brown braids, against his shoulder, and, like Isaac, was comforted for the loss of a mother.

There was a wedding on Christmas in the village, and a little feast at the cottage. Katie wore a warm colored delaine trimmed with black velvet that set off her plump little figure to advantage, her shining hair was all a mass of curls. Bert in his plain black suit was just the most noble-looking, manly fellow out, and the happiest. The wedding-cake, white, like the hills without; the guests were a few tried friends, many of them too poor to give a feast in return.

Katie's bird all but sung himself to death over a little brown mate given him in a larger cage, the windows were full of fresh plants, and, that the cup might be full, in came the white cat, looking very glad to get home. Katie Allen was again the light of her cottage home, but Bert Allen was Katie's chief luminary.

'Tis but the ruin of the bad,
The wasting of the wrong and ill,
Whatever of good the old time had,
Is living still.

HAS GOD A FAVORITE PEOPLE?

BY W. H. SHEARMAN.

Buckle, in his history of civilization, declares that the Church has ever been an enemy to progress. The "Church" is, doubtless, used by him as a general term to include all religious denominations, and if so, in one sense the allegation is true. The real church of Christ, or church of Zion, whether in heaven or upon earth, has ever been the repository, the friend and exponent of liberty, intelligence and progress. But, as a general thing churches, and most of their members, have been exceedingly narrow and bigoted in their views. Like the ancient Jews, they have been accustomed to regard themselves as the only people of God, and to limit the prospects of salvation to believers in their own doctrines.

It seems the most difficult thing in the world for religious people to allow their minds to expand on religious matters. While progress is written upon every other department of life around them, and men are flinging away the worn and tattered garments of philosophic and scientific error,—religionists wrap themselves in their antiquated creeds, as in a coat of mail, rendering them invunerable to the increasing light and knowledge which the heavenly world is ever ready to shed forth. One reason for this is that, in every age, the powers of heaven have revealed such principles of Divine truth as were adapted to, though considerably in advance of, the condition of the world. Those who received these principles, so much superior to the ideas of those around them, almost invariably imagined that they had the whole of Divine truth, and so shut out from their souls the increasing light which the heavens yearned to bestow. Believing that they possessed all the truths necessary for the redemption and happiness of mankind, and that it was absolutely essential all should obey those truths, whether understandingly or not also that all who opposed them were the enemies of mankind,—it was quite natural they should seek to resist any innovations upon their faith, and endeavor to compel others to acquiesce in their views, and bitterly oppose all who offered any objection to them. In these respects this age forms no exception to the past. However much the "Mormon" system may be superior to, and in advance of, other religions in point of liberality, breadth and intelligence, its devotees have been, in some respects, practically, at least, more exclusive and illiberal in their views and lives than millions who really did not know as much. The philosophic mind can find a very plain solution to this apparent paradox. But the generality of mankind are too busy to probe beneath the surface of things,—they have, therefore, concluded that the exclusiveness of the "Mormons" is the result of an intense and unholy selfishness. The fact is, that feeling themselves intensely right, they regard others as intensely wrong, and have found it impossible to bridge over the gulf between them. They have also felt, as a natural sequence, that the salvation of the world depended upon the enforcement of their views. This "stand by, I am holier than thou" feeling, in all cases, tends to individual and collective demoralization of character, whether in God's church or out of it

It is wrong, however, to charge our religion with the absurdities and inconsistencies which have characterized many of its professed believers. Because the very foundation of the religious system introduced through Joseph Smith, was, the opening up of fresh and continuous communication with the heavenly world, whereby mankind could receive all the knowledge necessary to convert this planet into a heaven of peace and love. But here, again, as usual humanity steps in and, just as the heavens have commenced to reveal the glorious principles of celestial truth, attempts to close them by saying, "We have enough revelation to do us the next thousand years."

The position assumed by us as a church, has been this:—"We are the chosen and specially favored people of God; our church is the only infallible repository of Divine truth upon the earth; our President is the only man on the earth to whom God has any right—according to the order He has established—to give revelation for the guidance of the church and the salvation of mankind; he (the President) says we do not need any fresh revelations—other than that of an impressional kind—therefore, direct communication with the heavenly world has ceased, for God will speak to no other man." This is putting a barrier in the way of progress with a vengeance. This virtually amounts to one man claiming the power to lock or unlock the heavens at his pleasure. Millions may be thirsting for a draught from the unsullied fountain of truth; but, though perishing for want of it, they must wait till he is prepared to hand it to them. How different this, from the invitation of Heaven,—"Whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely!"

There is abundance of evidence that God has, in different ages, chosen individuals or nations to do a certain work, because of their special fitness therefor. But it does not necessarily follow that they are the peculiar favorites of heaven, or that all others are regarded with indifference. A man may select one member of his family to perform a certain duty for which he or she is particularly adapted; but none, except the most foolish and egotistical, would assume this to be a mark of exclusive favor. Neither, if he thinks proper, is there anything to prevent him from selecting a different person to perform the same duty at another time. In this sense the "Mormons" may be truly said to be the people of God. They have been gathered out of the nations for a special purpose,—viz., that they might become an inspirational nation, a people believing in and enjoying constant communication with the heavenly world. The Jewish nation was once chosen for that purpose, but not being faithful to the trust committed to them, it was taken away. The primal causes of their overthrow being the narrow conceit that they were the only people in whose welfare Jehovah felt interested, and that God would not impart additional revelation except through those at that time presiding over the priesthood. The same feelings are rife among us to-day, and need as much to be counteracted.

The prevailing idea, among many of the bearers of the "Priesthood" in our church, appears to be, that God has chosen them to become, by-and-bye, absolute kings who are to rule the nations of the earth with a rod of iron. True, they are a little more charitable than most other men, for they do believe that nearly all the human family will be saved in some condition. But then they, with their families, are the only ones who are to enjoy the thrones, riches and dominion of eternity, while the rest of mankind are destined to an eternal condition of servitude to their exalted masters and mistresses, to whom, as the kings and queens of eternity, they are to be the hopeless hewers of wood and drawers of water. From the expressions of some extreme men in our midst, one would conclude that they expect, by-and-bye, to see the whole world turned into one vast chain-gang, while a few—upon whom has been conferred the Kingly and Priestly power—will stand by with a club in one hand, and a heavenly commission in the other, to see that the unfortunate wretches perform their allotted tasks. Thank God this is very far from the feeling of many, but it is unfortunately true to the conceptions of some.

The truth is, that, in the highest and broadest sense, the whole human family, with all their weaknesses and follies, are "the people of God," and that He never has and never will delegate any power to, or bestow any peculiar privileges upon one portion, excepting with a view to the ultimate general good. He selects a few out of the mass, from time to time, on account of their virtue and enlarged capacity, to become the recipients of Divine truth and the teachers of mankind—on the same principle that the superintendent of a school chooses assistants from the more advanced of his scholars. It is but natural and right that those who thus labor for the welfare of their race, should receive tokens of the Divine approbation, and rewards proportionate to their diligence and devotion; but they find their greatest compensation in the pleasure of doing good, and are as far from desiring, as God is from bestowing, any power except that which will enable them to bless, enlighten and elevate their fellow-mortals. This is the only class who can rightfully lay any claim to be regarded in a special sense as the "People of of God."

JOSEPH SMITH ON LIBERALITY OF CREED.

(WRITTEN IN LIBERTY JAIL, MISSOURI, 1838)

"We ought to be aware of those prejudices (which are so congenial to human nature) against our neighbors, friends, and brethren of the world, who choose to differ with us in opinion, and in matters of faith. Our religion is between us and our God, their religion is between them and their God.

There certainly is a tie to those of the same faith which is peculiar to itself, but it is without prejudice, gives full scope to the mind, and enables us to conduct ourselves with liberality towards those who are not of our faith. This principle, in our opinion, approximates the nearest to the mind of God, and is Godlike.

MUSICAL DEPARTMENT.

Owing to the change in the character of the MAGAZINE, from a literary journal to a social and theological organ of public opinion, we desire to gain all possible space for the articles and communications which we design to publish. Owing to these and other reasons growing out of present circumstances, our Musical Department will be suspended for the present. In doing so we return thanks to Professor Tullidge for his able conduct of this department, and trust to avail ourselves of the benefit of his important services again as soon as circumstances will permit the publication of a purely literary Magazine, in addition to a journal of the present order. THEATER USAGES IN EUROPE.

In France playgoing is a recreation; in Germany it is a habit; in Italy, among the upper classes, it seems to be a social necessity. The theaters are at once the clubs and the drawing-rooms of Italy. In all the chief societies of the peninsula, but more especialy at Naples and Milan, people pay their visits, transact their business, and make their appointments at the theater. Italians, as a rule, do not receive much at their homes. It is only at Florence and Genoa that the English customs of dinner-giving and party-giving prevail to any extent. Speaking generally, the life which an Italian leads within doors is untidy and uncomfortable. He has no notion of entertaining visitors, looks upon his house as a shelter against wind and rain, dresses in it, sleeps it, but goes for his entertainment elsewhere.

MANIFESTO FROM W. S. GODBE AND E. L. T. HARRISON.

Inasmuch as a great variety of rumors have been started with reference to our views concerning the past and future of "Mormonism," we feel that our interests, as well as our duty to the public, require us to make a plain statement of the circumstances which have led to our present relations to the Church, and the reasons that have guided our course in relation to the articles we have published in the UTAH MAGAZINE.

For some years past we have felt that a great encroachment of power was being made by the ruling Priesthood of our Church, beyond that allowed by the spirit and genius of the Gospel. We also have perceived that a steady and constant decline was taking place in the manifestation of the spiritual gifts, as well as in the spirituality of our system as a whole, and that as a Church we were fast running into a state of the most complete materialism. We felt that the working out of our system was small and insignificant compared with the grandeur of the programme as announced by Joseph Smith. The broad and liberal system which, in the earnestness of our souls, we had embraced so many years ago, with its grand and universalian invitation to men of every creed and nation to come to Zion for a home in our midst, was being practically ignored, and in the stead thereof was being built up a wall of bitterness and hate between ourselves and the rest of the world. The constant growth of such principles as these, and the certainty that under such conditions Mormonism never could fulfil that great destiny of salvation to the world, for which we had prayed and labored, gave us great pain. But, feeling assured of the divinity of our system in its origin, and fearful lest we should ignorantly oppose the will of God as manifested through his servants, we tried, from time to time, to close our eyes to the facts before us, and sought earnestly by every kind of argument to convince ourselves that we were wrong. We continued thus vainly striving to reconcile ourselves to the inconsistencies around us, until the facts forced themselves so overwhelmingly upon our minds, that we were driven from every stronghold and reluctantly compelled to admit the truth of these convictions.

During all these times we sought earnestly for light from above, our first and last prayer being that we might never be allowed to oppose the truth, and earnestly, and continually examined ourselves to see whether pride, selfishness, self-will, or any impurity of thought or deed, prevented our seeing the wisdom of President Young's measures, or receiving a testimony of their divinity. At last the light came, and by the voice of angelic beings accompanied by most holy influences—and other evidences that witnessed to all our faculties that their communications were authorized of God—we were, each of us, given personally to know that, notwithstaning some misconceptions and extremes wisely permitted to accomodate it to the weaknesses of mankind, "Mormonism" was inaugurated by the Heavens for a great and divine purpose; its main object being the gathering of an inspirational people, believing in continuous revelations, who, with such channels opened up, could at any period be moulded to any purpose the Heavens might desire; and out of whom, with these opportunities for divine communication, could be developed the grandest, and the noblest civilization the world had ever seen. We also learned that the evils we had seen in the Church truly did exist; but that they would pass away before the light of a clearer and greater day of revelation and inspiration which was about to dawn upon our system.

At the same time we learned that President Young was truly called by the direct providences of God to preside over our people; that he was inspired to lead them to these mountains; and, that, so far as his personal bias and character permitted, he had been, from time to time, influenced for the good of this people; but that his course in building up a despotic priestly rule in the Church was contrary to the will of the Heavens. We further learned that it was contrary to the laws of divine communication, and impossible for Heavenly beings to influence him or any other man against his will, or to enlighten such of the Priesthood associated with him, so long as they entirely surrendered their judgment and will into his keeping. On which account other channels for communication would be obtained and opened up to the people.

With this understanding came instructions that it was our duty to remain in the Church so long as the policy of the Presiding Priesthood would allow us the privilege, and at the same time our duty to throw out through the MAGAZINE such advanced truths as would elevate the people and prepare them for the changes at hand. Two motives prompted us to this. One was that as men, independent of the question of divinity, it was our duty to strive for the liberties and advancement of our fellows, and the other, that the will of the Heavens demanded it. We well knew that we should have to fight through a thousand obstacles; that calumny and falsehood would be unsparingly used against us, and that the ruling Priesthood would bring the whole of its gigantic organization to bear, both in public and in private, to crush the MAGAZINE and its sentiments out of existence; and more than all, we knew that but few of the people for whom we were laboring, would—for some time at least—appreciate our motives. There was, however, but one course for men of truth, and that was to face the whole. And thus far we have struggled through, regardless of consequences, and expect to do so until we see truth and liberty triumphant.

We were also instructed to respect the legitimate exercise of President Young's authority, and that there might be no righteous cause against us, to sustain it until he should tread upon the last vestige of liberty, and attempt to abolish all rights of thought and speech within the Church.

This he has now done. For daring mildly, and respectfully, to reason upon the inconsistencies of some of his propositions he has deprived us of our fellowship and standing in the Church, and thus with his own hand has dissolved our allegiance to him. He has declared that his will is supreme and omnipotent in the Church, and that it shall be unquestioningly obeyed; and that to oppose any of his measures shall be deemed apostacy, and punished by excommunication.

The proper time having now arrived, we are at liberty to bear our message to the members of our church and the world at large. We, therefore, announce to them that a great and Divine Movement is at hand, when the Church will find a second birth, and commence a new era in her career. She will return to her true order—the guidance of Prophets, Seers, and Revelators, the administration of Angels, and the manifestations of the Holy Spirit. Having learned the evils of the one-man power, she will never again surrender her liberties into human keeping. She will disentangle her hands from alliance with Commerce and the Civil power, and move onward to her true destiny—to be the Great Spiritual and Intellectual power of the earth.

The Movement will be accompanied by manifestations of divine power. The Holy Spirit in the hearts of the Saints throughout the Church will bear witness to its truth. "Israel" in all their abidings, will hear and recognize the voice of the "True Shepherd."

Up to this moment we have started no organization, having hitherto had no authority to do so. As to the question whom God will raise up to lead this people, we will say, in the first place, that the Movement will never develop any one man in whom will be centered all the intelligence and wisdom of the people. In this sense there is no "Coming Man," there are, however, MANY Coming Men. Light, Truth, Wisdom, and Revelation will, and should be, reflected by the whole body of the Church, as well as by its head. While there must, of necessity be an Executive, or presiding head, man-worship of every degree must pass away, and men learn to look with greater reverence to principles than to those who present them. As to whom this head will be, it is not our business to say, further than that God will produce the proper man in due time. It is sufficient for us to know that it will be neither of us. Of this great Movement—far greater than ourselves—we are but the fore-runners. We are but as "the voice of one crying in the wilderness, 'prepare ye the way of the Lord, make straight in the desert a highway for our God.'" Ours is a preparatory mission, and it is our work to arouse the people, and by reasoning, teaching and enlightenment, prepare them for a new order of things. We have no personal cause to establish. We do not pretend to be Seers, nor to possess any wonderful or marvelous gifts. We make no claims to any distinction further than that, in the providence of God, it has been our privilege to be made acquainted with some great truths which it is our duty to make known.

It may be asked by what right we presume to interfere in matters appertaining to the Presiding Priesthood of the Church. We reply: by the simple right that every man has to utter a truth,—the same right that the boy Samuel had to deliver his simple message to the Lord's servant, the Great Presiding High Priest of Israel. And, finally, by the right which the Heavens reserve to themselves, to speak whenever and by whomsoever they please.

As to how many of the present authorities, or leading men, will, or will not work into the new order of things, it is not our business here to inquire. This will depend entirely on the extent to which they suspend a hasty judgment, seek divine guidance, and lay themselves open to the reception of light. To the extent to which they, or any other persons, will lay aside prejudice, and place themselves at the feet of the Truth, determined to accept any principle, however strange or new, which their judgments shall endorse and which God shall bear witness to, God in their whole beings, intellectually and spiritually, shall bear witness that light has come and that a divine influence accompanies the Movement. The words, the voice, and the spirit of Jesus shall be felt in it, speaking to the hearts of the yearning souls of the children of Zion.

And here let us say the object of this Movement will be to preserve, and not to destroy our system. In consequence of the undue exercise of priestly authority, the elements of resistance and division are now silently working in the overwrought but suppressed feelings of our people. It requires but little more exertion of such arbitrary power to rend asunder the ties which bind us, and scatter us to the four winds. Nothing can save us but the raising of a platform combining liberty of thought and action with all the ancient beauties of our faith—one upon which we can unite. In this way alone can we preserve our existence as a people,—and for this the Heavens have provided.

We will now give a general outline of what we understand will be the governing principles and policy which will characterize the Movement when established.

The Church thenceforth will be known as the CHURCH OF ZION.

The ordinances and principles of the Gospel will remain intact as at present.

The Spiritual gifts will be encouraged in all their forms of manifestation.

The great truth will be emphatically proclaimed, that no priesthood or standing in the church, or ordinances of any kind, in and of themselves, elevate the possessor, or obtain for him any distinction in the sight of God. All outward forms, important as they are in their place, will be considered only as means for our advancement in purity, goodness and intelligence. Apart from which object it will be understood that they have no power or value. The whole purpose of the gospel being the elevation of man's nature, all its organizations or requirements will be held, therefore, to be but means to that end.

Inasmuch as men cannot labor with all the energies of their souls, or work with dignity and influence, unless their hearts are fully engaged in their operations, the movement will oppose the principle of sending men on missions where they are destitute of the spirit of such mission or calling.

On the subject of funds it will be understood that the Church was not instituted as a machine for raising money, and that all wealth which the Church cannot obtain without oppressing its people it will be better without. It will be taught that God has no special object in requiring Tithing, only so far as it tends to the promulgation of truth, the relief of the poor, or the promotion of public improvements. The doctrine will be that Tithing was instituted for man and not man for the Tithing. The Movement will also maintain that the Church's funds are the people's property, and should be regularly accounted for to them; and, further, that the control thereof should belong to the Presiding Bishop, acting under a board of Trustees, elected by the people, and not to the Presidency of the Church, whose minds should be left free to attend to higher duties. Tithing will consist of a tenth of one's increase, or, a tenth of all clear profits, obtained over and above the amount possessed the previous year. Or, in other words, Tithing should be a tenth of the interest (or GAIN) obtained by labor or means, or both, annually, and not a tenth of one's entire labor, or, the results of labor, as at present understood and enforced. Thus throwing the weight of Tithing mainly on the rich, and lightening the burdens of the poor.

The prominence and influence once enjoyed by the Twelve and other quorums will be revived, and the policy will be to repress the principle by which any one quorum has hitherto been made to possess the sole voice in matters, and the entire conduct of the Church.

All quorums of the Church will be understood simply as organizations for the transaction of its business and the promulgation of its principles, and not as vehicles for promoting any set of men above their fellows. The First Presidency of the Church will be recognized as its Executive, who should be chief representatives of the spirit and inspirations of all its quorums—reflecting not only their own light but the garnered wisdom of the whole people. The first and last lesson to be learned by every quorum will be that neither head nor foot can say to the other,—"I have no need of thee."

The Priesthood will present itself before the world simply as an institution for teaching and propagating truth. It will throw aside all pretensions to dictatorial power, and leave men's professions, their employment, and the entire control of their talents and means to themselves. It will seek to promote the individuality of every man to the utmost. Instead of trying to force the conceptions of one man's brain, or those of twenty, into the million, it will recognize the God, the light and truth that is in the souls of all men, and seek only to develop it and guide it to its true end.

The Church will enlarge her creed so that she can become the nursing mother of millions instead of the controller of a few. So long as men obey the initiatory ordinances of the Gospel and live pure lives, the Church will find a place for them within her borders, whether they can accept one additional principle of truth or a thousand. Like Nature, which rejects nothing from her domain, but, from the rudest to the grandest organism, controls all with the same hand, so will the Church embrace all intelligences within her operations, accepting them where they are, and leading them up to God.

The unity which the Church will aim for, will be the unity of oneness in all great principles of truth. It will seek to harmonize the sentiments of mankind, leaving all free to follow the bent of their organization, and to work out their own inviduality, instead of aiming to direct their action in the petty details of life. This is the unity and harmony manifested in the Universe, in which all elements are united in obeying great general laws, while each manifests its peculiar qualities in its own way. This, therefore, is God's unity, and life and intelligence can be controlled on no other principle. All other unity is the soulless unity of the drill sergeant, and as destructive of human intelligence as it is beneath the aims of a God.

All religions will be recognized as having been wisely developed in the providences of God to meet the varied conditions of the different races and classes of mankind.

It will be understood that any creed which is above the understanding of a man cannot be divine to him, while a lower creed, which comes within his conceptions of what is divine, will touch his heart and develop more good in his nature. All creeds, therefore, will be respected in Zion as fulfilling a great and a useful mission in God's hand.

In the wide creed of this Divine Movement, Zion's motto will be: "Charity for all." She will view the wicked or corrupt as men morally diseased, that simply need to be cured. She will ascribe all wickedness to ignorance, false education, unfortunate surroundings, and more than all to inherent tendencies to good or evil derived from parentage at birth. While she will teach that all are responsible for making the best use of such intelligence and perceptions of good as they do possess, she will contend that tendencies to good or evil are not equally strong in all men—that with some it is far easier to do right than it is for others, and that the wicked should be viewed as the unfortunate, who require more love and care than "those that are whole and need not a physician."

The policy of the Movement will be to make Zion, that place, of all others on the face of the earth, where mere difference of creed has the least power to separate man from his fellow-man. Zion's policy will be to abolish all distinctions which build up hatred and division in the hearts of men, and to draw all men so near to her that she can reach their affections and do them good. The term "Gentile" will, therefore, pass away. Entrenched in the strength of the broadest, most liberal, and most philosophical principles the world has ever known, and backed by the invisible influences of a higher world, she will fear no rivalry, and need no petty external arrangements to shield her from the influence of inferior faiths, or from intermixture with the bad. All wholesale measures for separation and non-association between classes and creeds are artificial, and require, as we well know, the watchman and the inquisitor to keep them going—and then they fail. There is no true safeguard from corruption but that of higher education and intelligence. The good and the pure, the intellectually and spiritually developed, need no division between themselves and the ignorant and depraved. Their own natures and higher conditions are a sufficient division and protection.

All trading or social relations with people, in or out of the Church, will decide themselves upon grounds of acquaintance, experience and individual judgment. All wholesale prohibitions of classes or creeds, commercially or religiously, are opposed to the spirit of the age and must cease.

On the great question of Civil rule, the Movement will recognize the National Government as supreme in its sphere. It will, therefore, practically sustain its laws and seek, by constitutional means, to change those which it considers opposed to religious or civil liberty.

Another point in the movement will be to place the practice of plural marriage on the highest grounds. It will only maintain or encourage it so far as it is practised within the highest conditions of purity, delicacy and refinement. It will assert that pure affection on all sides can alone sanctify this or any other kind of marriage. It will, therefore, oppose all marriage from a cold sense of religious duty, as it will all marrying for the mere accumulation of families.

It will teach the high principles—the strict laws and conditions which alone can render this order of life successful, and then leave it—like the question of being called to preach the gospel—to every man's light and intuitions to determine when, or whether, it will be right in his case or not.

Above all things, the Movement will strongly assert the necessity of the highest appreciation of woman, and of her highest development and culture, as the only basis of a high civilization.

The foregoing, constitutes in brief, a general outline of the policy and character of the coming institutions, which are about to be inaugurated. To our judgment, the principles referred to speak for themselves. If any do not appear to do so, we ask all to suspend a hasty judgment until we shall further explain or amplify through the columns of our paper. We will here say, however, that the principles enumerated are but the very simplest elements of a grand chain of truths which will widen illimitably as the movement progresses.

Before closing, we will refer to another matter. Having written somewhat on the subject of the Spiritualities of our religion, some, who do not appear to recognize the very views which they held when they first entered the Church—so strangely are we altered as a people—have charged us with believing in Spiritualism. Our platform in relation to that system will be found in an article entitled "Spiritualism and Priesthood," published in the last number of this Magazine. To make the case still plainer we will state wherein we particularly differ with that system.

Let none be startled, for, in the first place, we do not believe that spiritual manifestations are the work of the devil. We view all rappings, tippings, planchettes, etc., as the lowest possible form of communication with the invisible world, all of which order of communications possess no more force, authority, wickedness or goodness, than the same communications would have from the same individuals were they present in the flesh. The simple fact about them being that they are not specially authorized by the authorities of the spiritual world, but not necessarily wicked on that account. They are, however, a far lower phase of manifestations and truths than those inspirations which come through the channel of the Controlling Powers, or the Holy Priesthood. The beings who give them belong mainly to the lower realms of spiritual life, and who have never entered into the higher truths of celestial existence, hence they know little or nothing of that wonderful system of Divine organization for the preservation and promulgation of light and truth through the realms of space. With all its ignorance of many great truths, Spiritualism possesses some good points, not the least of which is that it is that system by which, in the hands of Divine Providence, from five to ten millions of people have been made to believe in the realities of another life, and thus, so far, have been prepared for higher truths.

On the other hand, as the MAGAZINE has abundantly manifested, there is a great difference between our doctrines and those of Spiritualism, as any child in "Mormonism" ought to know.

For instance: we believe in a Priesthood or an organized system of Divine authority extending into the Spiritual world without exception Spiritualists reject this doctrine.

We believe in the necessity of the gathering of an inspirational people, and the building up of a Zion as a center of light and truth to the whole earth—they do not.

We believe in the divine mission of Joseph Smith; they do not.

We believe in Plural Marriage; they are utterly opposed to it.

These points—and they are far from all—form broad lines of division between our principles and those of Spiritualism. We leave them to the judgment of the reader. At the same time if Spiritualism, or any other form of belief, now or hereafter, presents a truth, we shall, at all times, admit it. We are ashamed of no truth and will battle for the bright points of all creeds as much as for our own.

We now submit our case to the public. To the intelligent mind, God is seen in all that is natural, simple, and heavenly in its character. What amount of light and truth we possess, this announcement, and our past and future articles in the MAGAZINE will best show—and each must decide for himself. We exhort all to be calm and judge dispassionately, and look for light to its great fountain, and a testimony will spring up in their minds that God is moving for the blessing and redemption of His people.

We shall seek to take that course which will give no cause for reproach. But all may make up their minds to this fact, that no course we can take will be allowed to be right by such as are interested in silencing our voices. If we speak boldly and bluntly, we shall be charged with being defiant and malicious. If we speak mildly and kindly, we shall be said to be hypocritical. If we reason, we shall be guilty of sophistry—we shall be wrong anyway. A tree, however, is known by its fruits, and an impure fountain will not send forth pure water, and, trusting in God, we shall fearlessly await the trial.

And now let us say, a Revolution is at our doors; not one of bloodshed or strife; but a peaceful revolution of ideas. An intellectual battle has to be fought, and Truth will prevail, but Moderation and Kindness must be the battle cry. The object of the Movement will be that a more Heavenly Zion may be established, the spirit of Jesus must, therefore, govern all, or our great object will be defeated. Insults, taunts, ridicule and false accusations, will, of course, prevail, but they must not be on our side. Let us dispel darkness with light, harshness with kindness, and move calmly on. And, as sure as to-morrow's sun will rise, the light will break, the truth will go forth in its majesty, and thousands of voices will soon echo our testimony.

JOSEPH SMITH AND HIS WORK.

BY EDWARD W. TULLIDGE.

It may, perhaps, at this particular time not be amiss to review our Founder and the character of his work.

I believe it is not altogether out of the minds of the people of Utah that in Joseph Smith was the beginning of the Mormon dispensation. The man was a PROPHET in his mission and in the very constitution of his mind. He represented genius and not character with its iron will and conservative policy. His nature was all of inspirations and spiritual power. As a tremendous battery charged with this spiritual force he stood to a world and to an age. This was according to his nature, independent of his mission. He was born a Seer, and he took his gifts from his mother. Indeed, this is always true of prophetic natures, and there is deep philosophy in the Catholic's worshipping Mary as the mother of Jesus, rather than giving the divinity to his mortal father. Intuitive souls and fond, clinging, unselfish natures are derived from the mothers. Joseph, then, was not a Smith, but a Mack. His brother Hyrum, however, turned after his father, from whom he took the grave precision of his character. He was as much a patriarch and counsellor by nature as Joseph was a Prophet, and hence the strong affection between them by their very dissimilarity. The one was impetuous, intuitive, liable to err, being charged with strong passions as well as endowed with extraordinary gifts, while Hyrum was a manly man, in whose character and life there was found scarcely a blemish.

Lucy Mack, the mother of Joseph Smith, was by nature a Seeress. I touch upon this fact not only to illustrate a great psychological relation in the case of the Mormon Prophet, but also to prove the genuineness of his mission, and of the administrations of his angels. Mormonism originated not in imposture nor in any deep-laid scheme concocted at any part of his life, for it was nascent in his very race, and was born with him. It could not have originated with Brigham Young, and been genuine, for the latter is not a Seer by nature. He never did see angels excepting in dreams, and never did hear the voice of God in a wakeful state. Hence, his own statement that he is neither a Prophet nor the son of a Prophet; but he is a society-builder, a founder of cities, an organizer—one of the most fitting men to preside over a people.

Prophets come from a prophetic line, just as poets and musicians spring from parents more or less like themselves. A grand culmination of gifts from a family of their order, constitutes a great poet, a great musician, or a great Prophet. Thus we are told by Joseph Smith, himself, that he was of the seed of Abraham, through Joseph who was sold into Egypt for being a dreamer and a Prophet like himself. Be that as it may, we find the Seer gifts in his family at a later date, and in a remarkable degree in his mother. If you possessed her portrait you would discover the Seeress in her physiognomy as you can also in John Wesley's mother. Here then, we have in Joseph Smith, God's fitness of nature and race for some new dispensation of a spiritual not a temporal religion.

There is connected with this fact of Joseph Smith being a Prophet by nature, a remarkable testimony from the spiritualists of America. This is only worth so much, just as was the witness from the spirits of old to the Christian Apostles: "Jesus we know, and Paul we know, but who are ye?" Now the spiritualists everywhere readily grant that Joseph was one of the greatest spiritual mediums that ever lived. They say that he was not much inferior in his prophetic and Seer gifts to Jesus himself, of course not referring to his Divinity. We come now to his mission, and herein we shall discover how much or how little the Mormons of to-day are like him.

Fifty years ago the world was in profound darkness, touching God, angels and immortality. The Heavens had been closed for well nigh two thousand years, excepting to Mohammed, whom the Christian world did not receive. It is true Swedenborg had lived, but he opened no great spiritual dispensation and was treated merely as a psychological mystery. And yet the world said, what our President recently affirmed, that we had enough revelations on hand to last for another thousand years. If any Prophets had arisen they had not made a very decided mark in a prophetic mission. At length fifty years ago came Joseph Smith, in the very age of infidelity, when men began to settle down into a stolid certainty that all religions were but great human problems, and God and immortality myths. And now mark two phases of his mission and work. First, he was not sent to found a mere sect of religionists, and he came not to build up a mere temporal power upon the earth. He was sent to reveal the Heavens, and to bring immortality to light. This was according to the very wants of the age: a new dispensation was really necessary even to preserve Christianity from being swallowed up by modern infidelity, the same as the Restoration is now needed to preserve the Mormons from losing the very genius of their religion. The other phase of his mission was that he was sent to reveal God and Jesus Christ. In this phase we find a striking difference from that found in modern spiritualism which reveals not God and his Christ. The burden of his spirit was that of our first hymn, "Jehovah speaks, let earth give ear." There was, then, a grand theme in his prophetic annunciation. His was like the burden of the Hebrew Prophets, and not the trivial and discordant messages of modern mediums. There was in his mission a broad and universal design worthy of the Heavens, for it was not only to take in all mankind, but to link all ages and dispensations by a culminating act of God and angels. It was a world's spiritual epic, linking mortals and immortals into one great family of Christ. A Church was to be built upon the earth with the most universal name. It was the Church of Zion, for Zion had been from all ages. There was to be no sectional name; Zion was to be built up on the earth, and Zion from above to come down to dwell among men. Indeed, it was this coming down from the heavens of Zion, that gave all the value. If the God and the angels came not, then all was a farce of the most solemn character. Thus in Joseph's mission the "dispensation of the fulness of times" was declared to be opened, in the consummation of which all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are on earth, were to be brought together in one. Let us pause here to ask, "was this in the general statement true, or a lie? Our almost entire temporal condition in Utah to-day, and our almost total spiritual darkness, make this inquiry very pertinent. For my part I believe it was true, having never doubted Joseph's mission, though for years I have doubted nearly everything else in Mormonism. I think the case justifies my unbelief that spiritual Zion has come down to dwell in Utah. But let us pass on from this application of a divine programme to the unfolding of Joseph's spiritual work on the earth.

The Mormon Prophet not only believed in the spiritual work of Zion, himself, and that Jehovah had spoken to him, but tens of thousands were in a few years converted to the same faith. Go forth and preach, was the command to the Elders, and the Holy Ghost shall bear witness in dreams, visions, prophecy and the ministering of angels. How often did we Elders in the boldness of certainty challenge the world upon the scientific method of our truths. Believe not because I tell you, but from the demonstrations of the Holy Ghost to yourselves, obey and you shall know from the witnesses from on high. Now I would make bold to-day, to challenge our apostles to come back to their own platform. If they can prevail upon God and angels to witness to the people of Utah now, not by a testimony of twenty years ago, that their temporal and commercial schemes are of heaven, I will repent of my unbelief of eight years, and bear testimony that their schemes are of God even as I think they are of man. All Israel once had the witness to their Divine message. Let the Heavens witness now. How simple, then, is the matter, how easy the unity of the faith if the Heavens are with you still, even as I have believed for years that they have left you all, and myself among the rest. Truly we have been given over to the buffetings of Satan, perhaps to bring us back to a yearning for the revival of the prophetic mission of Joseph. Temporal organisms and centralization grew not out of him. He was neither a commercial prophet nor a great financial administrator. It was almost as true of him as of Jesus, that "the foxes have holes and the birds of the air have nests, but the son of man hath not where to lay his head." Though he conceived grand social schemes, the conception was not in the form of a small temporal community to be built up in the Rocky Mountains there to be confined in isolation. Here it is, in the spirit of his own wording: "I will gather together all the nations of the earth to build up the Zion of God." Hence, not only all the wonderful missions of his apostles and elders throughout the world, but also the marvellous emigrations of the Mormons during a period of forty years.

PROSPECTUS.

THE MORMON TRIBUNE,

THE ORGAN OF LIBERTY AND PROGRESS,

TO BE PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY,

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH TERRITORY.

E. L. T. HARRISON, EDITOR.

The publishers of the UTAH MAGAZINE, believing that a NEWSPAPER would be a more appropriate medium than a MAGAZINE for the expression of their views, and better adapted for general circulation, purpose, in a few weeks to suspend the publication of the UTAH MAGAZINE and publish a large weekly newspaper, under the above title.

THE MORMON TRIBUNE will sustain the platform already laid down by the MAGAZINE, advocating freedom of speech and mental liberty within the Church, and will seek by kindly discussion to bring this question home to the minds of all.

The TRIBUNE will avoid personalities of all kinds, and no intemperate article will be allowed to appear in its columns; at the same time it will make a manly protest against wrong or abuse of power of every kind. In a word, the TRIBUNE will contend for a FREE "MORMONISM," not the freedom of license to do wrong, but such Gospel freedom as was offered to us when we came into the Church, and such as the Holy Spirit, then and now, certifies to us as our eternal right.

THE MORMON TRIBUNE will be the pioneer of all advanced thoughts. It will seek to break down all cramping influences which come in the way of the widest and freest discussion of every principle of right. It will bring into practical operation the old Mormon theory that ALL TRUTH belongs to our system, and show to the world that, as a people, we dare look any truth in the face, whether it may have belonged to our original belief or not.

THE MORMON TRIBUNE is started with the full assurance that we are on the eve of a new era in our career, in which "Mormonism" will throw aside all narrowing tendencies and present herself before the world as the exponent of the highest facts of science, the noblest truths of religion, and the widest sentiments of charity to all mankind. To prepare the way for this consummation will be the mission of the TRIBUNE. All who look and pray for such a day will lend their aid to sustain it in its holy work of progress and reform.

The TRIBUNE is no personal speculation. It will be made the property of the Movement it represents, and belong to the people. In aiding it, therefore, by purse, voice, or pen, all may feel that they contribute to a CAUSE and not to men.

As publishers, on behalf of the Movement, we urge all our friends to yield the TRIBUNE that aid that will enable it to meet the crusade now in operation against the circulation of the MAGAZINE, and sustain it while it fights the battle of free speech and thought.

All who have paid for the MAGAZINE will be supplied with the TRIBUNE until their number is complete. All subscribing for the TRIBUNE will be furnished with the MAGAZINE until the former is published.

THE MORMON TRIBUNE will be published every Saturday. Price $5.00 per year; $3.00 per half year; single copies, 20 cents; clubs of five copies, $20.00.

All who understand the enormous difficulties against which we have to contend, and are desirous of aiding the TRIBUNE in its struggle for right, will take as many copies as they can personally, and raise us all the subscriptions or advertisements in their power. And by the united effort of all our friends, moving in the spirit of reason and kindness, we shall win and convince on every hand, and the truth will march triumphantly along.

RUNNING THE GAUNTLET.

It was many years ago that the story I am about to relate occurred. Four young men, together with myself, started on a hunting expedition. My companions were wild and reckless fellows, afraid of nothing. It was, I often think, their recklessness which caused their death.

One evening, as I was sitting in my log hut, quietly smoking my pipe, I heard the sound of footsteps, and, in an instant, I was startled by a rap at the door. Without waiting for a reply, the stranger opened the door and entered the room. He accosted me by saying, "How are you, stranger? Mighty glad to see you."

"Are you trapping around about these parts?" I asked.

"Well, yes, some," he replied; "hunting and trapping, together with fighting redskins. Probably you have heard of me." I shook my head. "My name is Bill Rogers, the Ingen-fighter," he said. "I can whip more Ingens, catch more beavers, kill more bars, and run faster than any other man in old Kentuck. But where did you come from?"

"My name is Charles Grafton and I came from St. Louis."

"Well, ain't you afraid of the pesky Ingens?" he asked.

"No more than I am of the bears, or other wild animals."

"Well, stranger, you're in a mighty dangerous situation. The best thing for you to do is to leave this place."

As it was nearly dark, my newly-found friend asked permission to stay all night with me. To this I readily consented, and we passed the hours of the evening in lively conversation until our fires became extinguished. We then wrapped our blankets around us and lay down on the floor, where we soon fell into a quiet slumber. How long we slept I know not, but we were awakened by the barking of my friend's dog, which he had left outside the door. Arising, I asked Bill what was the matter with his dog.

"Matter enough," was the reply. "There is Ingens around here, and, we're mighty smart if we escape their tomahawks to-night."

I was soon at one of the loopholes, with which my cabin was amply provided, and discovered, by the dim light of the moon, dark objects flitting to and fro. As I watched them, I saw them coming towards us. When within about twenty rods of our cabin, I was startled by the report of Bill's rifle. Looking round, I saw him coolly loading his gun.

"There's one of the pesky thieves gone!" he muttered, as he rammed the ball down.

On looking out again, not a sign of an Indian could I see.

"There goes another!" said Bill, firing his weapon as he spoke.

The next instant, I saw about fifty Indians emerge from the forest, and, setting up a hideous yell, dash forward. When within about one hundred feet of us, I gave them the contents of my gun; in a second after, Bill also fired, and two savages bit the dust. Nothing daunted at this, on they came. We both drew our revolvers, and sent their contents into the thickest of them. As they had now lost ten men, in killed and wounded, they thought it best to retire.

About an hour elapsed, and, as they did not appear, I asked my companion if he could assign the reason.

"Some new scheme, I suppose," was the curt reply.

As we were watching, each moment expecting to see them burst forth from the forest, we were suddenly startled by a sharp, cracking sound proceeding from the opposite side of the cabin.

"Heavens!" exclaimed Bill, in alarm. "They have set the house on fire, and intend to burn us up!"

The truth was too apparent to be disputed, and the room was soon filled with smoke.

I returned at once to my post, and soon observed an Indian approaching us, bearing aloft a white cloth, which he kept waving to attract our attention. When within speaking distance, I opened the door, and called out, "What do you want?"

"Will you surrender?" he asked, in broken English

"On what terms?" I asked.

"We will give you a chance for your life," he replied. "If you fail, your life shall pay the forfeit; if you succeed, you are at liberty to go your way unmolested."

"We accept your terms," I said, advancing to the door.

Turning round, he motioned for his men to advance. Upon asking what chance we were to have, he told us that we were to run the gauntlet. That is, stationing the Indians in two lines, facing each other, about four feet apart, all of whom were to be armed with a knife or tomahawk. My companion wished to go first.

"You watch me," he said, "and then imitate me."

This I promised to do. The Indians were all assembled upon a plain piece of grass, awaiting us. After divesting himself of his coat and boots, the trapper took his place. At a given signal he started. The first Indian he dealt a blow, which sent him reeling to the ground; the next he easily passed, and then, crouching almost to the ground, escaped the blows of the third. Thus he continued, until he reached the end without a scratch.

I was now led forward, and, at the signal, started. Imitating my friend, as much as possible, I reached about halfway unhurt, but I was then struck a hard blow upon the arm by a powerful savage, which broke it. This somewhat retarded my speed, but, by dodging along from right to left, and then crouching down as my companion had done, I at last reached the end, and sank down exhausted. My friend bound up my arm as well as possible. The Indians were determined not to allow us to leave them, and their chief was expostulating with them, but in vain.

"The pesky, deceitful critters won't let us go now," said Bill.

The chief then came up to us and told Bill that one of the Indians—one who had lost a brother in their attack upon us—had challenged him to fight with the knife.

"Where is he?" asked the trapper.

The chief motioned to one of the Indians, a huge, athletic fellow, who now came forward.

"Come on!" exclaimed the trapper.

"Each man took his place, and, at the signal both commenced. I expected to see my companion fall beneath the heavy blows of his opponent. But not so; he carefully avoided his blows, and, at a favorable moment, he clasped him round the body and threw him to the ground; the next instant his knife was buried in the heart of the savage. Arising, he cast a proud and defiant look around; then, wiping his knife and replacing it in its sheath, he rejoined me.

The chief now came forward and informed us that we were at liberty. My companion donned his clothes, and, after helping me on with mine, we quitted the spot. I did not remain in that region any longer, but started for St. Louis, which I reached in due season. I soon recovered the use of my arm, but shall bear the scar until my dying day.

THE PLANET MARS.

The planet Mars is the only object in the whole heavens which is known to exhibit features similar to those of our own earth; and the accumulated explorations and discoveries of astronomers during the last two hundred years have resulted in the construction of a globe representing the characteristics of this planet as astronomers believe them to exist. At a recent meeting of the Astronomical Society, a globe of Mars was exhibited, on which lands and seas were depicted as on an ordinary terrestrial globe. By far the larger portion of these lands and seas were laid down as well-known entities, respecting which no more doubt is felt among astronomers than is felt by geographers concerning the oceans of our own globe. To the lands and seas, developed in the planet, are applied the names of those astronomers whose researches have added to our knowledge on the subject. Each pole of Mars, it seems, is capped with ice, which varies in extent according to the progress of the seasons. Around each cap is a polar sea, the northern sea being termed the Schroter Sea; the southern, Phillips Sea. The equatorial regions of Mars are mainly occupied by extensive continents, four in number, and named Dawes Continent, Madley Continent, Secchi Continent, Herschel Continent. Between Dawes and Herschel Continents flows a sea shaped like an hour-glass, called Kaiser Sea, the large southern ocean out of which it flows being denominated Dawes Ocean. Between Madler and Dawes continents flows Dawes Strait, connecting a large southern ocean and a northern sea, named after Tycho. Herschel Continent is separated from Secchi Continent by Higgins inlet, flowing from a large southern sea, termed Miraldi Sea. In like manner Bessel inlet, flowing out of Airey Sea (a northern sea) separates the Madler and Secchi Continents. Dawes Ocean is separated into four large seas, and large tracts of land lie between; but whether they are islands or not is not certain. In Delarne Ocean there is a small island, which presents so bright and glittering an aspect as to suggest the probability of its being usually snow-covered. These seas, separated by lands of doubtful extent, reach from Delarne Ocean to the south pole.

One of the most singular features of Mars is the prevalence of long and winding inlets and bottle-necked seas. These features are wholly distinct from anything on our earth. For instance, Higgins inlet is a long, forked stream, extending for about three thousand miles. Bessel inlet is nearly as long, and Nesmith inlet still more remarkable in its form. On our earth, the oceans are three times as extensive as the continents. On Mars, a very different arrangement prevails. In the first place, there is little disparity between the extent of oceans and continents, and then these are mixed up in the most complex manner. A traveler, by either land or water, can visit almost every quarter of the planet without leaving the element in which he began his journeyings. If he chooses to go by water, he could journey for upwards of thirty thousand miles, always in sight of land—generally with land on both sides—in such intricate labyrinthine fashion are the land and seas of Mars intertwined.

SENSATIONS IN A BALLOON.

The question, "Are you not dizzy in looking down from a balloon?" may be answered as follows:—Dizziness or giddiness is something entirely unknown in æronautic traveling, and therein is one of the most surprising facts of ballooning. You look downward with the same steadiness and composure with which you look off from a mountain top. Another strange feature is that the balloon seems to stand perfectly still. Common sense teaches you that you are moving when the distance between you and certain objects is widening; but there is no other indication of the fact, nor is there in rising and falling in the atmosphere. Immersed in the air current, and traveling at the same or nearly the same velocity, the balloon seems relatively becalmed.

This fact sufficiently explains the utter uselessness of sails and rudder. There is no wind to fill the one, nor fulcrum or resisting force for the other. The only power of a gas balloon is its buoyant force; and thus all inward efforts at propulsion or control, beyond a simple means of rising or falling through a depreciation of the buoyant material or the ballast weight, are manifestly fruitless. Until some other inward motive power than mere buoyancy is devised, no forward step can be made in ærostatics; and the union of any other with the gas balloon is entirely hopeless, since the craft is wholly at the mercy of the element which sustains it. The wind currents, too, are so variable that navigating the air between given points under their control would be quite as much out of the question.

No difficulty is experienced at a less height than two or three miles, by persons in health, nor is any other decided sensation felt under ordinary circumstances. There may be a slight ringing or closing of the ears with some persons in a less altitude; but in the upper regions a deafness is experienced. At the height of three and a half miles the atmosphere is known to have just half the density it has at the surface; and there is, of course, the corresponding decrease of atmospheric pressure. At the surface, a man of ordinary size is said to sustain an atmospheric pressure of 25,000 pounds, while at the height named it is reduced one half, the change bringing with it many discomforts. The reduction of atmospheric pressure is felt by the balloon through the expansion of the gas and the distension of its envelope, and thus to rise to great altitude necessitates an expenditure of the gas, as well as of ballast. To guard against a too sudden expansion of the balloon, the open neck at the bottom serves as a sort of safety valve, while it also becomes necessary to let out gas at times through the valve at the top

UNDERGROUND LIFE.

The coal miner passes in his cage rapidly from the light of day to the darkness of the coal-bed, several hundred yards beneath the surface. Here he toils—too often in a constrained position—for hours, hewing coal by the dim light of a lamp filtered through the small meshes if a wire gauze. His dangers are many, and, from the moment the miner trusts himself on the descending cage, they begin. A man a day is killed in the shafts of our collieries. The roof above him in his working place is often treacherous, and nearly six men are killed for every million of tons of coal raised in this country, by the fall of the stratum beneath which he labors. Then the coal itself is, sometimes continuously, often suddenly, pouring out its carburetted hydrogen gas, which, mixing with air, becomes the fire-damp; and, with the sad casualties arising from its explosion, we are, unfortunately, but too familiar. In one moment scores of men are destroyed by the force of the explosion; and those who escape the fire-damp, perish in the deadly cloud of "after-damp," "stythe," or "choke-damp," as the carbonic acid formed by the explosion is variously named. Nor are these all the dangers of the miner. He suddenly breaks into old workings, of which no records have been kept, and he perishes by drowning, in the rush of the liberated waters, surging under the pressure of the column of fluid, which has been gathering, it may be, for ages. The coal may be set on fire by an explosion of gunpowder, or from some accidental cause, and, fanned by the force of the ventilating current, become rapidly so extensive, as to cut off all means of escape. Then we have the sad record of the Hartley Colliery, in which, by the breaking of the machinery, the shaft was closed, and 204 men and boys found a living tomb. A similar accident occurred but a few weeks since near Rotherham, where the whole body of colliers at work were in a moment sealed in their colliery for some days; but, happily, here it was possible to release them.

The toiler in the metal mines, who is not liable to suffer from explosions of fire-damp, is surrounded by numerous dangers, analogous to those already described. Beyond those, from the severity of the labors of the metalliferous miner in air deficient of oxygen and with an excess of carbonic acid, and from the injurious influence of climbing on perpendicular ladders, from, it may be, more than 300 fathoms beneath the surface, bronchial diseases are contracted early in life, and the average period of his existence is but little above half that enjoyed by other men.

The very conditions of a miner's life render him a peculiar man. The darkness of the recesses of a mine gave birth to the kobal and the gnome.—types of all the various superstitions which, although somewhat modified, still haunt the miner. He is ever a religious man. There is no profane speaking in "underground life," and whistling is regarded as an act of levity, and always checked. Yet the miner's religion is almost always that of the fatalist. "I shall not die until it pleases the Lord" is his expression. A man who was brought out of the Lundhill Colliery for dead, but who recovered, was soon at work in a neighboring colliery known to be of a "fiery" character. He was asked by a visitor if he was not under fear, having already suffered so severely? "No," was his unhesitating reply; "the Lord who saved me then will save me again."

M. Simonin gives a description of the result of an inundation of a Liége colliery:—"On the 28th of February, a sudden irruption of the water which had been dammed up in the old workings surprised the colliers in the mine of Beaujonc, some of whom had just time enough to make their escape by means of the shaft, while others in their hasty flight were drowned; the rest remained close prisoners. The overman, Hubert Goffin, could have gone up in the tub, but would not do so; and he even kept his son, a boy aged twelve, near him. Like the captain who ought not to abandon his ship in the moment of danger, he meant to remain in the mine, displaying the most heroic devotion and the noblest resignation. 'I will save all my men,' he said, 'or I will perish with them.' Firm at his post, he encouraged and sustained everybody, striving to revive the courage of those who were on the point of yielding. Scenes took place such as the pen cannot describe. Two men were engaged in a quarrel, and while Goffin tried to separate them, some exclaimed, 'Let them fight; we will eat the one who is beaten.' At another time, all these men were seized with despair. The work that Goffin had caused them to begin, with the object of finding, if possible, a way out, having produced disengagements of fire-damp, they cried to their chief, 'Do not close the communication; let us take the lights there and blow ourselves up.' Some exhausted miners seemed to be nearly dying; their comrades, as they afterwards acknowledged, watched for the instant, in order to devour their bodies. All the lamps were extinguished for want of air; the weakest and most timid became delirious, complaining that somebody wanted to kill them by leaving them without food or light. They imperiously demanded something to eat, and inveighed against Goffin. They contended for the candles, which they devoured. Some went creeping along to quench their thirst. 'It seemed,' said they, 'as though we were drinking the blood of our comrades.'"

However, help from without came to the colliers. At the end of five days, twenty-four colliers were released, and once more saw the light of the sun.

Correspondence.

Salt Lake City, Nov. 19, 1869.

Messrs. Harrison & Godbe:

Although but an humble tiller of the soil, I find many ideas and reflections, peculiar to my own individual organization, will come bubbling up unbidden, convincing me that God left free the human mind, and that we cannot bind without destroying its divinity.

In reading the Magazine, in which I am always deeply interested, I was particularly struck with the statement made by Brother E. W. Tullidge, that President Young remarked, before the High Council at your trial, that we had revelations enough to last a thousand years. How can we reconcile that with his statement, made in reply to David and Alexander Smith, in the 14th Ward Assembly Rooms, that the Bible, Book of Mormon and Book of Covenants, were not worth the ashes of a rye straw, as we were henceforth to be governed by the Living Oracles. Be governed by Living Oracles, and the Heavens closed for a thousand years?

The Lord informed the Prophet Joseph that if he lived to the age of eighty-five years, he should see Him in the flesh. Now, if we have revelations to do us a thousand years, why should the Lord come in twenty; and is he to be debarred from giving any revelations when he does come?

Another question I would ask for information. At the meeting which was held in Nauvoo, when the burden of gathering the tithing, building temples, etc., was thrown upon the shoulders of the Twelve, there arose a controversy between President Young and the Prophet. President Young contended that "we should not muzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn," while the Prophet Joseph declared in the most emphatic terms, and by inspiration, that the Twelve should give a strict account of every cent of tithing received by them, and also pay their own. Now it is conceded by all that the Prophet was inspired upon that occasion, to lay down certain rules, and make certain declarations, in anticipation of his martyrdom, which soon followed. Consequently those rules were to be laws to the Twelve and the Church, when he should "go to rest for a little season."

Now please notice that the strongest requirement then made upon the Twelve, and that upon which the Prophet laid the most stress, was that they should be able to account for all the tithing received by them. Then reflect upon the statement made by President Young, a few conferences since, after taking all the power of the Twelve into his own hands, that he could not tell what had become of the tithing. When he innocently made that assertion, did he intend to acknowledge that the mission given him, in connection with the balance of the Twelve, had failed in that particular upon which their instructions were the most definite? And if one tenth of the property of the Church is more than one man can control and properly account for, would it not be madness to concede him the control of the whole?

The issue seems plain. If the canon of scripture is full (in which case we have advanced to where Joseph commenced) then let us all use the best intelligence God and nature have given us, by living in accordance therewith. And if, on the other hand, we have Living Oracles, a Prophet, Seer and Revelator, whose voice is the voice of God, we should be allowed to know when his mission commenced, and what message from the Heavens inaugurated that august event.

Of two facts we are certain. It could not have been at the death of Joseph; as the first general epistle of the Twelve declared, in all sincerity, that we were then without a prophet in the flesh. It could not have been during our first fifteen years sojourn in the mountains, as President Young frequently declared, during that period, that he was neither a prophet nor the son of a prophet, but simply an apostle of Joseph Smith. That the Urim and Thummum are again bestowed upon the head of the Church, and that prophetic visions are opened to his mind, I should be happy to learn: but, as a people, we could not be profited thereby till the revelations or prophecies were presented in proper form; nor can we without such proof, take all that our worthy President and the Twelve have said upon the subject of his non-Prophetship as a joke, and assume, under penalty of dismembership, that the reverse was all the time true.

In writing the foregoing I have acted upon the principle that the public acts of public men are public property; and as the present religion of the masses is centered in the man, we cannot well, in touching the principle, avoid touching the man. Our condition is not without a precedent, as Moses only left the ancient Israelites a few days before they erected a golden calf. It is not, therefore, so very strange, in the absence of revelation, that we as a people should confer upon our fellow-man the honors only due a God.

TOOELE CITY, Nov 16th, 1869.

Dear Brethren: * * * * *

I pray that God will bless you in your present undertaking—namely, in spreading truth. I am very much pleased with the MAGAZINE: also very much instructed and enlightened by it, not because E. L. T. Harrison and W. S. Godbe publish it, but because of the truth it contains; and my prayer is that God will continually bless you and enlighten your minds, that you may bring forth principles which will be for the edification and instruction of the people. I have just been reading the article on "Unconditional Obedience;" a better one I never read, and I am satisfied that it was dictated by the spirit of the Almighty. I believe that all the articles published in the MAGAZINE, on points of doctrine, are dictated by the same spirit. I anxiously look for each issue of the MAGAZINE, for I am satisfied it will enlighten any man who will read it and give heed to its teachings. I call you brethren, for I look upon you as such, notwithstanding what has transpired of late, and you shall have my fellowship so long as you continue in your present course and spirit; and I am satisfied that God will bless you in connection with your brethren. If there is any apostacy connected with your proceedings I cannot see it.

I remain your brother, in love,

GEORGE W. KELSEY.

CAMP IN THE MOUNTAINS, Nov. 1st, 1869.

ELDER WM. S. GODBE,

Dear Brother: I heard a rumor that you, together with some others, were becoming victimized for daring to express an honest opinion. The nature or particulars of your crime (?) I have not learned, not having seen a paper for some weeks, except when in the hands of another, who read in my hearing an article headed, "Justifiable Obedience," which article had and has my unqualified approval. Whether that was your fatal step I do not know, but would like to be enlightened.

I would like you to send me a file of the back numbers of the MAGAZINE, that I may learn how my brother has sinned and fallen (!)

I have not time to write much, but I think a deal. Suffice it to say that, though suffering from the effects of "blind obedience," I am not entirely discouraged. I behold the dawning of a day which is sure to dispel the darkness of night, and bring joy and gladness to many a desponding heart.

God moves in a mysterious way,
His wonders to perform, &c.

All is right, and I recognize the finger of Providence in all that is taking place.

I need not exhort you to patience nor prayerfulness; for I know you too well to believe you will cease communion with our heavenly Father, or that you fail to prize the truths of our religion.

There is one thing certain,—if hell is made up of such men as yourself, and some others whose names I have heard mentioned in the same connection, that is the very place I want my ticket for.

Your brother in the gospel of truth and integrity.

B.

THE DUCHESNE ESTATE.

"Hadn't we best be gittin' back to the shop?" asked Philpot, after two or three days of continuous eating and drinking, which Roland called "looking over the property."

"Can't see it," was the answer. "Let the old rum-hole run itself. I'm not going back there to roost. It's a mighty good market up here, and the bunks just fit my backbone. What's the use of going anywhere? The whole business has got to come where I am. If the lawyers want me, let 'em call. I'm comfortable. Ring for another bottle, won't you?"

They drank as usual; neither more nor less; simply all they could. The result was as usual that the flabby Philpot slept on the first landing of the stairway, while Roland was just able to get to bed in his boots and trowsers. The household servants, aristocratically contemptuous of this plebeian Stefano and Trinculo, had already learned to minister to them very carelessly, especially in their hours of helplessness. During the night Roland awoke. Every man who has continuously abused his nerves with strong drink, knows the mysterious terrors which come upon the inebriate when he struggles out of his nightmares, amid darkness and solitude. It was not by any means the first time that this precocious debauchee had awakened in such a state of fright that he dared not stir or call out. But this time there was really something horrible present; something which made the roots of his hair shudder, and his skin give out a cold sweat; something which for a moment paralyzed his limbs and his tongue. Vaporous moonlight, falling through bluish gauze curtains, cast a sickly gleam upon a tall, lank and upright figure, draped in burial white. Its head alone was uncovered; the graveclothes, drooping upon the narrow shoulders, disclosed a skull; the yellowish cranium, the bleached teeth and cavernous eye-sockets showed with horrible distinctness. It stood by the window, with the stiffness of a sentinel. But at Roland's first start of consciousness, it quitted its position with a slow movement, swept noiselessly to the foot of the bed, and halted there, facing the scared drunkard. Now, for the first time, Roland perceived a phosphorescent glimmer in the hollows of the eyes.

Had the youth been in good health, he would not probably have been shaken overmuch, and he certainly would not have been alarmed superstitiously. But his nerves were disordered by a week's debauch; he was not far removed from delirium tremens; he was hardly sane. During one of those minutes which take more life out of a man than an ordinary month, he was speechless, motionless, paralytic with terror. The spectre stirred: it slid to the corner of the bed; it turned to approach him.

With an effort which filled his hair and bedewed his skin with a perspiration like that of death, Roland threw up his benumbed hands and cried in a squeaking whisper, "Go away!"

It wouldn't go; on the contrary it came nearer; it tried to lie down beside him. In disgust and horror, fearful of being embraced by this mouldering visitant, Roland tumbled to the back side of the bed. Scarcely was he there ere the ghost stood beside him. Back again he bounced, and back glided the spectre. Roland seemed to himself a mass of shuddering gooseflesh, on the point of disintegration and dissolution, ready to drop to pieces. If the shrouded tormentor had dipped skeleton fingers into him and taken out handfuls of loose carcass, he would not have been astonished. Pieces of him might have rubbed off on the bedclothes without exciting his surprise. Escape at last: he leaped from the bed and ran: bang went his head against door-posts and walls: he never minded it; he flew. At the prospect of safety his voice came to him in the long shrill scream of a child, which recovers its breath after a fall. Still yelling, he reached the stairway, and fell headforemost. It was a lucky circumstance for him that flabby, blubbery Jacob Philpot had gone to sleep on the landing. Philpot awoke with a grunt, rolled somebody or something off his stomach, tumbled down the remaining stairs after it, drew his revolver and commenced firing. What was the matter he did not know, but his Southern instinct led him to have immediate recourse to his shooting-iron, and he blazed away in the darkness like a platoon. It seemed to him that a dozen people got off him and ran away screeching. His last ball brought down a glass chandelier in the parlor, with a crash which nearly bereft him of his lowdown senses. Then there was silence: next a tumult of negro voices; servants bearing lights flowed into the hall: and thus the scene ended.

Roland reappeared next morning, with the stains of earth and herbage on his back, showing how he had passed the close of the night. At the breakfast-table there was a period of sulky silence. Roland kept one eye shut; sometimes the right, sometimes the left; the open one always glaring at Philpot. The doughty countenance of the latter had an expression like that of a dog who discovers that he has attempted to bite his master, mistaking him for a stranger.

"I say, old porpus chops, you come mighty near finishin' me last night," began the heir of the Duchesne estate.

"I didn't know it was you," returned the victim of rum dropsy, with a bestial humility. "I'd a shot myself sooner than fired at you."

"Oh, you would, would you?" said Roland, with a squint of harrowing incredulity. "Let's see you do it next time. I wouldn't mind if you tried it on now. Don't hold in on my account."

"How could I know who was thar?" pleaded Philpot, "You mounted me in the dark like a bag o' cotton. Got your boot in my mouth the first lick. I thought the niggers was insurrected."

"Somethin' got into my room last night, and wanted to light on me."

"Like enough niggers. Was it black?"

"No, it was white—whiter than a grave-stone—had a skull and grinned at me. By Jiminy! I sweat all my whiskey out of me in less 'n a minute."

"Look a here, Roland," implored Philpot, "jest keep an eye on yerself. I'm afeard it was the man with the poker."

"I don't go it half so hard as you do. Why, I got to bed last night, and you keeled up on the stairs."

"Yes, I know. But it don't matter about me. Now you, jest come into this property, you'd be a heavy loss to yerself. Let's try, jest for a day or two, to stay sober. Don't let's get outside of more 'n a bottle apiece, and that plain whiskey. These wines and mixed drinks are bad for the health."

"I pint. Let's have a temperance society. Tell old Tom to give us our two bottles, and lock up the rest and hide the key."

It was done. All day these two teetotallers suffered with thirst on their quart apiece. At evening, sober, wretched and desperate, they extorted the key of the wine-vault from Tom, and drank themselves a trifle drunker than usual. It was long past midnight when Philpot went under the table, an indistinct mass of snoring pulp, much in the state of a stranded jelly-fish, and not greatly differing from one in features and expression. With his two hands on the board, as if about to address an audience, Roland struggled to his perpendicular, turned himself as slowly and carefully as if he were a crate of china, and set off lurchingly for his bedroom, one eye sagaciously open. At the stairs he halted, the ascent looked a mile high, and straight up at that, moreover he was vaguely afraid of the ghost. A little before he had not wanted assistance, but now he thought he should like some niggers.

"What those fellahs gone to bed for? Why don't they set up for me? I'll teach 'em their business. I'll light on 'em. D—n 'em!"

Such were his reflections, and such he supposed were his words, as he zig-zagged from wall to wall toward the rear of the house. It was a spacious edifice in reality, and to Roland it now seemed illimitable. Moreover, the footing was unsteady: the floors keeled up before him and behind him, it was like walking a deck in a storm. After a laborious and eventful journey, he found a back door, strove obstinately with it, swore at it and got it open. Stepping into a piazza, faintly illuminated by starlight, he fell over something. A nondescript! wrapped in loose drapery, a pack of unassorted, scrabbling legs and arms, a mysterious monster, soft in some spots and tough as timber in others, a most clamorous monster, too, squealing and bellowing in various voices. Suddenly invigorated by terror, Roland grappled with it, rolled over it, went under it and lost himself in the middle of it. Among the amazing members of the creature there seemed to be one wooden one, which was particularly hard on him, grinding his shins, mashing his nose and pinching his fingers.

"H-o-o!" howled the caitiff, "who dat fightin' me? Hi yah! Jumboloro got you. Now guess you catch it. H-o-o-o!" And then followed a burst of goblin laughter, "Wah, wah, wah."

After a fierce struggle they tumbled apart and rose. There was a brief pause for breath, during which they faced each other in silence, like two game-cocks. Then the monster began to dance; squeaking and bellowing and tossing its drapery, it capered about Roland: legs and arms, or perhaps fins, of various lengths, went out and in marvellously; now and then it stamped with what sounded like a hoof.

Roland had made a tolerable fight thus far, but this demonstration was too much for his whiskey-rotted nerves, and he undertook to retreat. The moment he faced about, down came the nondescript's head, there was a miscellaneous charge of legs and fins and hoofs, one awful butt, and the drunkard was on his face. He rolled over on his back just in time to witness a new horror. With a rush of drapery a white object passed through the piazza into the hall, where it turned and revealed a skeleton-head, the eye sockets faintly blazing. Uttering a simultaneous shriek, the late combatants skedaddled in any number of different directions. The last sound which Roland heard was that awful hoof going from him through the darkness. For the second time in forty-eight hours he passed the night out of doors. By afternoon of the next day the house servants were full of stories about ghosts, voudoos and obis. There was an influenza of fright on the place, everybody caught it, and had it badly, like a second attack of measles; niggers and white folks, they were all laid up with it.

"I say, I never believed in ghosts before," observed Roland to the chalky-faced Philpot. "But hanged if it don't begin to smell pretty strong of 'em. What's to be done, old porpus-chops?"

"Better quit till the 'state is settled. Reckon it ain't quite squar, this livin' on a dead man afore the lawyers is done with him. Told ye; 'n the fust place, didn' feel easy 'bout it."

"What would the boys say to hear we was scared out by ghosts?"

"Boys be cussed! If they say anything, ask 'em to settle thar bills."

"I guess I won't go till I've inquired into the character of this old institution among the neighbors," decided Roland. "Have up some horses, Philpot. We'll ride round."

The Rambeau house being the nearest, they made their first visit there. Philpot, like a meek lowdowner, as he was, wanted to stop in the hall, but Roland nudged him, trod on his toes and winked at him authoritatively, and the two entered the parlor together. With a slight flush in her pale, massive face, Madame Rambeau rose to receive the heir of the Duchesne estate. Her eye was very investigating, she was querying whether the young man would do. she glanced to see how he was received by Ninette. A very politic and a slightly greedy lady was Madame Rambeau. Ninette answered the awkward bow of Roland by a cold inclination of the head, and without rising. Even Madame found the young man "horrid," could hardly conceal her dislike of his gashed lip, sore nose, swelled face and plug-ugly manner, began to feel that he could not by any possibility be made to do. Still, she had told Ninette to treat him decently, in case he should call; she had tried to hint to her that a fortune is to a husband what sugar is to a pill, and she was secretly wrathful at the girl's averted face and chill demeanor. Daughters have so little sympathy with the troubles and anxieties of mothers! Daughters, in short, are so hardhearted! So felt Madame.

"My name is Roland," said the legatee, advancing with one moist eye closed and the other fixed on Ninette. "And this is my friend and bar—my friend, Mr. Philpot."

"Have the goodness to sit down," replied Madame Rambeau. "But why call yourself Roland? The name should now be Duchesne, should it not?"

"You're right, ma'am. Duchesne. That's the will. That's so. But I haven't got used to it yet. New thing."

"Ah! but you are so well paid for it!" smiled the lady. "The Duchesne estate is worth a name, even an aristocratic one, like yours."

"Heavy old estate," admitted Roland. "Big thing."

Madame's eyes flashed—this coarse, stupid boor was intolerable, she wanted to hurt him.

"Are you descended from the great Roland—the Roland of Charlemagne?" she asked. "He was mad, you know. I hope brain affection does not run in the family."

Roland had not a suspicion that he was being satirized; her sneer, smothered in smiles, was to him quite impalpable. Moreover, not being a student of Ariosto, he was puzzled by her allusion to Orlando Furioso. He glanced askant at Philpot for guidance. But that worthy, overwhelmed by the presence of "high-toned" people, sat meek and speechless on the edge of the chair, his napless hat between his greasy knees and his white eyes fixed on the floor.

"You beat me, ma'am," confessed Roland. "You do beat me bad. I don't know whether I'm descended from the old chap or not. Was he much mad?"

"He entirely lost his wits, and they had to be sought for in the moon," said Madame, gravely.

"The devil!" muttered Roland, turning a glance of bewilderment upon Philpot. The latter slightly elevated his colorless eyes, and whispered out of one corner of his tobacco-stained mouth, "Some vondoo business. I reckon."

"Queer country, anyway, ma'am," continued Roland. "My old house over there is haunted, or somethin' like it."

"Ah! is it?" answered Madame, calmly. "But, of course, it is. I knew it."

"The what's-his-name you did! How long has it been so?"

"About fifty years."

"What? and old Duchesne lived there all the while?"

"But it killed him at last, you know."

"I say, Philpot, that's what made the old boy drink so," whispered Roland, opening both his eyes with a start.

Philpot, wiping the perspiration from his putty-colored face, responded with a groan of assent and dismay. After some further conversation the visitors departed.

When the door had closed behind them, Ninette spoke for the first time since their appearance.

"Mamma, how could you tell them that the Duchesne place has been haunted?"

"I meant," replied the mother, "haunted by vice."

"Ah! but that is too bad on our poor old friend. I am sure he was good when he cried over Jeanie Deans."

"Besides, I want that brute to be driven away," continued the elder lady. "I want time for Vincent to be found, and to arrive. Every day that this creature stays strengthens his claim to the estate. Possession, I have always heard, is nine points of the law."

Thus, in her womanly and dense ignorance of law, talked Madame.

What with the skeleton-headed apparition, and his drunken fight with the equally drunken Jumboloro, and Madame Rambeau's adroit hints of ancient hauntings, our friend Roland went home convinced that the Duchesne place was no fitting residence for human beings.

"Hanged if I don't travel to morrow!" he said to Philpot, as they ambled along. "And before I come back, I'll have a new house built. I ain't goin' to live in a grave, with ghosts and vondoos, Philpot. It ain't my style. It never was, and I ain't goin' to begin it now, you bet your pile on it."

That evening, Ninette, alone in the Rambeau veranda, was pondering and, perhaps, crying over the question, "Where was Vincent?" The Duchesne estate was now a matter of minor consequence to her, so overwhelming was her anxiety as to the fate of the man she loved. Not a word from him for three weeks; no reply to letters of inquiry sent to Mobile. It was insupportable, it was horrible.

Presently there was an outburst of joyful shrieks and bellows from the greenery, near the gate; and in another moment Jumboloro appeared in the shadowy pathway which led up to the mansion. The bacchanalian old faun was outdoing himself: it seemed as if his sound leg would run clear away from his hobbled one, and dismember him; his raiment waved, his stick slashed the orange branches, and the whites of his eyes illuminated the evening.

Prancing, jerking, snorting, and squeaking up to the veranda, he bellowed, "I-o-o-o! This time he come. Mas'r Henry Vincent! Here he be for sure. Jumboloro tell you both times. Wah, wah, wah."

Strong desire is always ready to take the wings of hope, and carry us aloft. Ninette sprang to her feet, with the cry, "Oh, Jumboloro! is it true?"

Then, seeing another figure coming up the walk, she rushed down the steps, ran through the flower-scented gloom, and threw herself into eager arms.

"My darling! my goddess! my glorious beauty!" whispered the stranger, turning her head back to look into her face.

After a time, no doubt pleasantly filled, there came a moment when she was able to say, "Oh! what has kept you so long?"

"I am ashamed to tell you," he answered. "But I may as well make a clean breast of it. Such a thing shall never have a chance to happen again. I was invited to a bachelor supper in New Orleans. After supper, as I was going home, or going somewhere, I don't know where—pardon me, my dear child; I assure you it is the last folly of the kind. Well, I don't know what happened till next morning. But then I found myself on a vessel dropping down the river. They told me that I had shipped myself for a common sailor. I don't believe it. I believe that I was kidnapped while I was asleep. You will forgive me, won't you?"

"What an outrage!" exclaimed Ninette. "The wretches ought to be punished."

"Well, I made a row, as you may suppose. After a few days I frightened the captain, and he took me into the cabin. Finally, we met a vessel bound for New Orleans; and so, instead of visiting Havre, here I am. You are not angry with me? You don't despise me, Ninette?"

"Oh Henry!" she sighed, lifting her face to worship him.

"You are sufficiently punished," she said, presently. "You have lost the Duchesne estate. But I ought not to have told you so suddenly," she added, tenderly. "Don't mind it. We shall not need it. We can be very happy without it."

"You dear child," he whispered, caressing her hand. "Tell me the whole story."

"It has gone to a hideous little wretch—a barkeeper, or something of that sort—who calls himself Edward Roland. Oh, there is no doubt about it. The will said Edward Roland. Nobody comprehends; but so it is."

"My name is Edward Roland," he answered, with a smile.

"Henry! what do you mean?" she exclaimed, stepping back from him. "Who are you?"

"Now, I have got to tell you another bad affair, and this time you will be really angry," he stammered. "It was a duel."

"Oh!" answered Ninette, in a tone of relief. Duels were not crimes in the eyes of Southern girls.

"I was a second," he continued. "One of the principals was killed. So the authorities of Mobile got out warrants for all the parties concerned. I was not to blame. I had tried to bring about a peaceable settlement. Still, I didn't want to be arrested. So I ran away. I took the name of Henry Vincent, and lived for a while in Carrollton. Then I came up here to visit my father's old friend, Duchesne. That is the whole mystery, Ninette. Are you angry with me?" If she was angry she did not show it in the usual way, for she let him seize her hands once more.

"I knew about this other Roland," he added. "Duchesne knew him, too—used to drink at his place. But he probably never heard him called anything but Ned. I heard of the fellow's claim in New Orleans, and have seen my lawyer about it. The will is badly worded, of course: but my right can be maintained. Your mother is a witness as to what Roland was meant.

Some weeks after Edward Roland, the barkeeper, had been dispossessed by Edward Roland, the gentleman (now Duchesne), the conversation at the Rambeau dinner-table turned on the ghost of the Duchesne mansion.

"Perhaps I had best explain," said Madame Rambeau. "It was a little trick of my own. Cato here managed it admirably."

Cato grinned from ear to ear, and went on serving the table.

"What was the use of it?" demanded Ninette.

"Well—it was soothing," answered Madame.

GALAXY.

THE GRÆFENBERG MEDICINES ARE INVALUABLE. GODBE & CO. HAVE THEM.

PATENT

ARION PIANOFORTE

GRANDS AND GRAND SQUARES.

7½ OCTAVE.

The "ARION" is the very best Piano for the Great West because it stands in tune longer than any other Piano. It requires no repairing or regulating; shipping any distance, or dampness does not affect them.

WHY?

It commences where the "First Premium" Makers stop, and upon the most improved Modern scale makes four patented improvements; which make the Arion more simple, yet stronger; increasing its volume and beauty of tone, while rendering the instrument more enduring.

WHAT THEY ARE.

First. The patent Arion Reversed Wooden Agraffe Bridge, which retains all the purity of tone only found in a wooden bridge (the tone whereon the strings lay), and obtains all the added prolonged strength of tone of the metal Agraffe, without that acute metalic noise which the metal Agraffe develops by use.

Secondly. The Patent Arion Compound Wrest-Plank, which holds the tuning pins, is six thicknesses of hard maple, the grain of each layer runs in a different direction. The advantages are, the torsion strain of the strings cannot split our Arion wrest-plank, as frequently happens in other Pianos, and when people say "My Piano won't stand in tune," all other makers must use the single wrest plank with the grain running only one way.

The Arion Tuning-Pins have end wood to hold them on every side, while all other makers can have it only upon two sides of their pins.

Thirdly. The Patent Arion Diagonal Sustaining Bar, extending parellel with the steel strings under the over strung Bass strings. The Arion is the only Piano wherein the enormous strain of the large steel strings is resisted in the natural place and direction. Using this bar renders the weakest part in all other over strung Pianos the

STRONGEST IN THE ARION.

Fourthly. The Patent Arion Iron Frame concentrates all the metal in front of the tuning pin line, and its frame is let in to (butted) the front edge of the wooden wrest plank, thereby preventing the great strain of the strings upon it from splitting or moving it one particle. All other "Full Iron Frames" cover the entire wrest plank, and when it is split it cannot be seen, the wood of the Arion wrest plank is seen.

THE ARION STANDS UPON ITS OWN MERITS.

unsupported by either buncome, weak facts, or useless or complicated Patents. We append a few unbought opinions of those who

KNOW THE ARION.

The Musical Director of the New York Conservatory of Music, Edward Mollenhauer, says: "The Arion I bought of you is the best Piano I ever played on; that rolling bass and silvery treble, etc."

John H. Woods, Piano Dealer, Oswego, N. Y., says: "The tone is truly immense, and surpasses anything in the shape of a Piano we ever saw or heard of, etc."

Horace Greely said: "The Arion is the best Square Piano, superior for its clearness and brilliancy of tone," &c.

Louis Wagner, Fort Leavenworth, says: "My Piano arrived here in splendid order. Its tone fills my parlor with melody—it is the wonder and admiration of all who hear it. Miss ——, who is teaching the Piano desires me to order one for her," &c.

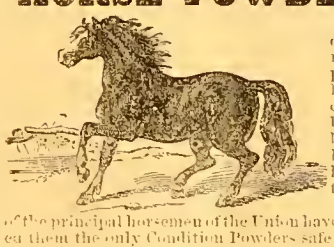
HARVELL'S HORSE POWDERS.



These celebrated and renowned powders for horses and cattle have been tested by an intelligent public for sixteen years. Hundreds of the principal horsemen of the Union have pronounced them the only Condition Powders safe to use and work the horse. There is nothing in them to expose the animal, but, on the contrary, everything to improve them. The proprietors of horse railroads, omnibusses, and stage owners in all the principal cities use them: and their combined testimony stamps them one of the wonders of medical science. Letters sufficient to fill a small book are in our possession, testifying to their goodness. Merchants are requested to warrant them, and refund the purchase money should they fail to give satisfaction.

Ayer's Hair Vigor,

For restoring Grey Hair to its natural Vitality and Color.

A dressing which is at once agreeable, healthy, and effectual for preserving the hair. Faded or gray hair is soon restored to its original color with the gloss and freshness of youth. Thin hair is thickened, falling hair is checked, and baldness often, though not always, cured by its use. Nothing can restore the hair where the follicles are destroyed, or the glands atrophied and decayed. But such as remain can be saved for usefulness by this application. Instead of fouling the hair with a pasty sediment it will keep it clean and vigorous. Its occasional use will prevent the hair from turning gray or falling off, and consequently prevent baldness. Free from those deleterious substances which make some preparations dangerous and injurious to the hair, the Vigor can only benefit but not harm it. If wanted merely for a nothing else can be found so desirable. Containing neither oil nor dye, it does not soil white cambric, and yet lasts long on the hair, giving it a rich glossy lustre and a grateful perfume.

MUSICAL DOINGS.—Since Mr. Waters gave up publishing sheet music, he has devoted his whole capital and attention to the manufacture and sale of Pianos and Melodeons. He has just issued a catalogue of his new instruments, giving a new scale of prices, which shows a marked reduction from former rates, and his Pianos have recently been awarded the First Premium at several Fairs. Many people of the present day, who are attracted, if not confused, with the flaming advertisements of rival piano houses, probably overlook the modest manufacturer like Mr. Waters; but we happen to know that his instruments earned him a good reputation long before positions and "honors" connected therewith were ever thought of; indeed, we have one of Mr. Waters' Piano-fortes now in our residence, (where it has stood for years,) of which any manufacturer in the world might be proud. We have always been delighted with it as a sweet-toned and powerful instrument, and there is no doubt of its durability; more than this, some of the best amateur players in the city, and several celebrated pianists, have performed on the said piano, and all pronounce it a superior and first-class Instrument. Stronger indorsement we could not give.—Home Journal.

UPON THE WATCH TOWER.

BY WILLIAM H. BURLEIGH.

Oh Lord, how long? We watch and wait
The coming of that Better Day,
When Love, triumphant over Hate,
Shall rule the earth with sovereign sway—
When he who toils and he who bleeds,
The promise of its dawn shall see,
And slaves of Power and slaves of Creeds
Shall hear the word that makes them free!

Oh Lord, how long? We wait and watch;
Night lingers, and the rough wind chills;
We strive some gleam of Morn to catch,
Slow-climbing o'er the eastern hills—
Some glimpses of the herald-star,
Whose light shall tell its advent near;
But lo! the darkness, wide and far,
Blots out the whole broad hemisphere!

Oh Lord, how long? The earth is old,
And reels, sin-stricken, to its doom,
Burdened with sorrows manifold,
And veiled in more than midnight gloom;
Her children weep upon her breast,
And heavenward eyes of suppliance turn;
Perplexed by doubts, by fears distressed,
Too blind Thy promise to discern.

Yet is that promise sure! and sure
The coming of earth's Better Day,
Though long the night of Wrong endure,
And still the dawn of Right delay!
Oh make us brave to watch and wait
The hour by prophet-bards foretold,
When Thou shalt lift the Orient's gate
And flood the lands with morning's gold!

CAPTAIN ANGELO BERTANI;

OR, THE TOUCH OF THE HAND.

I was in Florence in eighteen hundred and fifty-nine. That was a terribly hot summer all over Europe. In Florence the heat was very great; and I remained in the city all through the dog-days, instead of going to make a villeggiatura amongst the hills or by the seaside. For was not that the year of the Austro-Franco-Italian campaign? And did not every lover of Italy feel chained to the focus of news from the seat of war?

Late in September, when the nights were still warm and fine enough to allow of one's enjoying a cigar al fresco, I took the habit of going to the Bottegone every evening. The Bottegone is one of the most frequented cafés in Florence. It is in a central part of the city, on the great cathedral square, and in fine weather the pavement before its door is thronged of an evening with drinkers and smokers. For the Piazza del Duomo enjoys the benefit of whatever breeze may be stirring in the city. There is a legend to the effect that the Devil, having made an appointment to meet the wind there, stepped into the cathedral on his way to the rendezvous, having, says the irreverent fable, particular business with some of the canons. The business has detained the Devil ever since. And so, from that day to this, the wind has been wandering up and down on the piazza, vainly expecting to find the Devil.

I was alone in Florence, idle and observant. One young man, among the many frequenters of the Bottegone, I noticed for some weeks as a regular visitor. He had a tall, slender, gentlemanly-like figure, bright, dark southern eyes, and, though dressed in plain clothes, clearly had the bearing of a soldier. He always wore, pressed somewhat low over his brows, a soft felt hat, from which escaped on either side a luxuriant mass of hair, thick and waving, and as blue-black as the raven's wing. The old reason for disliking Dr. Fell is quite as potent, on occasion, for loving Dr. Fell; and, without being able to account for it to myself, I felt a strong attraction towards this young man. Our little tables outside the café stood side by side, and we naturally came to interchange small civilities, such as the proffer of a fusee, the loan of a newspaper, and so on. The first words I heard him utter betrayed, in their soft, sweet, lisping accents, that he was a Venetian. This circumstance heightened my interest in him, for the sympathy then felt for Venice in Italy was very deep, very tender, and very real.

He responded to my advances, and I came to know him. His name was Angelo Bertani; he was a captain in a regiment of the line, and had distinguished himself at Solferino, where he had received a flesh-wound in the thigh, on which fever and ague had supervened.

His quarters in Florence were on a steep bit of hill at the back of the Palazzo Pitti. The first time I made him a visit there was when he had been laid up for some few days. As I left the more frequented thoroughfares to mount the ascent, a strange, sad silence took possession of the street. I might have been many miles away from a crowded city. The moon looked solemnly down on tall stone garden walls, and on the dusky cypress-trees that overtopped them. My measured footsteps echoed sharply on the flagged way. There was no other sound, except, at regular intervals, the peculiarly plaintive short cry of a little chiù owl, calling to its mate.

Arrived at the gate, I entered and mounted a long outer flight of steps, partly covered by arcades, to the first floor of a wide, rambling, old palazzo. A soldierly man, with a little brazen oil lamp in his hand, stepped out of a doorway and looked at me.

"You are the servant of the Captain Angelo Bertani?" said I.

"Yes, sir, I am Gabor," was the answer, in good Italian, but with a strong foreign accent.

"How is the Captain?"

"Not so well this evening, I fear, signor. He has been much depressed all day."

The old soldier gave me a scrutinizing glance, and, seeming to be tolerably well satisfied with his inspection, made a military salute, and preceded me with his lamp along a stone corridor.

I experienced an inexplicable feeling as I walked down the echoing passage. I had no definite expectation; but I felt as though something strange were infallibly about to happen. Nothing at all strange did happen. I found Bertani lying on a sofa in his lofty vaulted room, with a shaded lamp on a little table at his back, and before him the glorious panorama with the broad chiar'oscuro of the moonlight.

He received me more than graciously, with somewhat of the warmth of an old acquaintance. As such, indeed, he claimed me on the strength of our frequent meeting at the Bottegone. He looked haggard and suffering, but strikingly handsome, with his pale Titianesque face and black hair relieved by a Greek smoking-cap of crimson silk. I noticed that he wore this cap, as I had always seen him wear his felt hat, low on his brow.

We conversed freely. I asked if his wound were worse? He replied, it was troublesome, but nothing more, except that it reduced his strength terribly, and—combined with many hardships inseparable from his late service, poor food, and not enough of that—caused his nervous system to be much shaken by fever. He was charmed to see me (he assured me several times); he took my visit as a very great kindness; he earnestly hoped that I would soon repeat it; and he said, in the winning Italian manner, that he found me very "simpatico," and I did him good.

Little faith as I had in my power to dispel any nervous fancies by which the young Venetian's mind might be secretly troubled, I was too much interested in him not to avail myself most gladly of the chance of improving our acquaintance. It was not long, therefore, before I repeated my visit. I was received with even more cordiality than on the first occasion, and speedily became the intimate friend of Captain Angelo Bertani. Youth forms its friendships rapidly, and there was a most engaging simplicity in Bertani's character. As I came to know him better, I was struck by the singular sweetness and serenity of his temper and manner. I found him uniformly placid and self-possessed. A tinge of melancholy hung about him, but no gloom. And how was it possible, I asked myself, for a patriotic Venetian to be gay and cheerful, when his country was cast beneath the heel of the Austrian at the moment when all hearts had been beating high with the hope of her deliverance?

"Bertani," said I to him one evening, after we had been sitting silent for a time, "don't you think it would be good for you to make a move southward? Surely, a winter in Naples would do you good."

He smiled very slightly, and answered, "No."

"No? A taste of the sea breeze, well warmed by that southern sun, would set you up again."

He paused a moment, looking full in my face with his liquid bright eyes and answered, slowly, "Cano mio, the sea breeze and the southern sun would not set me up again,—because nothing will ever set me up again."

There was something in the notion of his being a prey to a morbid delusion which shocked me inexpressibly,—shocked me the more, in that his manner and conversation had always impressed me with a high opinion of the limpid clearness, if not the force, of his intellect. I began to try to prove to him the folly and weakness of giving way to a fancy that nothing would restore him. I talked myself into quite an excited state, and only paused at last, not from the lack of arguments, but because my eloquence was chilled by his absolute silence and serenity. Bertani sat motionless, with his handsome head leaning back against the old tapestry-covered chair, and a look of patient sweetness on his face, which somehow seemed so incompatible with the weak despondency of which I was accusing him, that I felt ashamed to proceed. "Forgive me," I said, suddenly, "if I presume too far on our brief acquaintance."

"Forgive you?" he cried, and grasped my hand warmly. "My friend, I have nothing to forgive. I thank you, on the contrary, with all my heart. But do not mistake me when I say that nothing will ever set me up again. I do not believe that I shall die immediately. I hope to live yet a few years whilst there is work for my arm to do. When I say that nothing will ever set me up again, I say the simple truth, for all that. I shall never be the man I was,—never, never."

He spoke very placidly, and was even smiling, but there was something in the fixed look of his eye which filled me with an undefined and unaccountable terror.

I suppose he saw my face change, for he rose and stood opposite to me (we had been sitting side by side), saying, "No, no, no, my good friend. It is not that. Be at ease. I am as sane as you are. Listen. That you are good and true I do not doubt, and never have doubted since I first saw your face among the crowd at the Bottegone. You have told me since that you were singularly attracted by me. Well, it was a mutual attraction. If you have the patience to hear me out, I will tell you what I have never yet told any human being. Stay yet a moment. What I have to say is strange beyond all strangeness, perhaps, that you can imagine, but to meet it is a deep and solemn reality; and to have it met with a scoff, or even a cold expression of incredulity, would pain me to the heart without shaking my own conviction by one hair's breadth."

I assured Bertani that I was prepared to listen to what he would tell me with all respect; and after a minute he began:—

"I am quite alone in the world. As far as I know, there remains no creature bound to me by ties of relationship. I was an only child. My father was a lawyer, but his practice was very small, and before I was ten years old it had dwindled away altogether, owing to the strong political opinions he held and professed. In the '48' no entreaties could prevent him from shouldering a musket and joining the volunteers, who responded with generous enthusiasm to the call of patriotism from all parts of Italy. He died in the early part of the following year, from the effects of fatigues to which he was unaccustomed, and which his age—for he had married late, and was advanced in years—rendered doubly trying. My mother and I were left literally destitute. In her distress she turned to a distant relative of my poor father's, with whom we had none of us been on speaking terms for many years. This man was a wealthy bachelor. He had been as prosperous in life as my father had been the reverse, and held a high position under the Austrian government in Venice. This alone would have been an unforgivable crime in my father's eyes. Then, besides, Pasquale Rosai—that was our cousin's name—was a bigoted and uncompromising Catholic, and an upholder of the Papacy in its worst and most despotic phases. To this man my mother appealed for help in her forlorn widowhood.

"I was then a boy between thirteen and fourteen years old, and Rosai offered to undertake the expense of my education, and to provide for my establishment in life, on the condition that he should be permitted to exercise supreme and unlimited authority over me; and that I should be separated from my mother, who was only to visit me at stated periods. Our circumstances were too desperate to permit my mother to hesitate. I was transferred from the gloomy silent dwelling in which my poor father had died to the wealthy and luxurious home of Pasquale Rosai. I believe this man intended and tried to do his duty by me. But his character was naturally stern and cold, and his narrow intellect warped by the harshest bigotry. I was expected unhesitatingly to accept his dictum upon every subject, and was compelled to listen to the severest condemnation of principles which I had been hitherto taught to hold sacred. You see I had been cradled and brought up in the midst of a circle of people the chief article of whose creed was hatred of the Austrian. Incredible as it may seem to you, after what I have said, the man I have loved best on this earth belonged to the nation of our detested rulers."

"He was an Austrian?"

"Yes; and I loved him. Ah, mio Dio, loved him! In my guardian's house, though my body was pampered, my heart was starved. My poor mother died within a twelvemonth of my father, and then I was desolate. Under these circumstances, is it surprising that when my cousin one day (I was little more than sixteen years old) announced his intention of sending me to the university at Vienna, I hailed the prospect as an escape from the dreary round of my daily life? I did not fully understand why he should send me to Germany. But I now conjecture that it may have been with a hope of denationalizing me as much as possible. For he designed me for the law, and it was my ambition to become a soldier in my country's glorious cause. Well, I went to Vienna, and warmth and light were shed into my loveless life by the friendship of Gustav von Hildesheim, a fellow-student. He was to me friend, companion, brother. The truest, noblest, dearest!"

Bertani paused and covered his eyes with his hand. I sat silent, not venturing to break in upon that sacred grief, even by a word. Presently he resumed, having thanked me for my silent sympathy by holding out his hand with a gesture full of grace and sympathy.

"If I could describe to you what Gustav was!" he said. "It was not merely my boyish love and admiration which invested him with heroic qualities. He was beloved by all who knew him. My elder by four years, the relations between us were, on his side, tender, protecting friendship; on mine, gratitude and devotion almost amounting to idolatry. He shone in all studies and accomplishments; surmounting difficulties with an ease which appeared marvellous to my duller brain. And he was ever ready to help me over rough places that I could never have surmounted without his aid. Gustav von Hildesheim belonged to a high and influential family, holding the most orthodox opinions in politics and religion. But the Abbé Walddrof, my priestly Mentor at the university, would have been aghast could he have heard the theories held by this scion of a noble Catholic house. Gustav had caught the infection of liberalism, which was then rife among the youth of Germany, and he had an especial sympathy and admiration for Italy. We used to sit and talk for hours of the future of my beloved Venice, and he confirmed and encouraged all the patriotic hopes and aspirations bequeathed to me by my father. Notice this especially:—he had a peculiar habit of passing his fingers through my hair, so as to raise up the thick curls from my forehead, as he listened to my stories of my father's career, and of our life at home.

"But we talked also of other and higher things. Gustav had a tendency to mysticism, and a national love for the marvellous. I used to listen, awe-struck, to his strange, dreamy speculations about a future state, and whether the spirits of the dead were permitted to hold communion with those they had loved while living.

"Nearly three years passed without my once revisiting Italy. I took counsel with Gustav, and, with his concurrence, I wrote explicitly to Rosai, confessing my dislike of, and unfitness for, the profession to which he had destined me, and begging him to permit me to follow that to which all my inclinations pointed. We awaited his reply anxiously, and meanwhile I had a serious trouble in the prospect of soon parting from Gustav. He had completed his course of study, and was about to leave Vienna for a distant part of the country.

"'I hope, my dear exile,' he said, smilingly, 'that I shall not be called away before your destiny is determined on. What will you do if Rosai should be inflexible?'

"'I have made up my mind what to do,' I answered. 'I shall run away and enlist in the army of the King of Sardinia. If my father were alive, it is what he would counsel.'

"'Enlist, Angelo mio, as a common soldier?' cried Gustav, stroking my hair in his accustomed manner.

"'Yes,' I answered; 'in that way I shall at least not disgrace myself, either as a man or an Italian.'

"The letter from Vienna came at last, and was more harsh than I had believed possible. Gustav and I held counsel together, deep into the night. On the morrow he was to leave Vienna. Finding my main determination not to be shaken or changed, 'At least,' said he, 'you will not refuse to share my purse for the present. You have told me I am as a brother to you. Do not deny me a brother's right to aid you now.' I hastily considered what was the smallest sum that would take me across the Alps, and then told my friend that I would thankfully accept that sum from him as a loan. We agreed to write to each other, and formed many plans for a speedy meeting. All the manly dignity I tried to summon up could not repress the tears that gushed forth when Gustav took me in his arms for one last brotherly embrace, and passed his hand through my hair in the old caressing way. I clung to him as a child might cling, and sobbed upon his faithful breast. He cheered and soothed me with high words of hope, and noble aspirations, for the future. 'Heaven bless you, my Angelo! Courage, faith, patience! Remember my prophecy. You will live to see your Venice free and Italian. And we shall meet again—here or hereafter.'

"I never saw him more.

"Next morning, at daybreak, I left Vienna forever. I reached Turin, and there enlisted in a line regiment as a private soldier. I first saw service in the Crimea. Fortune favored me, and I was promoted from the ranks.

"I kept up a constant correspondence with Gustav; and, at one time, had great hopes of seeing him, for he wrote me word that he had been recommended to pass a winter in Italy. In the joy of looking forward to having him with me once more, I paid less heed than I should otherwise have done to the hint of ill-health which such a recommendation conveyed. He had looked strong, and bright, and blooming; the very incarnation of youthful health. But consumption lurked in his rosy cheek and bright blue eye, and soon the tidings came that a voyage to Egypt was considered the only chance of baffling the disease. I would have given worlds to see him before he left Europe; but my duty and my poverty combined to keep me at my post.

"The events of '58' and '59' are as familiar to you as to me. I won my company at San Martino. At Solferino—" As Bertini pronounced the word, a deadly pallor whitened his already pale face, and his eyes resumed that fixed gaze which had so startled me.

"—At Solferino my life was saved thus: I was in the thick of the battle where the fight raged hottest, and I had reached that state of furious excitement in which only the wild beast instinct of destruction seems to animate a man, when I felt ice-cold fingers passed lightly through my hair. At that same instant a bullet whistled past my ear. It passed so close to me that it seemed as if the difference of a hair's breadth would have buried it in my brain. I knew then, and I know now, that the hand that saved me was Gustav's. I recognized the touch of that hand, and the peculiar caress I had so often received from it, as instantly and certainly as though my friend had been standing bodily by my side; nor did I need the fatal news that came to me. Within six weeks I received a letter from Madame van Hildesheim, written (these were her words) in compliance with her son's last and most urgent request. Gustav had died in Egypt, on the very day and at the very hour when I had felt his hand amidst my hair upon the battle-field of Solferino."

Bertani's voice thrilled me in every nerve, and I shuddered. "Was that," I asked, "the only occasion on which you have experienced the mysterious touch?"

He answered, softly: "I felt it once again when I was lying sick in hospital, with the sabre-cut in my thigh, received that same day of Solferino. How I came by it I know not, for, after the hand had touched me, I remembered nothing until I found myself stretched on a hospital pallet, with the surgeon dressing my wound. I got brain-fever after that, and was delirious, they tell me. One night as I opened my aching eyes to stare at the dull flicker from the lamp that wavered on the whitewashed ceiling, I felt the cold soft fingers stroke my hair, and immediately a tight hot band of pain seemed loosened from my temples, and I slept. Next day I awoke—weak, it is true, but refreshed and free from fever. My time was not yet come."

"Granted that all this was so," I urged, "why should you despond, and say that you are never again to be the man you were? This beneficent hand has brought you nothing but good."

"True," returned Bertani, "true. And you rightly call it a beneficent hand. But the next time I feel its touch it will summon me away; to join my friend in the awful spirit-world."

"Why should you think so?"

"I do not think it," he answered. "I know it. I have an assurance with me that the third touch of that dear hand will convey my death-signal. Look!" he now added, bending forward; "those spirit-fingers have left a visible trace behind them."

He removed the crimson smoking-cap he always wore, and then I saw, running from brow to crown, in startling contrast with the raven blackness of the rest, one streak of hair about a finger's breadth, as white as driven snow.

Towards the end of this present year of grace 1866, when the Italian troops made their entry into Venice, I was there, one of many strangers. Bertani was there too, and I saw him among a brilliant knot of distinguished officers. Next morning, when his servant went to call him, he was found dead in his bed. It was at the moment of my coming up the staircase that Gabor (a Hungarian, and I believe a deserter from the Austrians) rushed out with the cry, "Death, death, death!" upon his lips.

We went into the solemn room together. Captain Angelo Bertani lay peacefully on his pillow, with a smile on his face, and his hair all pushed back from his brow, as if his mother's hand had soothed him to sleep.

I felt a thrill of terror at the sight. But I forbore to speak of the mystery to the Hungarian soldier, and I held the hand of my old friend to my breast in silence.

FATHER HYACINTHE AND THE CATHOLIC CHURCH.

The precise result of Father Hyacinthe's departure from his convent can not yet be known. The course which the Superior of his order censured was approved by the Archbishop of Paris, in whose diocese the alleged improprieties were committed; and after the peremptory order from the Carmelite Superior to confine his preaching to certain topics, and to suspend all advocacy of measures not "exclusively Catholic," Father Hyacinthe, by declining to obey, and by throwing off the robe of his order and leaving the Carmelite convent, seems to have declared that if the Superior has a right to discipline him for conduct which the Archbishop approves, he renounces the vows of his order, and releases himself from the duty of obedience. It is not, as we write, known that Father Hyacinthe has made any appeal to a competent ecclesiastical tribunal, nor that the penalty which the Superior asserts that he has incurred has been enforced against him. Apparently he must take the first step if he would arrest judgment. But who shall assume to penetrate the ecclesiastical meshes of Rome.

The interest of the protest is its illustration of the instinct of moral liberty. Since Bossuet there seems to have been no preacher of such peculiar persuasiveness and renown as Hyacinthe. That there was a great deal of melodrama in the scenes at the Madeleine and Notre Dame may be true; but they were parts of a melodramatic system. That his preaching was emotional, and even sentimental, may also be true. But the best preaching has its source in emotion, and most great preachers have been in some degree sentimentalists. His gifts and graces as an orator would seem to be indisputable; and when it happens that a cowled and tonsured monk, whose vows imprison him from the most precious human affections, has a great tender heart, it gives his oratorical genius a power and pathos which may easily be resistless. Such a man, too, naturally idealizes with almost a lover's passion the Church, which stands to him for wife and mother and child He clings to it, he defends it with immeasurable fondness. When, therefore, such a man seems to become its antagonist, or is in any way willing to provoke observation and criticism by a protest, and will not confine himself, as Father Hyacinthe's Superior besought him to do, to subjects upon which the whole Church agrees, it is plain that the attitude he takes has the deepest significance.

As long as a Church can control civilization it has an aspect of liberality and progress. It promotes improvements not inconsistent with its own supremacy, as it gladly encourages secular schools of which it can have the exclusive direction. Cedric the Saxon is not anxious in these days that Gurth shall wear the iron collar conspicuously on the outside of his coat. He may adjust it skillfully under the most rakish and fashionable scarf or cravat—but the collar must be there. An age which will not wear the collar, however, disturbs the placidity of the master, and his attempt to retain it reveals the fact that the iron collar is the main thing with him. The Gallican tendency, or the liberal spirit in Father Hyacinthe's Church, is disposed to fraternize with the religious world every where; to help what are called secular reforms; in a word, as the phrase goes, to accept the nineteenth century. But this is to dispense with the collar altogether. This is to release civilization from absolute ecclesiastical domination; to confound the faithful and the infidel, the sheep and the goats, and to plunge the world into ecclesiastical chaos. Now the ecclesiastical seal every where has always the same legend, "Heads, I win; Tails, You Lose." The nineteenth century doubts, and questions, and philosophizes. To accept it, therefore, is to disregard the signet.

Father Hyacinthe represents the protest which a commanding part of the intelligence of Catholic Europe makes against the probable action of the Great Council. He and his friends fear that by a declaration of the infallibility of the Head of the Church, or by some denunciation of the spirit of the age, the Church will be overwhelmed in a reaction which will alienate from her embrace many of the best and most powerful of her children. With that complacent contempt which the adherents of a vast establishment, whether political or religious, always feel toward opposition —for the confidence of conservatism in the established order is as absolute as that of Sinbad's sailors in the solid land which proved to be a whale and diver—it is said that greater men than the good Carmelite have protested and succumbed to the mighty mother; that Fénelon made his peace, and that Passaglia, who broke with the Jesuits, recanted, and begged to be allowed to return.

But when we read the history of the American Revolution it is not the defeats at Long Island and Germantown that arrest our minds so much as the surrenders at Saratoga and Yorktown. Fénelon made his peace. How about Luther? Passaglia recanted. Did Savonarola? The ancient ecclesiastical establishment is very firm and solid, but are there no signs in Austria, for instance, of a disposition to dive? If greater men than the Carmelite have recanted, greater than they have persisted. And in these days, however they may be condemned by due ecclesiastical authority, still in these days can a Church which is to be as wise as a serpent, as well as guileless as a dove, safely alienate men like Montalembert and Hyacinthe and their friends and followers?

The precise position of these protestants against the probable action of the coming Council seems to be difficult to understand, although, as we said, the result in the particular case of Father Hyacinthe's alleged contumacy as a Carmelite friar cannot be easily foreseen. The infallibility of the Church is a fundamental doctrine of the Roman establishment; but it has always been an undecided point whether it resided in the General Council or in the union of the Pope and Council. In any case, however, the harmonious declaration of a dogma by Pope and Council together must be received as infallible. To this, as we understand, Father Hyacinthe and his friends do not object; but they say that the declaration of the Council, whatever it may be, must be the result of the most ample and the most unfettered deliberation. The voice of a coerced Council, or a packed Council, is not the infallible voice of the Church. Father Hyacinthe, in his letter, protests against the doctrines and practices calling themselves Roman, but which are not Christian; against the attempted divorce between the Church and the century; and the dreadful opposition in the name of the Church to human nature. He then says that if France is given over to social, moral, and religious anarchy the principal cause is not Catholicism, but the way in which Catholicism has long been taught and practised. Then, in a tone which must have caused the Carmelite Superior and the Holy Father to listen with open mouth of amazement, the monk cries: "I appeal to the Council about to meet to seek for remedies for the excess of our evils, and to apply them with as much force as gentleness. But if fears in which I do not wish to share come to be realized—if the august assembly has not more liberty in its deliberations than it has already in its preparation—if, in a word, it is deprived of the essential character of an Œcumenical Council, I will cry to God and men to call another truly united in the Holy Spirit, not in the spirit of party, and representing really the Universal Church, not the silence of some men, the oppression of others."

This is to say that the Council is probably packed, and that its conclusions will not be the result of free deliberation, and therefore not binding. But the Father must see that the apparent harmony of Pope and Council is all that is essential to an infallible declaration, because actual harmony can never be known. When a legislature passes a law by constitutional methods it is the binding action of the Legislature, whether the members of it are all conscientiously convinced, or whether a majority of them have been bribed or frightened. If the Church be infallible, the infallibility must reside in Pope and Council united, and when they speak their voice is final. Father Hyacinthe, in declaring in advance that he will not regard the united voice if it says what he does not believe, and that certain declarations will prove that the Council is not free, merely asserts what any other Catholic may assert of any Council that has ever assembled. It is a position incompatible with the infallibility of the Church, because it is a plain declaration that if the Church proclaims what Father Hyacinthe does not believe he will reject it. This is simple Protestantism. Every Protestant, the Rev. Dr. Prime, for instance, who called upon the Father upon his arrival in this city, will willingly accept any declaration of the Œcumenical Council which he believes to be true.

Harper's Magazine

BOTH SIDES.

One of the comic papers of London has recently done a thing which is considered very laughable. It has published a page entitled "Both Sides;"—the page is divided into parallel columns, and in these opposing columns are given the reasons and arguments of the opposing parties, for the grounds they assume in reference to the public questions of the day. Both sides are given with perfect fairness; there is no leaning in either direction.

Thus, the "intelligent reader"—as the newspapers are fond of styling their patrons—is enabled to judge fairly for himself of the merits of each measure as it is held by the respective parties; and he can select his own ground after obtaining an unbiassed statement of the position of both sides. Now, we do not see why this sort of thing should be confined to a comic journal, or why it should be considered laughable, except for its exceeding oddity. As it is, you can rarely find in a newspaper of either party a fair statement of the principles and policy of the other party. How rare it is to find an opponent of any scientific theory set forth that theory as it is held by its believers! How rare it is to find a Republican who can set forth the principles of Democracy as the Democrats hold them! How rare it is to find a Roman Catholic who can set forth the creed of Luther as he held it! How rare it is to find anybody of any school of ideas, who can state with perfect fairness the ideas of the opposing school! In the newspapers, such a thing as absolute justice in this respect is hardly ever attempted. Each school misrepresents the other, though, we believe, not always intentionally or maliciously. As a consequence, few people have ever the opportunity of studying both sides of any question from an impartial statement of the principles and grounds of each side; and hence a just and reasonable mind is apt to be exceedingly confused.

CAN DELUSION COME FROM GOD?

BY W. S. GODBE.

And for this cause [the rejection of the truth] God shall send them strong delusions that they should believe a lie.

That they might be damned who believe not the truth but have pleasure in unrighteousness. 2nd Thess. 2—11. 12

I am induced to express a few thoughts on this subject for the reason that some persons have been so inconsiderate and illogical as to apply the above words to the publishers of the Utah Magazine, as well as to those who endorse the sentiments it advocates, regarding them as individuals who have become victims of a "strong delusion," that God has sent in fulfilment of these words of the Apostle Paul. They are led to form this opinion, mainly, because their knowledge of our past course is such that they cannot believe it possible that we would designedly take a course that would militate against the work of God.

These persons being confident we are sincere, but no less confident that the authorities cannot be wrong, have come to the conclusion that we must be deceived and are ourselves the victims of a "strong delusion."

Let us calmly investigate this question, and try to ascertain what grounds, if any, there are for such a conclusion.

In doing so, we are met at the very outset with the fact, unmistakably expressed, that those who are to be overcome by the delusion spoken of, will be such only as "have pleasure in unrighteousness."

Now it requires no argument to prove to the persons who quote this text against us, that we are not of this class, for however much they may believe we are now in the dark, in the past, at some period not very remote, we were, in their judgment, traveling in the right path. We do think, in all candor, that all who are in the least acquainted with our history will be just enough to award this much. Assuming, then, we were enlightened by the true spirit of the Gospel and were trying to live in harmony therewith, we could not by any possibility be of the class referred to, for the delusion, it will be remembered, was to come as a punishment upon such as "believed not the truth, but have pleasure in unrighteousness."

Having briefly, but I think—to the class referred to, at least—fully exonerated ourselves from the charge of delusion, (assuming the ground taken by the Apostle to be correct,) we have now become disinterested parties in the case, and as such, desire to make an impartial investigation of the words of the Apostle, and subject it to the test of reason aided by the light of revelation, and see whether such an utterance, in its present form, at least, could have been inspired of God.

In doing this we do not wish to be understood as trying to undermine the Holy Scriptures, neither will it be obligatory upon us to clear up any inconsistencies they may contain, assuming such to exist. There are a great many ways of accounting for them that do not in the least invalidate the sacredness of the scriptures as a whole, or detract from the great truths they contain. We simply wish to avoid the error that lies at the root of all sectarianism, viz, adhering too much to the letter of the law, instead of paying due regard to its spirit.

For centuries the Christian world have traveled into a maze of contradictions and mystifications, not so much through believing the men who compiled the sacred books to be inspired, as through their claiming that every word they wrote was the same as though spoken by the Almighty Himself; and this without any reference to the circumstances connected with either the writers themselves, the severe ordeals through which their writings have passed by translations, &c., or when and by what means they obtained their present form.

Mormonism has done much for us in emancipating our minds from the erroneous traditions of the past on this vital question. We have long since been taught by President Young, and others, that, while the Bible abounded with truths, it did not follow that every statement it contained must necessarily be true because it was in the Bible. He, in connection with many others, has dared not only to doubt the correctness of some statements, but to deny their truthfulness in the most unequivocal manner. For instance, the story told by Moses about the creation of Adam and Eve, is well known to be wholly repudiated by him, and treated as a fable. Consequently, if it be right to reject one thing in the sacred book on account of its incompatibility with the known laws of nature, or its variance with any principle of truth, susceptible of demonstration as such, it clearly follows that any other thing may be rejected for reasons equally sound and conclusive; therefore, if it can be shown that such a sentiment as that contained in the text is in the least degree unjust or cruel in its tendency, all will agree that it could not have emanated from that Being who is the perfection of justice and the embodiment of mercy.

These words of Paul, unlike many others, are most clearly stated, and are as free from ambiguity as language can well make them. It says in effect that, because some had rejected the truth, God would send a delusion so strong that they would become influenced by it, and believe a lie; or, in other words, believe something to be true that was false; in doing which, it is implied that they became more wicked than before, so much so, that they are then fit subjects for damnation.

Now assuming for a moment that to honestly believe a lie —for it is impossible for any one to really believe a thing unless sincere in doing so—is so heinous a sin that it deserves to be thus severely punished, does it not follow that God, in directly causing its commission became, in legal parlance, accessary before the fact, and therefore a participator in the crime itself? In our judgment it most certainly does, for, however unrighteous their course may have been before the delusion came—however culpable they were for rejecting the truth—they were evidently not considered sufficiently guilty to be worthy of being damned. This being the case, it follows, if these words be true, that it must be a principle of Eternal justice, for God—not being satisfied with meting out a punishment adequate to the offence of such persons—to resort to the very extraordinary procedure of forcing these erring ones to the commission of a still greater crime in order to give Him the justification for damning them, that evidently being the ultimate object aimed at in all such cases.

With regard to the question of the criminality of believing a thing to be true that is in reality false, it must be apparent to every intelligent mind, that people can be, and are, as sincere in a false, as in a true belief, and, consequently, that it would be unjust in the extreme to condemn them for believing a "strong delusion," even did God send them one. All advanced conceptions of Deity force us to the conclusion that God will hold people responsible for so much of light and truth as they may possess, and that if they are true to their convictions they will be approved by Him, hence, there is no necessity for the unfortunate ones who "reject the truth," to become more wicked than they are, because they can obtain a due punishment for such offense without going any further in the same direction. No just being could punish men for simply being deluded, or honestly believing even a lie; for one could not believe without being sincere, especially, when the evidence is conclusive that the delusion is to be strong, which is clearly stated in the words in question.

Another objectionable feature in these words of the Apostle, lies in the fact that it pre-supposes that God is anxious to destroy, instead of to save His creatures, after they once reject the gospel, and that He actually takes means to effect this end; and inasmuch as God sends the delusion, He, in doing so, causes the commission of crime, which would of course make the Deity himself a criminal. This deduction if fairly drawn, brings us to the alternative of either believing the statement incorrect, or of supposing that God is not only a criminal but a fierce and vengeful being. We are, therefore, led to believe that the language of this text, if given by the great Apostle at all, in its present form, must be regarded as an imperfect and unqualified statement, and that, on the occasion when it was made, as on a former one, Paul spoke simply "after his judgment." At all events, it would be nothing less than impious to suppose that such a sentiment could have been inspired of God.

Having proved that God cannot be the author of delusion, we will assert—as all who have thought upon the subject must know—that such an idea is based on ignorance, which is the parent of deception, and the uncompromising foe of mental liberty. Ignorance is the mighty power through which the devil works, and against which we are warring. Freedom of thought and speech are the weapons that must be used against it, for whenever they are permitted or encouraged, the opportunities are afforded to disseminate light and truth. This species of liberty is regarded by all free nations as the great safety-valve which it would be not only dangerous, but fatal to their very existence to close. And this is no less the case with us. We must not surrender this mighty engine for the overthrow of wickedness and the destruction of its parent, ignorance. And yet there are those who are most unwilling that any views or sentiments should be published that do not accord with their own. Does not this indicate a fearfulness or doubt on the part of such persons that their views may not be quite sound, their positions not altogether impregnable? Who does not know that the truth cannot be injured by the severest criticism? But, not so with error which, conscious of its weakness, shrinks from investigation and the light of reason, as a guilty culprit from the bar of justice or a crafty fox from the courageous lion. Whenever men of influence in a community seek to suppress the publication of anything concerning matters of liberty or conscience, that moment they betray a manifestation of conscious weakness that sooner or later will become apparent to all. There is but one safeguard against delusion, and that is knowledge. This we should try to obtain from every available source; bearing in mind the injunction of the Apostle Paul to "try all things, prove all things and hold fast to that which is good." And be assured, that where the heart is single and the desire pure in the search for truth, you can press fearlessly onward. Be not timid or faint hearted, then, in seeking God—God is truth—fearing lest the devil should lead you astray. Depend upon it the Deity that rules our destiny will not suffer any power or influence to lead human beings into the dark who are diligently searching for truth. Next in absurdity to believing that God could send delusions upon the earth to destroy His children, comes the belief that He permits the devil to do it in cases where individuals are seeking in the earnestness of their souls for divine guidance. Were this possible,—could God suffer the honest seeker after truth to become the victim of delusion, irrespective of the source—He would cease to be the Omnipotent Being, whom we believe in and adore as the fountain of all good, and reverence as the Supreme Ruler of the Universe. But, says one, must we not be careful as to the source whence truth emanates? President Brigham Young says that we should receive truth wherever it comes from. In a sermon preached in the Old Tabernacle in this city on the 25th of September last, he declared in stringent and most unequivocal terms, that it was our duty to accept light and intelligence if it came from the "bowels of hell;" showing by these emphatic words that he believed the truth should determine the source, instead of the source determining the truth. Jesus enunciated the same glorious principle; said he, in referring to false prophets that should arise, "Ye shall know them by their fruits; do men gather grapes of thorns or figs of thistles? Even so every good tree bringeth forth good fruit, but a corrupt tree bringeth forth evil fruit. A good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit, neither can a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit." How well is this principle understood when applied to literal fruit. Who ever knew a person, when convinced, by his sight, that a tree was laden with large, ripe peaches, examine the tree to see whether it really was a peach tree or a huge prickly pear bush, before he would dare to pluck and eat the luscious fruit? It is no less unreasonable to raise the question about the source of a principle, when its character is equally self-apparent. First let us determine, by all the light we possess, whether the principle or statement presented be true or false; and if true, claim it as our own by divine right; and know that it comes from God, who alone is the source whence truth can spring.

CROWDED OUT.

Owing to press of matter—and some little miscalculation as to the amount of space at our command—several articles are crowded out of this number. Among which are the continuation of Elder E. W. Tullidge's essay on Joseph Smith and his work; an article on Tithing and Consecration, by Eli B. Kelsey, and two short articles by the Editor—one of them in reply to Elder Orson Hyde's remarks on Apostasy in the Daily Telegraph. They will appear next week.

THE MORMON TRIBUNE.

This journal will be published immediately on the arrival of suitable paper. All desirous of aiding us against the silent but wide-spread efforts now being made to stop the publication of our principles, will go to work at once and obtain for us all the subscribers in their power for the people's paper, the exponent of freedom and progress—the MORMON TRIBUNE.

PUBLIC MEETINGS.

In answer to numerous requests of our friends, we beg to say that we anticipate holding public meetings for the fuller explanation of our principles, in about a fortnight from the date of this MAGAZINE. Full particulars will be published next week.

Essays, Contributions, etc.

Note.—Essays and contributions under the above heading do not, of necessity represent the sentiments of the Editor. They are inserted on the personal responsibility of the writers.

LIBERTY IN HEAVEN AND ON EARTH.

BY W. H. SHEARMAN.

The most important and the most perplexing question throughout the world to-day is,—What extent of freedom, in thought, word and act, in religious as well as social and political affairs, it is safe to accord to the masses. This question is being agitated in Utah as well as in Rome—the two principal places of interest and attention just now—and has been and still is a source of anxiety to thinking men in both. It is the grand social question, practically involving all others, on which we believe the world is about to pass a final and unalterable decision in favor of human liberty.

It has been publicly and privately stated that the principles advocated in this Magazine are calculated to overthrow the Kingdom of God, and encourage a "license" which would result in social confusion and anarchy. No body of people, it is said, can long remain united, if it is left to each individual to decide when, and how far, he will yield obedience to existing authority; that there would not be sufficient cohesion in such an organization to hold it together, and that social order and prosperity cannot be maintained without a strong coercive and restraining power wielded by some one man, who, in his turn, is controlled by the Almighty. This is, practically, the doctrine of our Church to-day.

In the present imperfectly developed condition of mankind it may be necessary for the leaders of a community to exercise more or less of such dictatorial power; but it should and must emanate from the people, and ought to be exercised in agreement with their intelligent consent. At the same time we utterly deny that, either designedly or otherwise, are the teachings and policy we proclaim calculated to produce the results charged. On the contrary, believing the views we advocate to be of divine origin, we feel that their practical development is the only way in which the Zion of God can be established upon the earth.

In the Book of Doctrine and Covenants, which is considered authoritative by all Latter-day Saints, we are informed that the Lord has made ample provisions for the happiness of all his creatures, by preparing "kingdoms" adapted to their varied capacities and degrees of progress. There are the celestial, terrestrial and telestial kingdoms, with their infinite variety of conditions, where all who will conform to the simple requirements necessary for the maintenance of social order, may find a heaven suited to their conceptions of happiness. The Apostle Paul asserts the same thing, where he says, "There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars," and as "one star differeth from another star in glory, so also is the resurrection of the dead." Thus, we see, the Great Father of all has, in accordance with his glorious character, amply provided for all his children. In these sublime arrangements, as in everything of heavenly origin, we perceive the operation of the "perfect law of liberty." Freedom, in the most enlarged sense, is accorded to every individual. No coercion of any kind is employed to drive persons into any one of these kingdoms. All can go where their attractions lead them.

As President Young has said, in the spirit world there are people of as many religious persuasions as there are on earth, besides many who profess no religion at all. But is the government of the Almighty weakened, or does His throne totter, because the unnumbered millions of his children are allowed to choose that mode of life, belief and action, which is most congenial to them? No! The stability and power of heavenly institutions are based upon the devoted love of intelligent beings who, feeling that every desire of their nature is provided for, and every right sacredly secured, have no desire for any change, feeling assured that existing arrangements are the best that could possibly be devised.

It has been urged that were practical development allowed to the variety of opinions resulting from the many grades of intelligence and character, it would culminate in confusion and conflict, whether in the physical or spiritual world. But in the divine economy every possible contingency is provided for. The sacred principles of liberty are guaranteed to every individual by eternal laws, which it is alike the interest and determination of all classes and faiths in that world to sustain. The same order of things will yet prevail upon this earth. In such a state of society the rights of every individual would be jealously guarded by every member of the body politic, and the slightest invasion of them would be immediately checked. Those who will contend that such liberty as this is dangerous and bordering on license, must be either deplorably ignorant or untruthfully disposed.

It should be distinctly understood, however, that, while we believe that the fullest extent of liberty—for there is no such thing as unrighteous liberty—is accorded, in the divine arrangements, to every individual in the universe, we are aware, as every one must be, that there are conditions of admission and membership to all social organizations, whether earthly or heavenly, with which all must comply who desire to become members of them. That no one may mistake our views upon this point, we insert the passage, before referred to, from the Book of Doctrine and Covenants, Sec. 7, par. 5.

"For he who is not able to abide the law of a celestial kingdom, cannot abide a celestial glory; and he who cannot abide the law of a terrestrial kingdom, cannot abide a terrestrial glory; he who cannot abide the law of a telestial kingdom, cannot abide a telestial glory; therefore he is not meet for a kingdom of glory." Par. 9. "And unto every kingdom is given a law; and unto every law there are certain bounds and conditions."

The beauty and simplicity of the foregoing is such that every child in "Mormonism" can understand it. The Lord has here made plain the divisions between the different grades of intelligence and obedience. But, instead of being like the lines which surround a besieged army, and taking a million angels with flaming swords to guard them against intrusion, they are those which nature has drawn, and which, like herself, are unalterable and eternal. Force will be unnecessary to preserve these distinctions, for none will have the slightest disposition to forsake present associations, until those desires and attributes are developed within them, which will be a sure passport to the higher mansions or "kingdoms."

Some people seem to have an idea that admission to and enjoyment of "heaven," is not so much dependent upon internal fitness and capacity as upon external obedience; that it is some very beautiful locality where everything moves with clock-like, mechanical precision, in obedience to the will of some powerful, arbitrary being who holds out these "celestial glories" as an inducement to people to obey him, and thus gratify his love of power and dominion. They are forever imagining themselves revelling in the luxuries and splendors of a "celestial kingdom," surrounded by a barrier which millions of unfortunate wretches are vainly endeavoring to get over or break down, but who are held in check by Almighty power.

Now, while admitting, as before stated, that to every kingdom there is a law, and that all who dwell in that kingdom must abide that law, we still believe that there is not one particle of compulsion necessary or practised. Whenever people want to go into a celestial, or any other kingdom, they will have the privilege of doing so. But they will never want to, until they have learned to love the principles which, by unanimous accord, prevail and govern there. Even if permitted to enter, because of external but unloving submission to its conditions, it would be no heaven to them. Hence, the threat of non-admission to the celestial kingdom is as futile as telling a child he shall be deprived of something he does not care a straw about.

As men and women grow out of their errors and ignorance, and yearn for more exalted truths, and the companionship of purer and more advanced beings, there are higher departments prepared, in an eternally progressive order. To these higher orders of intellectual and spiritual progress they will be attracted as naturally as the needle to the magnet, and there they will find congenial natures in perfect harmony with their own; and thus will it be for ever.

It is a gross mis-conception and mis-representation of the character of Deity, to suppose that he is angry with his children because they all cannot receive equally advanced truths. It would be no more unreasonable for an earthly father to require of a family, varying in age from infancy to manhood, the exercise of equal obedience and judgment, and the performance of similar duties. We may form an approximate idea of God's feelings towards us, by our's to our children; only, He is infinitely more loving, merciful and patient than we are. A wise and humane parent is careful to put as few restrictions upon his children as possible, and not to overtask their young minds. Wherein they cannot understand, he waits patiently for the unfolding of their intellectual powers.

"But," says one, "does not the Lord say, 'He that believeth not shall be damned?'" Yes; on the same principle that if a hungry man refuses food, he must suffer the pains of hunger till he feels disposed to accept the proffered blessing. If another, while in deep poverty, should be presented with a check for a thousand dollars, but, choosing to believe the bank will not pay it, neglects to present it, he is, temporally, "damned" most effectually, and must reap the fruits of his own folly. Just so, men who reject the light are "damned" by remaining in darkness. And this will be "damnation" enough; for, though men seldom realize they have been in "hell" till they begin to get out of it, the sense of time lost and blessings rejected, will bring its own bitter punishment.

How great is the contrast between what we have shown to be the order of government which exists in heaven, and that which men are endeavoring to establish on the earth under the name of the "Kingdom of God." The first thrills our souls with joy and love, as we contemplate its beautiful order, and the perfect freedom, but intelligent and loving harmony of its children. The second fills the mind with fearful forebodings, as it gazes on a growing despotism that threatens to over shadow the earth, obscure the sunshine of love and freedom, chill the heart with despondency, and reduce its subjects to varying degrees of hopeless and thoughtless servility. The government that we have been hoping, praying and laboring to see established upon the earth, is the same as that which we have seen prevails in the heavenly worlds. We believe that the same freedom which is enjoyed by the varied grades of intelligences there should, and could with perfect safety, be accorded to all classes of society within or without the pales of the "Church" on earth. We believe that there always was and always will be social distinctions, arising from variety in taste, organization and development; and that the present attempt to elevate and reduce all classes and individuals to one dead level, is as futile as it is unwise, being opposed to the order of nature. We also believe that, while it should be the constant aim and effort of all superior intelligences to elevate those less advanced, such elevation should be effected through education. That we should ever be attracted to the higher social conditions by love, instead of been driven there by fear; and that association with those who have already been admitted to them should be regarded as a great privilege, dependent upon internal fitness, rather than as a duty obligatory upon all men, irrespective of all conditions, excepting that of external obedience. For the establishment of such glorious principles of intelligence, freedom and love, we are as willing to toil as we ever were; and we do so in the gratifying assurance that the labors of the thousands who have devoted their lives to the propagation of these sublime truths will not have been in vain.

IS THE MANIFESTO OF GOD?

BY E. W. TULLIDGE.

A man should not tell me that he has walked among the angels; his proof is that his eloquence makes me one.

Emerson.

That revelations had been given to my friends, Elias and William, from the realms of the other life I have long known. It was no speculation, no uncertain dream, no fancy, not even a second-handed knowledge. Flesh and blood have revealed but little to me. Nature made me intuitive from my birth, and a thousand witnesses in my life culminate in a testimony to this great movement into which we are entering.

At length the MANIFESTO has come, for which I have looked for many years; and now the question to be determined stands thus: Is this MANIFESTO of God, or is it from some other source?

I confess, however, that this wording of the proposition gives to me, personally, but little concern. For he to me is a revelator who reveals the light of God and Nature—he a Seer who perceives by his fine intuitions the spiritual conditions of this and the inner life—he a prophet who can, beforehand, unfold the purposes of the heavens to be worked out in human experience. Furthermore, to me that is of God which is divine and good in its own essence and manifestations; and that man has "walked among the angels" who seeks to bring about a more angelic state of things upon the earth. On the other hand, he has at best but a human apostleship, who virtually is keeping humanity in a low and unprogressive state; he has no divine promptings who is pratically bringing society into temporal and spiritual bondage; and he publishes no manifesto from God, whose teachings and works tend to make mankind more worldly-minded and hateful one towards the other.

This statement is in keeping with the maxims and philosophy of all religions. But for the sake of investigation we will, for the present, somewhat waive the everlasting truth of the universe that the quality of things determines their source. We will be mindful of the mental education which suggested to the Jews, by way of explanation of the divinest manifestation of God to man, in the person of Christ: "He casteth out devils by Beelzebub the Prince of devils." So we will query now: Is this Manifesto from God, which purports to be authorized by the heavens, setting forth the true platform of the Church of Zion?

In the first place, let us now confess that mankind have too often been betrayed by religious leaders. The assumptions of the entire Christian world make up a monstrous constitution of falsehood and misconception. Yet is there generally no lie designed, nor imposition practised. He is a fool who treats religious movements as originations of impostors. Nevertheless, it is the fact that even the advanced divines of America, such as Henry Ward Beecher and Dr. Chapin, assume nearly every cardinal point of religious faith, even to the doctrine of the immortality of the soul.

And thus it is with the people of Utah, who have called themselves Zion. This fact brings us directly to the pertinency of the announciation of the platform of Zion, in some of its first principles, as laid down in the Magazine, professedly by Divine Authority. It is scarcely necessary to evade the position in our argument, that the present condition of the Church, calling herself Zion, has given to the Heavens the reason or necessity for their Manifesto.

How stands it, then, with Zion to-day? Here is a church founded by a prophet. Its mission commenced by the administrations of angels. Indeed the very existence of this Church is an assumption that God and angelic beings are directing and inspiring the leaders and the people by practical and immediate revelation. Now is this the truth? We all know that it is not. Yet there was a time in their experience, when that which they now assume was all true.

But hope has again dawned and faith revived. God has not deserted Zion! But neither my faith in the divine experience of my brethren, nor the knowledge in my own experience, shall weigh an atom in the scale in this investigation. This matter shall be regarded in a scientific spirit, and in the severe uncompromise of truth. All personal considerations and attachments have been laid aside by the Councils of the Church and by ourselves. We are all now in the scales of Truth and Justice, and these scales are in the hand of God.

Let us be honest one to the other, for honesty becomes men. We must hear the truth to-day, no matter what the cost to ourselves, for God has commanded that the truth be spoken. Know, then, to what thousands will witness: that our Godless state of things has driven hundreds of our best thinkers into scepticism, and our haughty righteousness, ten thousand of the meek ones away. A host of elders, who built up the British mission, have given way to despair, and the entire people have become worldly-minded and indifferent to spiritual things; the Church has been led into temporal bondage; and men cut off, in whose lives there was found no spot; among whom I rank not myself. For these, and other reasons, the Heavens have sent their Manifesto. There is God written on its very face, in the necessity of its proclamation.

And how stands it with the Church of Zion in relation to the Heavens? When did our apostles hear direct from God, in fact, as in the days of Joseph? When did angelic beings administer to the Saints? To-day angels are as unpopular as in the sectarian world. In vain do we evade the question by a practical infidelity, declaring that revelation of that order is no longer needed in our experience. Sooner or later all must be answered at the bar of reason and truth; all the past confirmed by a restoration from on High, or "Mormonism" appear before the age a monstrous falsehood.

As touching the assumption, that direct, outspoken communication with the Heavens, of the ancient order, is "no longer needed," a thousand Mormon elders have often made their manifestoes in Europe. Have they not declared such doctrine to be practical infidelity? Have they not maintained that such assumptions grew into a faith from the fact that the Church had lost all she once possessed? Have they not crowned this by saying that priests, by sophistry, endeavored to hide their spiritual poverty and apostacy?

Let me word the synopsis of a sermon which our elders have preached a thousand times, for it will bear directly on the recent Manifesto made to the people of Zion. We have said to the sectarian world:

"If God has been directing the Christian Churches by the immediate revelations of His will, then there is no need of a new dispensation. If angels have been administering for the last eighteen hundred years, as they did during a period of four thousand, whenever God had a people on the earth, not in apostacy, there is no necessity for our manifesto now. If the believers, bearing the name of Christian, during their era have possessed the same spiritual experience which characterized the ancient Saints, then our mission is in vain. If, under an unbroken dispensation of this divine government and angelic administration, the Christian world has been advanced eighteen centuries nearer to God and a heavenly state on earth, then Christendom requires no special Prophet sent unto it to restore the ancient power. In such a case, the Christian Churches have been under the guidance of a succession of apostles and prophets, through whom God and angels have constantly spoken, and to whom they have constantly administered. But if the reverse of this is the case, then do we need a new dispensation and some special Prophet —some Joseph Smith, sent of God. Why, therefore, should he not come now? And seeing that God has sent him, we have God's manifesto that now is the proper time of his coming."

Is not this a fair statement of the subject which the elders have laid before the nations a thousand times? Why not, then, apply it to this Church to-day! Considerations of this kind make the Manifesto in question very pertinent; and it bears upon the face of its circumstances the stamp of God's authority. Let me now make a closing reference to its character and fitness.

I endorse the thought of the apostle Emerson that "a man should not tell me that he has walked among angels; his proof is that his eloquence makes me one." Emerson uses not the phrase eloquence in the sense of rhetoric—not in the mere significance of fine writing or splendid oratory. It is the eloquence of Truth, the eloquence of Love, the eloquence of Divine Thought, embodied in the message of the apostle, which is proof to him that the man has walked with angels and communed with them in their Holy of Holies. The life of Jesus is to Emerson divine eloquence, because it has made the world more angelic; and the highest proof of his incarnate Deity is that Jesus has made the ages since his advent more divine.

In the spirit of the same philosophy, I view this Manifesto, caring little for angels in the abstract, but everything for their truths and divine sentiments.

There is the wisdom of a truly Christian civilization evolved in the Manifesto. Its tone is supremely humanitarian; its theology up to the advanced thought and circumstances of the age, and the spirit which it breathes would bring peace on earth and good will among mankind.

Viewing it, then, in the light of Reason, endorsed by human experience, this Manifesto appears to me to lay down a grand Christian platform, and to embody the genius of a heavenly legislation. It is the broadest and most universalian yet published by any Christian church.

Whether this manifesto be divine or not, it is a necessity of the age that men should come who have walked with angels and held communion with the Priesthood of the other world. If they come not, the Christian nations—to say nothing of ourselves—will dwindle into a cold infidelity. This is generally realized by the advanced thinkers of the day, who would gladly receive evidence of a divine communication, the proof of man's immortality, and the circumstances of the life hereafter. But they who come must be apostles with a priesthood holding communion with the other world—revelators who reveal the Heavens, and not the mere conditions of this life, no matter how fraught with human wisdom and policies. The world is burdened to death with such, and nations have enough of temporal and commercial schemes. They need no Utah to set them examples in their own line in which they outdo us a hundredfold. Ask the East India Company if this is not true,—ask the Rothschilds if they cannot prove it with overwhelming facts of material wealth!

Now Joseph Smith, who made his manifestoes under the direction of angelic beings, proposed, in his mission, to supply the great spiritual want of the age. He did open a dispensation of communication with the Heavens, and was a revelator in fact. Were he here now America would perhaps not again reject him; however many of those who call themselves his disciples might, for even Jesus would find it again illustrated: "I came unto my own, and my own received me not."

It is a very strik'ng fact, that the Priesthood of the Church, calling herself Zion, have almost entirely departed from their spiritual mission. We, who were once evangelists to all mankind, now, compared with our past missionary zeal, leave a world to perdition, and give ourselves over to a few temporal and commercial schemes. We, who abroad converted hundreds of thousands to the faith, have not in five and twenty years converted one out of a thousand who have come to the glory of our Zion, while thousands of the disciples have fled away, finding, to their minds, no Zion here. Is not this, with circumstances of a similar kind, immensely suggestive, and prophetic that God will again send His manifestoes to meet the peculiar case of His Saints, and the general wants of all mankind? This is what He is now doing.

In this opening of our investigations of the inspired documents, of which the public have received the first, I have chiefly considered the necessity of Divine manifestoes adapted to our circumstances. The points of this Manifesto shall be reviewed hereafter. In the meantime, to the consummation of proof that it is of God we will believe as of old, that the day will come when the Saints shall again walk with angels.

POLYGAMY AND THE MANIFESTO.

Our views on Plural Marriage are very fully set forth in a series of articles which can be found in the present volume of the MAGAZINE. A question has, however, arisen in the minds of some as to whether we believe that plural marriage will ever be abolished as a principle of our church. To this we reply, most unequivocally, No! We do believe, however, that polygamy should be taught and practised on much higher grounds than, in many cases, it is at the present time. We hold that plural marriage is only right when practised under certain conditions. We believe it to be in harmony with a certain advanced state of men and women's nature, which all will reach sooner or later, but not necessarily true or natural to them to-day.

We all know that there are plenty of men who cannot truly love more than one woman. To all such, Polygamy is unnatural, and it is wrong for them to practice it while in that condition. The only justification for any man's entering into Plural Marriage is the necessities of his nature for more objects of his love. If his yearnings and capacities for increased affection absolutely demand it, it is right to him, but not right in any other case. The man that cannot love a second wife without withdrawing one particle of his affection from the first, has no need of the second wife, and no right to enter into plural marriage.

When we say that Polygamy is true to all men, we say it with reference more to the future than the present—we say it with an eye to men and women as eternal beings; with reference to the purity, the love and intelligence which they are destined to reach, under which conditions Plural Marriage can produce perfect happiness. We are well aware that there are thousands both of men and women to whom Polygamy is not natural or beneficial in their present state, and that millions can honestly deny its fitness to their nature. We believe that they are not only honest in such statements, but that their belief is founded on facts—they are not suited to Plural Marriage, and the reason is they have not arrived at the conditions under which it can be true or natural to them.

Polygamy as revealed by the Heavenly world is designed with direct reference to Celestial existence—a state which is open to all men and women. In that state conditions exist which make its practise different to anything we can conceive of. Pure, divine love, will swell the bosom; passion and lust will be under men's feet, and men will love from the highest and the holiest motives. Plural Marriage is an absolute necessity of that life. Love is a power and faculty that grows like any quality of the brain and needs opportunities for its display; and in that world men's love will so enlarge that it will demand and must have more than one of such objects for its exercise. Men that are dead to every impulse of plural love to-day will realize it then if not before, because powers will then be aroused which are dormant within them now. It is only to the extent that the quality of soul or mind which will constitute the necessity for Plural Marriage in that life, is developed in men to-day, that it is justifiable, or can be blessed in its results. This we know is not the case with millions at the present time: we, therefore, object to any man being urged or goaded into Plural Marriage. We would leave it to God and nature, and to men's own inspirations, to determine the matter—each man for himself. This it may be urged would considerably limit the practise; but we have no objection to polygamy, or any other principle, being limited to such persons as practise it properly. As to our doctrines destroying the practise of Polygamy, we will here venture an assertion to which thousands will bear witness, and that is, that Polygamy, as practised at present, is destroying itself. Not that it is in danger because society objects to it, but because as everybody knows, a growing dislike is felt to it by our rising generation. Thousands of women are this day carefully cultivating a dislike to Polygamy in the minds of their daughters, not because it is not true, but because it has been practised in a way that has made it unbearable to them. Nothing can save this principle but the elevation of it to a higher plane—that to which it properly belongs, and this will be done by the coming movement. There is a great truth in the principle when properly applied, which truth God designs to exhibit to mankind; as it will have a bearing on the social happiness of the whole world. In addition to which—whether understood or not, it has a place among the great facts of eternal existence.—[ED.

WATCHING A WINDOW.

The bar of red in the amber west
Burns to ashes, and all is gray,
Though a sickle-moon is glittering out
Through the haze of the dying day.

Already the wine-red curtains drawn,
Hide the room with their ruddy glow,
And the face is gone that whitely gazed
At the sunset an hour ago.

Gone! Ah, no; as I speak there streams
A shaft of light athwart the gloom;
The dew-wet laurels beneath it gleam;
And the flowers, returning, bloom.

She had come again, and with either hand
The silken damask holds apart,
And full in the streaming light she stands,
Troubled of eye and heart.

Full in the softening light, that makes
A glory round her, like a saint,
I see the form that is Art's despair,
And a face that no words can paint.

She watches and waits for one who stays,
For one beloved she looks in vain;
And the big black eyes are full of tears,
And the child-mouth quivers with pain.

Passionful longing, and not reproach,
Steals the blood from her rounded cheek;
And sadness, born of the hungering heart
That suffers, and dare not speak.

"The hours drag on, O, love of my heart!
Wearily on, and you are not here;
A hundred terrors oppress my brain;
I am sick to swooning with fear.

"It is not doubt, O, life of my life!
O, truest, and fondest, and best;
But I am a woman, and womanly fears
Tear and distract my breast."

So I fancy her murmuring low;
Yet the while with her wistful eyes
She gazes into the garden's gloom,
And up at the darkening skies.

The sickle-moon has the gleam of gold
In the deepening blue above;
She thinks, "It shines not for me alone;
It is shining on him I love."

But, hark! What echo the silence breaks?
What sound, when all sound seemed dead?
Her cheek is changing from red to white,
And flushing from white to red;

And the big eyes glisten. Yet these alone
Are the sounds on my ears that grate,—
Hasty footsteps spurning the road,
And a hand on the garden gate.

A BUNCH OF VIOLETS.

I.

"I say, will you lend me a hand, please?—I'm in a mess!"

It was a small, boyish voice, that rose somewhat shrilly above the clamor of the birds, and the babbling of the river over which the owner of the voice hung suspended. His arms were thrown round a branch, that bent with his weight. His trim suit of black velvet was the worse for brambles, and his scarlet cap had badges of a mossy green hue upon it. Nevertheless, the round rosy face under the cap had a certain undaunted bravery, that seemed to contradict that sharp tone of dismay in which the boy made his appeal.

The wanderer in the wood below looked up smiling, and said, "Keep a firm grip a moment longer, my man. Now, hold me fast,—that's right. And now tell me what a wee laddie like you can be doing all alone in the wood?"

The boy did not answer; he was busy examining his torn knickerbockers and the patches on his cap. He shook his head at the rents, and began rubbing his cap with his sleeve.

"I'm in for a row," he said, speculatively; "but I should have got a ducking as well if you hadn't passed by. I must have dropped soon,—splash,—see here!"

The stranger took the little delicate, childish hand in his, and saw that the fingers were grazed and bleeding. "Poor little man!" said he.

"O, that's nothing, you know. But I'm forgetting. Thank you for pulling me down. Let me see, now," said the little man, gravely, "I don't know your face. You don't belong to Corven?"

"No," was the reply.

"A stranger?" said the boy. "From a long way off, eh?"

"Pretty well," was the reply.

"Ah, then you know nothing about it?" said the boy. "That's the village over the water there, and this is Corven Wood—jolly, is n't it?"

"Very jolly!" said the gentleman. "Do your friends know you are here by yourself?"

"O, they know I'm somewhere about," replied the boy; "but of course I shall tell them all about it. That is our house, you can see a bit of the chimneys through the trees. It used to be a farm-house. But my father doesn't farm—he's a gentleman. Do you have to do anything?—to work, I mean,—or are you a gentleman?"

The stranger laughed—a low, quiet laugh, like a musical note. It seemed to strike even the boy, for he stopped rubbing his cap to look curiously into his companion's face. He did not know exactly what there was in the eyes, half grave, half humorous, that met his own. He knew nothing of that strange pathos which has its element of regret, but a larger one, perhaps, of pity, that steals into the heart of the man who has known sorrow, and wrong, and buffeting, at the sight of such a child as this. The boy's life lay before him an unwritten page, and he stood at the beginning of it with a fearless front, thoughtless of care and contemptuous of danger. Involuntarily, however, as he looked into the stranger's face, he drew nearer, and touched the knapsack that was slung over one shoulder.

"I didn't mean that you mightn't be a gentleman, of course,' said he; "but then you carry that yourself. Papa doesn't carry his. My name is Antony, but they call me Tony; what is yours? because I shall have to tell about you."

"My name is Noel Caperne," replied the gentleman, "and I do work for my living. I am a painter."

Master Tony looked again dubiously at the knapsack, and began to think of certain beings with paper caps and an incurable habit of whistling popular airs, who had been occupied about the woodwork of his father's house. He decided that his new friend could not belong to that class.

"O!" said he, "a painter! Well, I tell you what, it would be very jolly if you would come home with me. Papa won't scold me before a stranger. That's what people would call downy of me, isn't it? I am rather a downy chap, and that's the truth. Aunt Lucy would like to thank you. She's fond of me, though she is a bit sharp, sometimes. You won't? I must go, then. Good bye, Mr. Caperne."

The lad went a few steps and turned irresolutely; then he ran back and put out his scarred little fingers to the stranger who worked for his living.

"I forgot to shake hands," said he. "I say, I've got a box of colors, myself, and I should like to see what sort of a hand you are at painting. I almost always bring Aunt Lucy to the wood some time in the day; she likes it. If I come to-morrow will you bring me a picture to look at—a swell one?"

Mr. Caperne put his hand on the child's scarlet cap with a smile.

"I shall be miles away to-morrow, laddie. Good bye, and don't climb. There might not always be a chance wanderer at hand to help you down."

II.

The Spring air was very sweet in Corven Wood; and the birds sang to the accompaniment of the rippling river with a jolly abandon that must have fascinated the strange artist. At any rate something did; since he was not miles away on the morrow.

He was in the wood again; oddly enough, at about the same hour that had found him there the day before. I don't know whether he expected to meet the small man again, or why he altered his plans; perhaps he did not know himself. He looked over the village, which was to have been simply a pausing place for refreshment; at the fickle sunshine throwing light and shadows over the wood, which was so beautiful even in the winter bareness, and thought that a day might be well spent in such a place.

Mr. Noel Caperne sat on a mossy stone by the river, and watched a squirrel springing from branch to branch, till the brown fur began to turn into a velvet coat, and he caught himself wandering back to yesterday's adventure, and speculating as to what sort of a reception the little chap had met with at home. All at once, he put his bearded chin into his hands, and bent a perplexed frown upon the river.

"There's something in his face I've seen before," said the artist to himself. "I wonder what it is. A fancy of mine, perhaps. Don't believe that though. Whatever it is, circumstances not pleasant have to do with it. I am a fool."

Here he broke into a laugh which the very solitude of the wood around him seemed to rebuke and silence. Of course he was a fool. The day was declining, and he had a stage of his journey before him; what was the use of sitting on a moss-covered stone speculating on ghostly resemblances?

As he got up from the stone Mr. Caperne heard voices, and paused. A little below him there was a turn in the path, over which the branches, leafless though they were, fell so thickly that he dared to peep through them without being seen; and there was Tony, velvet-coated, red-capped, and long-tongued. Mr. Caperne saw something else also, which appeared to him more worthy of attention; only a young girl, with a bunch of violets in her hand, early violets, and sweet, so far as he could judge, since each one travelled to her lips before it was arranged in its place amongst the tiny bits of moss which served as a foil to the blossoms.

"In the first place, Tony," said this young lady, "you had no business 'up a tree,' as you call it,—horrid slang! In the next—"

"But, don't I tell you I was after a squirrel," said Tony; "and you know how papa hates squirrels? And this was the very chap that ate our nuts in the summer—I knew him by the curl of his tail."

"In the next," proceeded the young lady, calmly, "you must have been shockingly rude to a strange gentleman, by your own account."

"Aunt Lucy, I didn't say he was a gentleman," cried Tony. "He works for his living. Girls never will understand things."

"Very stupid of them, certainly," said Aunt Lucy. "Then you think if I were to soil my hands with anything but flowers, I shouldn't be a lady, eh? They are very sweet, Tony."

This was about the violets, but the girl looked up as she said it, and Mr. Noel Caperne drew back suddenly, and went away down the path with noiseless footsteps. He went to his room in the queer old inn by the river, and looked at the knapsack, which lay ready for him, but he did not take it up. He threw open the casement instead, and leaned out over the river, where it ran, dark and sullen, under stone arches, and the distant rush of a mill-wheel reached him. But these things were only palpable to him vaguely. What he really saw with his discerning mind's eye was the picture of a girlish face bent over a bunch of violets; and as this rose before him, Noel brought his eyebrows together, and said, impatiently, "Where have I seen it before?"

III.

The mill-wheel sang on its monotone, and the woods began to have a suspicion of green about them; still, the strange gentleman stayed on at the clumsy old inn by the river. People talked about him curiously, which was not of the least consequence; the landlord took credit to himself that the old inn was better worth staying at, after all, than your modern stucco and gingerbread inventions, where men where treated more like sacks of grain than human creatures, with bones to break; and the landlady hinted that her guest must be in love, because he was always mooning about by the waterside, in Corven Wood. He was doing some bit of a painting, too, she thought; but what it was she could not get at to see, for he always locked it up when he went for these rambles. At any rate, the longer he stayed the better for them, since his purse was open, and he never asked questions about the items of his bills, only looking at the amount, and paying it, as a gentleman should do.

Mr. Caperne knew nothing of all this criticism; if he had known it, it would not have affected him in the smallest degree. When he came in one evening and found his hostess bustling about his room, in all that agony of putting things to rights which belongs to the nature of orderly housewives, he took no further notice of her movements than by holding the door open with silent patience until it pleased her to take the hint and go. That was what she complained of. He never spoke to her; never asked any questions like other strangers would; never gave her any opening to enlighten him respecting the neighborhood, as she flattered herself she could have done. He simply dismissed her with silent politeness, when she had only been anxious to put his room into something like decent order, and goodness knows it was a disheartening task enough.

"Fidget!" said Mr. Caperne, briefly, as he looked round and proceeded to undo her work. Then he went to a drawer and took out the bit of a picture upon which she had surmised him to be occupied.

Mr. Caperne worked at the picture for an hour diligently; the rush of the mill-wheel fell upon his ear like an accompaniment which custom or association had made pleasant to him. When he stopped to examine his progress, the corners of his mouth turned down with an expression which was not so much annoyance as perplexity. The girlish face was there, bent over the bunch of violets, a perfect likeness in feature and coloring; but that one expression which had so struck and haunted him, the artist could not paint. Whereas in his own mind this expression was dimly associated with wrong and suffering, while he had looked from time to time into the girl's face all idea of such words left him, and he could paint there only what was fresh and sweet and beautiful. It was a beautiful face. Examining it he wondered whether the landlady, if she had chanced to stumble upon the painting in her prying visits, would have recognized the subject of it,—the fairy for whom he stayed in the clumsy inn and haunted the Corven woods.

The red mounted into his cheeks at this thought. No, it was not for her sake, but for the acquisition of a beautiful picture. And he then looked out upon the mill, and thought that the whirling steps were like men who splash forever in the waters of their own little round, and never look beyond it, or write their mark upon the world outside.

To-day Mr. Caperne had been disappointed. Corven Wood was as bright as ever, the river like a silver sheet in the March sun, and the birds had sung his welcome as usual, but there was no fairy. He began to wonder if it were yet too late. How could he possibly finish his picture without another look at the original? And then there was the chance that they might meet—accidentally, of course—and the possibility that she would look up and give him a bow in passing; for Master Tony had found out his rescuer, and darted upon him with noisy glee, and a noisier introduction to Aunt Lucy. It was incumbent upon the artist to lose no chance of making his work as perfect as he could. By this time he had crossed the bridge, and was entering the little footpath that led to Corven Wood. And the landlady, shading her eyes from the western light, peered after him, and said, "There he goes again; I've half a mind to follow and see what is in the wood."

But Mr. Caperne was unconscious of his danger; unconscious that a crisis of his life was at hand, that he was not to return this night nor the next, nor for many nights—some of them long and weary enough, to the inn by the river.

He remembered afterwards that some sudden presentiment quickened at once his pulses and his step as he drew near the spot where the path fell steeply down to the river, and a mental speech of his own, made some days before, came across his brain like a flash of fateful meaning.

"The lad is always climbing," he had said to himself, as he watched the little figure swinging like a monkey from branch to branch. "Shouldn't wonder if I have to fish him out some day yet."

And so he had. Almost as soon as the splash and cry reached him, Mr. Caperne was in the water, seeing, as he sprang, the red cap dangling in its mocking vividness from a bramble above him. It was comparatively easy to lift the drenched boy into a position to be helped to land by the girl standing on the river's brink; but Mr. Caperne did this with his left arm, for somehow his right was powerless. And then a sudden faintness came over him; sparks danced before his eyes; the noise and rush of the mill-wheel seemed to draw nearer, deafening him; and he knew no more.

When Mr. Caperne awoke to full consciousness he was in bed in a room which turned round with him for the first few moments, and then was steady again; and at the foot of his bed there was a sturdy little chap cutting a stick, and whistling softly to himself. Mr. Caperne again closed his eyes. He began to have a confused recollection of lying on a moss-covered bank; of feeling soft hands chafing his own; of a passing glimpse into eyes darkened with anxiety—anxiety for him. He raised the hand that had been so chafed, and passed it across his lips softly; and it seemed to him that the odor of violets lingered about it still. A little while longer he lay and watched the cutting of the stick, till the boy, turning suddenly, said, "Hallo!" and began clambering upon the bed.

"You're to hush, you know," he said, with all the grave authority of a young physician. "But you're better. I'm jolly glad! Now I must go and tell—"

"Wait one moment, Tony," said Mr. Caperne. "Tell me what it's all about—and how long I've been here—and where is 'here'? it's not the inn?"

The boy laughed, and then brought his lips together with an odd contortion.

"I'm not to laugh," said he—"I don't think I ought to speak. You're sure it won't hurt you?"

"Quite sure," replied Mr. Caperne.

"Well, then," said the boy, "you fished me out of the Cor, and broke your arm. And you'd have been all right long since, but they said fever super—something. O, haven't you talked nonsense, just! There now, you're going red. I shall so catch it!"

"One word more," said Mr. Caperne,—"is this your home?"

"To be sure it is," replied Tony.

"Ah!" sighed Mr. Caperne.

The lad jumped down from the bed with as little bustle as was consistent with his turbulent nature, and went away, shutting the door gently after him; but the unwonted caution was lost upon Mr. Caperne, for he lay with his eyes closed dreaming.

"You fished me out of the Cor, and broke your arm."

He remembered it all now,—the sharp, sudden pang, the sparks before his eyes, the roaring mill wheel. How long was it ago? and who had been his nurse? he wondered. The trees in the wood were bare then, would they be green now? And his picture, and the half-finished bunch of violets, what had become of that? Mr. Caperne had painted flowers before, but never with so careful a touch. A vision rose before him of the fidgety landlady in his room; of a big duster, and brooms, and clumsy fingers, that left no corner untouched, and respected no lock. He grew hot as he thought of it, and of his own helplessness. Then all at once a blackbird began to sing in a tree outside the window, and he was back in the woods again, dreaming.

Who talks about the monotonous dreariness of a sick-chamber? Mr. Caperne would have spurned the notion if he had not been too utterly languid and lazy for so much exertion. Day after day he felt the latent life coming back to him as he lay there, dreaming. Pleasant dreams, but foolish perhaps, who knows? He never took the trouble to consider. He had visions of a gentle old lady with gray curls and a rather foreign air, whom Tony introduced as "Granny," and who purred about him in his convalescence as though her whole heart were in his comfort and his recovery. He remembered trying to utter his thanks to her; breaking down signally, and then feeling his lips silenced by the touch of the kind old hand upon them.

"You will say no thanks, mon fils," said the old lady, stroking his hair as if he had been a child. "You saved our boy; and, madcap as he is, we can never repay you for that."

"If I might see my kind host," pleaded Mr. Caperne, and assure him that I am sensible of his hospitality—"

"That, you perceive, is impossible, since my son is from home," said the old lady. "He is in Scotland, and will probably remain there for the next month, so that my patient must be content with his nurse for the present. Now I go to see after luncheon."

Mr. Caperne looked after her with a smile, and the gray curls that always shook and quivered when she talked seemed to have a sort of halo round them. He was dimly happy. The thought of his lonely wandering life, and of returning to it, did come upon him sometimes with a strange sinking of the heart, but he shook it off. He knew whose hand gathered the flowers that decked his table. They brought a sort of mist into the room, out of which there came again to him the eyes saddened with anxiety and the shadowy touch of a soft hand upon his own. He got to know in a round-about way at what hour Aunt Lucy was accustomed to gather these flowers, and then he never rested until they let him get up and sit at the window, where he could see her without being seen.

One day, in his absorption, Mr. Caperne bent forward to the front of the window, and Aunt Lucy looked up suddenly and saw him. It might have been the pathetic appeal of his pale face, and the coat-sleeve which hung at his side empty; at any rate, Lucy waved her hand with a smile that moved him like sweet music. After this he used to look out for her eagerly, and that little recognition grew to be the event of his day, the one great centre round which all other circumstances clustered vaguely, insignificant accessories, until the day came when he was to be allowed to go down stairs for the first time.

IV.

Aunt Lucy was standing beside an open French window when Mr. Caperne went into the drawing-room, and he knew at once that the easy-chair drawn up near her was for him, for the man whose past had been a hard battle single-armed, upon whose life for many a weary year had fallen no touch of gentle fingers, no whisper of womanly solicitude. There was a rose in the bosom of her light Spring dress, and a tall arum thrust forth its blossom from behind her.

Mr. Caperne saw all this in his one hurried glance. He will see it again many a time in days to come. It became for him one of those photographs which the brain has a trick of taking for our ceaseless torment or happiness. She came forward to meet him, holding out her hand, and in his eagerness he quitted the arm on which he leaned. He was weaker than he had thought. The carpet grew unsteady beneath his feet; the tall arum multiplied itself a dozen times; and, but for that outstretched hand, he knew that he must have fallen.

"You have been imprudent," said Lucy, quietly. "My mother should have kept you prisoner a little longer, though I know how weary the days must be."

It was the voice he had heard in the wood, nearer to him now, speaking to him, and about him.

"Weary!" repeated Mr. Caperne; slowly. "I think that they have been the happiest days I ever spent."

She turned from him half smiling, as Tony gave vent to a whistle of boyish contempt for such an idea of happiness.

"In that case it was lucky I dropped into the Cor," said Tony. "But it is an odd notion. I know I shouldn't like it; and I'm sure Aunt Lucy wouldn't either. Why, she's out all day long, amongst the flowers, or the pigeons, or the green ducks,—such swell ducks! Mr. Caperne. You wouldn't believe what a quacking they set up at the sight of us? But you shall see them. Here comes granny; and now, Aunt Lucy, go to the piano, and we'll have a jolly evening."

Mr. Caperne leaned back in his chair, and listened. Through the open window he felt the soft Spring air, all flower-scented, on his cheek, as he watched the tiny white clouds chasing each other, and fell into a hazy sort of speculation upon the strange chance that had brought him here; and through all his thoughts rang the music of Stephen Heller's "Sleepless Nights," full of wonderful pathos and wild abandon.

When the music ceased, and Mr. Caperne looked up, the clicking of madame's knitting-needles ceased too, abruptly. She gave him a little peremptory nod from her seat in the corner, rose up briskly, like the resolute nurse she was, and then he knew that his evening was over, and he was to be sent away.

V.

"I would rather live than merely exist," said Mr. Caperne. "If the pains are keener, so are the joys."

He did not at once get an answer from Lucy, for the "green" ducks were about her feet, gobbling up her bounty with noisy enjoyment, while Tony threw stones into the pool for a drenched retriever to bring out. Mr. Caperne might have gone on with his philosophy, but Lucy gave him her empty basket, saying lightly, "That's a slur on my poor ducks, I suppose. It is getting late, Mr. Caperne, and the little Cor hangs out foggy signals. You had better go in."

Mr. Noel Caperne followed, not quite satisfied. He wanted to say something about going away; for of course, now that he was comparatively strong again, there was no excuse for remaining; but, somehow, the words would not come. He looked back upon the days that had passed since he first left his sick-room, and wondered to find that he could not count them. He had had his puzzles and perplexities. It occurred to him one day, with a sudden sense of awkwardness, that he had never known by what name to thank his good Samaritans. When he spoke of this, stammering, Tony broke into a wild fit of nonsense, which madame checked with an uplifted finger, and a curious compression of her lips.

"You are not to thank us at all, sir. I thought I had made that plain. As to names," she went on, after a little pause, "you will say Aunt Lucy and Granny, as Tony does; or you may call me madame, after my son's fashion, if you prefer it. I am French, you know—at least I was. You should feel at home with us now, mons fils."

The quick red came up into Mr. Caperne's face at the words. Though she had used them before, yet they seemed just then to take a new significance.

"Tell me," said the old lady, softly, "is it not so?"

"Madame," said Mr. Caperne, "you have been everything to me—more than I have words to express."

He was in an abnormal and unreasoning state of mind. With Lucy he had arrived at that stage when it seems impossible to make use of any name at all, and by and by he forgot all about it. To-night, as he took his usual seat at the window and watched her closing it carefully to shut out the river fog for his sake, Mr. Caperne turned away with a great sigh, the meaning of which Tony instantly demanded.

"I'm like a spoilt child, my boy, that's all," replied the painter. "It's time to go back to school, and I'm fractious that my holiday is over."

"Holiday, indeed!" repeated Tony. "And what do you want to leave for? Hasn't Granny been good to you?"

"Only too good," he replied.

"And haven't I?" said Tony. "And hasn't Aunt Lucy? I say she has, although you wouldn't give her the portrait, you know."

Involuntarily the two looked at each other. Mr. Caperne had finished his picture, and meant to keep it; but when Lucy begged a copy of the bunch of violets, what could he do but put his heart and soul into each tiny blossom as it rose to life under his hand?

"I tell you it isn't everybody that she cuts the choice flowers for," continued the boy. "Don't you like us, Mr. Caperne?"

"Yes, Tony," he replied.

"Then what's the good of going away?" said Tony. "It's a curious thing now, isn't it?" continued the young philosopher, catching Lucy's dress. "Why does one like people?"

She only laughed and said it was a question for the chemists, but Noel Caperne raised his head quickly at that.

"You wouldn't put the wine of life into an alembic, would you?" said he. "We don't want that analyzed, I think."

He saw the faint color pass over her cheek, and leave it pale again, but she did not answer.

"To be sure," proceeded Tony, returning to the subject; "perhaps you do find it a bit dull with Granny and Aunt Lucy, but then there's me. And I can show you lots of jolly places where womankind would be afraid to venture. You don't know what cowards they are. You haven't any belonging to you?"

The painter's face grew dark. "No laddie," he replied, "I had a sister once."

"Had you?" said Tony. "Was she like you? Were you fond of her?"

Mr. Caperne saw Lucy touch the boy's lips with her finger, and he bent forward in a sudden tumult of gratitude.

"Shall I tell you about her?" he asked.

"If you will," said Tony.

"You are very quiet here," said Mr. Caperne gently. "Your life seems so calm and untroubled that it has occurred to me to wonder what you would think of my past if you knew it. What would you say if I told you I was once a murderer at heart?"

Lucy looked up at him, but she did not speak, and Tony drew nearer with a gesture of profound appreciation. Mr. Caperne put his hand on the boy's head, but it was still to Lucy that he spoke.

"You don't seem half so shocked as you ought," he said. "Perhaps in these sensation days the announcement is not very startling. It is true, nevertheless. I will tell you about it.

"My little sister was not strong, and we used to spend the hot months by the seaside. Well, in one of those months I found out that a chance acquaintance had become more to her than ever I could be or had been. You will understand that it seemed a little hard at first. She was all I had to care for in the world. The stranger was poor, but spoke largely of his hopes for the future; he was a barrister. I did what I could. I stipulated for a year's grace in which to test that large language of his, and they parted. There was a little old church standing on the top of the hill; which my sister had always preferred to the more fashionable and crowded town churches below. It was there I found her that evening when he was gone; her two hands resting on the churchyard wall; and her face looking out seaward towards the sunset; but when she turned at my footstep I knew the light that shone there was not for me any more.

"My story is not a new one. There came letters, often at first, then more seldom; at last they ceased. Twelve months after the parting in the churchyard I read of that man's marriage. He had sold himself for money. You will think, perhaps, that I should consider this giving me back my sister, and be glad; but there is a little more to tell. She was very patient and good; his name was never mentioned between us, but I knew what those solitary walks meant. I could read the listless, far-away eyes that needed many words from me before they could come back to any present interest.

"I thought I would work hard for a short time, and then take my sister abroad amongst new scenes, but I never did it. One day I heard my studio door open softly, and my poor little girl stood beside me like the pale patient ghost of what she once had been.

"'Noel,' she said, 'don't be angry with me. I want to see the little church on the hill once again.'

"I drew her down close to me and spoke of my scheme, but she only shook her head sadly, and laid it on my shoulder like a tired child.

"'Noel,' she said, 'I want to tell you something, and you must not think I am fanciful. I believe I am very ill—dying. Let me see the church once more.'"

Mr. Caperne stopped a moment to stroke the curly head on which his hand rested.

"I knew what was in her mind then," he resumed; "but I could not thwart her, and I was right. I left my sister at rest in the little churchyard on the hill, just where she leaned over the wall one balmy evening; looking out into the sunlit West; and the waves must rock her to sleep," finished Mr. Caperne, softly.

"Now, is it any wonder that I was a murderer at heart?" he said. "I wandered to and fro over the earth seeking vengeance, but I have never found him yet."

"Mr. Caperne," said Lucy, slowly, "have you forgiven?"

He looked up at her with a strange mixture of wistfulness and determination in his face.

"No, I am not a murderer now," he replied; "but I will tell you what I have done. I have knelt on the grave in the little churchyard and vowed a vow never to touch the hand of this man or any belonging to him in fellowship; to remember, as long as I live, that there is blood between us."

Lucy's heart sank with some undefinable fear and foreboding, and she put her hand on his sleeve, hardly conscious of the act.

"Mr. Caperne!" she said.

Then he forgot that there were others in the room, for he took the delicate fingers in his own, and said, "Do you blame me, Lucy? You must not—you of all people in the world. I could not lose your good opinion, and live."

No one but the person they were meant for heard those last two words; but at this juncture madame's knitting-needles, which had long been silent, were put away, and she crossed the room hurriedly, and went out. Half an hour afterwards Lucy found her standing before the portrait of a boy, painted some twenty years ago. The kind old hands were pressed together tightly, and the lips were moving; but when her daughter spoke, she only stooped, and kissed the girl's forehead, with a brief good night.

As for Noel, he was leaning against his window, looking at the moonlight over the Cor, and the gray church-tower, and the trees; and there was a strange tumult in his heart.

"Why did I tell her?" he mused. "I don't know, but I feel better for it, calmer. She did not turn away from me. She would have me forgive. Would she forgive, I wonder, in such a case? I meant to go away to-morrow, it is true, but I cannot. I cannot put the cup from my lips just yet—the opium cup which brings such dreams as mine. I do not write poetry, because every day is a poem, sweeter than mortal hand could write. The whole world has changed its face, I think. Will there be any wakening for me, I wonder? and how, and when?"

VI.

Thus was the awakening: They were bending together over the piano, Mr. Caperne carelessly turning over the piles of music, when something seemed to startle him, and he stood upright, with his hand pointing to a name, written in a bold, straggled hand, on one of the songs, "Julian Dudley."

"This belongs to—" he stammered—"tell me."

Lucy looked up at him, in sudden wonder. She did not know why, but the same instinctive terror which had smitten her at the artist's story, smote her now as she looked at him.

"Tell me," repeated Noel—"not your brother?"

"Yes," she replied; "but—"

"But," interrupted Noel, with whitening lips, "in all these books, in Tony's, and your brother's books—"

"The name is Woodfield," said Lucy. "Yes, my brother's wife was an heiress, and he was required to take her name—an unnatural arrangement, I think," she said, trying to smile. "If I were a man—Mr. Caperne, do you know you frighten me! What is it?"

Noel looked into her face once, as a man looks at a treasure which is to be taken away from him; he just said, "God help us both!" and turned towards the door. It opened as he reached it. There were sounds of an arrival in the hall, and he stood face to face with the host whom he had so longed to thank.

The eyes of this man fell as they met Noel's; there was a weak imploring gesture of his hands, and a hurried, nervous "Not here, not here, for pity's sake! Come with me."

Noel followed into the room opposite: he closed the door behind him, and set his back against it.

"Julian Dudley, I have found you at last then," said Noel.

"Caperne," said Mr. Dudley, putting up his hands deprecatingly, "listen to me!"

"At last!" repeated Noel; only to know that I have shared your roof, and eaten your bread. I wonder it did'nt choke me. I wish it had. I wish—"

"I ask you to hear me, Caperne," said Julian. "After that, load me with your curses, if you will; but hear me first. Look at me! Am I not old before my time—a broken man? Heaven is my witness that I have suffered enough to satisfy even you. You think I did a wanton and cruel thing in the days gone by. It was wicked, but not wanton. I have never loved as I did then. But even when I dared to win her, I was in debt, Noel, and knew not where to turn for money. I had been wild. You see I confess all. I could make nothing of my profession; things grew worse with me, and at last I was arrested. The only terms on which my friends would help me were that I should marry the woman, who was a good wife to a bad husband as long as she lived. Think of it. What could I do? What hope was there for that other engagement? I wrote to her," said Mr. Dudley, quickly, seeing the gathering wrath in Noel's face, "and told all, but I got no answer."

"She never had your letter," said Noel.

"I will pass over the rest briefly," said Dudley. "I gave up the profession that never had been more than a name. With my wife's fortune, there was no need of it. When I heard of your sorrow, Noel, which was my sorrow too—a darker one than yours—I thought my heart must break. We left England, and wandered about the Continent for years, till my wife grew homesick, and I bought this place. Have patience a little longer. I knew who you were of course when you heaped coals of fire on my head, and were brought here hurt. I knew also that, if you found me out, nothing would induce you to stay in the house. I told my mother the story in part—only my mother, mind; bade her keep you ignorant of the name as long as possible, and I went to Scotland. They told me you were going away last week, or I would not have come home."

"The work was done," said Noel, grimly. "I had found you out; your presence was not needed to teach me whose guest I had been."

"Hear me out, Caperne," said Dudley. "I have had a hope; I have prayed for it to come true. I hoped that in time you might take happiness from my hands, as you once took sorrow. Noel, I am humble enough; let me have your pardon."

Noel laughed, a hard metallic laugh, with no mirth in it. "I vowed a vow on my sister's grave, Mr. Dudley. I owe you a double debt now: the wreck of my own life as well as that other one. Ask forgiveness elsewhere."

He opened the door and passed out into the shubbery, where he had walked so often with Lucy. He put up his hand over his eyes, for her face met him at every turn as he had seen it last, when she said that he frightened her. There was a little path leading from the shubbery into Corven Wood, and Noel took it. He went away far into the wood, and threw himself down in that very spot where first the childish accents of appeal had reached him; and the little Cor ran brawling by, the mill-wheel sang in the distance, and all the wood was full of pleasant sounds. Imagination plays strange tricks with a man at such times as these. He heard the babbling of the river, and the mill-wheel, and the birds, but plainer than any of them there rang through his brain one sentence, spoken by a voice which he must never listen to again, "Mr. Caperne, have you forgiven?"

"No, he had not forgiven; he could not forgive. In that evil hour Noel said hard things of the fate that had brought him hither; the fate he once thought so wonderfully happy. He did not fully know yet the heaviness of the blow that had fallen upon him; he was like a man stunned and only half conscious; shrinking from the examination into his hurt, which yet he was aware must come. He knew now what was that ghostly resemblance which had so troubled him at first, both in Tony's boyish features, and afterwards in Lucy's face as she bent over the violets. At that thought Mr. Caperne sprang up to leave the wood which he might never see more; he went away along the path to the bridge under which the stream ran sullen and dark—there he paused to look round, and he said, with his eyes far away beyond Corven Wood, "Never again—never!"

VII.

Five years since Noel Caperne found Julian Dudley's name on the bit of music; five years since he lay on the grass, reviling the pleasant music of the wood, which jarred upon his misery; and he was back again; gray amongst his hair, weariness in his look and listless gait; back beside the brawling Cor, wondering dimly what had brought him there; stirred to the very bottom of his soul by the sweet and bitter memories that hung about the place, but rigid as ever in the resolve that he had written its lines by this time in his face. He wandered about the wood until the evening dews began to fall; then he saw the foggy signals rise on the breast of the Cor, and remembered the voice that used to warn him of their danger. What on earth had he come here for? He crossed the bridge, and heard the familiar wheel, without wishing to hear it. He got away to the old inn by the river, and asked for lodging. At first the landlady stared at him as she would at a stranger in that quiet place; then suddenly, with a start, she gave him the usual courtesy, and led the way to his old room. Mr. Caperne paused on the threshold, and held back.

"Can't you put me somewhere else?" he said, with a little impatience. "But no, never mind; perhaps this is best after all."

The landlady thought so too. She watched him throw down his knapsack wearily; she tried in vain to tempt him in the matter of supper; and when his persistent replies that he wanted only rest and quiet, and should remain but one night, drove her to the last extremity, she went forward with some hesitation and unlocked the drawer which used to contain the artist's mysterious painting.

"If you please, sir," she said, "the packet."

"The packet?" repeated Mr. Caperne, vacantly. "I left none that I am aware of."

"No, sir," she replied; "but the young lady—Miss Dudley—Miss Lucy, as she is called about here—"

"Well, what of her?" said Noel, turning sharply from the window.

"Nothing, sir," said the landlady; "only she left this; it's years ago now. We were to forward it, but we never could find out where. We've kept it safe, sir, and I'm sure—"

"Thanks," interrupted Noel. "Leave it, please. Good night."

When the landlady was gone, Noel got up and locked his door. He stuck his hands together roughly as he sat down again, for they were trembling, and then he opened the little parcel which Lucy had left. Noel laid it down upon the table beside him, and put his hands over his face, with a gasp. It was the little painting he had done for her—the bunch of violets. Did ever flowers look at him with eyes like those before? For the moment, when the woman first spoke, it had flashed across him that she was going to tell him Lucy was dead. He sat there terror-stricken still at the shock. It had never occurred to him in all these years that she might suffer even as his little sister suffered. His own misery, his own pride and vengeance, left no room for such a thought; but it came to him now, as he sat with her token before him, and remembered all. What had he done? He never knew how long he sat there; the landlady declared that she heard him walking up and down all night like a madman, or some one who had committed a great crime, as indeed, who could answer for it that he had not? But it was late in the morning when he left his room, sane enough to all appearance, dressed very much as he had been used to dress five years ago, and took the path towards Corven Wood, careless of the curious eyes that watched him.

It was in the sweet freshness of early Summer that Noel Caperne passed once more into the well-known shrubbery, and found Lucy amongst her flowers. She stood up when she saw him, and then the color left her face, and she drew back the hands he would have taken.

"Lucy, Lucy!" he cried, "won't you speak to me? Won't you forgive me?"

"I have nothing to forgive," said Lucy, coldly. She had been stronger than the little girl who was at rest in the churchyard on the hill. And then, seeing his altered looks, she added, faltering a little, "My brother—"

"What drew me hither, Lucy? I could not know that I should find my poor little painting waiting for me, rejected. You have conquered through your token; take it again from me."

A little while they stood silent, Lucy trying to be calm, Mr. Caperne to read the face that changed so often. At last he spoke again.

"I have loved you so long and so well, Lucy; I have been so wretched a wanderer; give me hope."

"Your vow?" said Lucy, briefly.

"Was wicked, and ought not to be kept," said Noel. "I wait to give my hand to Julian Dudley if he will take it. Let me see your face that I may know if I am forgiven."

She raised it to him simply, with the sunlight on it, and he put out his arms.

"You will not send me away, my love?" said Noel.

"No," was the low muttered reply.

THE GRÆFENBERG MEDICINES ARE INVALUABLE. GODBE & CO. HAVE THEM.

PATENT

ARION PIANOFORTE

GRANDS AND GRAND SQUARES,

7⅓ OCTAVES.

The "ARION" is the very best Piano for the Great West, because it stands in tune longer than any other Piano. It requires no repairing or regulating; shipping any distance, or dampness does not affect them.

WHY?

It commences where the "First Premium" Makers stop, and upon the most improved Modern scale makes four patented improvements: which make the Arion more simple, yet stronger; increasing its volume and beauty of tone, while rendering the instrument more enduring.

WHAT THEY ARE.

First. The patent Arion Reversed Wooden Agraffe Bridge, which retains all the purity of tone only found in a wooden bridge (the rest whereon the strings lay), and obtains all the solid prolonged strength of tone of the metal Agraffe, without that acute metalic noise which the metal Agraffe develops by use.

Secondly. The Patent Arion Compound Wrest-Plank, which holds the tuning pins, is six thicknesses of hard maple, the grain of each layer runs in a different direction. The advantages are, the 20 tons strain of the strings cannot split our Arion wrest-plank, as frequently happens in other Pianos, and when people say "My Piano won't stand in tune," all other makers must use the single wrest plank with the grain running only one way.

The Arion Tuning-Pins have end wood to hold them on every side, while all other makers can have it only upon two sides of their pins.

Thirdly. The Patent Arion Diagonal Sustaining Bar, extending parelled with the steel strings under the over strung Bass strings. The Arion is the only Piano wherein the enormous strain of the large steel strings is resisted in the natural place and direction. Using this bar renders the weakest part in all other over strung Pianos the

STRONGEST IN THE ARION.

Fourthly, The Patent Arion Iron Frame concentrates all the metal in front of the tuning pin line, and its frame is let into (butted) the front edge of the wooden wrest plank, thereby preventing the great strain of the strings upon it from splitting or moving it one particle. All other "Full Iron Frames" cover the entire wrest plank, and when it is split it cannot be seen, the wood of the Arion wrest plank is seen.

THE ARION STANDS UPON ITS OWN MERITS.

unsupported by either humcome, weak facts, or useless or complicated Patents. We append a few unbought opinions of those who

KNOW THE ARION.

The Musical Director of the New York Conservatory of Music, Edward Mollhaver, says: "The Arion I bought of you is the best Piano I ever played on; that rolling bass and silvery treble, etc."

John H. Woods, Piano Dealer, Oswego, N. Y., says: The tone is truly immense, and I surpasses anything in the shape of a Piano we ever saw or heard of, etc."

Horace Greely said: "The Arion is the best Square Piano, superior for its clearness and brilliancy of tone," &c.

Louis Wagner, Fort Leavenworth, says: "My Piano arrived here in splendid order. Its tone fills my parlor with melody—it is the wonder and admiration of all who hear it. Miss ——, who is teaching the Piano desires me to order one for her," &c.

HORSE POWDERS.

These celebrated and renowned powders for horses and cattle have been tested by an intelligent public for sixteen years. Hundreds of the principal horsemen of the Union have pronounced them the only Condition Powders safe to use and work the horse. There is nothing in them to expose the animal, but, on the contrary, everything to improve them. The proprietors of horse railroads, omnibusses, and stage owners in all the principal cities use them; and their combined testimony stamps them one of the wonders of medical science. Letters sufficient to fill a small book are in our possession, testifying to their goodness. Merchants are requested to warrant them, and refund the purchase money should they fail to give satisfaction.

Ayer's
Hair Vigor,
For restoring Grey Hair to its natural Vitality and Color.

A dressing which is at once agreeable, healthy, and effectual for preserving the hair. Faded or gray hair is soon restored to its original color with the gloss and freshness of youth. Thin hair is thickened, falling hair is checked, and baldness often, though not always, cured by its use. Nothing can restore the hair where the follicles are destroyed, or the glands atrophied and decayed. But such as remain can be saved for usefulness by this application. Instead of fouling the hair with a pasty sediment it will keep it clean and vigorous. Its occasional use will prevent the hair from turning gray or falling off, and consequently prevent baldness. Free from those deleterious substances which make some preparations dangerous and injurious to the hair, the Vigor can only benefit but not harm it. If wanted merely for a

BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES

"A SLIGHT COLD," COUGH, Hoarseness, or Sore Throat which might be checked with a simple remedy, if neglected often terminates seriously. Few are aware of the importance of stopping a Cough or "slight cold" in its first stage; that which in the beginning would yield to a mild remedy, if not attended to, soon attacks the lungs.

The efficacy of Brown's Bronchial Troches is demonstrated by testimonials from Physicians, Surgeons in the Army, and eminent men wherever they have been used.

They were introduced in 1850. It has been proved that they are the best article before the public for Coughs, Colds, Bronchitis, Asthma, Catarrh, the Hacking Cough in Consumption, and numerous affections of the Throat, giving immediate relief.

PUBLIC SPEAKERS & SINGERS will find them effectual for clearing and strengthening the voice.

Your Troches are too well and favorably known to need commendation.

HON. CHAS. A. PHELAS, Pres. Mass. Senate.

My communication with the world has been very much enlarged by the Lozenge which now I carry always in my pocket; that trouble in my Throat (for which Troches are a specific) having made me often a mere whisperer.

WE ARE GROWING OLD TOGETHER.

BY MARY CLEMMER AMES.

We are growing old together;
There is silver in thy hair,
In the whiteness of my temples
Life hath left its lines of care.
We are growing old together,
Thou art beautiful to me;
We are growing old together,
Am I beautiful to thee?

We are growing old together:
When you held my plighted hand,
Life wore a look of splendor
Unseen on sea or land.
By the pain of the lamenting
That the summer could not bring,
With the ripeness of its fruitage,
The brightness of the spring;
By the lovely hope we buried,
By the dying child we kissed,
I love thee best, my dearest,
For what thy life hath missed.

We are growing old together;
When we drop the body's veil,
The one will wait the other
Within the silent pale.
Into the grand Forever
Together we will glide;
No power in the ages
Our being can divide.
We shall grow young together;
What poet ever sung
The rapture of Immortals,
Who love, forever young!

THE FIRST CRIME.

BY JOHN ROSS DIX.

There was bustle in the sleeping-room of young Ella Lane, a dodging about of lights, a constant tramping of fat, good-natured serving-maids, a flitting of curious, smiling little girls, and a disarranging of drapery and furniture not very often occurring in this quiet and tasteful corner.

An arch-looking miss of twelve was standing before a basket, selecting the choicest flowers. On the bed lay a light fleecy dress of white. Immediately opposite a small fireplace sat a girl of seventeen, in half undress. Immediately behind the chair of the young lady stood a fair, mild-looking matron. There was a smile upon the mother's lip, a pleased, gratified smile, and yet half shadowed over by a strange anxiety that she strove to conceal from her happy children.

At last the young girl was arrayed, each braid in its place, and the wreath of purple buds falling behind her ear, her simple dress floating about her slight figure, her white kid gloves drawn upon her hands, and fan, bouquet and kerchief all in readiness. The large warm shall had been carefully laid on her shoulders, the mother's kiss was on her cheek, and a "don't stay late, dear," in her ear; she had nodded good-bye to all, but when on the bottom stair she paused.

"I'm sorry to go without you, mamma."

"I am sorry that you must, dear. But I hope you will find it very pleasant."

"It will be pleasant, I have no doubt. But, mamma, I am afraid you are not quite well, or perhaps," she whispered, "you have something to trouble you; if so, I should very much like to stay with you."

"No, dear, I am quite well, and—" Mrs. Lane did not say happy, for the falsehood died on her lips, but she smiled so cheerily, and her eye looked so clear and bright as it met her daughter's that Ella took it for a negative, as she sprang into the carriage.

When Mrs. Lane turned from the door the smile had entirely disappeared, and an expression of anxious solicitude occupied its place. She paused beneath the hall lamp, and pulling a scrap of paper from her bosom, read—"Do not go out to-night, dear mother; I must see you. He will not come in before eleven—I will be with you by ten." It was written in a hurried, irregular hand, and was without signature; but it needed none.

"My poor, poor boy!" murmured the now almost weeping mother, as she crushed the paper in her hand and laid it back upon her heart. "It may be wrong to deceive him so; but how can a mother refuse to see the son she has carried in her arms and nursed upon her bosom? Poor Robert!"

Ay, poor Robert, indeed, the only son of one of the proudest and wealthiest citizens of New York, and yet without a shelter for his head!

Mr. Lane had lived a bachelor, until the age of forty-two, when he married a beautiful girl of eighteen—the mother whom we have already introduced to our readers. She was gentle and complying, hence the rigid sternness of his character seldom had an opportunity to exhibit itself. But the iron was all there, though buried for a time in the flowers which love had nursed into bloom above it. The eldest of their children was a boy—a frank, heartsome, merry fellow—a lamb to those who would condescend to lead him by love, but exhibiting even in infancy an indomitable will that caused the young mother many an anxious foreboding. But as the boy grew towards manhood a new and deeper cause for anxiety began to appear. To Robert's gayety were added other qualities that made him a fascinating companion; his society was constantly sought, first by the families in which his parents were on terms of intimacy, and then by others, and still others, till Mrs. Lane began to tremble lest among her son's associates might be found some of exceptional character. By degrees he spent fewer evenings at home, went out with her less frequently, and accounted for his absence less satisfactorily. Then she spoke to him on the subject, and received his assurance that all was well—that she need not be troubled about his falling into bad company; but she was troubled.

There was at evening a wild sparkle in the boy's eye and an unnatural glow upon his cheek that told of unhealthy excitement. but in the morning it was all gone, and his gayety, sometimes his cheerfulness, fled with it. Mrs. Lane was anxious, but she confined her anxiety to her own bosom, not even whispering it to her husband, lest he should ridicule it on the one hand, or on the other exercise a severity which should lead to a collision. But matters grew worse and worse constantly. Robert was seldom home till late at night, and then he came heated and flurried, and hastened away to bed as though his mother's loving eye were a monitor he could not meet. She sought opportunities to warn him, but he feared and evaded them, and so several more weeks passed by—weeks of more importance than many a lifetime. Finally Mrs. Lane became seriously alarmed, and consulted her husband.

"I have business with you to-night, Robert," said Mr. Lane, pointedly, as the boy was going out after dinner, "and will see you in the library at nine o'clock."

"I—I have—an engagement, sir. If some other hour—"

"No other hour will do. You have no engagement that will be allowed to interfere with those I make for you."

Robert was about to answer, perhaps angrily, when he caught a glimpse of his mother. Her face was of an ashy hue, and a large tear was trembling in her eye. He turned hastily away, and was hurrying along the hall; but before he had reached the street door her hand was on his arm, and she whispered in his ear:

"Meet your father at nine, as he has bidden you, Robert, and do not, for my sake—for your mother's sake, Robert—do not say anything to exasperate him."

"Do not fear, mother," he answered, in a subdued tone; then as the door closed behind him, he muttered, "He will be exasperated enough with little saying, if his business is what I suspect. What a fool I have been—mad—mad! I wish I had told him at first, without being driven to it through waiting; but now—I will make one more attempt—desperate it must be, and then, if the worst comes, he will only punish me. That I can bear patiently, for I deserve it; but it would kill my poor mother—this he must not tell her!"

Mrs. Lane started nervously at every ring of the door-bell that evening; and when at nine she heard it, she could not forbear stepping into the hall to see who was admitted. It was her husband, and only waiting to enquire of the girl if Robert had yet come in, he passed on to the library. Mrs. Lane found it more difficult than ever to sustain conversation; she became abstracted, nervous, and when her few evening visitors departed, she was so manifestly relieved that Ella inquired in surprise if anything had been said or done to annoy her. It was past ten, and Robert had not yet appeared. Finally the bell was pulled violently, and she hastened to the door herself. With livid lip and bloodshot eye her son stepped to the threshold, and starting at sight of her, he hurried away to the library without giving her another glance. How slowly passed the moments to the waiting mother! How she longed to catch but a tone of those voices, both so loved, that she might know whether they sounded in confidence or anger. What Robert's course had been she could not guess, but she knew that he would be required to give a strict account of himself, and she dreaded the effect of her husband's well known severity. A few minutes passed (they seemed an age to her), and then she heard the door of the library thrown open, and a moment after a quick, light step sounded upon the stairs—it was Robert's.

"You are not going out again, my son?" she inquired.

"Father will tell you why I go, dear mother," said the boy, pausing, and pressing her hand affectionately. "I must not wait to answer questions now." He passed on till he reached the door, then returning back, whispered, "Be at Mrs. Hinman's to-morrow evening, mother;" and before she had time to ask a question, or utter an exclamation of surprise, he had disappeared up the street.

But poor Mrs. Lane was soon made acquainted with the truth. Mr. Lane was somewhat vexed with himself for not perceiving his son's tendency to error before, and like many others, he seemed resolved to make up in decision what he had lost by blindness. It was this which had caused his sharpness when he made the appointment, and he considered his dignity compromised when nine o'clock passed and his son seemed resolved on acting in open disobedience to his command. When the culprit appeared, he demanded peremptorily a full confession, and Robert gave it. He had fallen into gay society, then into vicious, and he was not the one to occupy a minor position anywhere. Wine and wit had reduced him, and in an evil hour he sat down to the gaming-table. He had played at first a trivial stake, then more deeply, and had that night plunged in almost past extrication. At any time Mr. Lane would have been shocked, now he was exasperated, and spoke bitterly. At first Robert did not retort, for he had come in resolved on confession and reformation; but finally, repentance was drowned in anger, and he answered as a son, particularly as an erring son, should not. Then a few more words ensued, unreasonable on both sides; Mr. Lane asserting that debts so contracted were dishonest, and should not be paid, and Robert declaring that they should be paid if he gamed his life long to win the money; till finally the old man's rage became uncontrollable. It was in obedience to his father's command that Robert left his home that night with an order never to cross its threshold again.

For two or three weeks Mrs. Lane, now and then of an evening met her son at the houses of her friends, and then he disappeared almost entirely. Since the first disclosure she had never mentioned Robert's name to her husband; and Ellen only knew that some angry words had estranged her father and brother for a time—she was ignorant of Robert's guilt and danger.

The evening on which our story commences Mrs. Lane had intended to spend abroad with her daughter, but had been prevented by the receipt of the note before mentioned. Robert had never been home since he was commanded to leave it, and though anxious both about the cause and result, she could not but be rejoiced at the thought of seeing him again in her own private sitting-room. She had many things, too, to learn respecting his manner of living, and his intentions for the future.

While Mrs. Lane walked up and down her little sitting-room, wishing that ten o'clock would come, her son entered his small, scantily-furnished apartment in a decent boarding-house, and throwing himself on the only chair within it, he covered his face with his hands. For a long time he sat in this position, then he arose, and taking down a pocket pistol, carefully primed it and laid it beneath his pillow. Immediately, however, he took it out, charged it heavily, and laying it on the table, folded his arms and gazed upon it, muttering, "It may be needed when I least expect it. I have at least one friend while this is by." Then muffling himself up, he hurried into the street, and soon reached his father's door, where he stood in hesitation.

He rang. The girl started when she opened the door, but gave no other signal of recognition. Robert inquired after Mrs. Lane. In a moment afterwards he leaned his forehead on his mother's knees.

"Is it any new trouble, Robert?" she inquired, tenderly; "any new—guilt?" she whispered, bending her lips close to his ear, and placing the other arm over his neck. "Tell your mother, Robert—she will help you. O Robert, you know she will love you and cling to you through it all!"

The boy raised his head, and now she saw, for the first time, the change that had come over him. His face was haggard, his eyes sunk and bloodshot; that round, rosy cheek, which her lips had loved to meet, had grown pale and thin; and in place of the gay, careless smile had arisen looks of anxiety and bitterness.

"I shall break your heart, mother," he said, sorrowfully, "and poor little Ella's too! O, it is a dreadful thing to murder those one loves best! I never meant to do it; try to remember that, dear mother, will you, whatever comes."

"I do believe it, Robert."

"Ah! you know only a small part yet; but I could not go away without seeing and telling you. I knew you would learn it from others."

"But surely, Robert, you have nothing worse to tell me than I know already?"

"You know that night my father summoned me to his library? I had told my companions it should be my last among them; I promised myself so, and I repeated it to my father, and I would have kept my promise, I would. But you know how it turned out. It did seem dishonorable to refuse to pay those debts. I left him, and then I was desperate. I was determined to have the money, mother, and I got it."

"How, Robert?"

"Not honestly."

The boy's voice was low and husky, and his face was of a deathlike paleness.

A faintness came over her, but she gaspingly articulated:

"How, Robert?"

"By forgery! No matter for the particulars; I could not tell them now, and you could not hear. To-morrow all will be discovered, and I must escape. But I never meant it should come to this; I thought I could have paid it."

Mrs. Lane made a strong effort, and murmured, brokenly:

"To-morrow! O, to-morrow! O, my poor ruined boy!"

"I know that after-deeds cannot compensate, mother; but if a life of rectitude, if—"

Robert paused suddenly, and his father entered the room. A cloud instantly gathered upon his countenance.

"You here, sirrah! What business brings you to the home you have dishonored?"

"I came to see my mother, sir."

"It is the last time then," said Mr. Lane, sternly.

"The last time!" echoed Robert, in a tone of mocking bitterness.

"The last time!" whispered the white lips of the mother, as her husband left the room, and she slid to the floor, lightly and unresistingly. Robert raised her head to his bosom and covered her pale face with his tears.

Mrs. Lane was awakened by the warm drops raining on her face, and starting up wildly, she entreated him to be gone.

"I cannot go to-night, mother. I waited to see you, and so lost the opportunity. It is too late to take a boat now. I shall go to some of the landings above when I leave here, and in the morning go aboard the first boat that passes."

So deeply were both engaged, that neither the merry voice of Ella in the doorway, nor her step along the hall, reached them. She entered.

"Robert! you here, Robert?"

But neither Mrs. Lane nor Robert spoke—the boy only strained his sister convulsively to his heart.

"Alas! my poor Ella," sobbed Mrs. Lane, "our Robert has come home now for the last time—we part from him to-night forever."

"Forever!" And Ella's cheeks turned as pale as the white glove which she raised to put back her curls from her forehead.

Robert then made the same confession to his sister that he had already made to his mother.

"You!" exclaimed Ella, almost scornfully, springing to her feet, "you, Robert Lane, my brother! Is it so, mamma? Is my brother a villain, a forger? is he—"

"Hush, Ella, hush!" interrupted Mrs. Lane; "it is for those who have hard hearts to condemn, not for you, my daughter. There will be insults enough heaped on his poor head to-morrow; at least, let him have love and pity here."

"Pity! Whom did he pity or love when he deliberately—"

Ella stood for a moment, white and trembling, and then flinging herself into her brother's arms, exclaimed:

"I do pity you: but the disgrace may be avoided. Papa will, of course, shield his own name. I will go to him directly."

Suddenly breaking from him, she hurried up the stairs. Along the hall she went, but when she reached her father's door, she paused in dread. She could hear his heavy, monotonous tramp, as he walked up and down the room; and remembering his almost repulsive sternness, she dreaded meeting him. At last she opened the door and burst forth:

"Come down and see Robert, papa—come and save him! They will drag him away to prison for forgery, and you will be the father of a condemned criminal, and I his sister. O, do not let him go away from us so! Come, do see him, and you will pity him—you cannot help it."

"Forgery, Ella! He has not—"

"He has! and you must save him, papa; for your own sake, for all our sakes!"

"Do you know this, Ella? It is not true. It is a miserable subterfuge to wheedle money from his mother to squander among the vile wretches whom he has preferred to us. No—send him back to his dissolute—"

"Is that the way to make him better, papa?" inquired Ella, raising her head and fixing her sparkling eyes on him resolutely. "You sent him back to them before, you shut the door on him. There were none to say 'Take care, Robert!' and no wonder they have made him what he is. Robert has committed a dreadful crime, but it was when you, who should have prevented it, had shut your heart against him. If Robert is put in prison, I would almost as soon be in his place as yours."

"Ella! Ella!"

"I should, papa. I know you cannot do wrong without feeling remorse. You must forgive Robert, and you must save him and us the disgrace of an exposure."

"I will avert the disgrace while I have the power, Ella, but that will not be long, if he goes on at this rate. Do you know the sum he asks?"

"He asks none. I ask for him the sum that you refused before."

"Well, then, give him that and bid him depart."

"And may I not tell him you forgive him?"

"No."

"That you pity him?"

"No!"

"May I not say that when he is reformed he may come back to us and be received with open hands and heart?"

"Say nothing but what I bid you, and go."

Ella returned to her brother.

"There is the money, Robert," flinging the purse on the table; "and now you must go back with me and say to our father that you are sorry you have made him miserable."

"He will turn me from the door, Ella."

"And do you not deserve it?"

"Ella!" interposed the tender mother.

"I do—that, and more."

The excited girl clasped both hands over her brother's arm and led the way up stairs, while the trembling mother followed. When they entered Mr. Lane's room, the old man sat in his arm-chair, leaning over a table and resting his forehead upon his clasped hands. The heart of the erring boy was stricken at the sight. The sorrow that he had brought upon his mother and sister had been duly weighed, but his stern father had never been reckoned among the sufferers. A loud, convulsive sob burst from his bosom, and he threw himself, without a word, at the old man's feet. The mother drew near and joined her son, and Ella, first kissing her father's hand, placed it on Robert's head.

"You forgive him, papa—you forgive poor Robert? He shall never act wickedly again, and he is your only son."

Bowing his head on the shoulder of his son, the old man wept aloud.

"Stay with us, Robert," at last he said; "stay and make yourself worthy of the love that forgives so much."

Men never knew by what a very hair hung Robert Lane's welfare—that a mere breath alone had stood between him and ignominy. Years afterwards, when he was an honored and respected citizen, no one knew why he should ever turn to the erring with encouraging words. But yet a white-haired man, who watched his course with an eagle eye, might often have been heard muttering to himself, with proud and wondering affection:

"This, my son, was dead, and is alive again; he was lost, and is found."

TITHING AND CONSECRATION.

BY ELI B. KELSEY.

In view of the present demand for tithes, and the prospective call for consecrations upon the members of the Church of Latter-day Saints, we wish to offer a few reflections upon the subject of tithes and consecrations. Heretofore, it has been taught that the revealed law of tithing required the payment of the tenth of the entire productive labor of the members of the Church. This is not true, nor can any law, requiring the faithful to so tithe themselves, be truthfully gathered from any revelation ever given upon the subject. The Saints are required by the revealed law to pay into "the Lord's store-house" the tenth of their INTEREST annually.

The first revelation on this subject—that any more than incidentally mentioned tithing in connection with the law of consecration—was given at Far West, Missouri, July 8th, 1838, in answer to the question: "O Lord, shew unto Thy servants how much Thou requirest of the properties of Thy people for a tithing." The answer of this prayer—after reiterating in general terms the law of consecration given February, 1831—goes on to say.—"And this shall be the beginning of the tithing of My people, and after that, those who have been thus tithed, shall pay one tenth of their interest annually, and this shall be a standing law unto them forever, for My Holy Priesthood, saith the Lord."

We perceive, by the above quotation, that the tenth of the "interest" of the productive labor of the Saints was all that the Lord required as an annual tithe, after they consecrate all their surplus properties to begin with. The first requisition was simply (see Revelation given Feb. 1831, page 124) to,—"consecrate of thy properties;" but the covetousness of the people was such that this indefinite law met with but little response, and gave rise to endless divisions of opinion on the subject. The Revelation of 1838 settled the subject as definitely as it possibly could do. It does not authorize any person to determine what another man's tithing amounts to. It leaves that to be settled by the person himself, who is called upon to tithe.

These revelations, like all the rest given in this dispensation, throw the responsibility to act honestly and nobly, in his dealings with his God, directly upon the individual upon whom the requisition is made. It does not authorize any living man—be he priest or High Priest—to sit in judgment on the affairs of a man, where his conscience alone must be judge. It does not create a master, or masters, to dictate what the conscience of the believer allows or does not allow, unless his conscience permits him to trespass upon his neighbor. Should a man, in the free exercise of his rights of conscience, so trespass, litigation would be the result. The Priesthood in that case have the power to interfere, as "peace makers," and as the defenders of the innocent and unjustly treated.

Having settled the question as to who shall be the judge of how much or how little of a man's properties shall be considered "surplus," let us come to the question of how much the laws of God require as a man's tithing.

The "surplus" of a man's property was all that was required as a beginning of the principle or law of tithing. In answer to the question propounded, the Lord said,—"I require all the SURPLUS property." That which was not surplus property, was not required. The poor were not to be burdened by this law. Now, let us enquire what the word surplus means. The Lord says: (Doc. & Cov., page 124, Par. 10,) "And, again, if there shall be properties in the hands of the Church, or any individual of it, more than is necessary for their support, after this first consecration," etc., etc. Here, then, we have the answer as to what is to be considered as "surplus property." No requisition for property is to be made of the poor who have not any more property "than is necessary for their support."

Now, suppose that we claim that the words,—"one tenth of all their interest," mean a tenth of the total sum of a man's income, then we must admit that the law of tithing requires more than was ever contemplated by the law of Consecration itself; for by that law the surplus, only, is demanded. This way of interpreting Tithing requires a tenth of the sum of our labors, whether that labor produces a sufficiency or an insufficiency for our support. There would be manifest injustice in such a law. If the "surplus" only, was required in the first great requisition of the law, then the tenth of the annual surplus is all that the law of tithing contemplates. The "tenth of all their interest" means the tenth of all their surplus from each year's labor, over and above what "is necessary for their support."

For the better elucidation of this subject, let us suppose that a man's labor produces one thousand dollars per year, and that the "necessary support" of himself, and the loved ones dependent upon him, requires the expenditure of the whole of that one thousand dollars. If, then, the sum of the product of his labor is to be tithed, which will amount to one hundred dollars, it is clear that he must either suffer for some things necessary for his support, or run into debt for the one hundred dollars. How long would it take before a man would be in bondage at that rate?

Our views of the laws of tithing may be objected to by some—not because they are not true views, for they cannot be denied—but because if the fact is admitted that a tenth of the surplus of a man's income constitutes his tithing instead of a tenth of the total sum, it would so far decrease the aggregate amount paid into the "Lord's store-house," as the tithes of His people, that the sum would not be so large as at present. We freely admit that for the present, at least, the vast sums now paid yearly to the Trustee-in-Trust would not be realized; but this would be of little consequence, inasmuch as the Church has a greater mission than the mere accumulation of funds. On the other hand, we claim that were the members of the Church made to feel that a spirit of liberality, generosity and consideration governed the raising of Tithing and other funds, it would so enlarge their sympathies that if the poor paid less the rich would give more; men, generally, would be more conscientious in the settlement of their tithing, and the principle would be found to have compensations on every hand.

We come now to the principle of Consecration, which, indeed, should have been considered first; for the law of Tithing is not, as some imagine, a "school-master" to bring us to the higher law of Consecration. The law of consecration is, as the Lord said, (Doc. & Cov., page 223,) "the BEGINNING of the tithing of my people." We simply yield to the prevailing idea entertained by many of our brethren and speak of it as the "higher law."

Light is not further from darkness, nor white from black, than is the true interpretation of the law of consecration from that interpretation which is being impressed upon the people of this Territory. It is taught, generally, to our people that Consecration means the giving up of ALL their property into the hands of the Trustee-in-Trust, who is to give back to them such portion of it as he may see proper to return to them, which portion they are to hold in trust for him, to be used at his sole dictation, or at the dictation of the Presidency, which means the same thing. Now let us enquire what the Lord has said about the amount of a man's property that is subject to the law of consecration:

"If thou lovest me, thou shalt serve me and keep all my commandments. And, behold, thou wilt remember the poor, and consecrate of thy properties for their support, that which thou hast to impart unto them with a covenant and a deed which cannot be broken; and, inasmuch as ye impart of your substance unto the poor, ye will do it unto me, and they shall be laid before the Bishop of my Church and his counselors. * * * * And it shall come to pass, that after they are laid before the Bishop of my Church, and after he has received these testimonies concerning the consecration of the properties of my Church, that they cannot be taken from the Church agreeably to my commandments: every man shall be made accountable to ME, a steward over his own property, or that which he has received by consecration, inasmuch as is sufficient for himself and family."—Doc. & Cov., Sec. XIII., Par. 8.

Judge ye, Elders of Israel, which law of consecration is right—the Consecration as above enunciated, which is full of truth, justice and mercy, or the law as now taught by the Priesthood, which requires all of our substance to be laid at the Apostles' feet, with but "one pocket for the whole Church" and that dictated by the Presidency through the Bishops?

The law of the Lord, as above quoted, calls upon the rich to open their hearts for the benefit of the poor, and to place means in their hands, so that with industry and economy they may render themselves independent, and be stewards unto God over their own property. The law, as now interpreted, reduces not only the poor but the rich also, to the condition of TENANTS AT WILL, and places them in bondage to their fellow man. The Lord says, (Doc. & Cov., page 281,) "Therefore, it is not right that any man should be in bondage, one to another, and for this purpose have I established the Constitution of this land, by the hands of wise men whom I raised up unto this very purpose, and redeemed the land by the shedding of blood."

It will be seen at a glance that the Consecration required in the paragraphs which we have quoted, is a Consecration solely for the benefit of the poor, and it will also be seen that the property consecrated is to be deeded directly over to them and not to the Church, although the deeds are to be laid before the Bishop. Here then is the object of all the Consecration required. All Consecration for other purposes than the relief of the poor, has no authority so far as the revelations of Joseph Smith are concerned. It is true that he says that if there are properties in the hands of the Church after the poor are supplied, more than is necessary for their support, it can go to build houses of worship and purchasing public lands for the benefit of the Church, etc. This is only just and right, and none can object to such a disposal of all that the poor do not require. We should have no objection to doing the same with the surplus means of any other "poor fund," and Consecration, first and last, is nothing more than a grand poor fund as taught in these revelations. How far it is practised in that light all can judge for themselves.

Furthermore, the Lord, in giving a law of Consecration and Tithing, never intended to create a vast monied power in the midst of the Church, to be placed in the hands of an irresponsible agent acknowledging no power in the Church to call him to account. For better information on this subject, we refer our readers to a study of the paragraphs already quoted.

MY CREED.

I hold that Christian grace abounds
Where charity is seen; that when
We climb to heaven, 'tis on the rounds
Of love to men.

I hold all else, named piety,
A selfish scheme, a vain pretence;
Where center is not, can there be Circumference?

This I, moreover, hold and dare
Affirm, where'er my rhyme may go,
Whatever things be sweet or fair,
Love makes them so.

Whether it be the lullabies
That charm to rest the nurseling bird,
Or that sweet confidence of sighs
And blushes made without a word.

Whether the dazzling and the flush
Of softly sumptuous garden bowers;
Or by some cabin door or bush
Of ragged flowers.

'Tis not the wide phylactery,
Nor stubborn fast, nor stated prayers,
That make us saints; we judge the tree
By what it bears.

And when a man can live apart
From works, on theologic trust,
I know the blood about his heart
Is dry as dust.

REPLY TO ORSON HYDE ON APOSTACY.

BY E. L. T. HARRISON.

To the Editor of the Telegraph:

How oppressive and cruel was the Priesthood in heaven in casting out the "Son of the Morning" and his adherents, by coercion, for the very slight offense of differing a little in opinion from the ruling powers in that country. And how very unwise was that priesthood in thus protecting its own union! Would it not have been far better for Lucifer to remain in heaven with all his difference of opinion, causing a very agreeable variety in the midst of the heavenly throng? Would not earth thereby have been relieved from the constant warfare we have now to wage against that nice old gentleman? Would not such a heaven be a desirable home for us poor, weary and worn out earthly pilgrims after the journey of life is ended? A constant war of words and war of sentiment would chain us to endless strife! Oh, what bliss, what raptures, and what sweet strains of celestial music must fall upon the ears of the ransomed throng! * * * * * * * * *

Lucifer is full of argument to-day against the alleged injustice done him by his expulsion. He murmurs against and accuses his legitimate Head. His mind is fruitful in thought and word, and there is no end to his sayings; and for all of these, he will be destroyed. * * * * * * * * * * *

Springtown, Nov. 28, 1869. ORSON HYDE.

In the above correspondence, Elder Hyde wishes to defend the right of the Priesthood to cast out of the Church any who differ with them in opinion, to do this he refers to the case of the Almighty casting the Devil out of heaven, which to his mind is a perfectly parallel affair. The argument stands thus with him: Lucifer differed with God who cast him out. Certain parties have differed with Brigham Young, who, therefore, has an equal right to cast them out of the Church. Inasmuch as Lucifer had no right to grumble at the Almighty's decision, those who are cast out of the Church for differing with President Young have no more right to object to his course. Orson Hyde here makes a very common mistake; he simply forgets to prove that the Almighty and Brigham Young are one and the same thing.

Elder Hyde, of course, has never thought of the difference between Brigham Young and the Almighty. It is this difference that makes all assertions that he can act as absolutely as Jehovah perfect folly. The Almighty possesses boundless wisdom, infinite knowledge and eternal justice. All His laws are absolute truth. There is no possibility of error or injustice in any of His decisions. To object to them, is, in every case, to object to the TRUTH itself. Is this Brigham Young's case; can he make no mistake; can he commit no injustice? The Almighty's wisdom is spread out in scenes of unutterable power and grandeur throughout the Universe. We bow the heart and the head before them in speechless adoration at the perfection of beauty and unfailing skill they display. Is there any comparison between opposing the will of this immutable One and objecting to the opinion of an earth-born mortal like ourselves, who has manifested his liability to failure, both in his official and private acts—like all other men—in a score of ways? To disobey a man like this, Orson Hyde thinks a parallel case to differing with Jehovah—the majestic center of all life, power and wisdom.

Elder Hyde would, perhaps, reply that if the Priesthood are so immeasurably below the Almighty, in wisdom and ability, they still hold His Priesthood, or His authority and should, therefore, be obeyed like Himself. But this is nonsense. As all intelligent persons will see the Almighty can confer authority, but he cannot confer His own ability and intelligence with it. That is a question of time and growth. Hence, no mortal ever did or ever will receive authority to demand unlimited obedience, because he cannot receive unlimited wisdom to guide him in the use of it; and authority conferred without proportionate wisdom is despotism, tyranny and enslavement to mankind.

Inasmuch as it is argued by the believers of unquestioning obedience to the Priesthood, that our declaration that a Divine Movement has been started by the Almighty for the correction of the present abuse of power by the Priesthood and their known lack of spirituality, must be false, because God's Priesthood never will be allowed by Him to lead the people astray; we shall now prove, first that the Presiding Priesthood can go wrong; and, secondly, that when wrong, the evil can only be corrected through new channels of divine communication opened up to the People.

To suppose that the presiding Authorities never can by any possibillity go wrong, is to ignore the plainest facts of history. It is well known that the presidency of the ancient church did lead the people astray; and did it, too, by establishing Elder Hyde's doctrine that the Head is always right, and that to oppose him is, like Lucifer, to rebel against God. Having got the people in this helpless condition, so that they feared to oppose them lest they should offend the Almighty, the ancient Priesthood by degrees increased their claims to absolute authority, till they built up the most monstrous system of priestly tyranny the world has ever heard of. This very state of things was not originated by the Church of Rome in the days of its power, but was started by the very Authorities who survived the apostles, and who were ordained directly by them, or by those whom they ordained. It is a mistake to suppose that every person that received a legal ordination from the apostles, or those that were appointed by them, was killed off. Scores and hundreds of men whose ordinations could be traced as directly to the apostles as many of ours can to Joseph Smith, were then alive. The Seers and Revelators it is true were killed off the same as ours was in the case of Joseph Smith. The remaining Authorities did just what ours did, the next highest in authority claimed to lead the Church. And greater or less manifestations of the Holy Spirit were given for a long time; so that the Church was acknowledged of God about as much as ours has been. It was during these early times that the Presiding Priesthod, by the aid of this very doctrine of unquestioning obedience—which our Authorities are now trying to force down on the people—lead the church astray. If this can be done once it can occur again. It was the same priesthood and authority that went wrong that now exists in our midst. Their priesthood was obtained from Peter, James and John the same as ours. Our priesthood have received no promise that they shall be exempt from error, or false measures, any more than theirs. God has, indeed, promised that our institutions shall never pass away—and they never will; but He has not said that He will never need to correct the policy of those presiding.

Some, who admit that the Priesthood can err and introduce measures opposed to the will of Heaven, argue that God will always correct the Priesthood through themselves. The answer to this is, if the Priesthood can lose sufficient of the spirit of their priesthood to permit their introducing wrong measures in the first place, the same loss of the spirit of their religion will prevent their being set right afterwards. If men are stubborn enough to resist the gentle influences of the true spirit when it is strongest within them, will not the same stubbornness more than keep out such divine influences when they have weakened in their hold and have been partially driven away? How then shall the priesthood be corrected through themselves?

We will now show that the right of all men to refuse to obey the Priesthood any further than the wisdom of God is manifested in their dictations, is the only safeguard the Church or even the Heavens themselves have from perversion of the truth Let them once establish the doctrine that all views in opposition to that of the presiding authority are, of necessity, in opposition to God, and it must follow that unless they can always COMPEL the President to keep right, the Heavens have shut themselves off from the control of the people, and any Presidency can do as they please; for God cannot get at the people through the Presidency, neither can He speak through any below them in position, for directly He does so, they are in a position to denounce all such inspiration as being "of the Devil." By establishing such a doctrine God, Himself, would therefore be shut out from the correction of any evil by His own act. If for no other reasons, then, such a doctrine is monstrous and impossible.

But the question will arise with some,—If God calls a man to preside, cannot he keep him from going wrong? Without a moment's hesitation we reply, No! God can keep no man from going wrong. If God could compel man to go right by the exercise of His Divine Will, He could force a million on the same principle; and there would be no need of waiting thousands of weary years for a millenium. The agency and natural characteristics of a man called to preside over God's Church can no more be forced than that of any other man. The spirits of all men are governed by the same invariable laws. It is an eternal truth, to which there is no exception that God cannot inspire a man with any principle of truth, unless he yields himself to it, and throws his whole nature open to its reception, Angelic influences are soft, gentle and tender. They can force nothing. All that God or Angels can do with any man is to work in harmony with his natural development; and as fast as he seeks for truths of any particular kind, pour in suggestive thoughts by which he can travel step by step to higher principles. If a man's mind is shut against any particular order of truths, the whole Heavenly world combined cannot open it, any more than ten thousand men could force a flower to open before it was ready. If it opens properly it must open of itself. The same principle applies to visions and inspired dreams, as much as to enlightenment coming through the mind. They cannot be given, to answer a divine end, unless the mind is in a receptive condition If, then, a President of the Church be wrong, he cannot be set right by any of these means. If, for instance, his feelings and desires go out incessantly after temporalities, he cannot be made to see the beauty, loveliness and necessity of spiritual principles; and the people under him must, for the time being, famish for the bread of life.

But some will inquire, supposing this to be the case, and that God could not get at such a man owing to his mental condition, could He not send an angel and cause him to see him visibly and thus force him to know his will? To this we reply that God certainly can and does send angels, but no men can see one if He does do so, unless he is a Seer by nature. The present President of the Church is not a man of this order and could not see an angel if a thousand stood by his side. And if he could, it is not the policy of the Heavens to force things in this way. Unless a man's heart is filled with a sense of the excellence and propriety of a truth which God wishes to communicate, He does not wish him to teach it, inasmuch as he would, under such circumstances, proclaim it merely like a parrot. It would be the dry word —the letter which killeth; it would lack the spirit which giveth life. Under these circumstances, then,—angels, visions, dreams, impressions all being impossible—God has no alternative but to raise up fresh channels of communication with the people as fast as circumstances present themselves and the minds of the people are ripe for such changes.

But, if—as is the case with our Church—the Presiding head has, by the influence of his position—and the aid of his assistant rulers whom he has carefully selected to that end—built up in the minds of the people a belief that all opposition to his views is of necessity opposed to God; then —inasmuch as the masses cannot be appealed to by their inspirations—is the way hedged with such difficulties that the people are hopelessly enslaved; and the evil must be allowed to go on until its very oppressiveness compels them to believe that it is possible that such a system may be wrong, and by thus emancipating their minds prepares them to accept light and truth from other sources than the Presiding Authorities. This is the philosophy of our situation to-day, and the reason why things have been allowed to go on as they have in the past, and the reason why, at this period of our history, a heavenly message through new channels of communication is necessary. It can come in no other way.

This argument of Orson Hyde's about Lucifer is a very opportune one, for it serves to illustrate the weak kind of groundwork upon which the advocates of unconditional obedience build. They always assume that the very question is proved about which they propose to argue. For instance, in this case the question in dispute is:—Is the President of the Church entitled to the same implicit obedience as that required by the Almighty himself. This is the point to be settled. Orson Hyde, instead of settling this question, concludes at once that Brigham has the same right to obedience as God; and begins to talk about the Almighty's rights as if this had anything to do with the question what President Young has a right to do? If it was proved that the President of the Church did stand absolutely in the place of the Almighty to us, and that he possessed God's infallibility, God's matchless wisdom and goodness, it would be important to know what the Almighty did with Satan, as that would be a precedent for Brigham Young to go by. But seeing that neither he nor any other man that ever lived, ever did possess these qualities of the Almighty or the right to stand in His place, and act as absolutely, the argument is useless and falls to the ground.

And mark, reader, that the arguers of blind obedience always make this same fatal mistake; always take for granted that it is already proved Brigham Young's dictations are the same as God's, whereas this is the point to be proved. They refer to a number of men to whom God spoke personally, and who of course obeyed without question. And they say triumphantly,—"look, here is a proof that the President should be obeyed unconditionally. Do you not see that directly God spoke to these men they obeyed?" They refer to the fact that God spoke to Abraham, and that Abraham obeyed without question. Suppose that he did, it was God who spoke to Abraham and not man, and that made all the difference. Suppose that Abraham, instead of God, had spoken to some one else, and the individual had not been sure that Abraham told God's will correctly, would he have been under the same responsibility to obey Abraham that Abraham was to obey God? Is there no difference between having God speak to us personally, and getting His will second hand? Abraham was sure that it was God's will that was presented to him. He had no room for doubt—he, therefore, was under obligation to obey. Now, we have never had any objection to obeying even unconditionally when we have no doubt that it is God who speaks. Nor have we any objection to obeying Him in the Priesthood, when we are certain that it is God's will that is presented to us. All that we claim is that we have a right to be sure that the President's dictations are the will of God before we obey them; and it was for asserting this right, and teaching it to others that we were cut off from the Church. Any one can see that in the cases of Lucifer and Abraham, both knew that it was God's will that they were called upon to obey—theirs are, therefore, not parallel cases to ours. Whenever we know assuredly, like they are assumed to have done, that it is God who speaks, we will obey passively and without question. All sensible persons will see at once that this view of the case disposes of Elder Hyde's Lucifer argument at once and for ever.

There is another argument now being extensively used by the advocates of passive obedience. The case of the Israelites and their passive obedience to Moses is cited as an example of what God requires of us. As a proof that we have no right to use our reason with respect to the requirements of the Priesthood, we are reminded that the Israelites were commanded to walk seven times round Jericho and blow on ram's horns. We are told that, unreasonable as it appeared, blind obedience to this requirement brought down the walls of that city. In both of these cases the quoters forget that we are not under the law of Moses, or any of its conditions. We are under a Gospel dispensation, a "law of liberty"—a law which pre-supposes freedom of thought, and which appeals only to the highest qualities of our nature. This was not the case with the Israelites. They were serfs just redeemed from Egyptian slavery, with ideas no higher than to worship a golden calf—they were fit only for blind obedience, and consequently were handled by the Almighty just as children always have to be; mechanical, unquestioning obedience, was required of them; and it was the best thing for people in their semi-civilized and ignorant condition. But when ages of higher civilization had arrived, and a nobler race was on the earth, Jesus came, the harbinger of a new era. Before him and the new light which he brought, all such childish, mechanical requirements, as walking round walls and blowing on ram's horns, and every other unreasoning requirement of the lower priesthood passed away. Under the influences of his grand dispensation of life and freedom, man stepped forth disenthralled, ransomed and redeemed from blind obedience for ever. Its chains and manacles passed away and were buried with all the rest of the barbarian code fitted to those times. And they never shall be resurrected. It is the voice of Jesus which cries to-day,—"Children, arise! be free! awake to life and liberty!" They that ask us to lay our reason at their feet, can know but little of the liberality of his great spirit. There is no precedent in his church for the absolute control of body, soul, brains, talent and means, as aimed at by our priesthood. To find a precedent for such demands, they have to go back to the barbarian days of Moses, or prophets of his class. Jesus, Peter, John and James, men of the higher priesthood, put forth no such claims. They are utterly without precedent or foundation, and must pass away.

In closing, let us say that we do not wish to have it inferred because we differ with Orson Hyde or any other of the Twelve that we imagine they are bad men. Doubtless, Bro. Hyde fully believes what he says. What we say to Orson Hyde is, that he and his brethren of the Twelve have surrendered their judgment and inspiration into the hands of one man, and thereby shut off the opportunity for God to get at them. He and they are unwilling to trust their own inspirations for fear they should lead them astray. If their inward light reveals to them anything contrary to the teaching of President Young, they are afraid to receive it; hence, God has no means of correcting any wrong principle through the Twelve. Although told by Joseph Smith that they "form a quorum EQUAL in power and authority to the First Presidency," they fear to assert their right, and let God speak through them, consequently there is no redemption for this people through that quorum, because under the influence of the delusive doctrine that the President must be always right, they have manacled their own hands, and are in captivity like the rest. And as it is with the Twelve, so is it with the other quorums—all have accepted this same false dogma. All have, therefore, placed themselves in a position where their own light and inspirations are useless to them, for they have laid it down as a fixed truth, that all revelations to themselves which differ with the dictates of the President must be false. Hence God can reveal nothing to them that they will accept except it agrees with the policy of Brigham Young. On this account the President holds the key of the position, and the Heavens are locked outside, so far as correcting any error is concerned. This is the situation of affairs, and there being no alternative God has called upon men holding lower positions in the same priesthood to do His work. He has spoken again to us as a people. His voice is now ringing through our mountain vallies proclaiming a day of spiritual emancipation, of which great fact by the DIRECT revelations of Jesus Christ to myself I am a personal witness.

WHO GETS ANGRY FIRST?

We remember hearing a story of an old man who was in the habit of attending a society and listening to discussions which everybody knew were above his comprehension. He was asked how he could take any interest in such proceedings, seeing, from his education and opportunities, he could not be supposed to be capable of judging who was right in the case. The old fellow replied: "But I can tell who is right; I notice who gets angry first, and, of course, he is the one who is wrong."

Let this point rest in the minds of the people. Let them remember the old man's adage, and—in the intellectual contest coming along—notice who gets angry first. The angry side, or the abusive side, is always the weak side. The side which has to curse, anathematize, and call those who differ with them by names which it would sully our paper to write; that is the side which gets angry first, and is, of course, the wrong side.

Up to this moment—as the files of our MAGAZINE will prove—we have gone calmly along reasoning in simplicity and avoiding personalities of all kinds. On the other hand, we have been loaded down with abusive epithets and denunciations from every pulpit, and the vilest insinuations from the press. There is no harm in this to us; there is, in fact, great good in it. The public will see who gets angry first. They will need no one to tell them that, men who feel they stand in the majesty of truth, who know that Jehovah is their leader and their reward, can afford to look calmly on and say to the troubled waves of thought: "Peace, be still." There is no noise, or clamor, or vindictiveness in their feelings—no necessity for proving their opponents corrupt with those who know they hold the sword of Reason and of Truth within their grasp. They know their words will cut where they go, "dividing between the joints and the marrow," and why need they denounce any living soul? If any man thinks he has more light than themselves, they are glad of it if he has, and sorry for him if he has not. In the Divine Movement now at our doors, the Church will rise to the grand position that she will never stoop to petty denunciation of individuals as a means to aid her cause. She will stand on the ground of principles alone. She will spread out such an array of principles of light and reason—so scientific, so simple, so natural, so agreeable to every instinct of our true natures, and so heavenly in their character that she will fearlessly say without bitterness or anger to one and all—apostates or otherwise—depart in peace; it is your right to surpass my principles if you can; and this is the course our denouncers would be able to take to-day, did they feel the omnipotence of truth within them. The common sense way to cut the ground from under the feet of "apostates," or persons of that kind, is to surpass their reasonings by better ones, and drown them in the sea of their own arguments. This ought to be easy enough for men who claim to hold keys of divine revelation, or these keys of revelation must be useless affairs to mankind. It is ridiculous to talk of men being guided by the glorious inspirations of a higher world, while they are stooping to personal abuse to gain their ends. It is God's own demonstration that men are destitute of His heavenly spirit and His presence and His aid, when they have to fight with the weapons of malice, and uncharitableness, and descend below the rank of gentlemen, much more below that of messengers of a High and Holy world. The potent, scathing words of Jesus come in here,—"By their fruits shall ye know them."

THE MANIFESTO---A REVIEW OF THE TESTIMONY.

BY EDWARD W. TULLIDGE.

Weekly I take up my pen with pain. I would shun this conflict of thought, if I dared. I would fly to a distant land, rather than engage even in an intellectual warfare with the leaders of the people. But a higher Will than mine own subdues me to its purposes. It is, I believe, the Will of God. Well, therefore, can I appreciate the mental struggle through which my brethren, Elias and William have passed, and understand the might of the Supreme Mind which overrules them and forces them onward to their work.

I believe that this phase of the case touching the testimony which my friends have recently published, is but very indifferently realized by those who are so fierce and vituperative in their warfare against them. There are some who treat the case as one in which there is nothing involved but the will of man, and the disordered state of mind of a few dissenters. And yet never was there a testimony made that bore a stronger reverse of this.

If there is a point more touching than the marked integrity upon the face of the testimony of William Godbe and Elias Harrison, it is the Divine injunctions embodied in all the circumstances of the case. Here are men met at the very onset by a world of obstacles, the potency of systems, the might of a tremendous organization of earthly priesthood, and a state of things the very opposite to that which they believe the Heavens have designed to bring about. If God is not with them, we all know they must come to shame. There can be no two opinions upon that point; and even the affected contempt as well as vindictiveness manifested by some men towards them, is abundant evidence of an appreciation that their cause is utterly hopeless unless God is in it. It would be madness to believe otherwise. If it is merely an apostate or revolutionary movement, the result will be but as a petty agitation in the mighty ocean when a tiny stone is cast into its depths. Potent men need not trouble themselves or be wrathful; for if God is not with Elias and William their testimony will not amount to as much as the shaking of the green leaves in Spring by a passsing breeze.

Yet does their testimony, from these very considerations, come with the force of its great integrity, bearing the Divine injunction under which my brethren believe they stand. There may be some consistent question as to whether they are self-deceived, but none as to whether they are honest.

Now, the question of integrity, touching this testimony, seems to be the first point to be settled in the case, for at the second stage of the investigation we are met by the positive assurance of knowledge. The Witnesses declare that they have together demonstrated the great fact of immortality and held actual communion with angelic beings.

This brings me directly to speak of my friend Elias, for in the experience and mental preparation of the man, we shall find as much consistency, touching the Testimony, as in the particular circumstances of the Church which have given to the Heavenly world cause for its direct answers to himself and William S. Godbe.

No man is better acquainted than myself with the great mental travail of years which came in the life of Elias Harrison concerning the Divinity of the Mormon mission. With a soul attuned by Nature to sublime conceptions, with a mind endowed with idealities that sought their substantial forms in another life rather than in this, the supreme theme of immortality, and its endless resources of being, has possessed him from boyhood.

Who can answer to my soul concerning the mysteries of these Divine intentions of our mortality and take me into the certainties of the life to come?—where shall I travel to find out God? This was the very burden of his soul. These questions had a broader scope than the mere desire to discover whether or not Joseph Smith was a Prophet, but, being his disciple, the questions of his mind assumed a special form. Hence, in England, twelve years ago, his pen was engaged in unfolding the "Tokens of Divinity in Mormonism," and his mind soared to heaven to trace those tokens out. Perchance even then he found higher conceptions of truth than many of his brethren would endorse. There was also in the man a scientific spirit as well as a fine endowment of idealistic thought, and this made him somewhat of a sceptic. Yet at every stage of his mental growth, infidelity became immersed again in faith. From the very necessities of his own nature he was impelled onward, year after year, in search for the positive evidence of the Divinity of Mormonism, and the infallible proof of the life hereafter. Indeed, both his preaching and writings for the last twenty years have been as much the mighty exercise of a soul to find out God, and to grasp in the firm hand of its own experience the evidence of a future life, as of a minister of the Gospel laboring to bring others to the light of a new dispensation. It is the simple fact that from his very boyhood up to the Autumn of 1868, Elias Harrison labored as much to convince himself of the Divine mission of Joseph Smith as to convince others thereof. At the date named, the glorious truth of immortality and of angelic administration, was clearly manifested in his experience, in connection with his compeer William S. Godbe. Thus we see in Elias a mental preparation of twenty-one years, all directing towards the Divine consummation in his life concerning which the two Witnesses have sent forth their manifesto to the world. Here, then, we find a very strong mark of the integrity of the testimony, for the result in the life of Elias is not of apostacy, not born of passing doubts and dissatisfaction touching the present state of the Church, be that state good or bad. It is the culmination of a life, the last great struggle of a soul bursting at length the veil which separates the inner from the outer world. Bishop Budge, Charles W. Penrose and a host of our English and Scotch Elders can bear witness that I have, without embellishment, simply stated the case of my friend. Let us now couple with him William S. Godbe, noting the testimony of Apostle George Q. Cannon, given at their trial, confirmatory of the foregoing, and in itself a strong evidence of the facts and circumstances set forth in their recent MANIFESTO.

Up to December 1864, Elias and myself had for years shared a common experience of association of mental struggles, of kindred thought. At that date Providence brought about the remarkable connection between Elias and William referred to by Elder Cannon at their trial. Their history since is that of two men, one of profound thought and a scientific mind, the other of great commercial capacity and universalian religious views, trying to reconcile the state of the Church with their conceptions of its proper mission. And yet they held firmly to the Divinity of the Mormon dispensation, maintaining orthodox views concerning the constituted authorities of the Church. They saw inconsistencies, it is true, but believed that the future would reconcile all in some glorious issue. In the meantime they sought to tone their own natures and thoughts down to a harmony with the present state. I cannot do better at this stage of our review than to reproduce the statement of their experience from the Manifesto itself. They say:

We have perceived that a steady and constant decline was taking place in the manifestation of the spiritual gifts, as well as in the spirituality of our system as a whole, and that as a Church we were fast running into a state of the most complete materialism. We felt that the working out of our system was small and insignificant compared with the grandeur of the programme as announced by Joseph Smith. The broad and liberal system which, in the earnestness of our souls, we had embraced so many years ago, with its grand and universalian invitation to men of every creed and nation to come to Zion for a home in our midst, was being practically ignored, and in the stead thereof was being built up a wall of bitterness and hate between ourselves and the rest of the world. The constant growth of such principles as these, and the certainty that under such conditions Mormonism never could fulfill that great destiny of salvation to the world, for which we had prayed and labored, gave us great pain. But, feeling assured of the divinity of our system in its origin, and fearful lest we should ignorantly oppose the will of God as manifested through his servants, we tried, from time to time, to close our eyes to the facts before us, and sought earnestly by every kind of argument to convince ourselves that we were wrong. We continued thus vainly striving to reconcile ourselves to the inconsistencies around us, until the facts forced themselves so overwhelmingly upon our minds, that we were driven from every stronghold and reluctantly compelled to admit the truth of these convictions.

What a mighty echo from my own life, my own intellect, my own heart bears witness to Elias! And not only from mine, but also from thousands of Mormon Elders will there yet come a response to this thrilling strain of the testimony. The genuineness of this part of the Manifesto, scarcely even the authorities can question, so palpably true is it in all the circumstances of the case. The experience, the appreciation and the mental struggles of nearly all the Mormon Elders have more or less answered to this since the death of Joseph, or after the close of their missions abroad. Men whose missions have shaken Europe and built up a "kingdom," after twenty years of labor for the world's good, without purse or scrip, have found themselves at last seemingly further away from the reign of Christ and the glory of Zion than when they began their Evangelical career. The apostles know that this is true however much they may try to hide it from themselves to-day. If they doubt their hidden assurance, let the Parley Pratts, Orson Pratts and Wilford Woodruffs review to-day their prophecies, their sermons, their writings, and their private journals to see if they expected, a quarter of a century ago, to reach in 1870 their present materialistic state. And if this materialistic state be the proper one for this earth, then have all their preaching, writing and prophesying been in vain, and their entire mission, which they once deemed a divine act, would end in a solemn farce. But the Heavens themselves have witnessed unto Elias and William that this shall not be, for the old prophesies of Joseph, Brigham, Heber, Parley, Orson and Wilford concerning Zion shall in effect, be all fulfilled. This brings me directly to the testimony of the reopening of communication between the celestial world and the people whom God gathered expressly to build up Zion. Touching the times of their spiritual ignorance and darkness common to all Israel, they testify thus:

During all these times we sought earnestly for light from above, our first and last prayer being that we might never be allowed to oppose the truth, and earnestly, and continually examined ourselves to see whether pride, selfishness, selfwill, or any impurity of thought or deed, prevented our seeing the wisdom of President Young's measures, or receiving a testimony of their divinity. At last the light came, and by the voice of angelic beings accompanied by most holy influences—and other evidences that witnessed to all our faculties that their communications were authorized of God—we were each of us given personally to know that, notwithstanding some misconceptions and extremes wisely permitted to accomodate it to the weaknesses of mankind, "Mormonism" was inaugurated by the Heavens for a great and divine purpose; its main object being the gathering of an inspirational people, believing in continuous revelations, who, with such channels opened up, could at any period be moulded to any purpose the Heavens might desire; and out of whom, with these opportunities for divine communication, could be developed the grandest and the noblest civilization the world had ever seen. We also learned that the evils we had seen in the Church truly did exist, but that they would pass away before the light of a clearer and greater day of revelation and inspiration which was about to dawn upon our system.

This indeed, is a marvellous testimony concerning which I have received ten times more direct evidence of Jesus, of Joseph, and of the fact of communication with angelic beings than in all the previous twenty years of my Mormon experience.

I have shown in this part of my review, by the known facts of their lives, that the mental travail of Elias Harrison and William S. Godbe was merely a personal experience having not, to their knowledge, at first the remotest reference to any Divine call to set others in the right path. Upon this phase of their testimony, I will dwell in the next stage of our reviews and mark the striking resemblance between the cases of Joseph, Elias and William, all of whom sought to Heaven for personal light, but received also light which shall be given to a world in the revelation of Jesus Christ.

Public Meetings.—The first of a series of public meetings, for the fuller exposition of the principles advocated in this Magazine, will be held on Sunday, Dec. 19th, in the Thirteenth Ward Assembly Rooms at half past eleven in the morning; and in the Masonic and Odd Fellows Hall, in the upper part of Commerce Building, owned by Kimball & Lawrence, situated on East side of East Temple Street, at half past seven in the evening; all are invited to attend.

MINERAL DEVLOPMENTS AND THEIR TENDENCIES.

BY W. H. SHEARMAN.

For many years it has been customary to hold up the histories of Spain, Mexico and Peru—and, strangely enough, California has lately been added to the list—as examples of the evil tendencies of a sudden influx of the precious metals; and, to day, there are those who triumphantly point to them as evidences of the inevitable demoralization and poverty which would ensue to us from the discovery and working of these minerals in our Territory. Inasmuch as a great deal of physical, mental and moral suffering and, to some, pecuniary loss have, more or less, attended all extensive auriferous discoveries; the assertion is plausible that such developments in Utah would result in the temporal ruin and moral degradation of its inhabitants. Before proceeding further we wish it distinctly understood that it is not the development of the precious metals in our midst that we so specially advocate or desire, as those of the more useful and solid kind. The true policy is to utilize all our resources,—mineral, agricultural or any other kind that Nature has endowed us with, and that can be made remunerative. But the previous assertions, coming at this peculiar time, are worthy of a little investigation and exposition.

While fully admitting that the thirst for gold is degrading in its tendencies and destructive of the finer and holier impulses of our nature, there is no evidence that it is any more so when the coveted metal is obtained by mining than when gained through many other occupations deemed legitimate and respectable, though in many instances really less honorable—such as "Wall street gold transactions," speculations in stocks, grain, etc. The latter pursuits are quite as morbidly exciting as the former, and much oftener lead to dishonesty and ruin. The laborious part of "gold digging" is, we are aware, a merely mechanical, unintellectual employment, that does not qualify the individual for any other useful sphere of life. But this will apply equally to many other kinds of labor which, like placer gold mining, are only used by intelligent persons as stepping-stones to something better. There is no real reason why digging for gold or silver should be any more demoralizing than digging for iron or lead, or excavating the foundations for a building. One is just as honorable as the other; the evil, if any, is to be found in the men, not in the occupation.

The Spanish nation and people experienced very great evils consequent upon the discovery and conquest of Mexico, Peru and other parts of the American continent, a great portion of which was due,—not to the precious metals so abundantly discovered, but to the inconsiderate, unjust and cruel means by which they were obtained. Multitudes deserted Spain to seek sudden fortunes in the New World, without any knowledge of the climate, people or resources of the country to which they were going, and entirely unprepared for the difficulties, dangers and labors of their enterprize. The result was, thousands found graves where they expected to find fortunes; thousands more dragged out a miserable existence in the newly-discovered regions; while a few returned to Europe broken in spirit and in purse.

It is said that the treasure taken to Spain from its American colonies led to extravagance and effeminacy; and that this, combined with the emigration of many of her subjects, and the rapid extension of her colonies, resulted in moral and social corruption and political weakness and ruin.

The so-called argument deduced from the foregoing by the opponents of mineral developments in Utah, is this:—"The discovery and working of gold and silver mines ruined Spain and injured more of her citizens than were ever benefited by them; therefore, the discovery and working of such mines in Utah would bring the same evils upon its citizens."

The argument as above stated, containing only one premiss, is incomplete. To make the conclusion deducible the second premiss should be inserted, making the argument read thus:—"The discovery and working of gold and silver mines ruined Spain; such developments always produce similar effects; therefore, etc." If, as we believe, these premises can be proved untrue, the conclusion is false.

As before stated, the evils produced cannot, legitimately, be directly charged to the treasures obtained. Nearly all the miseries endured by the fortune hunters of that age were the results of their own corruption, violence and ungovernable passions, and were not more than they deserved to suffer. By prudence, justice and industry, they might have acquired fortunes and founded bloodless and permanent empires. But aside from this, they were far from home and the base of their supplies; in the midst of a hostile people, laboring under every disadvantage which their own ignorance, imprudence and wickedness could heap upon them. Gold and silver are, in themselves, not only harmless but beneficial; but the manner of obtaining and the use made of them, produced all the evils complained of.

Now let us compare the relative positions, circumstances and motives of the Spaniards and the Utonions—supposing the precious metals to exist in this Territory. The Spaniards had to take long and dangerous journeys, at great expense, to reach the site of operations; we are already upon the ground. They commenced by robbing and murdering those who had already labored for the coveted treasure; we should be honestly and industriously developing the resources of our own mountain region. They eagerly sought for the precious metals, almost entirely regardless of agriculture; we have developed our agricultural resources first, thus laying the foundation for the sustenance of those who may labor at mining or other pursuits; so that the opening of mines would be a blessing to the tillers of the soil quite as much as the latter would be to the workers of the former. Most of the wealth extracted from the New World was, for a long time, sent to the Old World to be expended there; it is not too much to expect that should such resources be opened up in our midst, most of the means thus obtained would be expended in otherwise improving our Territory and the circumstances of its inhabitants. In short, there is no one point of resemblance—not even, it is to be feared, in the richness of its mines!

The next illustration to be considered is that of California. It is said that the mineral counties are poorer than the agricultural ones, and are asking the latter to pay their debts. The only possible object there can be in referring to this statement is, to attempt to show that California owes her prosperity more to her agricultural than to her mineral resources. All who are acquainted with her history must know this to be false. Had it not been for the discovery of the precious metals within her borders, California would not have had anything like the population she has to-day; so that neither in numbers, wealth, influence or power would she have been what she now is, no matter how much attention she might have devoted to her agricultural resources. The miners made the farmers, stock raisers and merchants rich, by furnishing them a profitable market for their produce, stock and merchandise. The statement that the mining counties are unable to pay their debts proves nothing for the other side of the question. We all know that public expenditures are met by taxation. It is a very easy matter to tax a man's farm and stock, because he cannot put them in his pocket, and tell you he has none. But, while hundreds of miners made a great deal more money than most farmers, the proceeds of their labor, as well as that of the less fortunate, unavoidably escaped taxation in most instances. Here the County and the State were the losers, not because mining produced less actual wealth than agriculture, but because of the inadequacy of the means adopted to secure to the public exchequer the portion that rightfully belonged to it. Besides this, most of the wealth extracted from the California mines was expended in other Counties, States or Territories than where it was obtained, which is seldom the case with agricultural districts. This is not so much the case to-day; and, as permanent settlers occupy the lands and develop the riches of the mining regions, the public funds will increase.

The foregoing are the principal reasons of the impoverished condition of the treasuries of the mineral counties of California. It is true that agriculture, horticulture and manufactures, have been profitably engaged in, to a greater or less extent, and that they helped to swell the revenues of that State; but they could not and would not have been so extensively, speedily and successfully established, had it not been for the previous discoveries of gold.

Let us now inquire what the probable effects would be, to the people of this Territory, of the discovery of the precious metals within her borders. As before remarked, our citizens would be saved the expense and dangers of a long journey to the field of their labors, and the temptations incident to protracted absence from home and domestic associations. It is not unreasonable to presume that at least two thirds of the wealth thus obtained would be, directly or indirectly, expended in developing the other resources of the Territory. Many who are too poor at present, would, had they the means, open new farms, build houses, beautify their homes, import machinery, establish factories to supply home demand, and, in a thousand ways add to the prosperity and comfort of the community. Mining would not retard agricultural enterprise; on the contrary, it would impart a new and very powerful impetus to it, by furnishing the farmer and the gardener a profitable market for their produce. Even the distant regions of Montana, Idaho, Nevada, and Arizona have given to many of our farmers the means of obtaining necessaries and comforts, which they must, otherwise, have done without for years. The only danger to be apprehended would be from placer diggings, on account of the injury they would do by using the water necessary for irrigation, as well as that resulting from the class of adventurers they generally attract —though we feel abundantly able to adopt such wise precautions as would guard against any improper encroachments by the class referred to. But we are thankful for the assurance that there is no present prospect of such discoveries. The kind of mines we believe will be extensively developed here, are such as will be subject to taxation as much as any other property; and, therefore, will directly benefit the State as well as the individual. Who cannot see that the temporal condition of all classes would be greatly improved by the opening up of new industries and fresh and permanent avenues to wealth.

The foregoing remarks are made because all the objections to mineral developments in Utah are particularly directed against gold and silver, and not, as before stated, because we are specially anxious to have them found. We are not aware that any one objects to the discovery and manufacture of iron, lead, copper, coal or salt, which, with a great variety of other materials that will yet yield a profitable revenue, are abundant in our Territory; but, if the more precious metals should prove abundant also, why should we not thankfully accept and wisely use the blessings Providence has thus placed within our reach? We believe that the manufacture of iron might be made profitable here, as the freight, even by the railroad, must be a very heavy protective tariff. It is also said that coal can be advantageously exported west. Copper would certainly pay; and a tin mine would not only be a source of immense wealth to its discoverer, but a great benefit to this and surrounding Territories.

It may be objected that such enterprises as these would need capital to carry them on, and consequently, the poor would be but little benefitted thereby. Even supposing capitalists did control such works, they would have to employ hundreds of men, who would be able to command fair wages. But there is no necessity for this. Men can co-operate in mining as well as in merchandizing; and though they might not have the means to purchase the necessary machinery for crushing or smelting, yet they could sell the ores, at the mine, to capitalists, at so much the ton, receive their money and have no further trouble or risk concerning them. This is being now done here in some instances.

Again, the kind of mines which it is believed abounds in our Territory, and the development of which we advocate, would be of a permanent character; and even if they did not last "forever," the means obtained from them would, if wisely appropriated, lay the foundation for a constantly increasing prosperity. Iron and other foundries and various manufactories would be established for home supply; and it is by no means impossible that, through some at present unperceived facilities peculiar to our Territory, we might be able, after a few years, to profitably manufacture some articles for exportation. Only let all restraint be removed from these and all other avenues to wealth—let them be left open to individual enterprise, and they would soon be thoroughly tested and developed.

Mining has not "ruined" California, either politically or financially. It has not "ruined" Montana, Idaho, Nevada or Arizona; on the contrary, it has opened up and settled those portions of the public domain which would, otherwise, have been undeveloped for years, and has laid the foundation of prosperous States which will add to the glory of our already mighty empire.

But, I am ashamed to admit, it is urged that riches would extinguish the love for and devotion to truth which are now supposed to reign in our breasts. What a humiliating confession, if true. Truth must have a very feeble hold upon the man who would sacrifice it for gold. And if some natures are so base that their gratitude decreases in proportion as their benefits increase, it does not follow that all are so constituted, nor that the culture, refinement and social blessings which wealth brings should be forever withheld from the mass, because a few may be injured thereby. If we have not, as a people, learned, by this time, to prize the truths of Heaven above all earthly considerations, we might as well be deprived of them and learn their value by bitter experience. But we do not believe that, were this people to become wealthy to-morrow, the majority would be any less willing to sacrifice their all for the truth than they are to-day. At any rate, judging from the course of some, they have no fear of the effect of comfort and wealth upon themselves, whatever they may think best for others.

It has been a standing prophecy in this Church—one generally believed, because very consoling—that we are to become, at some future time, the richest people on the earth. Now, how is this to be effected? Can we become so by raising wool and cotton, by spinning yarn or printing calicoes? Can we by raising grain or stock, by making wine or producing silk? Common sense answers, No! Because other countries possess so much greater facilities for producing and manufacturing these articles, and can furnish them so much cheaper than we can. They may all help, but none of them can form the great basis of our prosperity.

England is frequently referred to as an example of the wealth obtained by manufacturing. But her prosperity is due to her mines as much as to her factories. And she could not compete with the world—import, as she does in some instances, the raw material, manufacture and export it again cheaper than it could be made in the country where it was produced—were it not that the teeming millions of her population overstock the labor-market and make it, comparatively, valueless. We do not want to see our laborers and artisans reduced to the same condition. True, they might coöperate and share all profits of their labor. But what will not pay one big capitalist will not pay twenty small ones. Coöperation might divide losses, but it could not create profits out of nothing; and it has been abundantly proved that we have not, at present, the facilities for successfully engaging extensively in manufactures. Our mineral resources once developed, new avenues of industry would open and, as in California, machine shops, foundries and factories would speedily follow, while energy, enterprise and prosperity would characterize all classes.

A VERY SINGULAR STORY.

My name is Rachel Althea Travers. It seems to me that in an account of this sort, it is better to state that at once, and then it avoids all worrying as to who that perpetually recurring "I" may be. They are unfortunate initials, as you may perhaps observe, and have led to my being apostrophized as "Rat" by an impertinent younger brother, who is, I am thankful to say, generally at school. We, that is, my mother, my two sisters, and myself, live in Bryanston Square. We have no country house, and consequently are in town a great part of the year, when I, for one, would sooner be anywhere else; not that that melancholy fact has anything to do with my story, except so far as it accounts for our being in London one nasty day in November, when something happened which was the remote cause of my writing this, the cause, in fact, of my having this to write. I had a headache. Now I don't mean to say I wrote this story because I had a headache: I think that, perhaps, would have been a reason for not writing it, but I will explain in a minute what my headache had to do with it. It was the 15th, I think, and I was sitting in the drawing-room while my sister Agnes had her music lesson. I could speak German with tolerable fluency, having spent the last winter in Vienna with some friends, but Agnes hardly understood a single word. Herr Blume could, however, speak a little English, and they might, in reality, have got on very well, had it not been for the extreme excitability of the little man's temperament. In the event of a wrong chord, his conversation, though fluent, became totally incomprehensible, and of such a striking nature that Agnes, who was very nervous, had once gone into violent hysterics, occasioned by agonizing attempts to suppress her laughter. After that, my mother declared that I must always remain in the room to translate. It was a great bore being tied to one spot twice a week at exactly the same hour, and I heartily wished Agnes would learn German herself. Lessons had been talked of, but the idea had been given up.

"Rachel, dear, I don't think it's any use," my mother had said to me; "she hasn't the least talent for languages, and though the lessons may not be very expensive, yet you know, my dear child, all these things make a difference."

"Poor dear mamma! I made the sacrifice with a better grace, knowing as I did how many of "all those things" she would gladly have had, but denied herself for our sakes.

And so it came to pass that that 15th of November found me at my usual post in a corner of the sofa, awaiting the arrival of Herr Blume. In he came, as the clock struck eleven, in the midst of a frantic rush on poor Agnes's part through an immense pile of music to find her piece. I think that put him out, for he stood watching her with an unnatural calmness, which I felt sure could only be the effect of almost superhuman efforts of self-control. He was a short, hay-colored man with spectacles, extraordinarily round eyes, and an immense quantity of distracted-looking hair, through which he was constantly running his fingers in a manner quite peculiar to himself. At last the piece was found, Agnes began to play, and I established myself more snugly in my corner. Alas! the peace which followed was but of short duration. A series of small disturbances began, the immediate cause of which was the piano: now the piano was a hired one, and not particularly good. Under a successful course of our treatment it had arrived at a blissful state of indifference concerning the pedal, keeping up a perpetual rumble which sounded like mild thunder; this little peculiarity appeared to have a most irritating effect on the unfortunate music-master, and once or twice he had given vent to his feelings by a violent castigation of the wretched instrument. This, however, as one may imagine, only tended to increase the evil, and matters had arrived at a crisis, when this morning my mother entered the room as he was engaged in inflicting upon us a succession of tremendous minor crashes that were truly terrible.

With a bound which would not have disgraced Leotard, he leaped from the music-stool and stood before her. After the usual compliments, he asked if it might be allowed to him "to make to madame one small representation?"

This little inquiry was accompanied by a smile intended to be insinuating, but which was simply sardonic.

My mother of course assured him that she would be most happy to listen to any suggestion: upon which he declared, running his fingers through his hair, that, though it inflicted upon him much sorrow, he felt it to be his duty to instruct her that the pedal was much disordered, and was very noxious to him. "For myself," he proceeded, with a grand heroism, "for myself, I care not a little bit, but for these young messes"—here he indicated with a theatrical flourish Agnes and myself—"it is a fatal story."

"It is only a hired one, Herr Blume," said my mother, "and I think I really must change it; I know it is very bad."

"Ach!" he said, eagerly, "why does not one have her own splendid instrument? Madame will perhaps reflect this what I have said."

He then suddenly closed his lips, and with a pirouette and another bound seated himself again, commencing on the spot such an illustration of that little weakness on the part of the pedal of which he had spoken, that my poor mother fled the room. I remained, sorely against my will, but tried to find consolation in a pile of cushions. My head ached, I could not read, and I sat listlessly turning over a photograph book, until I suppose I must have gone off into a doze. I was suddenly roused by Herr Blume's voice, raised to a positive shriek; "Lang-saaoe r!—lang-samer, lang-sa-a-mer-r!" I got up, and rushed towards the piano; poor Agnes was as white as a sheet, and on Herr Blume's forehead stood great drops of perspiration.

"Slower, Agnes, slower; that is what Herr Blume means," I said. Poor child, she made one more effort, but her fingers trembled so that she could hardly strike a note, and the next moment she burst into tears.

There was nothing more to be done that morning by either of them, I plainly saw; as for him, he had been in a vile temper from the beginning.

"I am really very sorry, Herr Blume," I said, as the door closed after her; "it was entirely my fault for not attending; you know my sister hardly understands a word of German."

"That, my fräulein, I know," he answered, with awful solemnity, "and I must, I fear, abandon her, if she cannot learn a little."

To be abandoned by him he seemed to think the most dreadful fate in life.

"My tempers," he continued, with excitement, "suffers, yes, suffers, through these trials."

He never had any to speak of, but I didn't tell him so, thinking he mightn't like it. For a few minutes we both remained silent, he standing in a Napoleonic attitude, with folded arms and knitted brows, glaring in a malignant manner at a cross in the carpet. I began nervously to consider whether it could possibly be that, owing to a strong anti-ritualistic feeling, our carpet might be displeasing to his eye. My apprehensions were, however, relieved when he proceeded to unfold his plans. There was, it seemed, a German lady of his acquaintance lodging in a street close by, who was anxious to give lessons; he could recommend her highly for her ability and accent, he added, and if my mother would permit Agnes to have a few lessons, he was sure her music would greatly benefit. Might he ask the lady to call on madame? he inquired; and so the end of it was, that it was arranged for her to come the next day at eleven o'clock.

"Of course you will manage it all, Rachel," my mother said in the evening. "I dare say she can't speak a word of English."

So she came. As I look back at it now, the whole thing seems so odd, as if all that followed were the consequence of a little headache on my part, and a little temper on Herr Blume's; all the merest chance; and yet it cannot be; we are all working out some vast design, subservient to one great master will: generally, upon tiniest threads of trifles hang the great joys and miseries of life.

A little after eleven the next morning a card was brought up, on which was written "Fräulein Dorn," and in a minute she was in the room. She was not the least like what I had expected. Most people form some idea as to any one they are going to meet, and I had formed mine; but I was entirely wrong; there was not a trace of that dowdiness of dress and manner of which I had seen so much in the Vaterland, even in the classes to which, I knew, by her name, she did not belong. On the contrary, everything about her was fresh and graceful, and there was a charming ease and grave courtesy in her manner which astonished me. Her face, even now that I know it under its many changes, is difficult to describe. Clear was the only word that came into my mind as I looked at her. A sweet oval face, clear and pale, with dark hazel eyes, somewhat round and deep set, looking out fearlessly, like shining stars. Her lips were excessively pretty, and gave color to a face which would perhaps otherwise have been too pale: not that dark color verging on purple which Lely has bestowed on some of his beauties, and which gives one the painful impression that they have been indulging in black currant jam, but a bright light-red. It was not the first morning that I saw all the excellences of her face, but afterwards, when I grew to know her better.

There were two lessons a week, and I used generally to join in them; she was very quiet at first, but gradually we began to get better friends, and she would talk about Germany, or England, or on any general subject in the most amusing and lively manner; but I could never by any means whatever lead her to speak of herself, her former life, her reasons for coming to England, nor say a word, in fact, that could afford any clew to her history. There was a mystery about her; of that I felt very sure. Now the unraveling of mysteries was considered rather my forte, so I felt on my honor, as it were, to penetrate it. There had been an eagerness about Herr Blume's manner which had struck me at the very outset of the affair, and, strange to say, once or twice during the lessons, I had been possessed by a strong feeling that I had seen her before; yet the face was perfectly strange to me. The more I studied it, the more convinced I became that I must be laboring under some delusion—there was not a feature familiar to me. The lessons continued regularly until a little time before Christmas, when one morning she failed to make her appearance.

I knew the number of the house, though I had never been to her lodging, so before luncheon I walked round to see after her. The door was opened to me by an untidy-looking maid, and as I advanced into the passage, loud, angry tones issued from a room on my right. There was no help for it but to proceed, and this I was doing when I was almost knocked down by a fat, dirty, angry woman coming hastily out of the room, her head turned round, still addressing some one within.

"And sure it's not my house as 'll hould ye, with yer fine clothes and yer fine airs, if it's not a civil tongue ye can keep in yer head!"

She flounced off, and I ventured a peep into the room. It was in a state of the utmost confusion; boxes half packed stood about the floor.

On one of these, looking like Scipio amid the ruins of Carthage, sat the fräulein. On seeing me, the fräulein started up.

"Ach! I am so glad to see you," she said. "I must explain why I have not come to you. This woman, Thérèse, has made her angry,—furious: poor Thérèse, she was foolish. The woman has said we leave the house, so I go instantly; but where to, that I know not."

This was wretched. I tried in vain to make her tell me what Thérèse had said, thinking it most probably some misunderstanding which had arisen owing to their not understanding each other's language; but she evaded it, declaring, however, that it was impossible for her to remain.

I made up my mind on the spot, and rushed home to ask my mother to invite her to come to us until after Christmas.

"My dear Rachel, I really don't think I can do it; she is quite a stranger. I think you had better give it up: no doubt she has friends in London."

"Darling mamsey," I implored, caressing her, "just this once; you acknowledge that she is very nice; and indeed she has no friends, except Herr Blume and his wife, who live themselves in lodgings. You mustn't shut up your heart at Christmas time: just for a day or two," I entreated, giving her a hug, "until she can find a place to go to."

"Well, Rachel," she said, "it's all upon your shoulders. You're a naughty, self-willed girl," she added, smiling, and shaking her head deprecatingly, as I dashed off to bring my beauty to Bryanston Square.

It was just as I expected, they all fell in love with her; her sweet face, her high-bred, gentle manners, her charming grace; but most of all, she fascinated Bertie, that unpolished schoolboy whom we owned for a brother, and in so doing caused the benedictions of his sisters to rain down upon her head.

Never were there such peaceful Christmas holidays within the recollection of the "oldest inhabitant," and we trembled at the idea of losing our presiding genius. My mother, also, joined heartily in our entreaties for her to stay, for beside really liking her, it was impossible to overlook the immense advantages which accrued to us from her society. She could scarcely speak a word of English, but German, French, and Italian she seemed to be equally fluent in; and, wonder of wonders, Bertie, by New Year's Day, was positively beginning to talk French with, I won't say a good, but certainly a less extraordinary accent than when he came home.

This undisputed possession of the field was perfect bliss to him: he lionized her about London, taking her to all sorts of museums and places, which he professed to think it quite necessary that she should see.

In my own mind I felt sure it was for the pleasure, pure and simple, of having such a pretty person under his protection, and entirely dependent on him.

I think she liked him, and his boyish admiration. One evening, as she was talking, or rather gesticulating, to my mother,—for their conversation was mostly carried on by signs,—he gave me a nudge that would have been amply sufficient to awaken St. Paul's to attention.

"I say, Rachel, she is pretty," he said, in a low tone, "there's no mistake about that; you should see how all the fellows stare at her, and I don't believe she knows it, now," he added, in an inquiring sort of voice, as if he weren't quite sure of the truth of his own statement.

"Don't you think so?" I asked, innocently.

"Well, I don't quite know how she can help it," he said, meditatively; "when I took her to the Colosseum, the Guards were just passing, and you should have seen how they looked at her, and wished themselves in my shoes, I know; and I think they're pretty good judges," he said, in an improving tone.

So we went on very smoothly until New Year's Day, when she began to declare she must leave us. I promised to help her to find lodgings, if she would wait for a day or two longer.

The time of her visit had not been altogether unfruitful in affording me some insight into her history,—an insight obtained, however, more through my own observation than from any information vouchsafed by her.

It was one day in Christmas week, I think, she was going to the pantomime, or something of the sort, with mamma, Agnes and Bertie. She was sitting with her opera cloak on, talking to Bertie, before they went, when I came into the room; her back was turned to the door. As I looked at her, suddenly, like a flash of light, a host of recollections forced themselves into my mind. I was no longer in our own drawing-room, but in a well-known salon in Vienna, blazing with light, listening to Mademoiselle de Murska. The figure which was before me now was before me then, a few rows in front of us. The cloak in itself was peculiar,—white, with a very beautiful border of blue and silver,—that perhaps helped my memory; but as the light shone on the crisp, golden hair, I wondered at my own stupidity; yes, there could hardly be any mistake, I thought, as I remembered a letter which I had received some time before from my friend in Vienna.

"Look, Rachel, look!" she had whispered to me that night, "there is the great beauty, Countess Arnheim."

"Where?" I asked, trying to look in every direction at once, for I had heard a great deal about her, but had not seen her.

"There, to the left; don't you see? Ah! what a pity! she has turned her head."

I could not help laughing at her disappointed tone; she was always so eager that I should see all I wished.

"Never mind," I said, "she will be sure to turn it back again;" but she didn't; never during the whole time that we both sat there, though we were not more than two yards from the place she sat, did she turn once, so that I could even see her profile; just the pretty outline of her cheek, and the mass of crisp, rippling, golden hair was vouchsafed to us. Of her companions we saw quite enough, a dark, handsome woman, and a middle-aged, keen-eyed officer, who sat on either side of her. This evening, however, she was brought forcibly to my mind, as I entered the drawing-room, by the outline of Fräulein Dorn's face, and the white and blue cloak.

Not till after they were gone did I produce my writing-case, and, settling myself in a comfortable arm-chair before the fire, proceed to dive into its recesses after my Vienna letters.

I fished out four or five from its capacious pockets, but the right one did not make its appearance, and I was just beginning to echo my poor mother's wish, that I were more tidy and methodical, when I made a good haul and brought up the letter I was in search of: it began,—

"Köthener Strasse 10, Wien-May.

"DEAREST RACHEL,—

"My letter, you see, is dated from our old quarters. We have taken these rooms again, for though not so large as the others, they are much cleaner, and I think more comfortable. It makes me quite melancholy to go into your room. Char has it now. We all miss you dreadfully; it takes away half the pleasure of things, having no one to talk them over with, though really in these days of excitement there is no time for reflection; one simply has to keep one's mouth open to swallow the next new thing. There seems not to be the slightest doubt now about the war. I believe Count Bismarck has intended there should be war from the first. Talking about offering them indemnity for Holstein! offering a fiddlestick! It's a very bad business altogether, it seems to me, and it serves them right, of course, the home people will say, for having joined in it; but why Prussia should come off so much the best I can't see. The troops here seem confident enough of victory. By the by, young Siegelheim came in yesterday for a minute; his high spirits were quite funny and infectious; he had just gone home on leave, but had been recalled of course. The officers seem all delighted with the prospect of war: they only look at the bright side; for my part, I think it is very awful. And I cannot understand how they can rid themselves of the thought that, though the campaign may be a successful one, yet to some among them, perhaps to many, it will in all human probability bring death; and who those some will be it is the question I cannot help asking myself; which are the ones who are walking these well-known streets for the last time; looking for the last time upon the old familiar faces, who will in a few weeks, perhaps in a few days, be farther removed from us than thousands of miles could remove them, wrapt in that sleep, upon which no roar of cannon, no shout of friend or foe, ever can break. I confess to me it seems very terrible. I suppose it is a woman's view of the case; but I mustn't write any more of this sort of stuff, or I shall make you dismal. I dare say you don't feel particularly lively now, but you shall have any news that we hear, especially of that regiment to whose uniform you used to be rather partial. There, how horridly I have made you blush, only as there's nobody but me in the room it doesn't matter. Oh! there is one piece of scandal for you, which has, however, made less noise than if it had happened at any other time, for which I suspect the parties concerned are very thankful. Do you remember your seeing, or rather not seeing, the young Countess Arnheim at a concert? Well, she has actually gone off, and no one knows where to: but to begin at the the right end of the story, for, as I happened to be an eye-witness, I can vouch for my version being correct.

"We were at a ball at the Nesselroders, and she was there: she was looking most exquisite, I thought, though some people in the room said she looked not what she had been. Her husband was there too, of course, but I didn't see him go to her once the whole evening, though she was surrounded by a good many gentlemen: there was one man, a Frenchman, in the Austrian service, who never left her. His attentions, I certainly thought, were rather marked, but I didn't see any return on her side. You know that room off the hall at the Nesselroders, where one takes off one's things. Well, we happened to be there, putting on our cloaks; I was ready to go, and was standing at the door, talking to Herr von Langen. The countess was standing in the hall, waiting for her husband, I think, laughing and talking with a few gentlemen. All at once the count strode out of one of the dancing-rooms, and up to her. She was so placed under the lamps that I could see her face perfectly, and part of his; she glanced up in his face with a smiling look of inquiry in her beautiful eyes, which was answered by a fierce scowl and a muttered oath. Of course there was a breathless silence: no one knew what to say: no one ever does on such occasions.

"'Leopold,' she half whispered, 'has anything happened?' She had sprung forward eagerly, and laid her hand upon his arm. His face worked frightfully as she gazed up into it with beseeching eyes, but he turned it from her. 'Happened!' he said, in a loud, harsh voice, shaking her off roughly, 'no, nothing particular. By Heaven, no! nothing to you; I, fool that I have been, have found it more.'

"'For God's sake, Leopold, come away,' she whispered in an agony. She thought him mad or drunk, I believe. He did not shake her off this time, but taking both her slender white wrists in his iron grasp, he held her at half arm's length; and then, before those men, looking straight into her face, he said most cruel things to her. I don't know how she bore it—it was cruel, horrible; if I had been one of those men, I think, whether it were right or wrong, I must have struck him down. It took less time, far less, than it has taken me to write it. I could not tear myself away from watching them; but I sincerely trust it may never be my lot to witness such a scene again.

"Poor thing! her eyelids never drooped: she looked into his dark, angry eyes, with a half-amazed, half-imploring look. I think she had a dim sense of how very awful it was before these people; but that was all swallowed up in the agony and astonishment his words caused. When he had finished speaking, he dashed her hands away and strode off, leaving her standing there, a broken lily, but turned again after he had gone two steps. 'Monsieur, he said, looking at the French officer, 'I recommend this lady to your protection.' His whole countenance was convulsed with passion and deadly pale. That woke her up: her face quivered as with a sudden flash of anguish, and she turned to a young beardless officer who had been standing good-naturedly trying to shield her from the many pitiless, prying eyes; 'Will you be kind enough to take me to my carriage?' He could not look at her, but gave her his arm, and took her away almost tenderly. He was a merry, rough boy, and I dare say they had had many a laugh together; but I don't think either of them laughed then. She would have walked straight out into the cold, bitter night in her ball-dress, had he not stopped her and helped her servant to wrap her up in her furs. That was all I saw of it, and it was indeed enough.

"The next day we heard she had gone, as I quite expected. I most certainly would have gone too in her place, and I am sure you would; but I am writing you the most unconscionable letter; that is the way when I sit down to write to you; I intend just to write one sheet, and I scribble on and on till two o'clock sometimes. I am glad Aunt Margaret doesn't examine the candles! If she ever should, I will tell her that I find Vienna candles delicious eating, and can't resist the temptation.

"Best love to your mamma and the girls from all of us: they're all fast asleep, but of course they would send it if they were in possession of their faculties. Good night, dearest. I must go to by-by.

STEPHANIE."

It was a long letter, but I read it all through, and, when it was finished, laid it in my lap and sat gazing into the fire, and musing over those eventful days in which she wrote. How different now to then! Things were changed in Vienna. What was then but conjecture had become sad reality. All had taken place with such fearful suddenness as made it almost impossible to realize. I sat over the fire and tried to imagine it all, and reread more recent letters, in none of which, however, was the Countess Arnheim's name mentioned. I began to doubt the truth of my own surmises; it seemed almost impossible that she should have come to England in that manner, and remained quietly for such a length of time: she, the petted Vienna beauty, giving lessons in England and living in London lodgings! No, it was hardly credible: but there was one simple test which occurred to me; by copying out a small portion of that letter; and putting it in some place where it would fall into her hands, at a time when I should have an opportunity of watching her, I did not doubt but that I might read in her face the truth.

And I did copy it, translating it into French. I chose that part in which her name was mentioned; but when it was done, I put it by, and delayed to use it.

One day we were talking of Christian names, and she then told me, for the first time, that hers was Valerie, and asked me to call her by it. Another time she showed me a little book, with "Valerie" printed in it, and something over the name scratched out, which I felt sure must have been a cornet. I longed to know: and yet though I often thought of putting her to the test which I had devised, my heart failed me. Why should I seek to penetrate her mystery, and lay bare the bitter secrets of her heart? So I forbore and waited. However, it was not destined that she should go from us as she had come. On the 3d of January my mother came down to breakfast with rather a troubled face, and after I had read my own letters, she passed one for me to read, without a word. It was from my Aunt Honora, a sister of my mother's, whose husband had a house in one of the hunting counties.

"Dear Margaret," it began, "I am in great distress. The house is full of men, and only one lady besides myself—young Mrs. Charteris. Do, I beseech you, come to me the first day you can. They are frozen up, and there is no hunting, and some of them don't even play billiards. Francis says I ought to do something to amuse them, but what can I do? It is so miserable. Bring all the girls, and your German friend and Bertie. I entreat you not to refuse. Francis wishes it also so much. Write at once and let me know when I am to send to meet you.

"Your affectionate sister,

"HONORA C. HERRIES."

This was the letter, written in a scrambling, uncertain sort of hand, which my mother gave me. I had scarcely finished it, when Bertie said, from the other side of the table, "What's the row, Rat? shy it across;" so I shied it across, as he called it, and the young gentleman was pleased to express his highest approval of the plan.

"Be alive, now, girls, and pack up: the weather'll break, you'll see, and then I shall get some hunting out of the old rascal."

He settled on the spot, I believe, the horse he intended to ride. Alas! for human proposals. All the world knows that there was no hunting for those first weeks of January. But it wasn't for his amusement that my mother determined to go. With tears in her eyes she reread the letter when we were alone in her room, whither she had called me after breakfast to consult about it.

"Poor Honora! poor Honora!" she murmured. "Yes, my dear, I think we must go; there will probably be but little pleasure to any of us, but I think it is right. I can leave Agnes in Eaton Square with your uncle."

As I looked at the feeble, shaky writing, I, too, ejaculated from my heart, "Poor Honora!" She had married a man who had discovered her weakness, and had been a very tyrant to her. It seemed as if he had all but stamped out her identity. It was not from age that her letters were ill-formed and trembling; I hardly think she had any handwriting in particular. So a note was despatched to say we would come on the Monday. We might have managed to go before, but after some consultation it was fixed for that day.

"Impossible! I cannot spend Sunday there," my mother had said, decidedly; and even Bertie, I think, was glad when it was settled that we should spend that quietly at home.

For myself, I did not much care whether we stayed or went. I had not much hopes of the party likely to be assembled at Cheddington. The only two people I was sure of meeting were men whom I particularly disliked: but then it was also possible that some of the others might be very pleasant; as for Sir Francis Herries himself, he could be as agreeable or as disagreeable as he liked—under the present circumstances it was not unreasonable to hope that he would be at least civil. From him, that was sufficient. After a great deal of persuasion, we succeeded in making Fräulein Dorn promise to accompany us: and Monday afternoon saw us all at the station, where the carriage from Cheddington was to meet us.

Long before we got to the end of our drive, the windows were so frozen that we could see nothing of the park or house; and we were all heartily glad to find ourselves in the wide, old-fashioned hall, where the fine oak carving, seen by the light of the blazing fire, for the winter twilight had set in, called forth Valerie's warm admiration.

There were a great many hats about, and as we followed the servant up the stairs, I could hear the sharp crack of the billiard balls. It was quite a procession, and in spite of her earnest invitation, I think we rather overwhelmed my aunt when we invaded her sitting-room.

She was looking the same as she had always looked to me—a faded, worn-out picture, fragile and helpless, with traces of a beauty not dimmed by age, but by unhappiness. She stretched out her hands kindly to us all, however, kissing us, and welcoming Fräulein Dorn.

As I had expected, Sir Francis was civil enough to us all during this visit, and when the skating began, was very anxious about the ponds, that they should be well flooded at night, and that everything should be arranged exactly as we liked. We had on the whole a delightful week. There were some very pleasant men besides my two horrors, Mr. Sartoris and Lord Cosmo Fox, who, strange to say, though they didn't generally agree about things, both seemed very much smitten with Valerie. After all, however, it was not strange that she and Mr. Sartoris should be a good deal together: for, with the exception of Sir Francis, he was the only man in the house, I think, who spoke any foreign language with sufficient fluency to be able to talk to her. As for Lord Cosmo, it was droll enough: not a word of any other but his mother tongue could that great scion of nobility utter; it was mute admiration on his part, confined to paying his clumsy attentions. I did hear him one day talking broken English to her, thinking, I suppose, that style better suited to her infantine capacity.

But in spite of Lord Cosmo and Mr. Cartoris, and other little annoyances inseparable from Cheddington, it was a very pleasant visit, and we all enjoyed it the more from having expected something so different. The first day or two that the ice was really good, the female portion of the community assembled at the edge of the ponds, and watched the skaters, but no one ventured on the ice except in chairs; but the third day Mr. Sartoris came up to Valerie, after we had been there a few minutes.

"Won't you venture to try the skates on?" he asked. "I would promise to take good care of you."

"I don't think there would be a pair to fit me," was her answer, given rather indifferently, I thought, as she put out her foot.

Her indifference, however, did not seem to have the effect of damping his eagerness, for the next thing he said was—

"If I find a pair, will you come?"

"Yes, I should like it very much," she answered.

He instantly sat down, and took off his skates without another word, and went off himself to the house. I was amazed; I had never seen the man put himself out of the way so much for any one before, but Valerie seemed to take it all as a matter of course. She had never known him before, and could not tell how different it was to his usual habits. Presently he returned triumphant, holding up a small pair of skates.

"Whose are they?" Valerie asked, as she sat down and gave him one of her feet.

"I got them at the rectory," was the answer; "there were not any ladies' skates up at the house, so, as the rectory people said they were not coming down to-day, I went on there, and asked them to lend me a pair."

"It was very kind of you to take all that trouble," Valerie said.

"It was for my own gratification, I am afraid."

He was bending over her foot, but he looked into her face as he said the words in French, and in such a low, rapid voice that I only just caught them.

It was not the words, but the tone and look that made me watch eagerly the effect on her. Not a shadow of a blush rose into her clear face: she looked over his head with sad, vacant eyes, bent evidently on another scene than that before her. What was there in his words to bring such a sad, hopeless look into the beautiful face? Something seemed suddenly to have stirred within her a crowd of sorrowful remembrances. In a moment it passed, and there was nothing different about her voice or manner when next she spoke. When the skates were on, before she could rise, Mr. Sartoris put out his hands, saying, nervously—

"Now, please take care: you have no idea how difficult it is, even to stand firmly, just at first."

But she drew back, and with a smile, half arch, half sad, rose lightly on her feet. Then she put her hands into her muff, and glided away with long, slow sweeps. Her cavalier stood still, watching her without a word. I don't think he liked it; it was as if he had been rather taken in, and made to look foolish, and that, in the verimost trifle, was to him gall and wormwood. When she came back to us, there was more of his usual cool sarcasm in his voice than I had ever heard in speaking to her.

"I bow to your superior skill," he said, in a half mocking tone; "forgive my mistake, and accept my humble apologies."

Though he smiled, she was very quick to mark the change in his manner, and instantly set herself to work to soothe him: not that I think she cared for him, but she had an innate horror of being disagreeable to anybody, and a delicate sensitiveness with regard to other people's feelings.

His feathers were certainly effectually smoothed, and, in fact, as I watched them, I began to wonder whether he was trying to play with her, or whether he really liked her. The idea of Mr. Sartoris being attentive to anybody, except in his own cool, insulting, detestable way, was an idea so new as to be startling. She was here under my mother's protection as much as we were, and I determined to tell what I had seen. One thing, however, I now resolved to do. I would give Valerie the letter: before speaking to my mother it was better to be sure that there was any cause to interfere. We generally sat together and read or talked in her room the hour before dinner. She had got hold of a French book in which she was interested; I knew if I brought a book she would read that; so I slipped the piece of letter, as it appeared, between the pages of her novel a little way after her mark, and left it on her table. About an hour before dinner, as I had hoped, she went to her room, and I soon followed; but it seemed as though she would never settle to her book. I sat where I could see her face without her seeing me, and tried to answer her remarks, feeling horribly guilty. For some time she kept up a desultory sort of conversation, keeping me in a fever of expectation by playing with the leaves of the book.

"How well your uncle speaks French, Rachel!" she said.

"Yes, very well; he goes very often to Paris," I answered rather shortly.

"Mr. Sartoris talks better, though."

"Does he?" I said.

"Why, of course he does; you must hear."

"Yes; I suppose so."

"But I wish I could talk to your big Mr Mountjoy," she said, reflectively.

"Why?"

"Ach!" she smiled; "why one does wish those sort of things I know not: he looks so honest and upright."

"And Mr. Sartoris doesn't, you think?" She raised her eyebrows comically.

"Neither of our Frenchmen are of an open character," she said, with a wise shake of her head.

This was unendurable, and I was preparing to go when she said,—

"There's a man in this book that reminds me of Mr. Sartoris: listen." She then read a description of some one, and after that went on to herself. In a few minutes she turned the page where the little piece of paper lay. I saw her sudden start, and then her face grew deadly pale. She looked round the room with wild, hunted eyes, like a stag brought to bay, seeking some outlet of escape. There could be no doubt. In the first moment of certainty, I felt heartily sorry for what seemed then my cruelty, and would gladly have undone it, had such undoing been possible. Full of remorse and shame, I sat staring at my book. At last the bell rung and I left the room. As I went out, I saw that she was seated in exactly the same position, with the novel lying open before her.

THE GRÆFENBERG MEDICINES ARE INVALUABLE. GODBE & CO. HAVE THEM

PATENT

ARION PIANOFORTE

GRANDS AND GRAND SQUARES.

7⅓ OCTAVE.

The "ARION" is the very best Piano for the Great West, because it stands in tune longer than any other Piano. It requires no repairing or regulating; shipping any distance, or dampness does not affect them.

WHY?

It commences where the "First Premium" Makers stop, and upon the most improved Modern scale makes four patented improvements; which make the Arion more simple, yet stronger; increasing its volume and beauty of tone, while rendering the instrument more enduring.

WHAT THEY ARE.

First. The patent Arion Reversed Wooden Agraffe Bridge, which retains all the purity of tone only found in a wooden bridge (the rest whereon the strings lay), and obtains all the solid prolonged strength of tone of the metal Agraffe, without that acute metallic noise which the metal Agraffe develops by use.

Secondly, The Patent Arion Compound Wrest-Plank, which holds the tuning pins, is six thicknesses of hard maple, the grain of each layer runs in a different direction. The advantages are, the 20 tons strain of the strings cannot split our Arion wrest-plank, as frequently happens in other Pianos, and when people say "My Piano won't stand in tune," all other makers must use the single wrest plank with the grain running only one way.

The Arion Tuning-Pins have end wood to hold them on every side, while all other makers can have it only upon two sides of their pins.

Thirdly, The Patent Arion Diagonal Sustaining Bar, extending parellel with the steel strings under the over strung Bass-strings. The Arion is the only Piano wherein the enormous strain of the large steel strings is resisted in the natural place and direction. Using this bar renders the weakest part in all other over strung Pianos the

STRONGEST IN THE ARION.

Fourthly, The Patent Arion Iron Frame concentrates all the metal in front of the tuning pin line, and its frame is let into (chanted) the front edge of the wooden wrest plank, thereby preventing the great strain of the strings upon it from splitting or moving it one particle. All other "Full Iron Frames" cover the entire wrest plank, and when it is split it cannot be seen, the wood of the Arion wrest plank is seen.

THE ARION STANDS UPON ITS OWN MERITS.

unsupported by either humcome, weak facts, or useless or complicated Patents. We append a few unbought opinions of those who

KNOW THE ARION.

The Musical Director of the New York Conservatory of Music, Edward Mollenhauer, says: "The Arion I bought of you is the best Piano I ever played on, that rolling bass and silvery treble, etc."

John H. Woods, Piano Dealer, Owego, N. Y., says: "The tone is truly harmonic and I surpass anything in the shape of a Piano we ever saw or heard of, etc."

Horace Greely [illegible]: "The Arion is the best Square Piano, superior for its evenness and brilliancy of tone," &c.

Louis Wagner, Fort Leavenworth, says: "My Piano arrived here in splendid order. Its tone fills my parlor with melody—it is the wonder and admiration of all who hear it. Miss ——, who is teaching the Piano desires me to order one for her," &c.

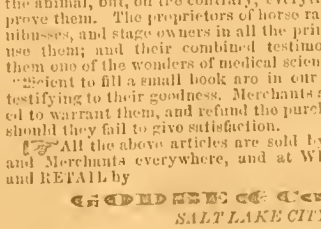
HARVELL'S

HORSE POWDERS.



These celebrated and renowned powders for horses and cattle have been tested by an intelligent public for sixteen years. Hundreds of the principal horsemen of the Union have pronounced them the only Condition Powders safe to use and work the horse. There is nothing in them to expose the animal, but, on the contrary, everything to improve them. The proprietors of horse railroads, omnibusses, and stage owners in all the principal cities use them; and their combined testimony stamps them one of the wonders of medical science. Letters sufficient to fill a small book are in our possession, testifying to their goodness. Merchants are requested to warrant them, and refund the purchase money should they fail to give satisfaction.

Ayer's Hair Vigor,

For restoring Grey Hair to its natural Vitality and Color.

A dressing which is at once agreeable, healthy, and effectual for preserving the hair. Faded or gray hair is soon restored to its original color with the gloss and freshness of youth. Thin hair is thickened, falling hair is checked, and baldness often, though not always, cured by its use. Nothing can restore the hair where the follicles are destroyed, or the glands atrophied and decayed. But such as remain can be saved for usefulness by this application. Instead of fouling the hair with a pasty sediment it will keep it clean and vigorous. Its occasional use will prevent the hair from turning gray or falling off, and consequently prevent baldness. Free from those deleterious substances which make some preparations dangerous and injurious to the hair, the Vigor can only benefit but not harm it. If wanted merely for a nothing else can be found so desirable. Containing neither oil nor dye, it does not soil white cambric, and yet lasts long on the hair, giving it a rich glossy lusture and a grateful perfume.

HAIR DRESSING

MUSICAL DONORS.—Since Mr. Waters gave up publishing sheet music, he has devoted his whole capital and attention to the manufacture and sale of Pianos and Melodeons. He has just issued a catalogue of his new instruments, giving a new scale of prices, which shows a marked reduction from former rates, and his Pianos have recently been awarded the First Premium at several Fairs. Many people of the present day, who are at a loss, if not confused, with the flaming advertisements of rival piano houses, probably overlook the honest manufacturer like Mr. Waters; but we happen to know that his instruments earned him a good reputation long before? positions and chromos? connected therewith were ever thought of; indeed, we have one of Mr. Waters' Pianofortes now in our residence, where it has stood for years, of which every man, sweetness in the world might be proud. We have always been delighted with it for a sweet toned and powerful instrument, and there is no doubt of its durability; more than this, some of the best amateur players in the city, and several celebrated pianist, have performed on the said piano, and all pronounce it a superior and first-class instrument. Stronger indorsement we could not give.—Home Journal.

BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES

"A SLIGHT COLD," COUGH, Hoarseness, or Sore Throat which might be checked with a simple remedy, if neglected often terminates seriously. Few are aware of the importance of stopping a Cough or "slight cold" in its first stage; that which in the beginning would yield to a mild remedy, if not attended to, soon attacks the lungs.

The efficacy of Brown's Bronchial Troches is demonstrated by testimonials from Physicians, Surgeons in the Army, and eminent men wherever they have been used.

They were introduced in 1850. It has been proved that they are the best article before the public for Coughs, Colds, Bronchitis, Asthma, Catarrh, the Hacking Cough in Consumption, and numerous affections of the Throat, giving immediate relief.

PUBLIC SPEAKERS & SINGERS will find them effectual for clearing and strengthening the voice.

NOTHING LOST.

Nothing is lost! the drop of dew
  Which trembles on the leaf or flower,
Is but exhaled, to fall anew
  In summer's thunder-shower;
Perchance to shine within the bow
  That fronts the sun at fall of day;
Perchance to sparkle in the flow
  Of fountains far away.

Naught lost; for e'en the tiniest seed
  By wild birds borne or breezes blown,
Finds something suited to its need
  Where 'er 'tis sown and grown;
Perchance finds sustenance and soil
  In some remote and desert place,
Or 'mid the crowded homes of toil—
  Sheds usefulness and grace.

The touching tones of minstrel art,
  The breathings of the mournful flute,
Which we have heard with listening heart,
  Are not extinct when mute;
The language of some household song,
  The perfumes of some cherished flower,
Though gone from outward sense, belong
  To memory's after hour.

So with our words, or harsh or kind,
  Uttered, they are not all forgot;
They leave their influence on the mind,
  Pass on, but perish not;
As they are spoken, so they fall
  Upon the spirit spoken to,
Search it like drops of burning gall
  Or soothe like honey dew.

So with our deeds, for good or ill
  They have a power scarce understood;
Then let us use our better will
  To make them rife with good;
Like circles on a lake they go,
  Ring within ring, and never stay;
Oh! that our deeds were fashioned so
  That they might bless alway!

MAXIMILIAN'S WISH.

Maximilian I., Emperor of Germany, sometimes called the 'Last Knight,' from his chivalrous character was in his youth remarkable for a high courage and love of adventure which at times led him to feats of rash daring.

Among the many lands over which he ruled, none was so dear to him as the mountainous Tyrol. Partly from the simple and loving loyalty of the hardy shepherds and mountaineers who dwelt there, partly also because hunting among the Tyrolese Alps was was one of his chief pleasures.

On Easter Monday, in the year 1493, the young emperor, who was staying in the neighborhood of Innsbrück, rose before dawn for a day's chamois hunting. He took with him a few courtiers and some experienced hunters.

At sunrise they were already high up on the mountain pastures, which are the favorite haunts of the chamois, the valleys beneath them were still covered by a sea of white mist, while the golden rays of morning shone from an unclouded sky on the snowy peaks and ridges above them.

Maximilian fixed a longing gaze on the rocky summits, which stood out clear and sharp against the blue heavens. He felt the power of the fresh mountain air and the sublime scenery, and it filled him with the spirit of enterprise and daring.

"I wish," said he, "that I could gain to-day some spot which the foot of man has never trod before, and where no man should be able to follow; a spot among the homes of the chamois and the eagle; where the busy hum of men should be lost to my ear, and all the crowded earth should lie beneath my feet; where even the thunder-clouds should mutter far below me, while I stood in eternal sunshine That would be a fit spot for the throne of an emperor!"

The courtiers replied that his majesty had but to wish and it would be fulfilled—to such a renowned hunter and intrepid mountaineer what could be impossible?

At this moment, one of the huntsmen gave notice that he had sighted some chamois; the whole party, guided by him, cautiously approached a rocky point, behind which the animals were grazing. On this point of rock stood a single chamois, its graceful head raised, as if on the watch. Long before they were within shot range, they heard it utter the peculiar piping cry by which the chamois gives notice of danger to its fellows, and then off it bounded with flying leaps toward the rocky solitudes above. Maximilian followed on its track, and had soon distanced his attendants. To be a good chamois-hunter, a firm foot and a steady head are required, for these beautiful little animals lead their pursuer into their own peculiar domain, the rocky wastes just below the regions of perpetual snow, and there they climb and spring with wonderful agility, and if they cannot escape, it is said that they will rather leap over a precipice and be dashed to pieces, than fall into the power of man.

Maximilian had all the qualities necessary for this adventurous chase, and was generally most successful in it. Now he reached the brink of a chasm, which the chamois had passed; black yawned the abyss at his feet, while beyond the rocks rose steep and forbidding, with but one little spot where a man could find footing. One moment he paused, then with a light spring he gained the other side, while a shout, half of admiration, half of terror, burst from his astonished suite.

"That was a royal leap! Who follows?" cried Maximilian, with an exulting laugh. Then he sped onward, intensely enjoying the excitement of the chase.

For a moment he lost the chamois from view, then it appeared again, its form standing out against the sky, on one of those rocky ridges that have been compared to the backbone of a fish, but are perhaps more like the upper edge of a steep-gabled roof. To gain this ridge it was needful to climb an almost perpendicular precipice; but Maximilian, nothing daunted, followed on, driving small iron holdfasts into the rock in places where he could gain no footing, and holding on by the hook, at the upper end of his iron-pointed Alp stick. At last, he seized a piece of projecting rock with his hand, hoping to swing himself up by it, but the stone did not bear his weight, it loosened and fell, and the emperor fell with it.

Breathless and stunned, it was some minutes before he recovered consciousness after the fall. When he came to himself, he found that he had received no injury, except a few bruises, and his first thought was that he was most lucky to have escaped so well. Then he began to look about him. He had fallen into a sort of crevice, or hollow in the rocks; on one side they rose above him as a high wall which it was impossible to scale; on the other hand they were hardly higher than his head, so that on this side he had no difficulty in getting out of the hollow.

"Lucky again," thought Maximilian; but as he emerged from the crevice and rose to his feet, he remained motionless in awe-struck consternation. He stood on a narrow ledge, a space hardly wide enough for two men abreast, and beneath him, sheer down to a depth of many hundred feet, sank a perpendicular wall of rock. He knew the place; it was called St. Martin's Wall, from the neighboring chapel of St. Martin, and the valley below it, which was now concealed from his view by white rolling vapors, was the Valley of Zierlein.

Above him rose the "wall," so straight and smooth, that it was utterly hopeless to think of scaling it. The only spot within sight, where a man could find footing, was the narrow shelf on which he stood. The ledge itself extended but a few feet on either side, and then ceased abruptly.

In vain Max gazed around for some way of escape.

No handsbreadth was there to which to cling; no hold for foot or hand of the most expert climber—beneath, a sea of cloud; above, a sea of air.

Suddenly he was startled by a whir and a rush of great wings in his face—it was a mountain eagle which swooped past him, and the wind of whose flight was so strong that it had nearly thrown him off his balance. He recollected that he had heard how these eagles try to drive any larger prey, too heavy to be seized in their talons, to the edge of a precipice, and so, by suddenly whirling round it, they may dash it over the brink; and how they had tried this manœuvre more than once to hunters whom they found in critical and helpless positions. And then his wish of the morning occurred to him. How literally and exactly it had been fulfilled! And how little could the emperor exult in his lofty and airy throne! He merely felt with a shudder his own exceeding littleness in the face of the great realities of Nature and Nature's God.

Beneath, in the valley of Zierlein, a shepherd was watching his flocks. As the sun rose higher and drew the mists off which clung round the foot of St. Martin's Wall, he noticed a dark speck moving on the face of the rock. He observed it narrowly.

"It is a man!" he cried; "what witchcraft has brought him there?"

And he ran to tell the wonder to the inhabitants of the valley. Soon a little crowd was collected and stood gazing up at St. Martin's Wall.

"God be with him!" was the compassionate exclamation of all. "He can never leave that spot alive—he must perish miserably of hunger!"

Just then a party of horsemen galloped along the valley, and rode up to the crowd, which was increasing every moment. It was the emperor's suite, who, giving up all hope of following his perilous course, had gone back to where they had left their horses in the morning, and ridden round, hoping to meet their master on the other side of the mountain.

"Has the emperor passed this way?" one of them called out. "He climbed up so far among the rocks that we lost sight of him."

The shepherd cast a terrified look at the wall, and, pointing upward, said:

"That must be he up yonder. God have mercy upon him!"

The emperor's attendants gazed at the figure, and at each other in horror. One of them had a speaking-trumpet with him such as mountaineers sometimes use for shouting to one another among the hills. He raised it to his mouth, and cried at the pitch of his voice:

"If it is the emperor who stands there, we pray him to cast down a stone."

There was a breathless hush of suspense now among the crowd, and down came the stone, crashing into the roof of a cottage at the foot of a rock.

A loud cry of lamentation broke from the people, and was echoed on every side among the mountains. For they loved their young emperor for the winning charm of his manner, for his frank and kindly ways, and especial fondness for their country.

The sound of that wail reached Max's ears, and looking down he could see the crowd of people, appearing from the giddy height like an army of ants—a black patch on the bright green of the valley. The sound and sight raised his hopes; he had completely given up all thought of delivering himself by his own exertions, but he still thought help from others might be possible. And now that his situation was discovered, the people he knew would do whatever lay in the power of man for his deliverance. So he kept up his courage, and waited patiently and hopefully. It was so hard to believe that he standing there in the bright sunshine, full of youthful health and strength, was a dying man, and never would leave that spot alive.

Higher and higher rose the sun. It was mid-day now, and the reflected heat from the rocky wall was well-nigh too great to bear. The stones beneath his feet became as hot as a furnace, and the sunbeams smote fiercely on his head. Exhausted by hunger and thirst, by heat and weariness, he sat down on the scorching rock. The furious headache and dizziness which came over him made him fear that he was about to become insensible. He longed for some certainty as to his fate before consciousness had forsaken him, and following a sudden thought, he drew from his pocket a small parchment book, tore out a blank leaf and wrote on it with pencil, then tied the parchment to a stone with some gold ribbon he happened to have with him, and let the stone fall into the valley as he had done the first. What he had written was the question, "Whether any human help was possible?" He waited long and patiently for the answer; but no sound reached his ear but the hoarse cry of the eagle. A second and a third time he repeated the message, lest the first should not have been observed — still there was silence, though the crowd in the valley had been increasing all day; and now a vast assembly—the inhabitants of Zierlien and all the district round—had gathered at the foot of that fatal throne which the emperor had desired for himself.

Terrible indeed—who can tell how terrible — were those hours of suspense to Max? Many deep and heart-searching thoughts visited him—thoughts of remorse for many sins, of self reproach for the great responsibilities unfaithfully fulfilled.

The day wore on, the sun was fast sinking toward the west, and Max could no longer resist the conviction that there was no help possible, that all hope must be over for him. It seemed as soon as he had faced this certainty that a calm resignation, a high courage and resolve, took possession of his soul. If he was to die, he would die as became a king and a Christian—if this world were vanishing from him, he would lay firm hold of the next.

Again he tore a leaf from his book, and wrote on it. There was no more gold ribbon to bind it to the stone, so he took the chain of the Order of the Golden Fleece—what value had it for a dying man?—and from that high and airy grave he threw the stone down among the living.

It was found, like the others before it. None had answered these, because no one was to be found willing to be a messenger of death to the much loved emperor. The man who found the stone read the letter aloud to the assembled crowd, for the emperor's messages were addressed to all Tyrol. And this was the message:

Oh Tyrol, my last warm thanks to thee for thy love which has so long been faithful to me.

In my pride and boastfulness I tempted God, and my life is now the penalty. I know that no help is possible. God's will be done —His will is just and right.

Yet one thing, good friends, you can do for me, and I will be thankful to you even in death. Send a messenger to Zierlien immediately for the holy sacrament for which my soul thirsts. And when the priest is standing by the river, let it be announced to me by a shot, and let another shot tell me when I am to receive the blessing. And then I pray you unite your prayers with mine to the great Helper in time of need, that He may strengthen me to endure the pains of a lingering death.

Farewell, my Tyrol.

MAX.

The reader's voice often faltered as he read this letter amid the sobs and cries of the multitude.

Off sped the messenger to Zierlien, and in haste came the priest.

Max heard the shot, and looking down, could see the white robe of the priest standing by the river, which looked like a little silver thread to him. He threw himself on his knees in all penitence and submission, praying that he might be a spiritual partaker of Christ, though he could not receive in body the signs of salvation. Then the second shot rang on the air, and through the speaking-trumpet came the words of the blessing:

"May God's blessing be upon thee in thy great need—the blessing of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, whom heaven and earth praise forever."

The emperor felt a deep peace filling his heart as the words of the blessing were wafted to his ear.

The sun had by this time sunk behind the mountain range beyond the valley of Zierlien; but a rosy blush still lingered on the snowy summits, and the western sky glowed in crimson and gold. Beneath, in the deep purple shade of the valley, the people all knelt, and the emperor could hear a faint murmur which told him they were praying for him.

Touched by their sympathy, he too continued kneeling in prayer for the welfare of his subjects.

It was quite dark now, and one by one the stars came forth on the deep blue sky, till at last all the heavenly host stood in glittering array. The sublime peace of these silent eternal fires stole into Max's heart, and drew his thoughts and desires heavenward to eternal Love and eternal Rest. So he knelt on, wrapt in prayer and in lofty and holy thoughts.

Suddenly a bright gleam flashed on his eyes, and a figure in a flicker and dazzle of light stood before him. No wonder that in his present mood, his spirit raised above earthly things, this vision should seem to him something more than human.

"Lord Emperor," it spake, "follow me quickly—the way is far and the torch is burning out."

Hardly knowing whether he was in the land of mortals or not, Max asked:

"Who art thou?"

"A messenger sent to save the emperor."

Max rose; as he gazed it seemed to him that the vision assumed the form of a bright-haired, barefooted peasant youth holding a torch in his hand.

"How didst thou find thy way to the cliff?" he asked.

"I know the mountains well, and every path in them."

"Has heaven sent thee to me?" said Max, still feeling as if he were in the dream world.

"Truly, it is God's will to deliver thee by my hand," was the simple answer.

The youth now turned and slid down into the hollow out of which Max had climbed that morning, and then glided through a crevice in the rock behind, which the emperor had failed to detect. Stooping low, he with difficulty squeezed through the narrow chink, and saw the torch flaring below him down a steep, rugged fissure which led into the heart of the rock. Leaping and sliding, he followed on, and the torch moving rapidly before him, its red light gleaming on metallic ores, and glittering on rock crystals. Sometimes a low thundering sound was heard, as of underground waterfalls, sometimes water dripping from the rocky roof made the torch hiss and sputter. Downward they went, miles and miles downward, till at last the ravine opened into a long, low, nearly flat-bottomed cavern, at the end of which the torch and its bearer suddenly vanished. But at the place where he had disappeared there was a glimmer of pale light. Max groped his way toward it, and drew a long breath as he found himself again in the open air, with the silent stars above him and the soft grass beneath his feet. He looked round for his deliverer, but no one was to be seen. He soon perceived that he was in the valley of Zierlien, and afar he heard a confused noise, as of an assembled multitude. He followed the sound till he reached the foot of St. Martin's Wall and saw the priest and people still praying for him. Deeply moved, he stepped into their midst and cried:

"Praise the Lord with me, my people. See, He has delivered me!"

The emperor was never able to discover his deliverer. A report soon spread among the people that an angel had saved him. When this rumor reached the emperor's ears he said:

"Yes, truly, it was an angel; my guardian angel, who has many a time come to my help—he is called in German 'The People's loyal Love.'"

Maximilian never forgot that day on St. Martin's Wall. It taught him many a lesson. It is said that he never again went out chamois-hunting without commending himself "en la garde de Dieu," as the native mountaineers of Switzerland and Tyrol are wont to do. And this spirit of thoughtless daring was sobered into a true and higher courage, which, throughout his life, never forsook him in the face of danger and death. [Frank Leslie's Pleasant Hours.

THE ORDER OF ENOCH;

OR, THE LAW OF EQUALITY.

BY ELI B. KELSEY.

As a sequel to our article on Tithing and Consecration, we now offer a few reflections on "The Order of Enoch," that the members of the Church may understand what that order really is, that has been dwelt upon so much of late by our teachers. The Law of Consecration, as before shewn, was given as "the beginning of the tithing of my people," (Doc. and Cov., page 323) and the law of Tithing was given as the standing law unto the whole Church, to endure for ever—which, for ever, applies, no doubt, only to the conditions of this life.

The Law of Consecration demands the surplus property of all believers, as a sign of acceptance of the law, and the law of Tithing calls for the payment, annually, of the tenth of the surplus or interest, arising from each year's labor, that as the poor are to be "always with us" there might be a constant source of revenue, out of which they could always be aided or relieved. The Order of Enoch is the real "higher law." The Law of Consecration being, as the Doctrine and Covenants says, the beginning; the Law of Tithing the continuance, and the Order of Enoch the voluntary result of the system of union to be established among the people of God. The laws of Consecration and Tithing are calculated, in their nature and operation, to cultivate and develop a generous consideration of the interests of all classes—especially of the poor and unfortunate—on the part of the rich and well-to-do portion of the Church. EQUALITY, in the communistic sense of the word, is not taught by any revelation ever given on the subject of Consecration and Tithing. The "Order of Enoch" is the higher law growing out of the two laws or conditions, before spoken of. The "Order of Enoch" lays the foundation of a grand system of voluntary co-partnerships, designed to be organized in Zion, and all her stakes, so fast as the people grow up to that standard, or development, absolutely necessary, before any such system could possibly be established. Deity never requires the establishment of impossible conditions for the management of society. A higher principle of law may be given, years, nay, ages before a people are found capable of living up to its conditions. "Do unto others as ye would have them do unto you," is a principle of divine justice and truth, that has been offered to the human race for acceptance for over eighteen centuries. Where are the peoples, or the societies to be found to-day, who not only engrave this beautiful law upon their temples, but live up to its requirements? The "Order of Enoch" is suited only for that class of mind that has attained to the highest standard of human development. In the library of every well ordered school may be found every class of books, from the Primer to those containing treatises on the various sciences in their most advanced stages. Where can you find a teacher or professor in charge of a school, embracing children of all ages and conditions, so much of a dolt as to imagine that he is bound by any principle of wisdom or justice to require an equal amount of obedience to principles taught in each and every book, from any one or any specified number of his pupils? A comprehensive observance of geometric rules is only required of advanced mathematicians.

However impossible, then, it may appear to some, that the principles laid down in the "Order of Enoch," can ever be other than visionary, let them consider that this order is no more antedated now, than was the beautiful saying, "Do unto others as ye would have them do unto you," before the time to that class of minds represented by the Pharisee, who thanked God that he was not as other men are; having especial reference to the poor publican who was beating his breast in the outer court of the temple.

Now let us examine this "Order of Enoch," and find what the Lord says on the subject, Doc. & Cov., Page 235, Par. 1, the Lord says,—

> And behold, and lo, it must needs be that there be an organization of my people, in regulating and establishing the affairs of the store house for the poor of my people, both in this place (Kirtland) and in the land of Zion, or in other words the City of Enoch, for a permanent and everlasting establishment and order unto my church, to advance the cause, which ye have espoused to the salvation of man, and to the glory of your Father who is in Heaven, that you may be EQUAL in the land of heavenly things; yea, and earthly things also, for the obtaining of heavenly things; for if ye are not EQUAL in earthly things, ye CANNOT be equal in obtaining heavenly things.

Here we find that the principle is laid down that to be equal in our opportunities of gaining heavenly things, we must be equal in our temporal condition. Let it be understood here, however, that goodness alone, although it will save a man, will never exalt him in heaven, worlds without end. The cultivation of thought, the expansion and growth of intellect, and the development of all the spiritual powers, based on goodness—will alone exalt a being in the great future of our existence—as they alone, exalt any one in this life. We must, to be in equal condition here, have equal opportunities and be equally attentive, industrious and studious, or we can never stand equally in the opening up of our spiritual life hereafter, even if it be admitted that we are at all likely to reach equal mental attainments under similiar conditions.

Hear, further, what the Lord says on the subject of this Order. Doc. & Cov. Page 257, Par. 3.

> Behold, here is wisdom also in me for your good. And you are to be equal, or in other words, you are to have equal claims on the properties, for the benefit of managing the concerns of your stewardships, every man according to his wants and his needs, inasmuch as his wants are just.

Further, he says, Doc. & Cov. Page 271, Par. 1:

> Verily, thus saith the Lord, I give unto the united order, organized agreeably to the commandment previously given, a revelation and commandment concerning my servant Shederlaomach, that ye shall receive him into the order.

Here we discover three principles set forth.

1st. That the order had power to determine what should be the past claims of any member of it upon the "properties" belonging to it.

2d. That the order was not established for the whole Church at once; we were to grow up to it.

3d. That the members of the Order had power given them to say who should be admitted into it. The "order" possessed the entire agency of determining as to who they should admit to an equal fellowship with themselves in the manipulation of the common funds, unless the Lord Himself spoke.

We find upon page 283, Doc. & Cov., a revelation without date, given to that branch of "the Order of Enoch" organized in Kirtland. In that revelation the principle is established that each branch of the order, as well as the parent order in Zion, had not only the right to determine who should be admitted to membership, but whether they would or would not hold the affairs of their order in connection with the affairs of the parent order in Zion, or of a branch in any of her "stakes." See page 286, Par. 9. On pages 287 and 288, Par. 12. We find that no matter how much nor how little, a person might be possessed of this world's gear, when he entered the Order, he immediately placed himself, in all respects, on a level with every member of the Order. Every member is to have not only an equal claim upon its properties, but is to have an equal voice in determining any and every question of any interest whatever.

Having shown what the Order was, as taught by Joseph, let us now enquire how far it resembles the Order of Enoch as taught so much of late.

We have been informed, time and time again, "that to live up to the higher law, we must consecrate all our substance to the use and control of the Priesthood. The Priesthood referred to being that portion of the Priesthood centered in the first Presidency of the Church. That the whole Church is hereafter, under this "higher law," to have but one purse, the strings of which are to be held by the Presidency alone, and, in whom shall rest all powers to dictate that purse. Thus we see that the President in place of becoming a member of the holy order of Enoch—himself is constituted the MASTER of not only the parent order in Zion, but of all the organizations instituted in any of her "stakes." We further see that instead of every member having equal claim on the "properties" or having an equal voice in its affairs, is to have no claim at all only such as the Presidency dictate, and to have no voice whatever in the management of his affairs, unless his voice shall sustain the mastership of the Presidency. If any member should unfortunately be endowed with even a modicum of brains and think differently from the Presidency on any subject, he may think on, but must in no case express his thoughts so as to influence the rest against any decision of the President on pain of expulsion from the Order, and of having the gates of the heavenly Jerusalem forever locked against him—"Oh! consistency, thou art a jewel." What comparison, we ask, is there between the Lord's plan for the management of this Order of union of the saints, based, as we have seen, on their individual control, and the plan as now taught by the Priesthood which vests the whole power of its direction in an irresponsible head, against whose course there is practically no appeal?

REPLY TO GEORGE Q. CANNON ON AUTHORITY.

BY E. L. T. HARRISON.

In our last issue we replied to an article on apostacy written by Elder Orson Hyde, one of the Twelve Apostles. As Orson Hyde is the President of that body, the condensed wisdom of the quorum might very reasonably have been expected in his arguments. To what extent they were weak or powerful our readers, who have read our reply, can best judge. Another one of the Twelve now enters the lists in opposition to the Movement, with a discourse which is evidently intended to be a crushing reply to any query respecting the divinity of Brigham Young's measures. We shall now reply to his remarks that the people may see how much sound reason and solid arguments two of the greatest lights of the Twelve can bring to bear on the doctrine of unconditional obedience to the Priesthood.

The discourse to which we refer, was published in the Deseret Evening News of Saturday, Dec. 11th. The object of it is to prove that no legal communication can possibly come from God to our people except through Brigham Young, and, consequently, that our MANIFESTO is false.

In this discourse, as in a number of editorials published lately in the Deseret News, great efforts are made to arouse the prejudices of the people against those who personally represent the great Movement now before them, by confounding their cause and position with that of every apostate that ever left our Church. Article after article has appeared comparing them to the Laws, the Higbees and Fosters, and every other corrupt man of a similar class, against whom our people are supposed to have a special aversion. This kind of "argument" was started at our trial and has been continued ever since. To the great body of principles and arguments we have issued from week to week, but one answer has come back, which can be summed up in the one word—Apostate. No arguments, no reasons, but an incessant cry of "Apostates. If Elder Cannon, or others, imagine that the application of a vile epithet like this will smother out of sight the array of Godlike principles we are continually presenting, so that the people will not see them, they simply miscalculate, and we are sorry for them. They mean well no doubt, but the course they take is a weak one. Where is the scientific man in all the world that would stoop to overpower the arguments of an opposing thinker by calling him an apostate? The whole scientific world would laugh at such evidence of weakness on the part of any philosopher, and take it as an evidence that he was worsted in the argument. Of all men in the world, it is reserved for priests and religious leaders alone to meet facts, arguments and truths, by simply blackening the character of those who differ with them! No other class of men on this earth descend to it. On this account Elder Cannon and his friends should have nothing to do with such a course.

In Elder Cannon's Editorials in the News, as well as in Orson Hyde's letter to the Telegraph, certain parties now advocating "liberty and freedom," etc.—who are well understood by the whole community to be ourselves—are mixed up in one heap with apostates, because such always blacken the character of the Presiding Authorities, and "expose the corruptions of Mormonism." Is this our case? Is this the spirit of our Movement? The case is precisely the reverse; all the attempts at exposing have been on the other side! While our language has been uniformly temperate and kind to the leaders of the Church—as this MAGAZINE will prove—they have assailed us in almost every case, with the bitterest personal denunciations; making use of language of the very kind indulged in by the apostates they refer to. It is to be hoped that these characteristics are not changing hands and getting on the orthodox side?

In the above discourse Elder Cannon gives a list of a number of persons who, at various times, have dissented from the Church and claimed to lead it; but who have failed. This to Elder Cannon's mind is conclusive proof that every other person who shall at any time or under any circumstances announce a divine mission, while dissenting from the policy of the leading authorities, must necessarily be wicked or deluded. The want of logic which enables a man to jump at conclusions like this, will be apparent to a child. Twenty thousand men, who differ with the Authorities, may come with false claims, and their lack of everything but big sounding assumptions may be manifest to all; and then one or more may come and he or they may bring a message which touches human hearts, and is pregnant with manifestations of its divinity. Shall men follow Elder Cannon's course and lump both these kinds together without further investigation? We do, indeed, announce a great mission, and we have the first fruits of it in our souls to disseminate, in principles so sweet, natural and pure, that they bear their God-given testimony upon their face. We do not come before the Church with a mere wonderful story of angelic visitations; nor do we rest our missions on ordinations or anything of the kind. It is true we do declare that angels have spoken to us, but we can do what the characters Elder Cannon refers to never could—we can leave aside the question whether these beings have spoken to us or not, and then we can prove all we say by every principle of light and truth We can stand on the ground of the superiority of the principles which we bring alone. Angels or no angels, we can prove every principle we present by common sense; by solid reason; by appealing to every high-born instinct of the human heart; and by the witness of the Holy Ghost. The difference between men who come out claiming to be some great ones, and men, the burden of whose mission is sheer principle, great truths and advanced thoughts, will be apparent to all. If we cannot prove we have greater light, higher and nobler sentiments to present to the world—and that without simply falling back on the miraculous, or claims to authority, we ask no one to accept us because we do. This is the difference, then, between our position and that of apostates or petty leaders of factions referred to by Elder Cannon. They claimed to preside over the Church. We do not. They rested their authority upon their own personal testimony. We, simply, announce a Movement, and rest its claims upon the enlightenment it brings to the mind, and the witness of God in the heart; and this constitutes a difference between the representatives of this Movement and the class referred to by Bro. Cannon, that thousands already appreciate.

Elder Cannon next tries to show that certain parties must be opposed to God, because they are welcomed by "the wicked," while President Young is hated and reviled by the same class. He says:

"All these men arose, claiming that it was their right and privilege, by ordination or by special appointment, to take charge of the Church. * * * Still this peculiarity,—being hailed as brethren by the wicked, characterized them, in Nauvoo, as their predecessors in New York, Kirtland and Missouri. Instead of being hated and calumniated, and men seeking their lives and persecuting them, they were hailed with seeming pleasure and satisfaction. Men bade them "God speed" and urged them forward to claim the rights they called their own. * * * *

"Brigham became the inheritor of all that animosity and hatred that had been manifested towards Joseph during his lifetime; and when Joseph slept in a bloody grave, the enemies of the Church turned their attention to Brigham Young, his legal successor.

"If the Saints had wanted evidence in relation to who was the right man, and who had the authority, the very fact that the world hated, reviled and persecuted Brigham should have been sufficient evidence that he was taking the path which Joseph had trod, and that his course was pleasing in the sight of Heaven, and consequently hateful in the sight of Hell."

We can settle the first of the above points in a very short way. If Elder Cannon means by "the wicked" persons morally corrupt we are willing to meet him before any tribunal, or any committee at any time, and challenge him to prove that in any one particular we have violated one law of purity or right ourselves, or that we are familiarly associated with any one person of that class. He should do this, or hereafter hold his peace. If by the wicked he means men and women, all over the world, who are opposed to the doctrine of passive unreasoning obedience to an absolute Priesthood, then we are willing to admit that such persons wish us God speed; because there is an instinct in every human heart, wide spread as humanity itself, except where ignorance and fanaticism prevail, which makes all reasoning intelligent men and women—no matter how widely they may differ with us on every other subject—agree in opposition to so monstrous a doctrine. And they should, for it is opposed to reason as well as to every sentiment of the Gospel of Christ, and is the most baseless theory ever offered to mankind. That the world at large agree with us on this point is natural enough. It is one of those things that all sensible men have to agree upon; just as all the world have to agree with our people on the subject of industry and labor, because the principle is true and self-evident. To our mind, it is a proof of a very poor narrow creed which supposes that every person opposed to it is wicked. Every sect deems those wicked who oppose its dogmas. Ask the Papist who are the wicked, and he will reply, "those who would reduce the temporal power of the Pope." To his mind this is conclusive evidence that such persons cannot have the Spirit of God. He reasons to himself, "do they not fight God's Priesthood; how then can they be anything but wicked?" As the Catholic reasons, so does Elder Cannon. To his conception all opposition to "Mormonism" has but one explanation, and that—the Devil. This is an old sectarian idea, in existence ages upon ages before "Mormonism" was thought of. Ask the Methodist, the Quaker, the Catholic, the Episcopalian, the Shaker,—old sects and new ones, why the world opposed them, and the venerable answer—old as the Pope—comes back, that the Devil stirs up the wicked against them. The writer, himself, while a youth, believed in this idea firmly, long before he ever heard of "Mormonism;" and it would have been a serious shock to his feelings if the Latter-day Saint Church had scouted this time-honored notion. But as he traveled amongst mankind, and began to closely study human nature, he found that it was a fanatical conception which had no foundation in fact. He found that opposition to any man, or to any institution, was no proof whatever that he or it was of God, or that the opposition came from the Devil. He discovered that opposition and persecution had followed the introduction of all new ideas. Even the inventor of the Spinning Jenny had to flee for his life—the devil was so opposed to him! It is a well-known fact that false prophets as well as true ones, have been persecuted even to death. In England, as well as on the Continent, men claiming to be sent of God, but whose prophecies utterly failed, were hunted down and shot, or otherwise got rid of. When the Methodists started in England they were repeatedly mobbed, knocked down, and brutally treated hundreds of times. If being opposed and reviled proves a man to hold divine authority, as Elder Cannon argues, then the Hugenots and the Waldenses must hold about ten times as much priesthood as we do, for both those sects can count a hundred martyrs who "sleep in bloody graves" to our one. How many did we have killed at Haun's Mill? perhaps twenty. Then think of SEVENTY THOUSAND MARTYRS for their faith, slain at the Massacre of St. Bartholomew, in France, at one time; and yet their faith was as full of errors as any other form of sectarianism. The Waldenses, a people who with their leaders, were hunted in the mountains, in a manner, compared to which, all the persecutions of Brigham Young and our Church were but a speck, were slain by the thousand from generation to generation. Terms of revilement and contempt were heaped upon them by the, then, whole Christian civilized world. In fact thousands of facts can be collected shewing that persecution proves nothing of itself, and that the brainless and visionary have been persecuted as much as any who ever held the Priesthood or claimed to; utterly overthrowing the idea that any opposition to President Young, past or present, goes to prove the divinity of his course; and putting to the rout the ignorant belief that persecution proves him or any of us to be the favorites of heaven.

While we say this much on the subject of persecution, we believe that President Young was called in the Providences of God to preside over our people. We refer to Elder Cannon's arguments respecting persecution simply to show the shallowness of the reasoning indulged in by many. There is no necessity to lug in divinity to account for persecution. It can be easily explained on natural principles. Generally, two thirds can be traced to the selfishness or ignorance of the persecutors, and the balance to the follies or extremes of the persecuted. In our case the solution is clear enough. As we have said, all ideas are persecuted, in proportion to their novelty; and as a people we presented a greater number of startling theories than any other set of religionists. Furthermore, we began to organize to carry these doctrines practically into effect. We sent all over the world to gather converts, and the ignorance and the fears of our neighbors were necessarily aroused as to what was to result from all this. All that they could see was a power rising up that threatened to overwhelm them. And then, as we all know, many of our people have, from time to time, talked extravagantly, and boasted that our institutions would some day drive all before them, compel all to bow the knee to our rule. Cannot a child see that there was in all this enough in itself to arouse the feelings of those ignorant or suspicious of our true spirit? If ignorance has in all ages caused men to be persecuted for their theories, how much more were men certain to be persecuted who formed powerful organizations, and gathered from all parts of the earth to carry their new doctrines into effect—whose course threatened to absorb in due time all ecclesiastical and civil power from their neighbors, and dispossess them of all leadership and influence, unless they succumbed to the new people? How could human nature—always prone to rebel against new doctrines—be supposed to quietly lie still and see such a power arise to mastery without an effort to put it down? It would have been the greatest miracle the world ever saw if such a system, true or false, had been permitted by selfish, jealous humanity to grow up in its midst without fear and suspicion. Under these circumstances, what need is there to suppose men wicked because they opposed a system that claimed absolute dominion over the destinies of all mankind—proclaimed far and wide as our Priesthood do to-day, that politically, socially and religiously, they will govern the whole earth? Who but a fanatic cannot see that if mankind were not jealous and alarmed at these assumptions that they ought to have been. If people who have presented no claims to power and authority, but merely asked the privilege of differing on a few simple articles of faith, have been ruthlessly slain by thousands; how can any man with a vestige of intelligence be surprised at the persecutions we have experienced as a people. The thing explains itself without our being obliged to consider the world wicked or corrupt in heart. Neither do we need to accept Elder Cannon's far fetched and illogical idea that the opposition of the political and commercial world to Brigham Young is owing to the fact that he holds the keys of the Priesthood. A simpler and far more natural reason lies on the face of things. Suppose, for the sake of argument, that President Young really held no Priesthood and and still acted in political matters as he now does, would it not, naturally, cause as much or more envy or jealousy as now exists against him? "The world hate him." Of course they do, and they would hate a Methodist, a Catholic, or a Pagan, who struck at the root of their trade, and absorbed all the political influence they wished to enjoy. It does not need Priesthood or Divine Authority to get hated and reviled when you touch men's interests and ambitions at every point. This President Young does all the time in a thousand ways, as we all know. And then Elder Cannon cries out they hate him because he holds the Priesthood. What a marvellous absurdity! The reason of the great opposition of commercial men to President Young is clear enough—he destroys their trade. The dislike of politicians is equally explainable: they find that President Young's system reduces them to mere ciphers. Be it ever so right it still does this. If these men believed, as our people have done, in the divinity of this order of things, of course they could accept it. But while they believe it to be mere superstition, is it reasonable to expect men of the world to act as angels and bear this loss of prestige and influence without feeling? Or while the whole American people believe we are no more than any other sect in the sight of God, is it fair to expect that that they should contemplate the rising of a power, which will not join with them and do as they do, without dislike? The national pride and desire for absolute governmental influence is aroused and interfered with. Even supposing this feeling arises out of ignorance or still lower feelings, is there any solid reason for bringing these national, political and commercial dislikes forward as proofs of the divinity of Brigham Young's measures, when they would exist against any man who did the same things?

Let us now turn our attention to another point. Bro. Cannon says, in this same discourse, referring of course, to our Manifesto:

> Men may say they have heard the voice of Jesus, or heard this, that or the other; but you will find that the power of God will attend the keys, and His blessings will follow the administration of His servants who hold the authority.

This is the most unfortunate argument that Elder Cannon could have chosen. If the possession of the keys of the kingdom of God is to be tried by the manifestation of the power of God, we much fear there cannot be a key left in the hands of President Young. For years and years every manifestation of the "power of God" has been declining in our midst. Our sick die by the hundred. One case of healing does not occur where fifty did in former times. You can go for years to our meetings and "not hear the inspiration of prophecy," or any other gift. This fact was so apparent to all, that after the Manifesto appeared, some of our Bishops publicly acknowledged the deadness of the people to spiritual gifts, and proposed—what they had not had for years before—weekly testimony meetings to pray for their revival. And such meetings are now being held in this city for which the people, of course, may thank the Movement. So unpopular were manifestations of the power of God some short time since, that one of the Twelve Apostles desired a literary man in our midst not to record in his history the vision of an angel which he had seen, because that sort of thing was not in accord with the spirit of the times. We are perfectly willing to let the truth of our mission be decided on Elder Cannon's principle. Not only have spiritual gifts ceased, but spirit, power and influence, have died out also, and our sermons are dry, stale and monotonous. Again men on missions have felt more divine influence abroad in the distant branches of the Church than at home. They have not only felt a greater influence when away from headquarters, but one of a higher and sweeter kind. How many, many Elders have come back from their missions full of holy influences and desires for spiritual life, and as soon as they reached this Territory they have felt as though they were immersed in a tub of cold water; every avenue of inspiration to their souls closed up by the worldly spirit that prevails. Fearlessly we can appeal to thousands for the truth of what we say; for we have heard such sentiments on innumerable occasions. Elder Cannon little knows what a dangerous chord he strikes. Nothing do the people feel more sensibly than the absence of the power and blessing of God from the present administration of late years. And indeed this is one of the great reasons which have caused the Heavens to interfere, that the people may enjoy these blessings of which so long they have been destitute. We are perfectly willing to have the Divinity of the Movement tested on this basis. If the power of God, in a thousand forms, does not attend it, let it perish and pass away. Already such blessings are being felt and enjoyed, with such a sense of spiritual witness and testimony that has not been enjoyed for years. Let the question be decided on Elder Cannon's grounds, by all means.

In our next we shall test his arguments of the divinity of the President's position and measures, drawn from the Doctrine and Covenants, etc.

JOSEPH SMITH AND HIS WORK,

VERSUS, UTAH AND THE PRESENT.

No. 2.

I do not wish, in this my second view of our founder and his work, to lessen the value of his chief apostle but to illustrate two types of character and phases of Mormonism marked in our own history.

In this investigation misunderstand me not. I grant the potency of the rule under which we have existed during our sojourn in the Rocky Mountains, the greatness of the man who has administered our affairs, and the integrity and devoted lives of his brethren, the Apostles. But truth and justice now demand that we should look into the divine and human mirrors, found in the experience of this Church. Some of us have dared to do it at a great price—the loss of a twenty-one years' standing in that Church from which we have been cast out, because we are not in the likeness of Utah and the present.

In my first view of the great Mormon Prophet I dwelt upon the fact that he was a Seer by nature and race. This was accompanied by a few leading assumptions of his mission. To this let us now supplement his Church, and we shall find one of the most marvellous psychological curiosities ever presented in the history of the world.

I have used the term psychological curiosities, to cover the ground of the sceptic as well as the experience of the disciple.

We will assume that Joseph was a Seer, and that his fitness of nature caused him to be chosen by the Heavens for a spiritual work. But this is only the curiosity in its first form. Confined to that, and it simply amounts to one prophet and a personal mission. In that form he might have been a light to the world, through the medium of splendid revelations—a light whereby mankind might only see how dark they were. But here is the greater marvel, in the assumption of his dispensation: "I will set up a church like unto myself, and my disciples shall be the mirrors of the Holy Ghost, and we will call our church Zion."

Now if this comes to pass, and an inspirational people is born of Joseph's mission, then this psychological marvel might be multiplied a thousand fold. And such, indeed, came to pass. A church grew up like unto Joseph. This proved the man's mission, and further proved that he was the Prophet of a dispensation. And if this spiritual church be not continued, then is there presumptive proof that the heavens have for a time been closed again; for, while Joseph lived, the entire Mormon people were baptized into his prophetic spirit, and the Heavens did reveal not to one man only but to tens of thousands. Indeed, it is a great fact that strikes us on every side of the Mormon experience, that we have seen two phases, first the Divine, and next the Human. But let us see the divine experience of this Church, for that is about to be repeated.

Fifty years ago, when the boy Joseph announced his first vision, it was as a shock upon the age from the other world. There were then no ten millions of spiritualists in Christendom, to bear witness even of the simple fact of another life, much less a church like ours bearing testimony of the higher truths of celestial existence. Immortality was a sealed book, and a Joseph was not merely a minority of a thousand to a little Utah, as he might be considered to-day in that number of Mormon elders in whom his spirit still lives, but he was a minority of one to a world. Do our brethren think of that, when they inconsistently talk of certain parties being mere minorities? It is facts, not minorities or majorities, which will stand in this account. Joseph, then, was but one prophet against the millions who declared, as some of us practically do to-day, that the heavens are closed and shall not speak to man. But there was a grand majority above, who on their part declared that a spiritual dispensation should be opened, and that the Heavens should reveal, though all the priests in Christendom should forbid God to speak and angels to come to earth attesting the immortality of man.

And just here comes the experience of a hundred and fifty thousand Mormons, who can answer the question, whether Joseph was right, or whether the faithless priests of the day were right.

The prophet proclaimed his divine mission to a few, and a little church of six members was founded, most of whom were of his own family. Mark this to-day; for there are as many thousand prophets in modern Israel as there were when great Elijah on Mount Horeb mourned the apostacy of his people.

But the promise to Joseph was, that spiritual Zion should be built up, and his problem was to be solved in other men's experience. It was a strange proclamation he made, that the thousands in many lands should receive the witness from on high of his mission. Had that witness not been given, his own testimony would have been as nought. But it was given, all Utah will answer to that, as but very few can answer, by the same evidence which they first received, concerning anything which is done to-day.

That little church of six grew, and the knowledge and the revelations of God increased among men. Yet the elders who were sent out as ministers of this gospel of a new dispensation, were the "hewers of wood and drawers of water" in the social ranks. Joseph, the prophet, himself was as David taken from the sheepfold. Mormonism, at first, came as a simple proclamation to the nations—"Jehovah speaks, let earth give ear." This was the burden of the subject of their message, and the majority of the first elders could do but little more in the way of preaching than to bear a testimony. The sum of a thousand sermons amounted to but little more than the TESTIMONY that God had again called a Prophet, that the Heavens were opened, and that spiritual power was about to be poured out upon all flesh. The most illiterate of the Mormon preachers, however, succeeded in committing to memory two passages of the New Testament. They were:

"And these signs shall follow them that believe. In my name they shall cast out devils; they shall speak with new tongues; they shall take up serpents; and if they drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them; they shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover."

To this was added Peter's quotation of the words of the Prophet Joel, applied to the day of Pentecost, but specially designed—so the Mormon elders declared—for our times:

"And it shall come to pass, in the last days, saith God, I will pour out my spirit upon all flesh, and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, and your young men shall see visions, and your old men shall dream dreams; and on my servants and on my handmaidens I will pour out in those days of my spirit, and they shall prophesy."

In all the history of missionary labors, excepting in the case of the fishermen of Galilee, never did simple-minded men, with so brief a chapter of theology, accomplish such vast results as did these illiterate Mormon elders and priests.

One of those results was that in Great Britain alone the church at one time numbered thirty-one thousand, with over fifty conferences, comprising between five hundred and a thousand branches.

Now the philosophy of these results and of the very existence and history of the Mormons is to be found in the fact that all that was promised was fulfilled in the spiritual experience of the disciples. Next to that given by Christ and his apostles it is the most marvellous psychological example found in the history of religious movements. Indeed these two great Christian examples seem to be the only scientific expositions of a spiritual Church and a spiritual movement ever known among mankind. It was not a mere religious epidemic, not a number of promiscuous experiences, but an organized spiritual movement answering to the most scientific methods of operation. Just as though the very Heavens had entered into a thorough understanding and compact to fulfil the general promises of the Prophet Joseph, did his great spiritual mission develop itself among the nations. Thus was it precisely in the dispensation established by Jesus and developed by him after His resurrection. This remarkable fact gives strong evidence that the second Christian dispensation, established by Joseph, also came down through the immediate ministry of Jesus and his angels to us. The entire Mormon Church was baptized into the prophetic and spiritual mission of Joseph Smith. Historians and social philosophers will yet note the Church which he founded, and its spiritual experience as the second most marvellous psychological fact known in the history of mankind.

And to what would a continuation of this spiritual experience have led this Church? It is a very pertinent question. If these demonstrations of the Holy Ghost, this direct powerful testimony that God did "to-day" speak to man with "His own voice," produced such effects in the world, what would the further witness thereof in the very experience of the nations themselves have produced? And if the simple testimony of a few hundred illiterate men and boys to the fact that the time had come for the Spirit to be poured out upon all flesh, wrought among the nations such wonderful results, what could not ten thousand Mormon Elders do to-day were their testimony now accompanied by the demonstrations of the Holy Ghost? And what must ere this have come to pass had there been a Jacob's ladder in Zion, day and night, by which the angels ascend and descend from God in their ministry to man, as they did to Jacob and to Joseph? We should have converted millions and shaken a world.

We are Elders ten thousand in number in Utah; the men who were once "hewers of wood and drawers of water" are now experienced statesmen; those illiterate boys are self-reliant men who can match their number from any Christian denomination; yet our ten thousand Elders cannot accomplish as much as did Heber C. Kimball, Wilford Woodruff and the rest of the apostles, during the first twelve years of the British mission. I do not doubt that they could gather ten thousand to Utah, but very much doubt if they could so shake Britain with a prophetic and spiritual mission as they did in the early period of the work. Indeed, they have now no such prophetic and spiritual work to witness unto, and no angelic priesthood coming down to confirm their testimony by the demonstrations of the Holy Ghost to every soul.

But Joseph Smith and his work must come again in our experience or the past, which is almost forgotten, amounts practically to nothing to-day. And come he will and commence his work again in our experience. The world shall see greater than at first this psychological wonder, and millions shall know in this generation that Joseph was a Prophet. Is not this the old testimony almost out of date and mind? Yet shall it come to pass in the nineteenth century through his mission, that the "knowledge of the Lord shall cover the earth as the waters cover the mighty deep." If not, Mormonism is a failure! Doubt, if you please, but trifle not with God!

THE ORACLES SPEAK

(REVIEWS OF THE MANIFESTO)

BY EDWARD W. TULLIDGE.

There was silence in Heaven for the space of half an hour.—JOHN.

Has there happened, then, in Israel a wonderful thing? Shall we be surprised that the oracles speak? It has been to me a matter of great astonishment that the oracles were silent, seeing that they are said to be living oracles. A dead God is a tremendous burden upon a world, and reticent angels are the worst of infidels. Under their administration society becomes ten times more worldly than before.

But there is no dead God, no silent Heaven, no reticent angels. For, when God cannot manifest Himself through Priesthoods, He manifests Himself through the grand providences of a world, somewhat, perhaps, to the detriment of special faiths, and to the increase of scepticism in society. If He has no Peter to build up His Christian Church, He will find a Watt, or a Stevenson to inaugurate an age of railroads and steam;—if he finds no Luther for His advent of reformation, He will raise up a George Washington for some blessed revolution to carry along humanity's destiny. And thus the Heavens still speak everlastingly, and angels in the teeming millions of earth's creatures, in science, civilization and national progress, testify daily to the marvellous work of God.

Now it was towards this latter phase of Divine manifestations, towards this philosophic mode of revealed religion, that my friends, Harrison, Godbe, Kelsey, Shearman, and a host of us Mormon Elders, were fast travelling. We were settling down into a philosophic state of religion, and anchoring faith in the DIVINE MISSION OF A WORLD, rather than in the mission of any special Prophet; for we knew, as all Israel knows, that the oracles had ceased to speak direct from God to man.

I wish, distinctly and strongly, to mark this tendency to a philosophic religious faith which, for many years, has been growing in the minds of the Mormon Elders and of our most enterprising commercial men, while a corresponding change, to the practical, hard sense, has been coming over the working classes of Utah. The reason why this should be strongly noted is because of its vast, yet solid significance. It will show the outside world that this religious movement, now rising amongst us, has not originated in wild fanaticism nor in a general inclination for the marvellous. There never was a people, from Brigham Young downwards, less in a fanatical mood than the Mormon people have been of late years. Our President had certainly cured us of all fanaticism, and made us as wise as any class of sceptics in the world. There is, therefore, in the very birth of this spiritual movement a scientific veracity. But there is a still more striking fact in the case, and that is, that the Heavens have chosen sceptics for their work of perpetuating Mormonism—actually challenging scientific obstinacy—and imposed a religious mission on men who least expect it, men, indeed, who hoped not for any apostolic mission in their future lives, and who desired to live in fellowship with all mankind, and to avoid every difficulty with the ruling Priesthood. There is, in these facts and circumstances, a special significance for the consideration of the Priesthood of the Church; and also a unique subject of interest for the thinking class outside of ourselves. Epitomise the case thus: Elias Harrison and William Godbe, in common with others, had reached a stage of their lives where they least expected a revival of the prophetic dispensation of Joseph Smith. A high moral and intellectual phase of Mormonism was the most that they hoped to witness during their lifetime. They were bound to the Church by their association and faith of the past, and not by the expectation that God was about to speak to anybody now, much less to themselves. They had no ambition to be religious leaders—scarcely a desire to be religious teachers in any special mission. To fulfill their duties in a general way, as the lesser helps, was all for which they were prepared. There was no desire to go to the nations with the testimony of the Mormon work, for the immense dissimilarity between the grand programme of the past, and the apparent consummation of the present, took from them the energy of faith necessary for a mission. Underlying this was also the understanding that, in many cases, missions in later years were but a mild form of transportation. Yet it was at such a time and under such circumstances that the celestial world burst the silence of years and spoke to man again—and spoke to William and Elias.

We come now to a very peculiar phase of the subject, to which I desire to draw the special attention of free thinkers and universalian Christians outside of the narrow circle of the Mormon Church.

We have read in the Manifesto of the witnesses of their mental struggles of years to limit themselves to the special sphere of Joseph Smith's mission; we have seen them in daring thought overleaping the barriers of their Church, on to the broad plain of a universal Christianity; we find them at the very turning point of their lives, in a scientific, ay, even in a sceptical mood—and yet their issue came not in a denunciation of the mission of the Mormon Prophet, but in a grand Manifesto of its truth. Here are the words of the remarkable testimony upon that point:

"At last the light came, and by the voice of angelic beings—accompanied by most holy influences—and other evidences that witnessed to all our faculties that their communications were authorized of God—we were each of us given personally to know that, notwithstanding some misconceptions and extremes wisely permitted, to accomodate it to the weaknesses of mankind, "Mormonism" was inaugurated by the Heavens for a great and divine purpose, its main object being the gathering of an inspirational people, believing in continued revelations, who, with such channels opened up, could at any period be moulded to any purpose the Heavens might desire; and out of whom, with these opportunities for divine communication, could be developed the grandest, and the noblest civilization the world has ever seen. We also learned that the evils we had seen in the Church truly did exist; but that they would pass away before the light of a clearer and greater day of revelation and inspiration which was about to dawn upon our system.

A transition from a philosophic and sceptical state of mind, (which was in itself the culmination of a twenty years' mental struggle and growth,) suddenly back to supremest faith in revelation through the direct administration of angelic beings to themselves, would certainly be an extraordinary event in the lives of any men; but, in their sudden breaking through the veil of midnight darkness, to find that "Mormonism" was inaugurated by the Heavens for a great and divine purpose, was, under the circumstances, still more marvellous.

I imagine, by way of illustration, the case of a philosopher leaping boldly into eternity to find out the solution of the great problems of all ages—a God and the immortality of man. Having passed the state of death, he meets the God and finds the immortality in his still existing self. Thus was it with these witnesses of the great movement of Zion who, without passing the veil into the spirit-world themselves, met holy beings from the other life who came to them, and spoke with their own voices and made immortality tangible to them by the evidence of mortal senses.

Next, pass to the special point of the case.

Let us also suppose the philosopher, whom we have taken to solve immortality and the existence of God, to be a Robert Owen or Theodore Parker or Ralph W. Emerson. Such are men who care but little about whether Peter or Paul were apostles, but everything for the truth and a philosophic christianity—men who would as soon receive Plato as Christ—who judge both only by the light which they have revealed and the goodness and the love which they have infused into human society. Our philosopher shall not only find out God and his own immortality upon his entering into the spirit world, but he shall, though he cares but little about specialties, also find out that Peter and Paul were apostles and are in fact still apostles of the world's grandest civilization. Moreover he shall discover that a Plato is a witness for Christ, and the Christ—the witness for all the great and the good who have lived in the ages before and since his day, working out humanity's advancement. He should learn that sectarianism and religious hates belong not to Christianity, which is as universalian and humanitarian as his own views. As he ascended to the plane of the revelation of Jesus to day, in the mansion of his Celestial Father, he should also learn of a God of love, a God of salvation, but no God of damnation, for the countless millions of Adam's race; for he would have left the hates and hells and the devils when he ascended from mortality and soared to the plane of Christ. Now, this part of it might not astonish him, being so much in harmony with his former universalian thoughts and humanitarian sentiments. It might, however, astonish him to discover how different Christianity is represented in the heavenly Zion above, to what it is below, among the sectarian churches, and perchance he would be joyfully surprised to find how near he had been to Christ on earth, even in his scepticism. There is one thing, however, that he would certainly discover, which would somewhat pain him: namely, that the spiritual darkness, religious hates and all which he had most deplored in mortal life, had grown out of the world's practical infidelity. Priesthoods, sceptics and worldly-minded men rule the mortal sphere and shut out the heavens from coming to the help of mankind. Where, then, shall stand the unthinking, and those who are led through their blind obedience and credulity by superior intellects and superior wills? The transcendentalist, or sceptical philosopher could soon answer that question; and he would, without further investigation, be able to conclude that if Joseph Smith did open communication between earth and the spirit world, then was his movement "inaugurated by the heavens for a great and Divine purpose." He would fully understand, and unreservedly endorse the passage in the Manifesto touching the mission of Mormonism: "Its main object being the gathering of an inspirational people, believing in continuous revelations, who, with such channels opened up, could at any period be moulded to any purpose the Heavens might desire; and out of whom, with these opportunities for divine communication, could be developed the grandest and the noblest civilization the world has ever seen." This is so religiously and socially sound, and so broad in its platform of anticipations, that a philosophic mind could not fail to appreciate the immensity of divine and human good which will yet spring out of the mission of Joseph Smith. If Jesus and his apostles have come down from the mansion of the Father to declare this grand intention, as set forth in the Manifesto, the angels in heaven rejoice over the great movement now renewed to that "inspirational people," gathered for that purpose to the Rocky Mountains for a world's good. For its consummation upon the earth has the God now raised up Elias and William to prepare for the greater day of the revelation of Jesus Christ.

Now the condition of many of the Mormon Elders has for years been approximating to that of our Owens, our Parkers and our Emersons. Compared with their numbers there are more among the English and Scotch Mormon elders inclining to a sceptical phase of mind and a universalian mode of thought than among any other body of Christians in the world. Perhaps this may be the result of a reaction from an extraordinary state of faith, and a life of aggressive missioning against the orthodox system and creeds of the age. Their state, at first, being that of a strange mixture of spiritual experience growing out of a new prophetic dispensation, and of free thought born of an innovative ministry, into the cold realities of a sunless religious life in the Rocky Mountains, they have naturally traveled towards the thoroughly materialistic spirit of the ruling Priesthood of Utah, on the one side, or towards the philosophic tone of mind of an Emerson, or the high social religion of the divine Robert Owen.

The next stage that the thoughtful investigator of the Mormon problem might have expected, is that thousands of the Mormon Elders would pass, at the close of the lives of Brigham Young and his veteran apostles, entirely out of religion; while the men of thought and a spiritual turn of mind, would console themselves over the miscarriage of the Mormon theocracy, by adopting a philosophic Christianity, in which neither Joseph Smith nor Brigham Young would stand as Prophets. This, indeed, is what the ten thousands of thinkers in the United States have actually laid down in their programme of anticipation concerning the Mormons and their future. They all expect, from the inevitable laws of social and religious organisms, that, on the death of Brigham and the first apostolic priesthood of the Mormon Church, a sudden revolution would break up absolutism and the policy of the ruling priesthood, and consequently bring about a reaction among the masses, which would consign Joseph Smith, Brigham Young, the Kimballs, the Pratts and the Woodruffs to an everlasting oblivion. This would certainly be the result but for Divine intervention; yet Brigham, the present apostles, and the rest of the conservative rulers of the Church, are almost the only men in America who do not appreciate their own situations and the inevitable tendency of their system and policy.

But just at this point of the history of the Mormons, and when least expected, even by the men most concerned, comes a strange resolution of the problem, and comes too, just in time to give the Mormons a future. It is this new spiritual dispensation to the "inspirational people" gathered in the Rocky Mountains, and this Manifesto that "Mormonism was inaugurated by the Heavens for a great and divine purpose."

This phase of the case will surprise most our friends abroad who have believed nothing in the Divinity of Mormonism, and somewhat disappoint those who have expected to see the Mormon Church and faith exploded by the combustive force of an absolute temporal theocracy, altogether repugnant to the genius of the age. Why, the thinking men everywhere are already struck with the fact that this new Movement will save Mormonism and its priesthood; they see that the elevation of the Movement upon a broad Christian platform will immortalize Joseph Smith, and perpetuate the Church which he founded. That Mormonism should find an issue in "the grandest and noblest civilization the world has ever seen," will be to them the circumstance of surprise; and yet thousands of those "outside" are to-day assured that the Manifesto and platform of the Utah Reformers, meet the case, and will perpetuate the Mormon dispensation upon its higher plane.

And to-day there are many, and to-morrow there shall be thousands more from within, rejoicing that Zion will be redeemed and its mission consummated. The Oracles speak again, and we are saved.

PUBLIC MEETINGS.

The first of a series of public meetings, for the fuller exposition of the principles advocated in this MAGAZINE, will be held on Sunday, December 19, in the Thirteenth Ward Assembly Rooms at half-past eleven in the morning, and in the Masonic and Odd Fellow's Hall, in the upper part of Commerce Building, owned by Kimball & Lawrence, situated on the east side of East Temple Street, at seven o'clock in the evening. All are invited to attend.

THE MEETINGS NEXT SUNDAY.

The hour of meeting in Masonic Hall, on Sunday evening, 19th inst., will be SEVEN, instead of half-past seven, as stated in last week's issue. Friends will please note the change.

TENDENCIES OF OUR SYSTEM TO DESPOTISM.

BY W. H. SHEARMAN.

It appears almost superfluous to undertake to prove the statement contained in the recent "Manifesto," that President Young has built "up a despotic priestly rule in the Church;" but, inasmuch as it has been publicly and repeatedly denied that the priesthood in our Church either did, attempted, or designed to exert any coercive or oppressive power in spiritual or temporal affairs, it may not be amiss to state a few facts, out of the thousands within reach, substantiating the position first referred to. In doing this, it is particularly desirable to avoid personalities. The results of principles, however, can only be manifested through the conduct of individuals believing in them; it is impossible, therefore, to call in question any men's acts or policy, without being liable to the charge of personal animus. There are minds, however, capable of distinguishing between principles and persons; and who know it to be quite possible to entertain kind feelings towards men whose policy they feel compelled, by a sense of duty, to condemn and oppose. It is in this spirit that the subsequent facts are referred to, as evidences of the despotic tendency of the present policy of the "Church."

The evils of this policy were not, until recently, so apparent or so oppressively felt in the city as in the country. The checks upon the exercise of this despotic power in the city are unknown there, and free scope is given to those who rule the people, in too many instances, as with a rod of iron. President Young would, undoubtedly, disavow many of the acts of some of his representatives, were he fully acquainted with them; they are, nevertheless, the legitimate results of his policy.

There are, of course, many excellent men, filling prominent positions in our midst, who endeavor to exercise the power entrusted to them in a spirit of moderation and kindness, and with a disinterested view to the benefit of the people over whom they preside. Blessed are such men, and happy are those people. But these are the exceptions; and, if they were not, it is the principle we war against, as subversive of human rights, and liable, at any time, to be abused. The danger of such irresponsible power must be evident to so sagacious a man as President Young, and it appears strangely wonderful that he should wish to bequeath such a system to his children.

It may be very pleasant and advantageous to them while he lives. But in after years, if this dogma were to prevail, men would arise who knew not Brigham Young nor his family, and who would oppress the latter as others are now being oppressed.

The following facts will show whether we really enjoy that degree of civil and religious liberty so much boasted of lately in the pulpit and through the press. We will first refer to instances where the privilege of civil voting has been interfered with or set aside.

Some time ago at a "City" election in Cache County, during the absence of the Bishop, an opposition ticket was nominated and elected by a large majority. On the return of the Bishop he condemned the movement in the strongest terms, denounced those engaged in it as having the "spirit of apostacy," and had the officers changed to suit himself.

On one occasion in Logan, before any other nomination had been made, some private members of the Church arranged a "People's ticket" for city officers, and posted it in several conspicuous places. The presiding Bishop wrote over it "Devil's Ticket;" sought to ferret out the perpetrators of so dreadful a crime, and by public and private anathemas quashed the movement. This, it must be remembered, was not an opposition ticket, for no other had been put forth. This circumstance is referred to because it proves that it is contrary to the policy of the Priesthood to permit any nominations, except such as they make themselves, or any free expression of individual or public sentiment. If the avowed policy of the Church be correct, the actions of these bishops was justifiable. Besides, the precedent had already been established in Salt Lake City. It is well known that all who were, some time since, concerned in the election of Bishop Woolley, as Alderman, in opposition to Mr. Le Grand Young, were strongly denounced by President Young. The Bishop felt compelled to resign an office to which his fellow citizens had elected him and which they were anxious he should fill.

These were exercises of despotic power the crowned heads of Europe would not venture upon to day. It is very seldom, however, that such instances as the foregoing arise; for the exercise of the franchise in Utah has been generally so controlled by the Priesthood as to make it a positive farce. The people have, in reality, nothing to say in the choice of their public men. In effect, the President of the Church appoints them all, for no subordinate presiding officer would presume to take so important step without first "counseling" with the President. Then a chosen and entirely subservient few are called together, to whom certain nominations are made which they, of course, unhesitatingly sanction. These in turn, are submitted to the people. But such precautions are taken that it is known how every man votes; and if any should be bold enough to vote for any other candidates than the regular nominees, they are, thereafter, spotted as opponents of the Priesthood and on the road to apostacy. Such individuals must change their course, or a series of petty persecutions ensue which ultimately drive them out of the Church. In this way opposition has been kept down and "unity" obtained. What inconsistency, to say that a people enjoy civil freedom, when they have no voice in the nomination of their officers and law-makers, and are required, in all cases, to confirm by their votes the persons selected to fill certain positions, whether the appointees meet their approval or not. Thus all Legislative and, so far as the Territorial Courts are concerned, judicial positions are under the control of one man, who might as well appoint all public officers and announce all laws by his own imperial edict, as to put the people to the trouble and expense of the forms of electing the one and enacting the other. The consequence of this state of things is, as the people very well know, that laws are made to please our leaders, whether the people are suited or not. Through the tremendous power of the Priesthood, the polls have been as effectually controlled in this Territory as they could have been under the censorship of a military tribunal. Not that personal or physical violence has been exercised by the Priesthood; but a coercion of a far stronger kind—one that affects men's hopes of eternal life—has been brought to bear on such questions. Is all this an evidence of despotism or not? It is assumed, of course, that the most suitable men are selected for all public positions, and that, consequently, it makes no difference by what means they are appointed. But it can be shown that the people, at least, do not always agree with this view of the case.

Again, we have always claimed ours to be the most democratic Church on the earth—all its officers, from the President down, being elected semi-annually at public meetings in which all members of the Church, male and female, are free to vote. So far as the letter is concerned, this is true; but in spirit it is untrue. Persons can vote for or against any individual or measure proposed by the presiding authorities; but if they do vote in the negative, they are almost invariably held up to ridicule and contempt and unless they acknowledge themselves to have been wrong, are liable to be deprived of their fellowship. Some time since in a public meeting in Logan, a prominent traveling elder gave, unintentionally, a practical illustration of this fact. He referred, in very disparaging and contemptuous terms, to some individual, supposed to be a prominent member of the Priesthood, who had refused to vote in accordance with the wish of President Young, in relation to severing a certain person from the Church. Said he: "All could see he was in the dark; and, when he did finally consent to vote with the majority, he looked like a great, awkward whipped, school-boy, and nobody cared a 'continental' whether he voted or not." Few men have the moral courage to endure being thus held up before their brethren as objects of ridicule and aversion. Again, several persons have lately been severed from the Church for no other reason than voting according to the dictates of their conscience in opposition to the views of President Young and some of his brethren; among these are Elders Eli B. Kelsey, John Tullidge, Joseph Silver, and others, against whom not a single crime has been proved or even charged. They have violated no principle of morality or requirement of the Gospel.

The right of voting, as universally understood, means the right to vote contrary to any measure proposed, and without any loss being thereby incurred. If a man cannot have the right on these terms, he has no vote at all, for the right to vote includes the right to differ. It therefore follows that when a man cannot vote, as in the case of the gentlemen referred to, without being excommunicated for so doing, and consequently deprived of the right to vote for ever afterward; no right to vote can be said to exist in such a system.

There is another point to which reference should be made, although not specially bearing on this question of voting, namely: that the moment a man is excluded from the Church, however unjustly, every effort is made to ruin him. How often have we denounced similar conduct on the part of other religious and political parties as in the highest degree tyrannical and reprehensible. Is it any better when practiced by ourselves?

Another evidence of the tendency of our system to despotic rule, is the denial of the right of petition,—a privilege regarded as sacred throughout the civilized world. The majority of the citizens of Logan had become very much dissatisfied with a certain city officer. Whether their dissatisfaction was well grounded, or not, is nothing to the point. A very respectful petition was drawn up, addressed to the City Council, praying for his removal, and was signed by a large number of the inhabitants. No one who signed this petition had the least idea they were doing wrong or that any exceptions would be taken to their action; but it was publicly denounced by most of the presiding authorities, "as an insult to the Priesthood," meriting the severest censure. Men must be blind, indeed, who do not see the dangerous tendency of this assumption, on the part of the Priesthood, of the right to thus resent the petitions of the people. It would reduce any people to a condition similar to that of the Israelites in Egypt, whose remonstrances, or petitions, were answered with increased tasks and more oppressive edicts.

Another phase of despotic power has lately been developed, as will be seen in the minutes of a Conference held in St. George during the early part of November last, and published in the Deseret News, wherein persons are prohibited, under pain of disfellowship, from "changing their location without the approval of their leaders." If this policy is right in St. George, it is right in any other portion of the Territory. Where do we find any precedent in the past, which will justify the exercise of such control by the Priesthood in any Gospel Dispensation?

Another important instance, in which liberty of thought is denied the people, is illustrated in the case of this very MAGAZINE. Notwithstanding the assertions of the Priesthood concerning the freedom of the press, it is well known that teachers are now being sent to almost every house in the Territory, expressly forbidding the people to read what we publish. Mark you, not merely counseling or advising them not to do so, but expressly forbidding them, under pain of being considered apostate in spirit. Scores are continually coming to our office, informing us that they only drop the MAGAZINE on compulsion. And hundreds do not hesitate to tell us they would take it if they dared. As a further evidence of the coercion exercised, we can prove that in some instances as many as a score of persons borrow our MAGAZINE from a single subscriber and read it, being afraid to take it in themselves. Can this be called freedom of speech and of the press? We suppose the ridiculous argument will be brought forward here, that all are at liberty to read it if they choose to take the consequences; but who does not know that those consequences,—the presumed loss of Heaven, the loss of association with the Church here and hereafter, are "consequences" which none but the most daring will meet; and that to bring such "consequences" to bear on the press is the strongest muzzling that it can experience. Roman Catholicism has been universally branded as opposed to the freedom of the press, and yet the principal means she used to suppress it were threats of excommunication and loss of eternal life. How, then, can our Church assert that she does not suppress freedom of the press, while she does precisely the same thing?

Let us review our position. We have shown that we are, virtually, deprived of the privilege of voting freely on civil or ecclesiastical questions. The right of petition has been denied. The liberty of the press has been abridged; and, according to the avowed policy of our Priesthood, they have the right to "dictate" and "control" us in everything. They are to say where we shall live, and when we may change our locality; what our occupation shall be, and what disposition we shall make of the proceeds of our labor; what we shall speak, what we may write, and, so far as they can control the mind, what we shall think. The sum of the present policy is—as a high Church Authority has often publicly said—we must place ourselves, our wives, children, houses, lands and powers and property of every description in the hands of the President of this Church, and hold all entirely subservient to the dictation of his will. This, we are taught by the highest Church Authority, is what this whole people must come to sooner or later; and that this state of things is not to be confined to this life, but is to be our eternal condition! If this be not despotism, we do not understand the meaning of the word.

The foregoing are a few instances, from among many that could be given, of the injurious results of the present policy of the leaders of our Church. They are not referred to from any personal dislike to the actors themselves, for some of them we very highly esteem. These instances would not have been cited had they not been necessary to show the injurious consequences of a false policy, and to disprove the recently reiterated statements that the people of this Territory enjoy ample civil and religious liberty. We war with PRINCIPLES, not with men. So far as the latter are concerned we do not think them so much to blame. Their conduct is the legitimate result of the present state of things. They cannot well pursue any other course and retain their positions. Nevertheless, the evil effects are the same; and they would continue to increase but for the change which is about to be inaugurated by the Heavens.

Correspondence.

The subjoined extract is from a letter written to a gentleman in this city by a brother in San Pete.

Dec. 5, 1869.

"The times here are very hard for some, and worse for others. Priestly authority rules supreme. We have the one store; the rest having been compelled to close, under penalty of disfellowship from the Church. Now; as everybody is not able to go into Co-operation, and some can't see the point, the Bishop announced, to-day, in public, that henceforward they will sell no goods to those not having capital stock in the Co-operative store! The question arises—what are we going to do for our goods? As I have said before, many are not able to take shares if they had the will. They can't run to Salt Lake City for their goods, so that there is from one third to one half of the people here without a store to go to. If a man's family is sick, or what not, he must comply with the wishes of the Priestly Authority, no difference what it is, or go 120 miles for the article or else go without it. I don't know what this people are coming to. I think if no change comes soon, we are candidates for the lower regions.

I was well pleased with the principles set forth in the MAGAZINE, and find many more who feel the same. My prayer is that it may be a success. I wish you would send it to me, for I believe I can find more truth in it than in any other paper in the Territory.

PROVO CITY, Dec. 5 1869.

EDITORS UTAH MAGAZINE,

Dear Brethren:—Please accept a few lines from a brother and sister to dispose of as you see fit.

We read in your MAGAZINE the account of your trial; it was the second time we had seen any of the MAGAZINES, but we had the testimony before we saw them, that there was a great advent at hand that would test the intelligence and light of truth in every soul. And now we cannot express the joy we felt when we read your MAGAZINE and found that our views agreed with yours. We feel to thank God for His kind mercies to us, for we know that there is a glorious day at hand—that we feel assured of. Our prayer is that God and His angels will always stand by Zion and all who love the truth. We rejoice to know that the day is near for the Zion of the Lord to be established on the earth in its true order.

SONG OF REJOICING.

Tune—John Brown.

Come, all ye sons and daughters of the Zion of our Lord,
And raise your grateful voices in a theme of sweet accord,
To tell in strains of music of the light now shed abroad,
For Zion is marching on.

We'll bless and praise the goodness of our Father, God and King,
For the peace, the joy and freedom which the Gospel tidings bring,
And gladly shall our voices with our hearts unite and sing,
For Zion is marching on.

Our souls were held in bondage by the slavish power of fear,
We saw no gleam of brightness in the night-watch, dark and drear,
But the love of God has saved us, to His Temple brought us near,
For Zion is marching on.

Our mind's illuminated and from error's thrall set free,
Our vision cleared by Charity, in Truth's fair light we see,
And firm, in love united, shall a happy people be,
For Zion is marching on.

A VERY SINGULAR STORY.

When I was safe in my own room, I sat down and drew a long breath.

"So it is true," I said to myself, "and what then? I cannot tell her that I know about her." One thing, however, was not now necessary: there was no speaking to my mother concerning Mr. Sartoris needful. I had often thought that, though always gracious, she received their attentions with a wonderful indifference. What would the end of it be?

I sat and speculated before my fire until I had scarcely time to dress for dinner. That evening, for the first time, she was not composed, very brilliant, but excitable and nervous, and I fancied she avoided me. They were very busy arranging some tableaux vivants for the evening but one after this, and it appeared to me that Mr. Sartoris had contrived that Valerie should have all the principal parts assigned to her. There was little doubt as to her fitness; as I watched her face to-night, it looked more lovely than ever before, though there was in it an unrest hitherto unknown. As we were going up stairs she managed to get by me, and said in a low voice, —

"I have something to say to you to-night: come into my room when you have had your hair brushed."

I nodded consent, and we separated. As soon as I thought she could be ready, I went to her. She was sitting before the table, wrapped in a white dressing-gown. Thérèse, her maid, was brushing her hair, which fell about her like a golden veil. "Make haste, Thérèse," she said, impatiently, as she caught sight of me in the glass, and her maid turned it all back and braided it into one great braid at the back.

She waited till the woman had left the room before she spoke. As the door closed, she stood up and drew me gently towards a sofa by the fire. We both sat down. Then, without a word of preparation, taking both my hands in hers, she looked into my face, and said,—

"So, Rachel, you have found out my secret."

It was not the way I had expected her to speak, and there was no answer ready on my lips.

"You mustn't mind," she said, gently, seeing, I suppose, my troubled look; "I think I am glad. There will be no more reserve between us now, and we can be true friends."

Of course I kissed her, and told her I would be her friend through all.

"And now," she said, "I am going to tell you how I come to be here."

She then got up and walked once or twice up and down the room, after which she reseated herself in a low chair by the fire.

"But first," she said, "may I see that letter from Vienna?" I grew crimson: she looked surprised, then bent her head. "Yes, yes, I see: perhaps I had better not; it was not fair to ask it."

Her tone cut me to the heart.

"Valerie! dear Valerie!" I cried, kneeling beside her, "forgive me! It is not that; I have deceived you; it is written in English, and I copied that bit into French for you to read." Then, miserable and ashamed, I hid my face in her lap.

"Don't, Rachel, don't!" she implored; "it is no harm; it is far better you should know all the truth since you have guessed so much."

"But can you ever love me again?"

"Love you!" she answered, with a smile; "nay, as you ask me that, dearest, you can hardly know how desolate I am! I have no one else to love."

But I could not be at rest until I had read her the letter. When it was done, she said, simply, "Thank you."

Her story, as she told it me that night, was too long to write here. I believed her then, as I know her now, to have been free from the faintest suspicion of guile, though from her own account she must have been imprudent. It was with a sort of horror I learnt that she actually had not been able to ascertain whether her husband were alive or dead. The night of the ball she had packed up all her clothes and jewels, which had come to her from her mother, and had set off for England. Herr Blume had been her music-master in happier days, and to him she applied.

During the whole recital she maintained a pitiful complacency, which had in it however, for me a pathos beyond all description. It was not like a person relating a story in which they feel any interest,—more like a dead man recalling the life to which he can never more return. She described her husband, declaring him to have been noble, generous, brave, but fiery and passionate. Then, speaking of Monsieur de St. Juste, with whom I had seen her, she said, "I think he was a very bad man, as bad almost as a man can be, without committing murder and that sort of thing."

I could not suppress an ejaculation of astonishment.

She looked at me with a sort of smiling despair in her sweet shining eyes.

"Ah! you wonder at me," she said, "but you can never wonder at me as I wonder at myself."

Then she ceased staring into the fire and laid her head back upon the chair in a weary way, like a tired child. I almost thought she had gone to sleep, she was so quiet, though when I watched her attentively I could see that her face had grown paler, and every now and then the lips, which were pressed firmly together, were convulsed by a sharp twitching. I had turned away, and was looking absently into the fire, thinking over all I heard, when, with a sort of low wail, she sprang up from her chair and began pacing the room.

"O God!" she moaned, "why have I done this? why have I told you about it? I who have so tried to forget! It is waking up," she cried, pressing her hands upon her bosom, "and I thought it was dead! But it will never die!" she added, wildly throwing up her arms.

I knew not what to do, and sat helplessly watching her walking to and fro: her eyes were wild, but still shining and tearless. This paroxysm, though dreadful, seemed to me, however, more natural than the calmness with which she had told me her history. Suddenly she stopped and turned upon me.

"You give me no comfort!" she cried, half fiercely, half imploring; but without giving me time to answer she turned again and continued, saying in a voice of anguish, "Comfort! comfort! there is none, why do I ask for it? O God! grant me forgetfulness; it is all I ask."

Ah, me! comfort indeed there was none to give, but my tears I did give her freely, weeping for this woman who could not weep for herself.

I thought at one time that she was becoming delirious in her grief, for as she paced swiftly through the room she muttered sometimes Italian, sometimes French.

At last she threw herself down upon a sofa and seemed to fall into a sort of stupor, she must have been thoroughly exhausted. For some time I remained sitting quietly by the fire, almost afraid to breathe, for fear of rousing her again. The silence was only broken at intervals by a coal falling out of the fire, or the clock at the stables striking the quarters. Half-past two, a quarter to three, and still she never moved: at last three struck. It was impossible for me to remain there any longer. We had all agreed to breakfast earlier than usual for the skating; and I knew that she, for one, had promised to skate, though I hardly believed it possible that she could be up after this, much less equal to any exertion. However, I should have no excuse to offer for non-appearance, so I determined to go to bed at once. At first I thought of stealing quietly out of the room; then the thought of her lying there until the morning, perhaps, in the bitter cold, for the fire would soon be out, stopped me, and I resolved to rouse her and try and persuade her to go to bed. As I moved across the room, she started up.

I said as gently as possible, "You have been asleep, Valerie, I think."

She pushed back her hair and stared at me for an instant.

"Ah! Rachel," she said, then, in a confused sort of way, "I had forgotten you; it must be late; you are going to bed, mein Herzchen?"

"Yes," I answered, "and you, you will go too?"

"Yes, O yes," she said; but from her manner I doubted her doing it.

"You promise to go now, immediately?" I urged.

She looked at me inquiringly; and I think the remembrance of what had passed only then fully flashed upon her.

"Rachel!" she said, eagerly, seizing my hands and bending towards me, "I have told you a great deal to-night, more than to any other person living; I trust you, you will never betray me?"

"Never," I answered, solemnly.

"There, there, I know you will not," she said, her eager manner suddenly vanishing. "Good night, dearest, good night;" and she kissed me on both cheeks, and then almost pushed me from her.

In spite of our promises the night before, it was half-past ten before I got down. Lord Cosmo, Mr. Sartoris, and another man were eating their breakfast in moody silence. It was my private opinion that the two former were waiting for Valerie. Aunt Honora was not down, and the others had already gone to the ponds.

"Good mornin', Miss Travers," said Lord Cosmo, with a charming indistinctness, owing probably to his mouth being quite full of cold pie, which he continued munching, while he made his inquires after my health and out-going intentions: he then kindly employed himself in lurching about the table collecting before me everything within reach.

"They've all been taking your name in vain, Miss Travers," said Mr. Sartoris; who was opposite me; "Fox and I only just came down in time to stop them. They've been abusing you and Fräulein Dorn frightfully, for being the only ones who had broken their getting-up vows. There were some very hard words I can assure you; were n't there, Fox?"

"'Pon honor," said Fox, "I think it was you bein' hauled over the coals when I came in; and after that they were chaffin' at me; Miss Travers and her friend they were discussin' afterwards."

He always called her my "friend." I think he had some vague, uncomfortable misgivings (if he ever had a misgiving) that "Frowlin', was not precisely the proper way of pronouncing that word.

"It don't sound quite right; but I'll be shot if I do know how to pronounce it now, Miss Travers," he said to me later in the day, with an I-know-you-won't-believe-it sort of air that was truly edifying.

I didn't express myself as sceptical on that point, as he seemed to expect; and directly afterwards he relieved me of his society, careening away to another part of the ponds like a Dutch fishing-boat in a heavy sea. How I detested the man! He was a born snob,—I think his grand name only made it worse.

All that morning we were on the ice. Valerie was, as usual, the center of attraction; her skating was certainly the perfection of grace. To me there was a change in her from that night. It seemed that in telling me her true name, she felt it no longer incumbent on her to feign any simplicity that was not natural to her. One, at least, in the room would recognize her right to wear the diamond rings that made her pretty hands look whiter that morning. There was certainly a change in her dress, which to this time had been extremely simple. That day she wore a tight-fitting velvet dress and petticoat, looped up for skating, and trimmed with narrow but beautiful sable round the throat and sleeves. It suited her admirably; and it was impossible to mistake the undisguised looks of admiration of my companions as she entered the breakfast-room, laughing and talking with Bertie, who had come up from the ponds to look after her. I was amazed at her fresh looks, and, had it not been for my own weariness, should have been inclined to think I had been laboring under some delusion.

Altogether, that was not a pleasant day; the afternoon was spent in arranging the tableaux for the next evening

When I went up to Aunt Honora, she attacked me on the subject of Valerie's dress.

"My dear, how very much your friend is dressed!" she said. "Don't you think it's rather odd for a person who professes to give lessons? Why, my dear," continued my aunt, seeing I made no answer, "that lace on her gown is magnificent!—quite magnificent!" she reiterated, waxing plaintively eloquent; "it must have cost I don't know how much."

Old lace was rather a failing of the poor thing's; and I don't think she would have objected to seeing that in question transferred to her own wardrobe.

"Is it such good lace, aunt?" I said, for want of anything better.

"My dear Rachel!"—this was with a spark of feeble indignation—"you don't mean to say you are so ignorant as not to know lace like that when you see it?"

She then closed her eyes, laid her head back, as if the exertion had been too much for her, and relapsed again into the plaintive.

"She's your friend, Rachel: I only hope it's all right. Margaret says you know very little of her. With men of such a high position here as Lord Cosmo, one must be careful, you know."

"Good heavens!" I ejaculated to myself.

"O aunt! don't be afraid, it's all right," I answered, though I could scarcely restrain my bitter laughter. Good heavens! Lord Cosmo! the idea of Valerie corrupting Lord Cosmo! It was really too good. The petted, high-born Austrian beauty not considered fit society for the muddle-headed, boorish Englishman! I felt very wrathful at first, but calmed down soon. After all, my poor aunt, with her narrow notions, knew nothing about Valerie, and I knew all.

The next day all was bustle. Part of the afternoon I helped in the dining-room, where all was confusion, the curtains being put up, while some of the party were altering and arranging dresses and rehearsing scenes for the tableaux. At last I grew quite tired and went away to my own room and sat at my window looking out over the park. It was almost dark when, to my surprise, I heard the crunch of wheels, and the next minute saw the Cheddington carriage going towards the stables. No one had been out that afternoon, of that I was certain. Some one must have come from the station, but I knew of no one coming.

I went down to the dining-room, hoping to see the new arrival on my way, but met no one, only as I entered the room I heard a servant inquiring for Sir Francis. As I had expected, there was still much to be done when the dressing-bell rang. Fortunately it was an irregular sort of dinner in the hall, and no one seemed expected to appear at the proper time. The tables were so placed that the occupants sat back to back; and it so happened that Valerie and Mr. Sartoris were not my vis-a-vis but my dos-a-dos. At the other end of our table there had been two places kept, one for Sir Francis, and the other, I supposed, for the newly arrived guest. The soup had gone when Sir Francis entered the hall by a door near his seat, accompanied by a tall dark man with his arm in a sling. There was a great deal of talking and laughing going on at the other table, and no one there seemed to observe their entrance.

"Do you see that dark man sitting by Sir Francis Herries?" asked my neighbor. "Can you tell me who he is?"

I could only answer "No;" then, to see if my own impressions were correct, I asked, "What country do you think he belongs to?"

"I don't know," he answered, slowly, looking at the subject of our conversation; "French, perhaps, perhaps Italian or Austrian; at any rate, not English," he said, as he turned away.

Not English, indeed! How the Vienna days returned as I watched him, so utterly unlike the Englishmen among whom he sat. A dark, handsome face, though worn through recent suffering, with eyes of southern splendor. It was evident that he couldn't speak English, for he talked to no one but his host, and once I distinctly saw Sir Francis directing him to the place where Valerie sat. It was not hard to guess who he was; the only thing I longed for was to warn her in some way of his presence, but it was impossible. She was not near enough to speak to without causing, perhaps, a scene, and, if possible, that was to be avoided. If I could only have stopped her talking to that man!

Many times during that interminable dinner I saw the deep-set, glittering eyes flare up with a sudden blaze as her silvery laugh or the deep tones of her companion reached his ear, and the dark blood came and went in his face, pale through long illness. Though his arm was in a sling, I noticed that it was not altogether helpless, for he sometimes used it.

O that dinner! and how I disgraced myself! Before it was over I was worked up to such a pitch of excitement that I precipitated a quantity of sticky pudding over old Mr. Palgrave's knees, and then burst into a fit of hysterical laughter in the poor old gentleman's face. At last it was time for us to go, and the other table moved at the same instant. I had not a moment to warn her: she turned towards me, and her eyes instantly fixed themselves upon the lower end of our table. He was standing up, looking full at her. For one second she remained motionless, then, without a word, fell forward upon the floor. Whether the man jumped over the table or went round I never discovered, but before either Mr. Sartoris or Lord Cosmo could get to her, he was at her side.

"I will carry this lady, sir," said Lord Cosmo, thickly, attempting to interpose his great hulking form between Valerie and the Austrian: but the other put him aside with a quiet, courteous determination.

"Pardon, monsieur, it is my right; I am her husband!" he said rapidly in French, a little speech the point of which was entirely lost on the thick-headed Englishman, who looked inclined to resist and follow this black-headed devil of a mossoo, as he no doubt called him in his own mind, when Mr. Sartoris laid his hand upon his arm.

"Don't be a fool, Fox, the man's her husband."

The whole scene had taken place in less than a minute, and the ladies had not yet got out of the room. I turned to look at the speaker; something in the tone of his low, clear voice struck me. He was leaning on the back of his chair, his eyebrows contracted, and looking whitish about the mouth. As our eyes met he moved away and left the hall by another door. He must have been badly hurt. It was the only time I ever saw the slightest change in the cool, cruel, aristocratic face. As for Lord Cosmo, he had sunk back in his chair, his mouth half open, his eyes staring vacantly at the wall. Such an event as this was beyond the wildest flights of his imagination.

"I don't believe it, I'll be —— if I do," he muttered: "I didn't want to carry her up, I'll be —— if I did."

It was no use going to Valerie's room, there were too many people there already, and I knew that Mrs. Cherry, the old housekeeper, would do exactly what was right. After two hours' struggling to entertain the people, who were in that state of suppressed whispering excitement in which people will be when there is anything going on which they are not desired to know, I managed to get up stairs. On the landing I met Mrs. Cherry, and asked how she was.

"Pore young lady; reelly I don't know whathever is the matter with her," she said, folding her hands across the front of her portly person. "She's no sooner come to than she's hoff again, and even when she is awake she don't seem to me in complete possession of her facilities."

So I went down again to the weary work of entertaining, but found, to my joy, that the people were going fast. Soon after I got away and went to Valerie's door, but all was so quiet that I was afraid to go in, so went on to my own room, took off my dress, and putting on a morning-gown, sat down to watch. About half an hour passed, and then a gentleman passed my door He stopped two doors off and went into a room; then I heard voices for a few minutes, and then two people came out. I went to the door with a feeling that I was wanted. It was Sir Francis and the Austrian.

"Ah! that is all right," said Sir Francis; "allow me to introduce Count Arnheim to you, Rachel; Miss Travers, the friend of Madame la Comtesse," he said to the count. "Rachel, the count would like very much to speak to you." I bowed. It was an odd introduction, at the door of my room, by the light of bedroom candles.

"You had better go to your aunt's morning room," Sir Francis said, and I led the way, followed by the tall dark figure. I had only that moment to consider what to do; I had indeed promised not to betray her, but it were surely best to tell him all. It was very dreadful to him, the first speaking, I could see, but as far as I could judge he was a man who would have walked through a wall of fire if he had once made up his mind to do it. In sharp, short, concise words, wrung from him as it were, he told me that his presence was so hateful to Valerie that, so long as he stood by her, she went from faint to faint. At last he had left her, and now he held in his hand a letter which he had written, and which he would leave in my charge, he said, to be given at such time as she should be able to read it. I hardly dared ask him if he were going, it seemed as though it would be stepping on a volcano of pride, and shame, and love, that might burst beneath my feet. If I could but find words to tell him all I knew! But his manner was so desperately stern and cold and unviting that my thoughts seemed frozen within me. At last I ventured to stammer,—

"I think you are mistaken, Herr Graf; it was the sudden shock which has been too much for her."

There was a dangerous glitter in his eyes even at that slight contradiction, and his manner was colder and stiffer than before, as he answered—

"Pardon, gracious Fraulein, much has passed of which you are no doubt ignorant, therefore permit me to say you can hardly be a judge. I have done and said that which it was folly to suppose she could either forget or forgive."

He spoke with the air of a man to whom confession was a new and bitter experience.

Then, however, my tongue was unloosed, and I told him, if not quite all, yet enough.

During the whole interview he had declined to sit down, but stood by the mantelpiece, his head resting on his hand, whilst I talked.

When I had finished, he came towards me, and holding out his hand, said in a husky voice,—

"God reward you; you have been a true friend to her."

And yet, strange to say, for all that, I think he was disappointed. I think the man, though he hardly knew it himself, would have been happier if there had been more to forgive, if he had not been so entirely in the wrong. He felt the truth of those holy words, "To whom little is forgiven, the same loveth little," and he trembled lest her love for him should be dead.

I left him there and went to Valerie's room; it was necessary to finish now the work I had begun. At the door I met my mother.

"She has been asking for you, Rachel; go in to her, but try and keep her quiet; she is delirious, I think; they have sent to Little Stratford for a doctor."

As soon as she saw me she stretched out her arms. I took her cold, trembling hands in mine, and she drew me towards her, whispering, fearfully,—

"Rachel, I have seen him; he must be dead, he looked so awful! O, it has been dreadful!" she gasped. "Why does he come to haunt me like this at last? he must know that it was false; surely, now he must know!" she moaned.

I held her hands firmly and looked into her face: then I steadied my voice and chose the shortest, clearest words I could think of.

"Valerie, it is no spirit," I said; "it is your husband himself, who is here to ask your forgiveness."

She looked wild and incredulous, then tried to get up; but she was too weak, and falling back burst into a passion of tears.

I slipped away and sent him to her; then, worn out myself with excitement and fatigue, sat down and cried like an idiot. The doctor came soon after, and I was obliged to go to her room. Her husband was sitting by her holding her hand in his. What between her smiles and tears, it hardly seemed the Valerie I had known.

"Rachel, come in," she said; "you know him, I needn't introduce you. O you wicked man!" she laughed, "you have frightened her, I know you have, Leopold," she said, with her old, quick perception. "I know exactly, he put on the iron mask. You, poor dear Rachel! and you know you must be friends." She was in a true Bavarian mood, in spite of her exhaustion. "Now you must go," she said, in a minute, "if I am to go to London tomorrow," and drove him away. When he was gone, she threw herself upon my neck. "Rachel, he is dead!" she whispered, hiding her face; "he died in the same hospital where Leopold was sent with his wound, and Leopold nursed him, and when he was dying he confessed that it was all a dreadful lie that he had invented to make him cast me off, knowing that he was helpless and couldn't fight: for once he fought a dreadful duel, and after that he took a vow and made a solemn promise to the Emperor never to fight another. It seems so dreadful, but I can't help being happy," she sobbed.

The next morning she got away without seeing any of the guests except one. I went with them to the station: as we turned out of the lodge gates the carriage stopped, and Mr. Sartoris appeared at the window.

"I could not let you go without saying good by," he said, "and wishing you a pleasant voyage, and may I come and see you next time I am in Vienna?"

Valerie looked troubled and glanced at her husband, leaving it to him to answer. He took her hand in his, and bowing with cold, grave courtesy, said,—

"Any of my wife's friends will be welcome to me in Vienna."

There was no time for more; the count's servant jumped off the box to tell his master that the coachman said we were already late. Valerie shook hands and we drove on.

"You will come to us in the summer, Rachel?" she said, as the train was moving off; "you have promised."

I often hear from her. They are living on an estate which the count owns in Bohemia. There is never a shadow of unhappiness in her letters. I am going to them in the end of August for the autumn, according to my promise, which I fulfil the more eagerly since she has made friends with Stephanie, and has asked her to come for part of my visit. Pray Heaven, Mr. Sartoris mayn't turn up; but I think that emphasis on the word "any" must have settled him.

THE END.

THE GRÆFENBERG MEDICINES ARE INVALUABLE. GODBE & CO. HAVE THEM

PATENT
ARION PIANOFORTE

GRANDS AND GRAND SQUARES.

7⅓ OCTAVES.

The "ARION" is the very best Piano for the Great West because it stands in tune longer than any other Piano. It requires no repairing or regulating; shipping any distance, or dampness does not affect them.

WHY?

It commences where the "First Premium" Makers stop, and upon the most improved Modern scale makes four patented improvements; which make the Arion more simple, yet stronger; increasing its volume and beauty of tone, while rendering the instrument more enduring.

WHAT THEY ARE.

First. The patent Arion Reversed Wooden Agraffe Bridge, which retains all the purity of tone only found in a wooden bridge (the rest whereon the strings lays, and obtains all the solid prolonged strength of tone of the metal Agraffe, without that acute metalic noise which Pressed Metal Agraffe develops by use.

Secondly. The Patent Arion Compound Wrest-Plank, which holds the tuning pins, is six thicknesses of hard maple, the grain of each layer runs in a different direction. The advantages are, the 20 tons strain of the strings cannot split our Arion wrest-plank, as frequently happens in other Pianos, and when people say "My Piano won't stand in tune," all other makers must use the single wrest plank with the grain running only one way.

The Arion Tuning-Pins have end wood to hold them in every side, while all other makers can have it only upon two sides of their pins.

Thirdly. The Patent Arion Diagonal Sustaining Bar, extending parellel with the steel strings under the over strung Bass strings. The Arion is the only Piano wherein the enormous strain of the large steel strings is resisted in the natural place and direction. Using this bar renders the weakest part in all other over strung Pianos the

STRONGEST IN THE ARION.

Fourthly. The Patent Arion Iron Frame concentrates all the metal in front of the tuning pin line, and its frame is let into (notched) the front edge of the wooden wrest plank, thereby preventing the great strain of the strings upon it from splitting or moving it one particle. All other "Full Iron Frames" cover the entire wrest plank, and when it is split it cannot be seen, the wood of the Arion wrest plank is seen.

THE ARION STANDS UPON ITS OWN MERITS.

unsupported by either buncome, weak facts, or useless or complicated Patents. We append a few unbought opinions of those who

KNOW THE ARION.

The Musical Director of the New York Conservatory of Music, Edward Mollenhauer, says: "The Arion I bought of you is the best Piano I ever played on; that rolling bass and silvery treble, etc."

John H. Woods, Piano Dealer, Oswego, N. Y., says: "The tone is truly immense, and surpasses anything in the shape of a Piano we ever saw or heard of, etc."

Horace Greely said: "The Arion is the best square Piano, superior for its evenness and brilliancy of tone," &c.

Louis Wagner, Fort Leavenworth, says: "My Piano arrived here in splendid order. Its tone fills my parlor with melody—it is the wonder and admiration of all who hear it. Miss ——, who is teaching the Piano desires me to order one for her," &c.

Hair Vigor,

For restoring Grey Hair to its natural Vitality and Color.

A dressing which is at once agreeable, healthy, and effectual for preserving the hair. Faded or gray hair is soon restored to its original color with the gloss and freshness of youth. Thin hair is thickened, falling hair is checked, and baldness often, though not always, cured by its use. Nothing can restore the hair where the follicles are destroyed, or the glands atrophied and decayed. But such as remain can be saved for usefulness by this application. Instead of fouling the hair with a pasty sediment it will keep it clean and vigorous. Its occasional use will prevent the hair from turning gray or falling off, and consequently prevent baldness. Free from those deleterious substances which make some preparations dangerous and injurious to the hair, the Vigor can only benefit but not harm it. If wanted merely for a

MUSICAL DOINGS.—Since Mr. Waters gave up publishing sheet music, he has devoted his whole capital and attention to the manufacture and sale of Pianos and Melodeons. He has just issued a catalogue of his new instruments, giving a new scale of prices, which shows a marked reduction from former rates, and his Pianos have recently been awarded the First Premium at several Fairs. Many people of the present day, who are attracted, if not convinced, with the flaming advertisements of rival piano houses, probably overlook the finest manufacturer like Mr. Waters; but we happen to know that his instruments earned him a good reputation long before positions and "honors" connected therewith were ever thought of; indeed, we have one of Mr. Waters' Pianofortes now in our residence, where it has stood for years, of which any manufacturer in the world might be proud. We have always been delighted with it as a sweet-toned and powerful instrument, and there is no doubt of its durability; more than this, some of the best amateur players in the city, and several celebrated pianists, have performed on the said piano, and all pronounce it a superior and first-class instrument. Stronger Indorsement we could not give.—Home Journal.

PREFACE.

The present Volume of this Magazine was commenced by the Publishers with the express purpose of presenting before the people of Utah some of those broad and grand conceptions of God and humanity which they felt themselves called upon to present to the world at large, and of which, they were assured, that that people were destined to become the special representatives.

In the face of special prohibition, by the absolute ecclesiastical authority which has prevailed in this Territory, it has run its course, a silent preacher of advanced thoughts, generous conceptions of the world at large, and a steady opponent of absolutism, in Church or State. Having thus far battled alone, and fulfilled its mission of opening up a New Dispensation of religious light and mental liberty, it is now withdrawn to make way for a more prominent advocate of the same great principles.

As the pioneer of untrammelled thought, and the first independent journal published from the heart of the "Mormon" people, it is now presented to the public

TRUTH.

Theories, which thousands cherish,
Pass like clouds that sweep the sky;
Creeds and dogmas all may perish—
Truth, herself, can never die.

From the glorious heavens above her,
She has shed her beams abroad;
That the souls who truly love her,
May become the sons of God.

Worldlings blindly may refuse her,
Close their eyes and call it night;
Learned scoffers may abuse her,
But they cannot quench her light.

Thrones may totter, empires crumble,
All their glories cease to be;
While she, Christ-like, crowns the humble,
And from bondage sets them free.

God, himself, will still defend her
From the fury of her foe,
Till, she, in her native splendor,
Sits enthroned o'er all below.

POLLY BODINE'S RISK.

A STORY OF THE OHIO SETTLEMENTS.

Years and years ago, when as yet Ohio ranked among the newest of our frontier commonwealths, there lived on the upper waters of the Muskingum a hardy young mountaineer, whom we will call Mark Bodine, and whose name is yet preserved among his many descendants, now rich and honored citizens of the state he helped to build, for his marvelous feats by flood and field.

Tall, handsome, stalwart, Mark was like Nimrod of old a mighty hunter, yet with a clear perception of the probable future of that then wilderness, which made him live and labor well and wisely for the future, as the broad acres of his grandchildren can now testify.

In the very heyday of his young and vigorous manhood he had found a fitting mate in the only daughter of another pioneer settler, and Polly Bodine was not a whit behind her gallant husband in energy of character and beauty of person, while she was hardly his inferior in the management of the rifle.

Like all the class to which they belonged they were adventurous and self-confident to the verge of rashness, and their little cabin, with its rapidly expanding clearing, was built in a locality which was as much beyond all help from others as it was desirable for a fertile soil and a superabundance of game.

The Indians still disputed the possession of those glorious hunting-grounds, and in the fall of 18— they became particularly troublesome. From time to time vague rumors of terrible outrages at other points reached even the lonely cabin of Mark Bodine; but he and Polly had many friends among the redskins, and they felt very little uneasiness until the general war broke out, whose final result was the expulsion of the "gentle savages" beyond the Mississippi.

As yet, however, though several times warned of approaching danger, they had not been molested, and, one bright October morning, Mark prepared to start, with an unusually valuable package of peltry, for a trading-post over twenty miles distant.

There were no roads in those days, and, though he expected to have the aid of some sort of a pony in bringing home his "supplies," Mark calculated on an absence of about four days.

Polly was not at all unused to being left alone even for a longer time; but it was with a sorrowful heart, and a strange, foreboding sort of feeling that she got her husband's breakfast, and prepared to bid him "good-by."

Women in those days, especially when their families were small, had a good deal of leisure time on their hands, and Polly had employed hers of late in working her liege lord a hunting-shirt of more than usually elaborate ornament and finish. Mark looked gayer and more stylish in her fond and loving eyes than ever before, when he donned it and strode out into the sunlight to display to her eyes the results of her patient work. It was perfect in fit and excellent in material, and she felt sure that her husband would not suffer by comparison with any acquaintances whom he might meet at "the post."

A kiss, a hug, and he was gone, and Polly returned into the cabin to take a look at her sleeping twins; and, if the truth must be known, to indulge in the rare luxury of a good cry.

Mark had especially enjoined upon her to keep a good lookout for Indians, and had left for her further protection his favorite hound "Wax," a huge dog, with a dash of mastiff blood, who would indeed have been a valuable addition to any garrison on the frontiers.

The first day and night, and the second, passed as peacefully as hundreds of others had done, and the only use Polly made of her rifle was to bring down a couple of fat deer that wandered carelessly into the bushy clearing. The third night, however, Wax displayed marked symptoms of uneasiness, though Polly could detect no additional signs of danger. She barred the door carefully, covered up the fire, and watched all night beside the rude cradle which held the two blooming pledges of her husband's love. Wax became more and more uneasy toward morning, lying by the door, and watching a chink in the logs with sleepless vigilance, ever and anon giving vent to his perceptions of coming evil by low and wrathful growls. Polly had plenty of arms, and she did not fear that any but a very strong party of redskins would presume to come within range of Mark Bodine's rifle.

"What if they knew that he was away from home?"

Even then, as she looked around at the heavy logs of the cabin, with a "shot-hole" here and there, she felt a fair degree of security. "Was not Mark to be home on the morrow?"

With that thought came a tumult of womanly fears. If there was danger around, would not he be exposed to it? And would not his lonely path through the woods, unprotected by the strong walls of his home, be beset by a thousand fearful perils? Could all his strength and skill guard against the cunning ambush, and the spring of the lurking tiger? As good men as he, too, had been overpowered by numbers, and afterward subjected to all the horrid extremities of an Indian's ingenuity of torture. It was frightful to think of. Oh, how she wished that he was safe at home!

The longest night must have an end, however, and, at last, the tokens of the coming day began to show themselves through the chinks in the logs and the thin-scraped "possum skin," which served as a glazing for the one window. Slowly the light increased, until she knew that now the sun was well up, but she hesitated about making any movement, for any danger to her was also a double danger to her children.

For a while she busied herself about her little household duties, wondering at what time in the day she ought to look for Mark's return; but she began to feel an almost uncontrollable desire to take a look at the outer world.

As for Wax, the noble fellow had ceased growling, with the return of day, but kept steadily at his post. He paid occasional attention to his breakfast, but the erectness of his ears and the nervous agitation of his bushy tail betrayed a canine mind but ill at ease.

By degrees, Polly made up her mind that, if there was any danger in the neighborhood, it could not be very near, and she cautiously unbarred the heavy oaken door. When she let it swing back upon its hinges, she stepped forward with her rifle cocked in her hand, and cast a rapid glance around the clearing. All was as still and peaceful as if there were no marauding savages in the wide world. A few paces in front of the door was the broad stump of a huge pine tree, and at its foot was the spring which furnished them with water. Her survey, which had been taken with lightning quickness, half satisfied her, and her eyes turned to the spring. Wax had stood for a moment by her side in the doorway, as if in uncertainty, but now he bounded forward toward the stump, with a gruff bark of suppressed rage. Almost at the same instant, a tall warrior, in the fantastic paint and war-dress of the Miamis, sprang up from his cover behind the stump, and leveled his rifle. He had no time to fire however, before he found himself in a deadly grapple with the powerful and fearless hound.

Polly's nerve was of the true border firmness, and she sprang to the assistance of her four-footed friend. It was time, for the Indian was no infant, and he already had his scalping-knife in his hand. Polly's aim was deadly, and the long fangs of Wax met in the throat of the savage in a way that prevented any "death-whoop."

He seemed to be without companions, at least very near, for no other shot answered his own, nor did any other of his tribe come to aid or avenge the fallen warrior. Wax, however, was badly wounded by knife-cuts, and required, as he richly deserved, all the attentions of his mistress.

Polly's blood was up, and, after carefully reloading her rifle, she went to examine her fallen foe. Her bullet had passed through his brain, killing him instantly. He was richly dressed in Indian fashion, and Polly felt a sort of vengeful satisfaction as she stripped off his beaded hunting-shirt and gnady blanket, and hung them as trophies in the doorway.

She then helped Wax into the cabin, where he crouched by the cradle in grim patience, and sat down by the stump to watch for Mark's return. Her own dress, like a true daughter of the border, was of buckskin, like her husband's; and her long black hair now fell in disheveled masses to her waist.

Patiently she waited, but it was nearly noon before any signs of life came from the bosom of the boundless forest beyond the little clearing. Then, she thought she caught the sound, dull and distant, of a couple of rifle-shots, and all her heart was in a tumult of anxiety to understand their meaning. She thought that one of them, at least, might be from Mark's, or—fearful thought—they might betoken the success of some deadly ambush for his life.

After a few minutes, which seemed an eternity, her keen eyes caught a glimpse of something moving in the edge of the forest, and she concealed herself behind the stump. The blood coursed through her veins like fire. Her children cried in the cradle, but she did not hear them, for now, beyond all mistake, she could discern, at intervals, above the bushes, the eagle crest of a Miami chief. He seemed to be alone, for she was sure of the identity of those hateful plumes wherever they appeared.

Slowly and terribly the conviction forced itself upon her that Mark must have fallen a victim, and that this must be his destroyer. Her heart, for a moment almost bursting with womanly grief, now gave way to revenge, and she leveled her rifle over the top of the stump, with an unfaltering hand and a deadly purpose.

Crack! That sight was too quickly taken, and she had missed him, for the answering shot, though at long range, nearly rustled her flowing hair.

"He's a good shot for an Indian," she thought, "and that's how he came to kill poor Mark."

It was now a regular game of hide-and-seek, each striving to keep entirely under cover, and yet get a sight of the other, and the redskin was clearly crawling nearer. Shot after shot had been exchanged, when Polly discovered, to her dismay, that her last bullet was in her rifle. To go to the cabin for more, in the face of such a marksman, would be almost certain death.

"I must wait and make sure of him this time," said Polly to herself, "or it's all over with me and the babies."

So she waited and watched for a certain shot; but meanwhile, we must leave her, to follow Mark Bodine's going and coming.

Mark's burden of furs had been a heavy one, rendering frequent stoppages for rest necessary, even for his brawny frame, and it was not until the second day that he reached "the post." Here he was met by such a host of terrible recitations of the ravages of the Indians, that he would at once have started for home, with the intention of promptly removing Polly and the twins to a place of safety, but a military express arrived that afternoon, announcing the movement of heavy bodies of troops, and that the outlying bands of savages who had committed the outrages were all being concentrated for some grand movement, either of assault or retreat. As this was pretty sure to render the settlements more secure, he went on with his original purpose.

The Indian troubles had made furs scarce, so that the market was good. He had no difficulty in securing a very serviceable pony at a low price, from an army sutler, and he would have been in high spirits over his successful trip, but that he was unable to free his mind from anxiety concerning the loved treasures in his cabin home. Determined not to lose any time in his return, his pony was packed, and he was on his way by sunrise of the fourth day.

The woods were comparatively open, and there were no streams hard to cross, yet his progress was necessarily slow, and he was beginning to chafe with impatience, before he found himself nearly approaching his home. Perhaps his anxiety about others had quickened his watchfulness, though his eyes were well trained, and quick in reading all the signs and indications of the wilderness; but at all events, as he trudged along by the side of his patient and sturdy pony, he caught the gleam of a gun-barrel among some fallen timber, and darted instantly to the cover of a neighboring tree.

He was none too rapid in his movements, for a rifle-bullet hissed closely by him as he reached the tree. It was a good shot for an Indian, but the return from the deadly rifle of Mark Bodine was directed by an eye and hand well accustomed to finding the vitals of half-hidden game, and with a ringing death-whoop, the savage bounded from his lurking-place, and fell prone upon the earth, "thrown cold."

On examining him, Mark decided that he must be a warrior of some distinction, if not a chief. The elaborate crest of eagle-feathers and the collar of bear-claws testified that much. The young hunter hardly relished the idea of taking a scalp for a trophy, and so substituted the crest and collar, adding the arms and other "plunder" of his fallen foe to the burden of his pony. It was hardly as well advised an experiment to doff his own coonskin cap, and put on the warrior's crest in place of it, as he found to his cost.

The excitement of his sudden adventure having somewhat passed off, the idea that Indians were lurking so near his home began to trouble him in his very soul.

"What might not have happened to his wife and little ones in his absence?"

With a heart full of awful imaginings, he concealed his pony as well as he might, in some bushes, and hastened forward to reconnoitre, keeping a sharp lookout for any further ambush.

As he drew nearer, his anxiety and his caution increased, for he knew that if the cabin was beset, every approach would be carefully guarded. He was at last in the edge of the forest, and in sight of the cabin. No smoke arose from the chimney, nor were there any other signs of life, and a keen pang thrilled him from head to foot. Even in that moment of deadly fear and pain, however, his coolness did not forsake him, and he kept on as cautiously as before. Suddenly a puff of light smoke arose from behind the well-known stump by the spring, and a rifle ball severed a plume from the eagle crest. He had forgotten that he had it on, and now he did not care. He sent an answering ball at once, however, little doubting now that his home—with its inmates, dead or alive—was in the power of his enemies. He determined on revenge, or, at least, a fight for it, and daringly pressed his way nearer and nearer, using every art to force his antagonist to expose himself, and to ascertain if he were alone. Shot after shot was exchanged, and he had already diminished the distance nearly one-half. There could be no doubt of the state of things at the cabin, for he could distinctly see articles of Indian finery hanging in the open doorway, while no bark of his faithful Wax greeted his approach with customary riot. It is more than likely that his grief and excitement made his aim unsteady, for more than once he had caught glimpses of dark hair and buckskin garments behind the stump which protected his foe. But he now bethought him of a stratagem. He waited patiently for the next shot from the keen marksman opposed to him, and then, with a spring into the air and a loud yell, he fell heavily on the earth, behind a log.

We will now return for a moment to poor Polly, treasuring her invaluable bullet, and watching for a fatal chance. As her keen eyes, glancing along the sights of her rifle, searched the little clump of underbrush which concealed her assailant, even in the act of discovering him, her fears for Mark received an agonizing confirmation. She could not be mistaken in the gay embroidery of the seam of that hunting-shirt, for her own hands had wrought it.

"Not only killed, but plundered!" groaned Polly; and, with vengeful quickness, she "drew a bead" right on the seam, and fired.

There could be no doubt of her success this time, for it was answered by a death cry, and the eagle-plume rose suddenly and then disappeared. She was now about to rush into the cabin for more ammunition, when, to her astonishment, Wax came limping forth, in spite of his wounds, and started, with a deep and mournful howl, in the direction of the fallen warrior.

Something in the tone of that death-whoop came back strangely to her own ears, and, with an undefinable horror struggling at her heart, she followed the dog almost mechanically.

The distance was short enough, but her limbs seemed almost to refuse their offices, and poor Wax, in spite of his hurts, easily kept ahead of her. A moment more, and the brave hound dragged himself, with a whine of delight, over a fallen tree, and almost instantly the eagle-crest, at which she had been firing, rose up before her bewildered eyes.

"Wax? Polly! What——"

"Oh, Mark! Mark!" and poor Polly fell fainting to the ground.

When she came to herself, she was in the arms of her husband, and he was dashing water in her face from the spring, while Wax lay at her feet, howling dismally. It did not take long to explain matters then, though Polly sobbed uncontrollably for a long time, shuddering with horror at the thought of the fearful tragedy which might have been the result of Mark's partial disguise, and her own skillful concealment. Her last shot had not been a bad one, as a long rent in the hunting-shirt and a smart score on Mark's ribs could testify, but both were easily mended. The babies were kissed and hugged indefinitely, the pony and his burden were brought in, Wax was attended to with affectionate care, and a sense of restored security settled over the humble cabin of Mark Bodine. They were never again molested by the Indians; but Polly never seemed to relish any references to her terrible duel with her own husband, and the thought of it, at times, brought a shadow even upon his own sunny face.

HOW HISTORY REPEATS ITSELF.

BY W. S. GODBE.

The Deseret News, while affecting to ignore, and in fact, to deny altogether, the existence of any "Schism in Utah," has, for some time past, devoted its editorial columns quite unsparingly to the publication of articles on "Apostacy," in which the most unmistakable, although covert references have been made to the UTAH MAGAZINE and to those who sustain its sentiments. Now while we do not propose to pay the slightest regard to anything we may deem unbecoming or extravagant, coming from what source it may, we shall not hesitate to use our pen in the refutation of any misstatement, false principle, or erroneous doctrine that may appear in that or any other organ, which we may think worthy of such notice. Aiming in every case to do so in a way that will be regarded by all capable of an unbiased judgment, as unexceptionable.

In an article which appeared in that paper on Dec. 8th headed "Similarity of past and present apostacy," great pains is taken to show that there is a striking resemblance in all the apostacies that have taken place in this Church, from the days of Kirtland to the present, so much so, that "if they were the production of one brain they could not be more alike." Now, were this matter treated upon without special reference to our recent expulsion from the Church and the glorious results, of which that has hastened the birth, we should allow it to pass unnoticed, with others of a similar kind, but, inasmuch, as the design is by the use of such unfair means to reflect dishonor upon men whose characters cannot be successfully assailed openly; and by this method prejudice the public mind against them; we feel it necessary to say a few words in reply, and endeavor to show some points of difference between the apostacies refered to and the Divine Movement which the News thinks fit to misname apostate.

It is affirmed in this article that certain apostates in the days of Kirtland in speaking of Joseph Smith declared that he had performed a divine work, but at that period "he had fallen and was no longer a Prophet."

We say in reference to the same person no such thing. We do assert, however, that Brigham Young, as President of the Church, merely (for he never was, nor does he claim to be a prophet,) has assumed undue authority, in claiming the right to dictate the people in the most complete and absolute sense; in everything,—from their conceptions of Deity to the purchase of their goods; or from a mission to Dixie, to the cut of a garment, the fashion of a bonnet or the "knitting of a stocking."

Attention is next called to the prospectus of a paper—the firs and only issue of which was published in Nauvoo—wherein the writers, among other things, proposed "to advocate unmitigated DISOBEDIENCE to POLITICAL REVELATIONS." Now we have tried hard, but have utterly failed to see what similarity there can possibly exist between this statement and any we have made in our prospectus. We certainly have not advocated "unmitigated disobedience" to revelations of any kind, for the simple reason that there have been none to disobey, that we are aware of, since the Prophet left us. What weakness does it betray to draw deductions, based on the bare assumption that the cases are parallel; would it not be more "logical" to first prove them so? What if apostates by the thousand railed out against imaginary wrongs claimed to have been perpetrated by Joseph Smith, or any other man, when no attempt is made to show that the monstrous dogmas to which we object are true?

First prove that the evils of which we complain have no real existence; show by solid argument that the Priesthood do possess the right of absolute control, and that the unconditional surrendering of the wills of a hundred thousand—or as many million—people to the will of one man is in harmony with the will of Jehovah—do but this, and rest assured none will be more willing than ourselves to render complete submission thereto. It is also affirmed that we must have yielded "to corrupt and iniquitous influences," simply because we honestly differ as stated. But we know the opposite of this statement to be true. We have yielded to the self-same influences by which we were all led into the Church in the first place, only immeasurably intensified. We call them Divine, because they fill the whole being with heavenly love, and tend to uplift and purify the soul and render it fit for the dwelling place of angelic thoughts and purposes.

Still referring to the work of the apostates in Nauvoo this article says:—"With all their efforts they never secured enough followers to make it difficult for a child to count their number on his fingers." Without wishing to treat with levity so important a subject we will venture to affirm that in the present instance the child, even to-day, in counting the followers of the great truths—of which we are but the humble advocates—will have to include his toes as well.

The exclamation; "How curiously history repeats itself," is certainly entitled to notice, for history does repeat itself in a thousand ways more or less remarkable. Note, for example, the time when the Romish priesthood, in northern Europe, feeling that its very foundations were being undermined by the publication of translations of the New Testament, and pamphlets attacking certain fundamental dogmas of their church, resorted to such extraordinary efforts to suppress them, accompanied by the most fierce and bloody persecutions. Is there not some "similarity" between those days of religious intolerance and the present, when the authorities of our Church in Utah are seeking with all their influence, and by the means of their vast and effective organization, to suppress the UTAH MAGAZINE, for discussing, in a mild and respectful way, the question of unconditional obedience, with all its vital issues? And is not the persecution equally fierce and uncompromising—differing only in character? It is true we have no Smithfield at which to burn heritics, but against those who are regarded as such, the direst anathemas are hurled; and those who dare, in opposition to the counsel of their rulers, to read this periodical and judge for themselves, have to do so at the imminent risk of expulsion from the Church; which, to those who believe in the bare possibility of divinity in the exercise of such power, is a moral Smithfield. The most severe measures, compatible with existing circumstances are adopted in the present issue, and they could do no more in the former one. The only difference being that the application of physical persecutions has to give place to intellectual ones. The Inquisition, the Stake and the dungeon, have all been supplanted by enlightened public opinion speaking to the million through that mighty engine of human progress—the press; and the hitherto victorious sword is fast retiring before its conqueror—the pen. Thus it is that "history repeats itself," but in milder forms.

"CHURCH OF ZION."

BY E. L. T. HARRISON.

A correspondent writes to us, on what appears to him to be an impropriety in changing the name of the Church from "The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints" to that of the CHURCH OF ZION as implied in the Manifesto.

Our reply to this is, that personally we have nothing to do with the matter. The idea of any change being necessary never occurred to our minds. We have, simply, been informed—speaking of the future—that "The Church of Zion" will be the name by which our Church will hereafter be distinguished.

As we understand it the name—Church of Latter-Day Saints, was a title simply bestowed as appropriate to that peculiar period in the world's history, at which we had arrived, in contradistinction to that of Former-day Saints. At some period or other in the future—although it was generally supposed to be quite distant—most of us expected that the name of our system would merge into a grander title—one less peculiar to a particular period, and more suited to an eternal condition.

We all know that different titles have been given by the Almighty to His Church in the past to suit certain periods. Titles have been given to suit the times. We, therefore, see no reason why the Almighty has not an equal right to establish a new and more appropriate name to the present Church, if the times require it.

That the name of THE CHURCH OF ZION is a more concise, as well as a more consistent one no one can deny. Whether our people call their church the Church of Zion or not that is what it really is. If a great people exist called Zion, and if that people have a church their church must be the CHURCH of ZION, whether they call it so or not. And this is our case. What more consistent title then can we bear—What more beautiful or appropriate one?

Then again, the name by which that great invisible church is called which exists in the Heavenly worlds is the Church of Zion. Of that great Church we are a branch—we are, therefore, the Church of Zion too. We cannot rise above the fountain, nor can we obtain a holier name.

In the opening up of this Dispensation, Dreams, Visions and Testimonies will be given by the Spirit to thousands to whom this Church will be personally designated as the Church of Zion. The witness of God that this is the title by which He designs to designate His Church in the grand era upon which it is now entering, will accompany our words. Thus the name will be established and sanctified to the judgments and hearts of the people.

INAUGURATION SERVICES OF THE NEW MOVEMENT.

On Sunday last, 19th December, the public meetings in exposition of the principles contained in the Manifesto, issued in this MAGAZINE, were inaugurated. The morning meeting was held at the THIRTEENTH WARD ASSEMBLY ROOMS, Salt Lake City, at half-past eleven o'clock. Long before the time for commencing the service, the Assembly Room was densely crowded, and hundreds had to leave without obtaining admission. Quite a number of the audience were from distant settlements.

On the stand were Elders Eli B. Kelsey, W. S. Godbe, W. H. Shearman, E. L. T. Harrison, H. W. Lawrence, and E. W. Tullidge, in connection with the Movement; and Bishop E. D. Woolley, on the part of the Ward.

The hymn commencing.—"The morning breaks, the shadows flee," was sung, and prayer dedicating the services to God and truth, was offered by E. L. T. Harrison.

W. S. Godbe and E. L. T. Harrison then addressed the meeting, bearing testimony to the administration of divine beings to themselves; revealing a Dispensation of greater light and power to the Church, and opening up a new Era in her history. Both referred to the evidences by which they had demonstrated to themselves the pure and exalted character of the communications received. Judging by the countenances and earnestness displayed by those present, their testimony went home to the hearts of hundreds. The warmest sympathy was expressed on every hand.

In the evening the MASONIC AND ODD FELLOWS' HALL, East Temple Street, was filled to overflowing. Hall, anterooms, and staircase, being one dense block all the period of the service. As in the morning, the meeting was filled for at least half an hour before the commencement of the service; and nearly as many persons went away unable to obtain admission, as those that remained.

E. L. T. HARRISON delivered a discourse on the nature of the evidence by which to test Divine Revelation; defining the difference between Spiritualism and the order of Revelations by which the Movement now inaugurated was established; and enlarging on the spirit and divine purpose of Priesthood, when interpreted in the spirit of Jesus.

W. S. GODBE followed, discoursing with great freedom on the nature and genius of the New Movement.

ELI B. KELSEY bore an energetic and powerful testimony to the divinity of the Movement; as personally witnessed to him by his own inspirations; its agreement with nature and science, and the increase of divine influences in his heart and life.

HENRY W. LAWRENCE declared himself a supporter of the Movement. He had not joined men but principles. He had none but the best feelings towards the existing authorities, between whom and himself there had never been any but the kindest feelings. He had joined the Movement solely because he was convinced of the truth of its principles. He felt assured that thousands would soon be enlisted under its banner.

The meeting was closed by prayer by E. W. TULLIDGE.

The most intense interest was manifested throughout the day. At the close of the evening meeting, some difficulty was experienced in emptying the Hall, owing to the narrowness of the stairs leading to the street; but so great was the kindly feeling felt, that long after the opportunities for leaving presented themselves, groups still filled the Hall, enjoying that sociable feeling that characterized our early associations in the Church. Numberless testimonies were borne by those present to the sweet and happy influence which attended the meetings.

Thus closed the eventful services of the day—a day that will be remembered as a turning point in our history; and to which future generations will look back as to the ushering in of a divine dispensation of greater light and truth to the world at large.

W. H. SHEARMAN, Sec.

SUBSCRIBERS TO THE UTAH MAGAZINE who have ordered it for one year, will receive the balance of papers due them in copies of the TRIBUNE. The number of issues due our subscribers for the year being fifty-two, they will be entitled to receive the TRIBUNE up to number eighteen; up to which issue it will be furnished them. On payment of the additional sum of three dollars, the TRIBUNE will be supplied for the balance of the year.

CLOSE OF THE VOLUME.

With this number we close—for the present at least—the publication of the UTAH MAGAZINE. It is withdrawn that the labors of the editorial staff may be concentrated upon its successor, the MORMON TRIBUNE; the first number of which we desire to publish on the first day of the coming year.

With this issue we present a title page and index, so that the volume may be bound. As a record of the causes which have led to the great Movement now opening upon Mormondom, it will be preserved as an heirloom in many a family. It is far from extravagant to say, that its articles will be referred to in years to come, as containing the pith and point of the great questions which led to a new era, not only in our history, but also in that of the religious world at large.

Through unprecedented opposition on the one hand, and heartfelt sympathy of hundreds of our brethren on the other, we have pushed our way, ever looking upwards for light and guidance. For the inspiration which has filled our minds, and the great hopes which have possessed our hearts, we return thanks to Him by whose great providences the world of humanity have from the earliest ages been carried up the steep of time, from knowledge to knowledge and from light to light. For the fulness of His love which has remembered us as a people and opened for us a door of redemption and progress, and through which the sunlight of diviner truths is now shining into the chambers of men's souls, let all hearts unite in ceaseless praises, for ever: Amen.

REPLY TO ELDER CANNON.—Owing to the press of business connected with the getting out of the MORMON TRIBUNE, the conclusion of our reply to Elder Cannon's discourse must be postponed until the appearance of that journal.

IS UNTHINKING OBEDIENCE REQUIRED?

BY W. H. SHEARMAN.

The Deseret Evening News, of Nov. 25, contains an editorial which, it is presumed, was written to prove that the people of Utah do enjoy and exercise freedom of thought, speech and action, and that they are neither required to, nor do, yield unreasoning obedience to any of the requirements of their leaders. It does not, however, touch the point. It states, what we all know, that the members of our Church, before and at the time of becoming so, did think and judge for themselves in regard to every principle presented to them; but it does not prove that they do so now. It is stated, in the editorial referred to, that "in every move which the people have made they have been urged to find out and understand the propriety of it for themselves;' but if, through mature reflection, they should happen to discover the *im*propriety of any measure and express their conviction to that effect, then they endanger their standing in the Church. This "urging people to find out and understand the propriety of any measure for themselves," is a hollow mockery; for, in all cases, they are required to assume that the proposed measure is correct, and the only way in which the exercise of their reasoning powers is considered justifiable, is in seeking confirmation of the truth of the principle in question.

The ideas advanced in a previous article, in reference to voting, apply equally to this subject. The right to "find out the propriety" and truthfulness of any proposition emanating from the Priesthood, includes the right to discover, if it be possible, its *im*propriety and *un*truthfulness; otherwise investigation is a farce. We all know that this right is, practically, denied.

The prevailing idea seems to be that it is quite necessary and right to investigate and scrutinize the teachings and requirements of any man or set of men outside our Church, but that it is unnecessary and very wrong to do so in reference to any part of the policy or counsels of the Priesthood in the Church, and that it will surely lead the man to apostacy who does it. This shows a very low estimate either of human nature, or of the policy and wisdom of the Priesthood. Either the latter will not bear investigation, or the former is so imperfect that its judgment—with one single exception—cannot be trusted in relation to any particular connected with so important a subject as the salvation of mankind. But how is it that the Elders of this Church have, while preaching the Gospel in the world, for so many years, been in the habit of appealing to this same judgment in men and women,—urging them to examine the foundation of their faith, and to test the principles presented to them by that light "which lighteth every man that cometh into the world," bestowed by God himself, which they were assured, if prayerful and humble, would not lead them astray. It is strange, indeed, if the light of the Gospel and the Holy Spirit accompanying it so injure a man's mind as to render him less capable of judging between truth and error than before receiving them!

Let us now enquire whether unquestioning obedience, in regard to the measures of the Priesthood, is practically required of the members of our Church. It is an exceedingly difficult thing to get at the advocates of this dangerous dogma, for they will assert it and deny it almost in the same breath, and then justify themselves by a chain of metaphysical sophistries that completely bewilder the brains of all but those who are willing to take the time and pains to sift them and discover their absurdity. We think, however, there is sufficient proof that this requirement is made of the members of this Church, with the sanction of the Presiding Priesthood.

In a discourse preached in the Tabernacle, recently, Elder Geo. Q. Cannon makes use of the following words: "Rebel against him and his (Brigham Young's) authority! As well might we rebel against Jehovah himself, or against Jesus!" As a refusal to obey is considered equivalent to rebellion, the above remarks are, of course, intended to apply to all who do not unhesitatingly obey the mandates of President Young. In the same discourse it is stated that, though Jehovah himself is not present in person, yet He is present in Brigham Young by His Spirit; thus, virtually, claiming for the President of this Church, reverence and obedience equal to that of Deity Himself. The words either mean this or they mean nothing. The statement that Brigham Young "is not to be worshipped," is meaningless. If he is so filled with the Holy Spirit and all the attributes of truth that God is virtually present in him, then he is just as worthy to be worshipped as any other being who is in possession of a fulness of the knowledge and attributes of Truth. And if he is not so filled with the Spirit of Truth, then he is fallible, liable to do wrong or to be mistaken; and, if so, he has no right to require his brethren to obey his voice as if it were the voice of God. Those who believe that there is as little difference between the President of this Church and the Almighty, as is represented in this discourse, should certainly obey one as unquestioningly as the other; they would be self-condemned if they did not. But they have no right to insist upon the same obedience from those who do not see sufficient evidence to convince them of the truth of such an assumption. Perhaps it will be said that "infallibility" is not claimed for the President of this Church. If he is not infallible then it follows that he is liable to err; if he can err upon one subject, it is equally possible for him to err upon another; is it not, then, preposterous to ask any people to accept and obey, as infallible and perfect, the counsels and commands of a man who is admitted to be fallible and imperfect? It is reversing the order of nature; and assuming that a muddy fountain can send forth streams of clear water. This doctrine, asserted by Elder Cannon, and practically enforced to-day throughout this Church, amounts to this:—God is not here present in person, but He is present in Spirit in His servant Brigham; therefore, all must obey Brigham Young as if he were God. Then, the Bishops say, —Brigham Young is not present with us in person, but we are acting under his instructions and influence; therefore, you must obey us as you would him. We would have no objection to this sort of obedience, if the grounds upon which it is claimed were correct. But there have been so many instances of mistake, failure and injustice on the part of the members of our Priesthood that we cannot feel it safe or right to entrust them with the irresponsible control of all our temporal and spiritual interests.

The remarks of a certain well-known Church official, when conversing upon this subject with the writer, afford additional confirmation upon this point. He said it would not do to question in our minds any of President Young's measures, or to stop to consider whether any requirement he might make was right or wrong; that it was our business to accept and sustain, without hesitation or investigation, any doctrine, counsel or policy emanating from him,—and that the man who did not do so, would get into the dark and eventually apostatize. A short time since the same person said, in the course of his remarks to a public audience at Tooele, that "we must obey as HORSES and MULES obey! not, that he wished to compare them to horses and mules," but that it was absolutely necessary that the members of this Church should obey their leaders in the same implicit, unreflecting manner that domestic animals obey us! It is astonishing that, in the middle of the nineteenth century, any sane man should presume to give public utterance to such sentiments; and it is, if possible, more surprising that intelligent men and women can calmly and patiently listen to them.

The advocates of this abject submission to the Priesthood quote the examples of Abraham offering his son Isaac, and the Israelites walking round the walls of Jericho, as confirmations of their position. These, as well as other objections, have been thoroughly considered and answered in previous articles by the Editor of this MAGAZINE. It may, however, be of some benefit to refer to them again briefly. Abraham received the command to offer up Isaac directly from God Himself. There is not the slightest probability that he would have attempted to carry out such a command had it come to him through any human being, no matter what Priesthood he might have held. He would certainly have wanted a testimony from the Lord to himself, that such was his will; and if he had not received it he would have been justified in refusing to yield obedience. If Isaac had doubted the divinity of the command, and refused to submit himself to his father, he would not, therefore, have been wilfully disobeying God; neither would he have been thus regarded by the Heavens. We are, both as individuals, and as a people, willing to make any sacrifice that may be necessary, and which we know to be the will of God, for the sake of the truth; indeed we have laid ourselves, our all, upon the altar as completely as did Isaac, and the voice of the Lord has been heard from the Heavens, saying:—It is enough; cut the cords, loose the bands, and let my people go free. There is a great deal of difference, however, between Abraham obeying the voice of God to himself, and our obeying a man who does not even claim any direct communication with heavenly beings.

Again, it is said that had the Israelities reasoned and questioned ever so much in regard to Joshua's strange command to circle the walls of Jericho seven times, they never could have discovered the philosophy of such a requirement. But such objectors forget that the Israelites had received abundant evidence that the power of God was with Joshua. Whatever he had undertaken he had accomplished; hence, they felt confident of the success of all subsequent measures, not doubting that the power and blessing of God would accompany them.

Besides, this command was of so singular a nature that, had obedience to it failed to produce the promised results, Joshua's influence would have been lost forever. If any doubted his authority or prophetic gift, here was an excellent opportunity of testing them and making his folly or wisdom manifest before all Israel. This consideration, alone, would be almost certain to secure obedience to a requirement of a similarly strange character now.

But the majority of our people do not view Brigham Young in the same light that the Israelites did Joshua. We have not seen sufficient reason for reposing the same confidence in him that the Israelites did in their leader. Failure after failure can be pointed out in the policy of the President, and thousands of acts that are anything but God-like on the part of his subordinates, who receive their power from him and claim from the people the same obedience that he does. Consequently, while we can and do sustain Brigham Young, at present, as the President of the Church, we cannot endorse all the measures of the Priesthood as divine, nor consider all their requirements obligatory upon the people.

It is vain to urge, as some do, that individuals may retain their membership in this Church and still differ from the President. The fallacy of this statement has been shown in previous articles. Facts, also, prove the contrary to be the case. One thing is evident,—whatever a man thinks, he must obey the Priesthood unquestioningly or, sooner or later, be cut off the Church; it is only a question of time. If he is called to go on a mission; if he is told to perform any public work, such as making kanyon roads, building telegraph lines or railroads; if required to donate his means for these or other purposes, however foolish and profitless,—what he thinks, or even what he says, is of little importance so long as he obeys: but, if he refuse obedience, he is instantly set down as an apostate and treated accordingly.

We think the foregoing statements and facts answer the question at the head of this article in the affirmative, beyond refutation. One individual tells us that we might as well rebel against God as against the President of the Church; that to question his policy or any of his measures is equivalent to doubting their propriety; that doubt leads to darkness and disobedience, and disobedience is virtual rebellion. Another asserts the necessity of our obeying as horses and mules obey; that is, unresistingly and unreflectingly; while the Church, in the persons of its presiding authorities, confirms the whole by severing from its fellowship all who refuse obedience to its new and continually increasing dogmas and requirements. How men can conscientously state that persons are not required to yield unquestioning obedience to the authorities of the Church, in the face of all the evidence to the contrary, is, to say the least, very surprising. Thank God the day is close at hand when such inconsistencies and unreasonable requirements will pass away for ever.

APOSTATES.

Apostates only are Iconoclasts.—Mrs. Browning,

BY EDWARD W. TULLIDGE.

There has of late been much written from various sides upon apostates. My brethren are stigmatized by my brethren of the other side with an epithet which they know the mass receive with much the same repugnance as they do that of convict. And as, in this "family difficulty" of ours, personalities are also required for personal applications, the Laws, the Higbees, and the Fosters are conjured up as warning spectres of a past experience. The motive of this name-calling is obvious enough, as also these comparisons to characters around which there is the disrepute of a popular prejudice. I have before observed, in relation to such cases, that I will not condescend, in treating of this "Movement," its personalities, and its principles, to degrade the subject to special pleading. "Nicknaming" of each other may become boys, but it becomes not men; stigmatizing epithets may abound in the mouths of partisans, with a weak cause to defend, but they lower apostolic dignitaries, and are as much out of place in an exalted Christianity as in temperate literature.

Now, whether my brethren who are at the present time defending the rights of conscience and advocating the adoption of an elevated Christian platform, are to be classed with the Laws, the Higbees, and the Fosters, I know not, and care less to know. A discussion of this point would be unworthy and unprofitable at best. Each side would take its own peculiar views, and, like similar discussions between the sectarians of the past, it might be continued in our case for half a century, with nothing of enlightenment to the public, but much of bitterness between contending parties. As for the term apostate when applied to myself, it is not offensive, for the world has not yet determined its exact value. It may be the very best that can be applied to men intellectually fighting in the great cause of religious emancipation and social reform. It has been borne by the most illustrious of Earth's sons, by the most devoted martyrs for the cause of God and humanity's good. It was in view of this, and deeply impressed by the divine spirit and theme in the lives of these religious heretics, that the epic soul of Mrs. Browning conceived in its daring exultation over the memory of the world's brightest apostles—

"Apostates only are Iconoclasts."

Let us note a few instances of this fact, as illustrated in the history of the divinest lights of Christendom. We will first go back to the immediate successors and disciples of the Apostles—to those who rank as the very Fathers of the Church, centuries before the distinctive era of the Reformation came. Among these we shall find our great apostates, and find them the brightest luminaries of the Christian Priesthood—the culminating intellects of their ages. Their apostasy consisted in the fact that they differed on some points with the Bishops of Rome, warred against their arrogant assumptions of infallibility and supremacy, and dared to think upon the new dispensation of Christianity.

First in this order came the venerable St. Polycarp, Bishop of Smyrna, and disciple of John the Divine. He was not the arch-apostate, for the famous Origen had preceded him, but in his visit to Rome during the pontificate of St. Aniect, was given the first check to the See of Rome, in her attempt to bring the Church under priestly bondage. Aniect desired to apply to the disciples of Christianity in every land, that pet scheme of priestly despots of every age —universal conformity.

The scheme is very bewitching to the imagination in its specious beauty, but it is in reality hideous with deformities. All its philosophy and aims, reduced to brevity, simply amount to an attempt of the Church to reduce a world to the one-man power, and all human thought to the intolerable bondage of one grand priestly mind. But so petty is its policy to harmonize mankind, that it generally descends to the most contemptible trivialities, instead of rising to some grand platform of universal union for a Christian brotherhood.

Pope St. Aniect was resolved, it appears, to force the Christians in Asia to keep the festival of Easter on the same day as did those at Rome. But St. Polycarp differed with the Pope on this point, affirming the privilege of the Disciples in Asia to keep Easter on the day on which it had been celebrated in Jerusalem from the time of the first Apostles. He moreover affirmed that the discipline of the Church ought not to be arbitrary, and that the various nations who received Christianity ought to be allowed to serve God in accordance with such rites as they thought most pleasing to the Supreme Being. Thus was illustrated, even in the venerable disciple of John the Divine, the characteristic spirit of the men who have been stigmatized as Apostates: it is that of a grand Christian liberality, proceeding from enlightened views. But for his reverent character and influence, the disciple of John the Divine might have been excommunicated by the Bishop of Rome as an apostate, for differing with him concerning the day of Easter. As it was, the Pope dared not touch him; but thence came division of the Christian Church, through the Bishops of Rome continuing to force their dogmatic wills even upon the most trivial points.

Next was the attempt of Pope Victor, an African by birth, to establish the supremacy of Rome, backed by threats of excommunication against all who did not conform to his judgment. But this was met with protests and sharp reprimands from nearly every Bishop of note outside of Rome, and in the name of the Christians of every land. These, therefore, were also apostates in effect, for they did precisely what we are doing to-day in Utah: they proclaimed the omnipotent supremacy and infallibility of one man to be usurpation—to be anti-Christian.

Pope Zephyrinus, however, soon afterwards succeeded in establishing the doctrine of the supremacy of the Bishops of Rome, and his case shows a remarkable example of despotic priests versus enlightened and consistent "apostates." During a storm of persecution this Pope who succeeded in the usurpation of a one-man power, fled from the charge of the Church to save himself, but returned after the storm, to regain favor among the so-called orthodox. He persecuted the "heretics"; he excommunicated the Montanists, among whom was the celebrated Tertullian, one of the most eminent fathers of the Church. The fall of this great man, it is said, deeply affected the Christians and excited general indignation against the Pope and his Romish clergy.

But even long before this date arose the famous Origen, another of the great chiefs of heretics, and, next to Clement, the earliest and most eminent of the Christian writers.

Thus we see how worthy were these apostates of old. "On this subject," says De Cormerin in his Lives of the Popes, "we will remark that the fathers of the Church have nearly all of them been heretics"—that is apostates. Pass now to a brief notice of the Reformers and Dissenters of the Christian Church.

First we have the English Wickliffe, who is called the Morning Star of the Reformation; then the immortal John Huss, apostate and martyr, with his equally eminent disciple, the martyred Jerome of Prague; next that glorious galaxy, Luther Melancthon, Calvin and Knox, followed by the stern uncompromising Nonconformists of England, including our Cromwells, our Hampdens and our Miltons, who apostacy not only from Priestcraft but also from Kingcraft.

Coming farther down we have our Wesleys and Whitfields, dissenters from the Established Church, and in this very day our Father Hyacinthes, advancing towards a grand universalian Christianity, linking the Mother Church of Rome with those of the foremost Protestant Churches of our broad harmonizing age. Ay, you may even go to the Jewish Synagogues and find a corresponding upheaving of the world from advanced Hebrew minds who are breaking through the circles of the past and the distinction of races and creeds.

Such, then, are the apostates of the ages, as we trace them down. Will the Apostolic Priesthood of Utah also remember these illustrious examples when they compare my brethren to the Laws, the Higbees and the Fosters, and can they appreciate the force of the thought of Mrs Browning—

"Apostates only are iconoclasts."

Touching myself, then, as before observed, the name of Apostate is not objectionable. There is one less illustrious which would become me better to claim—that of sinner—for infinitely more disposed am I to pray "God be merciful to me a sinner," than to thank Him that I am as righteous or orthodox as the Chief Priests and Pharisees, and not marred in my life with the faults of humanity.

But concerning my brethren, such as Harrison, Godbe, Lawrence, Shearman and Kelsey, I need not treat the case in the spirit of a seathing cynicism. Neither need I dignify them by comparison with the illustrious apostates of many ages, to outweigh the stigmatizing references to the Laws, the Higbees and the Fosters. The moral, intellectual and social character of my brethren stands boldly out in the minds of the people of Utah, challenging reproach by the unimpeached integrity of their whole lives. The purity of Elias Harrison's life, his great intellectual and moral endowments, and his devoted labors as an Evangelist of the Mormon mission, are all known to thousands throughout this Territory; and Nature, in his very organization, made him what we know him to be in the past and in the present. Ask Fowler and Wells, or ask any profound reader of man, and he shall tell you that God and Nature have written their infallible volumes in the organization of Elias concerning capacity, quality and a high-toned conscience. From such an organization as his there could be but one danger, namely: too strong an ambition to be known in his life and works as an apostle of truth and advanced ideas. This tendency of a superior organization—the force of mind above the force of body—was almost certain, sooner or later, to impel him towards the mission of a Luther, and consequently win for him the distinction of being an apostate.

And touching the personal character of William S. Godbe, he is not only known as a man of capacity, social standing and purity of life, but he is also beloved by ten thousand hearts for his ceaseless benevolence and universal sympathies. No honest man in Utah doubts William Godbe, either in his character, his purposes or testimony. Not even do the authorities, who have "cut him off" from the Church, question the fact that he and Elias have "seen a light and heard a voice," as did Paul; they only impugn the source and stigmatize by the epithet of apostate. This of itself is a striking testimony in favor of these witnesses. And if we connect with them Henry Lawrence, here again we have a man whose truth, justice and uncompromising fidelity to the right, are subjects of public notoriety. Above all the merchants of Utah he is known to represent commercial integrity and solid principles. Not even Godbe or the Walker Brothers will deny to Henry this distinction; this is his commercial character at home and abroad. And as touching religion and the Commonwealth of a people, he is as firm as the Rocky Mountains and as incorruptible in his honor as an ancient Roman. Of him I say, "An Israelite indeed, in whom there is found no guile."

I have instanced Henry with William and Elias, because he stands so strongly before the public as a guarantee for the integrity of this Movement, rather than as an apostolic preacher thereof. And fit companions of these three, in a great cause and the brotherhood of love, are such veterans as Kelsey, such spiritual minds as William H. Shearman.

A TESTIMONY.

BY ELDER ELI B. KELSEY.

I desire in this article to bear an especial Testimony to the Truths proclaimed by elders Godbe and Harrison in their Manifesto. I have borne a general testimony in all my contributions to the MAGAZINE for many months past. Shortly after the heavenly communications were given them, they were imparted to me. I received them with joy and gladness. So powerful was the witness vouchsafed to me of the divine nature of the principles revealed, by and through my own inspirations, that I could no more have rejected them, than I could have denied the fact of my existence. They corresponded with and surpassed my highest and noblest conceptions of Deity. I had long since discarded the dogma, that God had ever chosen an individual, a family, a race or a sect, to hold the Oracles, or the Keys of salvation, to the exclusion of the rest of the human family. Years ago I had outgrown the favorite dogma that God ever had constituted a family or a race his special pets, and destined the remaining myriads of His children to be the "hewers of wood and drawers of water" to the elect, in the regenerated or heavenly condition of the earth. I had long worshipped God as the Lord of the whole earth—the Father of the whole human race; and believed that in the Divine nature the paternal affections must have reached their noblest and grandest development.

The despotic tendencies manifested by our leaders disgusted me. My soul revolted at the idea that the will of my fellows should ever affect my relations with Deity; or that weak, fallible humanity should ever stand between me and my God. I could have no longer worshipped, could I have been made to fear that the will of any man or set of men could either lock or unlock the gates of the heavenly Zion to me. My faith in the divinity of the mission of Joseph alone remained to comfort and sustain me.

I renewed my investigations of the gospel revealed to the Prophet, and gained assurance. I preached the gospel I had received on my first entrance into the Church, and carefully avoided as much as possible any reference to existing dogmas. For proclaiming the higher elements of the gospel revealed to Joseph Smith—although no one dared to attack me—first one pulpit and then another was raised against me; until I was almost utterly ignored as a teacher in Israel. Now, I ask every thinking mind, what was left me, but to outrage my own nature, go back of my deepest convictions, and submit to have another see, hear and understand for me, or to altogether forsake the faith I had received through the ministrations of Joseph Smith. I thank and adore God in every fibre of my being that the light has come—that truth is Divinely scientific in all its characteristics, and demonstrable to the mind.

I must confess I have but indifferent respect for that class of minds that needs to go back in the world's history thousands of years, and erect into dogmatic rules of religious faith the words and teachings of inspired men, who could only be made recipients of inspirations suited to the development of rude and semi-barbarous societies—to that class of mind, that will in spite of all the lessons of history and common sense assert that man entered upon his earthly state of existence on the summit plane of human greatness, and that the race has been deteriorating from Adam until now; that Deity, in vindication of His power and greatness, is going to destroy the world and its teeming millions of intelligences. In my view it would be more to God's glory, and a greater manifestation of Divine power, to save and exalt one soul to the unspeakable joys of an endless celestial existence, than to destroy a world.

I entertain the highest respect for the memory of the inspired men who were lights to the ages in which they lived; even for Jonah, whose conceptions of the power of God were so narrow that he supposed that the "hill country" embraced His jurisdiction; and supposed that if he took shipping and escaped to another land he would be able to avoid the obligations of a very distasteful mission.

"When I was a child, I thought as a child, I spoke as a child, but when I became a man I put away childish things." From childhood to youth, from youth to manhood, and from manhood to mature age, I feel and know that notwithstanding the errors and mistakes of life, I have steadily progressed in the development of all my powers of mind. So it is, in my view, with regard to the human race. From age to age mankind have progressed—grown, developed, and attained to higher developments; risen to higher and still higher planes of thought. I believe that mankind in all their earthly history have never entertained such correct conceptions of the Divine nature; never had such grand conceptions of the goodness, greatness and glory of God—or of the universalian character of the plan of salvation, as they have in this the nineteenth century. When Jesus came to his own they received him not. A crucified Jesus aroused the sympathies of the world and from age to age his divine precepts and examples have gained prestige and power, until now, the world of mankind entertain higher and truer conceptions of Christ's character, spirit and mission than ever before. Joseph Smith was made the instrument through whom the foundation was laid for the introduction of the fullness of the Gospel. The developments of the last forty years have prepared the best minds of the age for the fullness of the Gospel of Christ that shall consume, in the blaze of its glory, the remains of the narrow, exclusive dogmas of the past, and unite all lovers of truth on the grand platform of human sympathies. Elders Godbe and Harrison have been made the happy recipients of the introductory principles of the glorious development of truth, and are, as they have stated in their Manifesto—"as the voice of one crying in the wilderness, prepare ye the way of the Lord, make straight in the desert a highway for our God." I, therefore, in the name of the most High, bear witness with them that light has come; that the heavens are open, and that Angels again administer to man.

NELLIE'S REPENTANCE.

"I will not, Norman!"—and Nellie Wilde brought her little foot down upon the carpet with a force that shook all her bright golden hair from under its little lace morning cap, and sent it rolling in golden shimmering waves over her shoulders.

There was a light in her blue eyes which her husband had never before seen there; and the fresh red lips which had always greeted him with smiles were parted over the white teeth with an expression of unmistakable scorn.

"It is cruel and exacting of you, Norman, when you know how much, how very much I like Mrs. May, and how fond she is of me. It is selfish to ask me to give up the society of my best friend, just to gratify a capricious whim of yours." And Mrs. Wilde burst into tears.

It was not in Norman Wilde's nature to see a woman's tears unmoved. It is scarcely in that of any man, when the tears are those of his own wife, and that wife one so fondly loved and tenderly cherished as Nellie. His habitually grave and quiet voice was full of troubled tenderness now, as he bent over her, and said, in tones of gentle remonstrance, "Nellie!"

"Don't, Norman!" was the pettish answer, as she turned away from the caressing touch of his hand upon her soft golden hair. "I am not a child to be tyrannized over one moment, and coaxed and petted into good humor the next."

Selfish, cruel, tyrannical! It was too much.

Mr. Wilde took his hat with that indescribable air which injured husbands know so well how to assume, and left the room. With a slow step he passed down the stairs and into the street.

Was it wrong, he asked himself, for him to win this bright young life to gladden his quiet home, and diffuse the sunshine of her buoyant spirits over his graver, maturer life? For though there was a difference of but ten years in their respective ages, many cares had made Norman Wilde older at twenty-seven than most men of thirty-five. He thought of it now with something like contempt for himself. He might have known that he could never make her happy; he, with a gravity of demeanour that was almost sternness; and she, with her joyous, loving disposition, for Nellie was good-tempered and affectionate generally, in spite of her wilfulness.

But he had not meant to be tyrannical. No, no; he loved his wife too well for that. Many fair women had looked kindly upon the great lawyer, the wealthy Mr. Wilde. Noble heads had dropped, and fair cheeks flushed at his approach; but the cherished Nellie, with her winning demonstrative ways, undisciplined and ungovernable as she was, had drawn him to her by a strange, sweet fascination, when more beautiful and more intellectual women had failed to make any impression upon his heart. And after all his efforts to make her happy, she had treated his first request with such unreasonable, childish anger.

Something weightier than the great lawsuit of "Hobart versus Long" pressed upon the spirits of Mr. Wilde, as he walked slowly down the street that bitter winter's morning; and his head clerk, Richards, to whom an honest lawyer was a paradox, and law a sublime mystery, thought, as he watched him from the office window, that some new legal stratagem must have taken possession of his brain to make him walk at that pace, when the thermometer stood twenty degrees below zero.

"Ma'am," said Kate, putting her head in at the door of Nellie's room, "Mrs. Lyon would like to see you directly, if it's quite convanient."

"Very well, Kate."

And Nellie, after arranging her hair, and bathing her face, proceeded to her aunt's apartment.

"How do you feel this morning, auntie?"

"Very cheerful, very contented, my child," was the invalid's reply, as she looked up into the innocent, girlish face that bent over her couch. "I should be ungrateful indeed, if, after all the affectionate care lavished upon me by my nephew and his wife, I should be otherwise."

Some shadows resting upon the usually happy face, caught Mrs. Lyon's attention. She loved Nellie dearly, not less for her loving kindness to her, than because she was the wife of her nephew, the only infallible mortal, in Aunt Ruth's eyes, that the world contained.

"Are you not well, Nellie?"

"Quite well, auntie."

"You are unhappy, Nellie?"

There was no answer, but Nellie's lips quivered, and two large tears gathered beneath the heavy drooped lashes, and rolled slowly down her cheeks.

"My dear child, I am surprised, grieved to see you thus. Can you not confide in me?"

"Oh, auntie, Norman is so selfish, so unkind."

"Nellie, tell me one thing—have you quarrelled?"

"Yes."

"And parted in anger?"

"Yes."

"Go to him, my child, and be reconciled. If Norman has erred, he will see his fault; if you have, it is all the more fitting that you should seek a reconciliation."

"Never!"

"Hush, Nellie: I will tell you a story, a true one, about a husband and wife who parted in anger, and never spoke to each other again. It is a terrible thing to anger those we love, Nellie. This man, whom I shall call Robert, was a proud man, grave, and self-possessed in his manners, commanding as a king should be, nobler than any king that ever lived, Nellie, and far, far handsomer. Some thought him stern, but there was one who never found him so; and, though he might have been cold to others, he was all love and tenderness to her."

"His wife, aunt?"

"Yes, Nellie. He loved her with a strength and depth of affection of which few men are capable. Why he loved her with such passionate devotion, I could never see, for she was a wild, thoughtless girl, exacting and wilful; great faults they must have seemed to one as thoroughly self-disciplined as he was. Perhaps he divined what she never knew herself till afterwards, her deep love for him. They had been married but a few months. They had thus far been very happy, for he was, oh, so tender and thoughtful towards her, and she thought she had overcome her faults in her great happiness. They were not overcome, however. One morning, he told her that he was going away to Vernon, and should not be back for two or three days. Vernon was the place where she had always lived till her marriage, and her mother still resided there. She wished to go with him, but he told her it would be impossible. She persisted, and he refused, but without giving his reasons. She grew very angry at his immovable calmness, and said bitter, cutting words, that would have maddened a man less able to control his temper. But he controlled himself. This exasperated her more, and she grew sarcastic and provoking; but, though he grew pale with anger, he gave her not one angry word. She refused to say good-by when he went; and thus they parted, never to meet again on earth."

"Oh, Aunt Ruth!" whispered Nellie, with paling cheeks.

"After he had gone, her anger all died away, and she thought she would follow him and ask his forgiveness, for the thought of his calm, cold scorn, nearly crazed her. She hastily put on her bonnet and cloak, and reached the station just as the train had gone. It was too late. Another train would start in about an hour, and she waited. When she was once on her way, she grew nervous and frightened. She was afraid he would be angry with her for following him, and the day's ride was a torture to her. When she arrived in Vernon it was dusk, and there was a crowd gathered around the station, seemingly under some strong excitement. A terrible fear of something, she knew not what, took possession of her as she stepped on the platform. She soon found out what had happened. A man on the other train, in stepping off, had, in his hurry, caught his foot, and fallen on the line. The train was in motion. Oh, Nellie! her repentance came too late."

There was an agony in Aunt Ruth's voice which flashed a sudden suspicion across Nellie's mind.

"He had heard that her mother was very ill with the small-pox, then raging in Vernon. He did not wish to pain or frighten her with the news till he had ascertained the truth of the report. This was the reason he refused to let her accompany him; this was why he could give no reason for the refusal. Tender and forbearing to the last; and she—oh, how had she repaid him!"

"And what became of her, auntie?"

"She took the disease from which his care would have guarded her, and for long weeks lay balancing between life and death. She prayed for death; but her prayers were not answered. Some portions of her former strength came back to her, but health never. She has never left her couch since that fatal day; but in the tender care of his nephew, who is as like him in disposition as in form and features, she has found content."

Nellie knew now whose story she had been listening to.

"No wonder she loves Norman so much," said the little wife to herself, as she wiped her tearful eyes, and stole out of the room.

* * * * * * * *

"A client, sir; a lady wishes to see you," said Richards, as he put his head into the dusty office where Mr. Wilde sat leaning over a table covered with papers which were scattered about in lawyer-like confusion.

"Very well, Richards."

And Mr. Wilde rose, and walked into the front office, where a little fur-muffled figure sat awaiting him. As he closed the door, Nellie sprang forward to meet him.

"Nellie!"

"Oh, Norman!" and she clung to him, sobbing. "Forgive me! I will never speak to Mrs. May again."

"She is a bad woman; not a fit associate for my little artless wife. I know this, else I had not asked you to give her up. And you came all this distance in the cold to see me about it! My little Nellie!"

And he kissed her fondly.

"Norman,"—and she clung closer, sobbing still,—"I have suffered so much! Forgive me and we will never part in anger again."

"My own darling, never."

And they never did. Through the long and happy years of married life which followed, no word of unkindness or reproach passed the lips of either, and they often spoke of this happy termination to the first and last quarrel.

VELOCIPEDES.

We find in "Howitt's Visits to Remarkable Places," published in 1841, a description of a velocipede seen by the author during a visit to Alnwick Castle, Northumberland, as follows:

"Among the curiosities laid up here are two velocipedes—machines which, twenty years ago, were for a short period much in vogue. One young man of my acquaintance rode on one of these wooden horses all the way from London to Falkirk, and was requested at various towns to exhibit his management of it to the ladies and gentlemen of the place; he afterward made a long excursion to France upon it. He was a very adroit velocipedian, and was always very much amused with the circumstance of a gentleman meeting him on the highway by the river side, who, requesting to be allowed to try it, and being shown how he must turn the handle to guide it, set off with great spirit, but turning the handle the wrong way, soon found himself hurrying to the edge of the river, where, in his flurry, instead of turning the handle the other way, he began lustily shouting, 'Woh, woh!' and so crying, plunged headlong into the stream. The Duke's horse, which is laid up for the gratification of posterity, was, I believe, not so very unruly; yet I was told its pranks caused it to be disused and here stabled. It is said the Duke and his physicians used to amuse themselves with careering about the grounds on these steeds; but one day, being somewhere on the terrace, his Grace's Trojan steed capsized, and rolled over and over with him down the green bank, much to the amusement of a troop of urchins who were mounted on a wall close by the road to witness this novel kind of racing. On this accident the velocipede was laid up in lavender, and a fine specimen of the breed it is. I asked the old porter if the story was true, but he only replied and said, 'Mind, I did not tell you that. Don't pretend to say, if you write any account of this place, that you had that from me.'"

Correspondence.

[The following letter was handed to us for publication by Bro. Shearman. When it was written, Bro. DeWitt had not attended any of our public meetings, and only one or two of our private ones; only having heard of the Movement a few days since. ED.]

OGDEN, Dec. 18th, 1869.

DEAR BRO. SHEARMAN,

Since I last saw you in Salt Lake City, at that private meeting where so much of the holy influences of heaven were felt, I have been much concerned about the Great Movement which has just commenced—so much so that I made it a matter of earnest prayer to that Being who has said that He will give to all men liberally, who would ask in faith, believing. On Thursday last, after retiring to bed, I fell into a calm sleep and I dreamed that I saw a very wide body of water between this world and that which is to come. I thought that there had always been a way by which mankind could pass over this mighty stream, although in past ages the path was very poor—merely piles, driven into the water, the tops of which came within a few inches of the surface. I looked down from where I stood and saw people, though but very few, passing over, one after the other, on these piles, feeling their way beneath the surface of the water as they stepped from one pile to another. About on the level from where I stood, President Young and many others were building a bridge entirely of earthly material. The bridge was far enough completed for people to pass over with difficulty. The people on this bridge appeared more beautiful than those on the lower path or piles. I thought a man stood by me and said, "Look up." I did so, and saw Bro's. Harrison and Godbe, building another bridge at a much greater height above Brigham's bridge, than his was above the one below. I also saw a great number helping to build the bridge, carrying material up to these men. Another tallish man, of a rather dark complexion, was superintending the job. I also saw the angels bringing much material from above to help those engaged below to hasten on the work. I never saw anything so stupendous completed in so short a time as this great work was; but it was finished, and I saw tens of thousands of people ready to cross the bridge. They all appeared very happy and beautiful—far more so than any mortals I ever saw; and as they passed over this bridge, I heard them singing—

"A new connecting link is given Between the sons of earth and Heaven."

With this I awoke, my bosom filled with a heavenly and peaceful influence.

Your old friend and Brother,

AARON DEWITT.

[The following communication, received from a valued friend in the Eastern states, who formerly resided in this Territory, and uniformly made good his claims to the respect and confidence of our citizens—though not written with a view to publication, shows such a just appreciation of the position occupied by the UTAH MAGAZINE and its supporters, and such an enlightened zeal in the cause of God's truth and man's amelioration, that we cannot refrain from inserting it in our columns.]

MESSRS. GODBE & HARRISON,

Gentlemen:—You are sufficiently familiar with the general integrity of my motives, and the undisguised character of my devotion to what I deem for the best interests of mankind, to permit me, without further apology, to address you in relation to your present religious difficulties, and to offer you at the same time my congratulations and my sympathy. Your case has awakened an interest throughout the East which is not confined to persons sustaining sentiments of hostility or vulgar prejudice against the Church from which you have been officially severed, and many otherwise disinterested minds are watching the progress of events in Utah in reference, simply, to their bearing upon the welfare of humanity. My long residence in your midst has enabled me to thoroughly appreciate the situation in which you have been placed, both anterior and subsequent to the edict of excommunication, and I am satisfied that your action has the approval of God, and will receive his sustaining grace. In any system of politics or religion, the man who, as a leader, assumes the virtue of infallibility, (belonging only to God) and attempts to control the minds and consciences of others, introduces a plank into his platform so essentially rotten that it cannot permanently sustain its own weight, and I am quite unwilling to believe that any respectable number of intelligent men and women will long persist in propping up so rickety a structure. Further than this, I have nothing to urge against the Church institution of Utah. With its earlier hopes and aspirations, I have felt myself before now, strongly in sympathy.

From the tone of your MAGAZINE since the forced act of separation, I am encouraged to believe that the shock, however severe and unlooked for, will not disturb your steadfast faith in God, and your sincere devotion to the cause of true religion. Relying upon the Divine aid, and the righteousness of your cause, I trust you will be enabled to pass triumphantly through the fiery ordeal, and be instrumental in placing the freedom of mind and conscience in Utah upon a broad and enduring basis.

YOUR FRIEND,
* * * * * *

OGDEN CITY, Nov. 28th 69.

DEAR BRO. HARRISON,

I take up my pen to congratulate you on the stand that you, and a few other brave men, have taken, to vindicate the cause of freedom of thought and liberty of speech, in opposition to priestly repression and slavish submission.

The work of cutting off the Church goes bravely on in Ogden City, and side by side is the great and increasing interest manifested in the statements contained in the UTAH MAGAZINE, which is eagerly read and discussed by great numbers, who, if honest, must join with those who, to keep a good conscience, are willing to lose their good name amongst their brethren for a time. As regards myself, I have long felt the absolute necessity for a change in the present order of things, and on reflecting, I have felt to say are there none on the Lord's side? and the answer has come, that there are thousands who have not bowed down to the creature but who love God and desire to do His will, and not the requirements of a fallible man, whose failings and imperfections are manifest to all but himself and those whose interest it is to flatter him. Alas, poor humanity, clothed with a little brief authority, plays, before high heaven, fantastic tricks which make the angels weep. But one thing is certain, no one can cut us off from a clear conscience void of offence to God and man, and if it comes to the test, I trust I shall not belie my conscience in speaking my honest convictions, believing in so doing I shall best serve the interests of the Kingdom of God, and the welfare of the whole human family. I do not write this for publication, or my own glorification, but simply to state that your course is appreciated and fully endorsed by many of those in the Church, who are not yet bold enough to avow their real sentiments.

With great respect, I remain your brother in the Gospel.
